The man who drave the ambu-lance
Said laughingly, "No more he'll dance,
But 'twill be cheaper buying pance"—
Ah, where is Charlie's leg?

Thus every Fourth our darlings lose
Some features or a limb;
'Tis 'most enough to cause the blues
And make our lot seem grim.
But, many be their limbs or few
Compared with those that on them grew,
We'll shout for Yankee doodle do
From dawn till dusktide dim.

A "How to" Graduate.

"Now, my dear," said the young husband after the cook had left in wrath, "I will go and get a nice rib roast and some potatoes and things, and I know you can prepare a dinner that will be fit for a king."

"I could get up a luncheon, darling, but not a dinner."

"Why, you took first prize at cooking school!"

"Yes, but I only studied the branches that taught how to get up a dainty luncheon from the cold meats and scraps of yesterday's dinner. Oh, I'll tell you! You go somewhere and get some scraps and I'll make the dearest croquettes you ever tasted."—Judge.

CAP AND THE CAT.

By Judson Welles.

Copyright, 1907, by Homer Sprague.

Hank Hinman sat on the front porch and gazed frankly and longingly across the neat fence to where Matie Forman worked in the garden and apparently gave him no heed. Hinman had yet to find that a woman may look north or south and yet be seeing east or west.

Matie very much approved of Hinman's attitude. The hunched up shoulders spoke eloquently of the good effect of her training. As a rule, those shoulders were accustomed to swagger, and it was the swagger to which Matie had objected. Just because they were engaged she did not concede his right to order her about, and the engagement had been broken.

Now that he was in this frame of mind she was quite willing to make up, but naturally to let the overture come from her would be a tactical error, and it did not look as though Hank would ever be enough himself again to make the first move. She was rather sorry for him and just a tiny bit contemptuous.

This might have been the end of the story had it not been for Miss Marsden's cat. Hank hated Miss Marsden, her cat and all else that was hers. Having failed to acquire a proprietary right to a man in her younger days, she was revenging herself upon the sex by leading the women's rights movement in Carrsdale.

It was she who had inculcated these advanced notions in Matie, and Hank cordially hated her for it. Captain, Hank's dog, looked up, with wagging tail and appeal in his soft brown eyes. Hank nodded.

"Get her, Cap," he urged, but Captain needed no urging. With a yelp of delight he was off down the side of the plot. Susan (her full name was Susan B. Anthony) looked up to find retreat cut off. There were no trees in the Hinman front yard, and she made for the next lot. She scrambled through the wide set pickets, and Captain took the fence with a leap, landing against Matie, who was just planting a bulb. He precipitated her into the middle of the tulip bed. Then he dashed on in pursuit of the cat, now comfortably intrenched up an apple tree.

Hank sprang to Matie's rescue, but before he could leap the fence she had scrambled to her feet and was facing him, her face white with anger save for the red spots that glowed on either cheek.

"You set the dog on me," she declared, with a stamp of her foot. "I never thought that you could be so—so"—

"I didn't," defended Hank before she could find an adjective commensurate with the offense.

"You did," she contradicted. "I heard you. You said, 'Get her, Cap,' and then he"—

"Nothing of the sort," protested Hank hotly. "Old Miss Marsden's familiar spirit came over into my yard. Cap wanted a run, and I told him to get after her. She ran into your yard, and there she is now up a tree, just like her mistress should be."

Cap's canine entreaties to the cat to come down and be annihilated were too vociferous to be overlooked. Matie took a fresh tack.

"Anyhow," she sniffed, "you were cruel to dumb animals. That's bad enough."

"She's not a dumb animal," insisted Hank. "She's a demon in a cat's skin. I think she puts her mistress up to all these tricks."

"What tricks?" demanded Matie truculently.

"These women's rights things and all that. I heard her telling you the other night that it was traitorous to the cause to stand my bullying. I heard her. I wasn't bullying. I was telling you for your own good that Jim Sears was not a fit person for you to know."

"And because you think that she influenced me you are taking it out on a poor little kitten?"

"Kitten!" he scoffed. "She's no more a kitten than is Miss Marsden."

"We shall all be old some day," she reproved. "It is not Miss Emmy's fault."

"It's her fault that she's a meddlesome old maid," he persisted. It's her fault that she keeps a cat that is a thorn in the flesh of all her neighbors."

"I love her," announced Matie just to be contrary. Hank whistled, and Cap came to his side, carefully picking out the walks in his approach.

"A love of cats is the second stage of sphasterhood," he said stiffly. "If that's the way you are getting to feel I guess Cap and I had better be going home."

"You are perfectly hateful this morning," she pouted.

"That statement is beginning to look frayed on the edges," he reminded. "It is what you said last night, also day before yesterday."

"Well, you are," she repeated. "He... I was enjoying the nice morning, and you race your dog after a cat and spoil my flower beds. Then because I am naturally annoyed you tell me that I am a confirmed old maid."

"Only a second degree old maid," he reminded. "The third degree is corkscrew curls and a pointed chin. There is still hope for you."

"I am grateful that you concede anything," she said stiffly.

"I am nothing if not honest," he retorted.

"Not always," she insisted. "What you said about Jim Sears, for instance."

"He was arrested last night for running a dog fight last week. That was my kick. I knew about it when I spoke. Both dogs were killed."

"Perhaps you were right," she shuddered. "I didn't care about Jim Sears, but I did not like your dictatorial manner."

"Thanks to Miss Marsden," he contended. "I'll bet she told you that if you gave in before marriage you would encourage a tyrant husband."

"Who told you?" she asked quickly.

"No one. I just know how she talks. She knows everything about husbands except how to get one."

"It wasn't that I am guided by her," declared Matie, with a toss of her head. "But I think she was right. Anyhow, you had no right to take it out on the cat."

"But she kills my chickens."

"Susan? Impossible!"

"Impossible?" he echoed. "Why, she is the worst"— The sentence was broken short, for with a growl Cap started for the fence, just in time to collar Susan, who was trying to slip through. There was a scurry, a howl and the cat lay dead on the grass.

With a cry of anger Matie sprang forward, Hank following more slowly. It was not like Susan to get caught in this fashion. Usually she could beat the ponderous Newfoundland. Then Matie, who had been stooping over the cat, straightened up and patted Cap's head.

"Good old dog," she praised. "Nice old fellow."

"What is it?" cried Hank, bewildered by the sudden change. She held out a little ball of yellow.

"I was cleaning Dicky's cage," she explained, "and left him out on the porch. That horrid brute knocked o the cage and killed him."

"So that's why she couldn't make her get away," he murmured. "I knew she was too fast for Cap."

"I'll call the bird Cap," she promised. "And there won't be any horrid cat to kill him."

He glanced at the solitaire restored to her finger.

"And if Miss Marsden interferes we'll set Cap on her," he promised. "Come, Cap. Good old boy."

"Good old Cap," echoed Matie as she kissed the precious ring.

Money and Kisses.

A man living for the time being in Columbus and who is in the habit of giving his wife a generous roll of bills the first day of every month for her pin money complained the other day that she owed him $2.80 for acting as her caddie while on the golf links during a visit to the sunny south. She demurred, but asked if he would be willing to take the pay in kisses. Although a Benedict of long standing, he still adores his wife, and he agreed to this method of payment.

While they were at breakfast on the first day of the following month he drew out his pocketbook and began counting out various bills of large denomination, while she, with hand outstretched, waited eagerly for the roll, remarking that her last month's allowance was all spent.

"Wait a moment," he said. "I believe I'll give you kisses instead." And the money was stuffed back in his pocket, much to her dismay.

It is only fair to say, however, that later she received both money and kisses.—Columbus Dispatch.

Too Low!

A well known sportsman had become very tired of listening to a series of shooting yarns that some friends had been spinning. At last he launched his first and only story that night. "I went into a field one day to have a shot," he said. "The only game in sight was an immense flock of blackbirds. I should say there were 10,000 in the flock. I fired both barrels, and how many do you think I killed?" Different guesses were made, ranging from twenty to a hundred birds. "Not one," said the stranger, "but I went out to look for results and picked up thirty bushels of legs. I had sh... ittle too low."—Tatler.

Early Pottery.

One of the principal territories of the potters for centuries was Kingte Chin, the finest pieces being made during the Ming dynasty. It is stated that the fine specimens were made with so much care that out of 200 pieces they would sometimes destroy 199. It is recorded in 1615 that a titled man in Japan had one of his attendants of rank whipped for breaking a cup and then sent to China at his own expense to buy another.

A MUSICAL EVENT.

Ol' Bill's a solemn kind o' man; he jes' looks straight ahead,
An' has a serious way o' takin' everything dat's said.
You won't find no one quieter, no matter whah you search.
He owns a house an' lot an' is a member of de church.
Dar's only one thing tempts him now an' then to step aside
F'um all his ordinary ways of dignity an' pride,
An' den de fam'ly gathers 'roun'; dey hears it mighty soon
Wen ol' Bill takes de banjo down an' stahts a little tune.

us' he strikes a lively one—he sorter shets his eyes,
Like he was lookin' far away acrost de distant skies
An' seein' 'way back yonder when he danced across de flo'
Wif folks dat was young folks wif him—dat mus' be long ago!
It soun's jes' like de robin an' de cricket an' de bee
A-joinin' in together in a contest foh to see
Which one of 'em kin make de loudes' music in de lan',
An' ol' Bill, he jes' sits an' plays, de leader of de ban'.

An' den he hums a little song; he hums it sof' an' low;
De banjo seems to answer back. It somehow 'pears to know
He's thinkin' 'bout de starlight an' de lonesome whippoorwill
Dat used to tell its troubles f'um de woods upon de hill.
An' den he smiles like some one was a-callin', far away—
Dar ain't nobody 'round here dat kin make him smile dat way.
It's like de honeysuckles sighin' sweetness to de moon
When ol' Bill takes de banjo down an' stahts a little tune.

He Took It Literally.

Billings ordered some wall paper.

The store sent a consignment of paper, together with a paperhanger, to Billings' home.

Billings looked at the paper and found it was not the pattern he had ordered.

He told the paperhanger in a vigorous manner that he disapproved of the paper and then started for the store to have his order filled as given.

When he arrived home he found the wrong paper on the wall.

"Why did you hang this paper?" he asked the paperhanger.

"Because you told me to," was the response.

"Nothing of the sort!" cried Billings.

"I remember your exact words, sir," said the paperhanger.

"What were they?"

"You said, 'That isn't the paper ordered, hang it all!'"

Overloaded.

"Jump down, Follette! The bench is breaking down!"—Journal Amusant.

Fair Exchange.

The man who had been undergoing the tortures of a lightning shave on a Saturday night stepped from the chair and fished out a dime.

"But don't you think you ought to give me an extra nick?" hastened the slangy barber.

"I suppose so, bub," replied the patron as he rubbed his sliced chin. "I notice you gave me several nicks."—Detroit Tribune.

No Novice.

"Why," asked her mother, "do you think Mr. Sniggesley has had experience in lovemaking?"

"I noticed that he took pains whenever he tried to kiss me to arrange it so that we could not be seen by any one who might be peeping through the keyhole."—Chicago Record-Herald.

Sordid.

"Do you believe in art for art's sake?" asked the transcendentalist.

"No," answered the materialist; "the mention of art for art's sake usually means a request to work hard without getting paid for it."—Washington Star.

A Different Thing.

"Did I understand you to say that all rum selling has been stopped in your town?"

"Not at all. I merely said it was strictly prohibited."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Eph's Condition.

Ephra'm Brown an' me are neighbors—been so more than forty year;
But of late he's got to actin' an' a-talkin' mighty queer,
For whene'er I chance tew meet him, Josh'y Jones," he sez, sez he,
"Tell me, if yew kin, what wuz I, an' what be I goin' tew be?"

When he sez tew me, "What wuz I?" in that holler sort o' way,
I don't make no bones o' leavin' with a kind o' short "Good day."
Then he sez, "What will I be, Josh?" with that daft look in his eye,
I jest bolt out mighty sudden without mentionin' "Goodby."

He's a-gittin' wuss an' wusser, with that wild look in his face;
An' he even asks them questions to the critters on the place.
"Wuz I once a Cochin China or a barkin' dog?" sez he.
"If I wuzzent me, who wuz I, an' who be I goin' tew be?"

I can't make no speckilation when he puts the thing that way,
But I'm wishin' he would ask me, "Josh, what be I right tewday?"
I could answer him so sudden that I 'low 'twould make him sick—
I'd say, "Eph, in my opeenyon, yew're a ravin' loonytick."

THE REPUBLICAN
Job Printing Department

Within the past year the increased demand made upon the Job Printing Department of The Republican necessitated many improvements, and to meet the requirements of our rapidly increasing business an addition of considerable proportions to our present building is in contemplation; new type and improved machinery must be purchased, but in the meantime all orders will be executed in a most satisfactory manner.

The products of our Job Printery are all models in the class, our customers are numerous and well satisfied and when ordering

Statements, Cards, Sale Bills,
Vouchers, Posters, Envelopes,
Bank Forms, Bill Heads, Programs,
Letter Heads, Folders, Tags, and Letter Press Printing of all Kinds

they are confident that the work will be satisfactory in every particular---in Workmanship, Price and Paper.

WE MAKE A SPECIALTY OF PRINTING

Lumber and Coal Companies' Forms
Bank Stationery, Hotel Prospectus,
Lodge and Society Laws, Reports, Etc.

It will cost you nothing to submit your Printing to us. Estimates will be cheerfully furnished you free. It must be borne in mind, however, that we do not do "cheap" printing, but we do Good Printing which has a par value of one hundred cents for every dollar invested in the product of THE REPUBLICAN PRINTERY

PENCILINGS BY THE WAY.

Graphic, Descriptive Account of the West by U. G. Palmer.

A Burlington engine pulling a train of eleven cars from the level Platt Valley to Denver, nearly twice as high as Oakland, may seem increditable to the Marylander but when it is known that it takes several hours and many miles to do it, it loses its incredibility. This ride until the immediate vicinity of Denver is reached shows all of the marks of getting farther and farther from the centers of civilization. Here we pass from the fertile valley farms, well irrigated and raising record breaking crops of sugar beets and alfalfa, to the buffalo moss covered sandy plains that offer but scanty inducements to the raisers of cattle, sheep and horse. Thousands of heads of stock perished last winter from lack of food and shelter and many of the carcasses are still seem from the car window.

This is the land of perpetual sunshine. Denver is a surprising city to the Eastern man. Colorado is the Pennsylvania of the West. It was admitted in 1876 as the "Centennial State."

Denver has 16 railroads, covers 89 square miles of territory, and scarcely a wood building is to be seen as lumber is scarce and stone, cement and brick are cheap.

The city was surveyed 48 years ago and today has a population of 225,000. Its banks have $100,000,000 on deposit. It has 72 miles of paved streets, 225 miles of street car tracks. It is the center of the mining industry of the west. The Omaha and Grant smelter is one of the largest in the world and its chimney is the highest in this country and the third largest in the world.

The residence section of the city is more beautiful and more artistic than the water side of Beacon street, Boston, or the Murray Hill section of Fifth avenue, New York—although of course the houses themselves cost far less and gardens, vines, &c., lack the beauty and individuality that come from age.

I was surprised to see here the home of Lawrence C. Phipps, the one time partner of Andrew Carnegie, and to learn that here lives Dr. Grant credited with being the first physician to perform an operation for appendicitis.

Mr. Phipps has endowed a home for consumptives 4 miles from the city with accommodations for 350 persons—in honor of his mother who died of that disease.

Today at noon the weather is like Oakland on July 4th and plainly visible from all parts of the city are the summits of the Rocky mountains clothed in perpetual snow—Pike's and Long's peaks 75 and 100 miles away and hard to believe as being one tenth of that distance.

I was charmed with Lincoln's capitol but Denver's cost $3,000,000—its basement floor is just one mile above sea level and from the top of its dome the mountains can be seen for 200 miles.

In the basement is the most complete and valuable collection of the Cliff Dwellers in the world and for which the State refused an offer of $1,000,000.

The mint at Denver, while not large comparatively, is said to be the most perfect one in the world.

Colorado Springs is the Deer Park of Colorado, only that it has 35,000 people and 43 millionaires. The Alamo and Anthers hotels are elegant in their appointments—like the Turraine of Boston and Waldof-Astoria of New York. The streets are very very wide and lined with shade trees. There is more timber in them than all I have seen in Colorado to date. We are right up under the shadow here of the Rocky mountains, which must be seen to be appreciated as no person can fully described their imposing majesty.

The waters here flow through the Arkansas to the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic. A few hours west the great continental divide is crossed and find ourselves in the region tributary to the Pacific, through the Colorado River and and Gulf of Lower California.

While this city depends largely on its tourist trade, it has the largest mining exchange in the world and fixes the prices of mining stocks in New York, San Francisco, and elsewhere. Also a few miles away is the plant of the United States Reduction Co., and two other smelters which neat 1350 tons of Cripple Creek ores every twenty-four hours and I was surprised to find there great trunk lines of railroad—the Rock Island, the Santa Fe and Missouri Pacific centering here. But it cannot help becoming more and more popular with the tourist every year, with Pike's Peak, Manitou, The Garden of the Gods, and a dozen other less noted but no less wonderful attractions surrounding the city. I have just returned from a trip to Cripple Creek and it is a task to select what to write, as I am filled with scenery as Chicago is with beer—to "saturation."

I always had great respect for the engineer who built the Baltimore and Ohio across the Alleghenies. To us Eastern people the system from Piedmont to Altamont and from Terra Alta to the top again of the mountains west of Rowlesburg will always command our admiration. But it is only A B C of engineering as compared with the Short line from Colorado Springs to Cripple Creek. The air line distance is twelve miles, the distance by rail is 49.9 miles. From Colorado Springs to Summit is a distance of 21.4 miles. It climbs from an altitude of 5,992 feet to one of 9,918 feet. And this climbing is right by the side of the migh y Rockies, so aptly styled the "Backbone of the Continent," rearing their lofty forms almost perpendicularly for thousands of feet; great red wall of almost base granite, cut here and there by canons equally as deep which must be spanned, one continuous succession of cuts and fills and trestles and tunnels.

At Point Sublime the road is carried across from one mountain to another on a trestle anchored to the side of the mountain and the passenger can look out of the car window down a perpendicular distance of 1,000 feet to the bottom of Cheyenne Canon. Across the canon apparently only a few hundred feet away rises the mountains fully 3,000 feet higher than the train. This view impressed me more than any other and literally made me "catch my breath."

As we enter the goldfields, we pass on the left, Altman, which enjoys the distinction of being the highest incorporated town on the American continent, its elevation being over 10,000 feet, nearly three times as high as the highest point in Great Back Bone mountain.

Fifteen years ago Cripple Creek was cattle grazing country. Eor the past five years its gold production each year has exceeded that of any other district in the world—averaging close to $25.-000,000 per year, or one tenth of the world's total output. Nearly all of this comes from a few great mines, the Portland (the greatest one, paying more than a million annually in dividends), the El Paso, Stratton's Independence, the Vindicator, etc. Although the district is fifteen years old, only twenty companies are on a dividend paying basis and yet the population is now only 50,000 as compared with 70,000 at one time.

The Rockies are literally plugged full of holds, nearly all of which are of the shallowest kind, for miles in every direction hundreds of which had no other end in view than the sale of the stock in million dollar companies to Eastern "suckers."

Early this morning, I was out to Manitou and the "Garden of the Gods." From the former the tourist climbs by the famous cog railroad in a journey of nine miles to the top of Pike's Peak 14,147 feet above the sea. This railroad is claimed to be a great triumph of engineering, but the building of an almost straight cog road up a steep incline seems to me an easy proposition as compared with the Cripple Creek Short line.

The rock formations in the "Garden of the Gods" are like the ones seen along the Potomac in the vicinity of Cumberland, only on a scale a hundred time as great. They are simply the result of the action of the elements during untold ages on the strata of rocks of varying degrees of hardness that were tilted up vertically by volcanic action. The softer portions are worn away and the harder parts remain, after assuming very grotesque and fantastic forms.

Nearby in Cheyenne Canon and only a few feet from the trail which leads to its head, lies buried Helen Hunt Jackson.

I will mail this from Woodland Park, a few miles west of Colorado Springs, on the Colorado Midland railroad, where the finest possible views of Pike's Peak are to be obtained, apparently as close to the observer as Monte Vista is to Oakland, but eighteen miles away.

I have spent the past six hours in Soda Springs, Idado. It is the center of the sheep belt of south east Idaho. There are scores of herds here that exceed 10,000 head in number. There are also thousands of acres of land, the richest kind for farming purposes, along the Bear River here that need only water to make them as productive as any soil in the world and the irrigation schemes now being developed make an eastern man open his eyes with wonder.

This is one of the towns which the Southern Pacific Railroad company advised me that needs a bank badly. If it were in the east it would have two. It ships annually 2,000,000 pounds of wool, 1,500 double decked cars of sheep, 1500 cars of cattle and other things in proportion. There is an immense country tributary to it, including the rich caribou mining country and the bulk of banking is done at Pocatello, 69 miles away. Three hundred and fifty people in this vicinity have bank accounts at Salt Lake City, Ogda, Montpelier, Pocatello, etc. The town has a much finer school building than Oakland, an an electric light plant, creamery, the finest mineral springs in the state, large summer hotels and the usual business places of a town of 1,000 people.

The discount rate in this country is 1 per cent. per month on all loans of less than $1,000 and at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum on larger ones. And the business men can afford to pay it, as I am reliably informed that the sheep men for several years have averaged 60 per cent. on their investments.

Within one hour after I reached the town, the business men had arranged a meeting for the evening at which they subscribed $I5,000 of the stock of a $25,000 National bank and offered me the cashiership at a handsome salary, provided I would place the remaining $10,000 east. But I am like the hero in Byrons's "Deformed Transformed"—as I have the power of choice I shall see farther. Tonapah, Nevada, is my next stop.

I reached Salt Lake City, more than 2,300 miles from Oakland, at 3 p. m. today. The trip from Denver must be taken to be appreciated as the English language fails in adjectives to describe the scenery. Jehovah has surely here wrought with Titanic force and while we stand in mute admiration of his handiwork we must likewise greatly marvel at the skill with which man has here done his part. Hardly a moment of the more than twenty-four hours consumed in the journey over the Colorado Midland railroad were we out of sight of the summits of the Rockies, covered with perpetual snow, more than forty peaks of which rise to an altitude of 14,000 feet or more.

I was greatly surprised to learn that the city of Leadville, the greatest mining camp in the world in point of gross production to date (viz. $325,000,000, although Cripple Creek's annual output is now greater) is 10,000 feet above the sea and only a few feet lower than Altman.

Mt. Massive, the highest point in the state, 226 feet higher than Pike's Peak, is near to Leadville. A few miles farther on we passed the highest artificial lake in the world, the great reservoir which contains six billion gallons of water for use in the Colorado Fuel and Iron Works at Pueblo 150 miles away and owned by John W. Gates and his assooiates.

We are fast approaching the highest point of the railroad and we stop at Ivanhoe after passing though Busk tunnel over two miles long, with 2,000 feet of the mountain above our head and the passenger get out and engage in a genuine game of snow ball on one side of the train and pick mountain flowers in full bloom on the other. We are 10,944 feet above sea level and the waters at our feet flow to the Pacific.

As darkness is coming on, I will mention but two or three more items of interests which we pass. Hell Gate is considered one of the most magnificent view in the world, a rugged chasm in the mountain with cliffs 2,000 feet sheer descent. The train goes around fourteen miles in order to descend one-half mile.

Back several miles from the main line on a branch at Aspen, are the two richest silver mines in the world—the Smuggler and the Mollie Gibson.

Glenwood Springs is a great summer resort, boasts of a bath house costing a half million dollars; the swimming pool is 110 feet by 700 feet and all warm water.

We pass through a little town called Palisade with a world-wide reputation for fruit raising. The belt is two miles wide and less than five miles long and land in it is worth $2,400 per acre. A gentleman who lives in it told me that a person could buy a farm here and raise enough peaches and apples in three or four years to pay for it. Big story! The westerners are all "boosters"—no "knockers" to be found anywhere.

All kinds of country are traversed in the descent into Salt Lake City—sage bush plains, badlands, alkali bottoms, stock ranches, the fidest alfalsa farms.

It is surprising what thousands and millions of acres of land this great country contains, absolutely unoccupied, much of which needs only water. Water is the great fertilizer of the west, nothgrows without it and everything, in an abundance absolutely incrediable to the eastern man, grows with it. This is the land of the irregation canal and both the federal government and private corporations are today spending millions today in their construction. The Salt Lake Valley is a beautiful one, surrounded by snow capped mountains and growing fruit and farm products in the greatest profusion and abundance.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumodia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure. Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, aching sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

IT RATTLED HIM.

His Wife's Startling Discovery Nearly Causes a Panic.

"Women are so impulsive," said a man the other day. "I was awakened from a sound sleep one morning by my wife crying in an excited manner, 'Henry, Henry, come quick!' I sprang from bed and ran to the head of the stairs and at once smelled smoke. Then I shouted, 'Take the baby, run to the corner and turn in an alarm!' I scrambled back to the room and snatched up some clothes, thinking I'd put them on later. Then I grabbed little Elizabeth, who was sleeping with me, under my arm and dashed downstairs. 'Where is it?' I exclaimed, running here and there to locate the fire. Behold, my wife was sitting in the dining room with the baby in her lap as calm as could be, with nothing out of the usual except a smile of joy on her face.

"'Why don't you get out of here? Do you want to be burned alive?' I shouted.

"'Why, Henry, what in the world's the matter with you? Are you crazy?'

"'No, I'm not crazy. I want to know where the fire is.'

"'Fire! There is no fire,' said she.

"'What did you yell fire for, then?'

"'I didn't.'

"'Well, what in thunder is it then?'

"'Why, Charlotte has a tooth!'

"'Goodness! I thought the house was on fire!'

"'How stupid!' remarked my wife coolly as she placed the baby in her high chair and started for the kitchen. 'Why don't you put Elizabeth down? Do you intend to carry her under your arm all day? And you had better get dressed too. Breakfast is almost ready.'"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Nice Looking Young Ladies.

In my father's native village lives Mr. S., a very deaf man, says a writer in the Pittsburg Press. During the summer months he lets his spare rooms to some of the many pleasure seekers who frequent the place, and one day last summer, while Mr. S. was in his garden, a young man of the village chanced by and the following conversation took place:

"Good morning, Mr. S."

"Mawnin'."

"You've got your house full of boarders this summer."

Mr. S. was picking potato bugs off his plants, but he managed to stop long enough to answer "Yes."

"Some nice looking young ladies among them," continued the young man.

Mr. S. stood up and eyed the potatoes critically, then answered:

"Well, they ought to look pretty good. I just picked two quarts of bugs off 'em."

As Indicated.

"I saw a rattlesnake fifteen feet long this morning," said the summer boarder.

"Heow did yew know it was a rattlesnake?" queried the old farmer.

"By the way my teeth rattled when I saw it," replied the S. B.—Des Moines Register.

Didn't Affect Him Much.

Landlord—And how did you get home last night?

Customer—Splendidly. I didn't stumble once and found the keyhole first shot. I'm sure you charged me for at least five glasses too much.—Meggendorfer Blatter.

A Convenience.

"Do you enjoy poetry?"

"Yes," answered Miss Cayenne. "It is a great conversational convenience. It enables people to quote instend of being stupidly original."—Washington Star.

About the Size of It.

Little Willie—Say, pa, what is a fisherman?

Pa—A fisherman, my son, is a man who sits and sits all day—then he lies.—Chicago News.

The Boss.

[By the office boy.]

When things go easy, he just sarnters round
At 10 o'clock or so; then reads his mail,
Dictates some half dozen letters to the girl,
Tosses us each a word, or maybe two,
Looks at the papers, lights a good cigar,
Phones to a friend, and then goes out to lunch.
And I go home and say to maw, "Gee whiz!
I hate to work. I wish I was the boss!"

But my, when things go wrong! Maybe a strike,
Or prices down, or some bank goes and busts—
Then ain't he Johnny-on-the-spot at 8!
Then he don't take no time to read the news,
Nor eat no lunch, but keeps us all a-jump.

Then he shoots letters at the girl till she Gets flustery red spots on her cheeks; and makes Even old Chief Clerk hustle; you know him,
That fat one, with the sort of double chin.
And me—why, I'm greased lightning when he calls.
And when night comes, then he looks kind er pale
And anxious like, and yet so full of fight
I get a sort of aching in my throat,
Like something choked me, when I look at him.
And I go home and say to maw, "Gee whiz!
Bizness is tough. I'm glad I ain't the boss!"

JUNE BROKE ALL RECORDS.

Coldest In Ninety-One Years—Only Eight Clear Days.

The month which ended yesterday proved to be the coldest June in the history of the local weather records. The mean temperature for June during the 91 years for which a record has been kept has been a normal temperature for the month of 73 degrees. The mean record for the last month was only 66.7 degrees. The past June was even colder than the historic and famous cold June of 1836, about which so much has been written and of which venerable citizens tell such remarkable stories. However, while the month was notable for its general low temperature, there was no frost and no weather which could be considered destructive to vegetation or fruit crops.

During the last month there were only eight clear days, the other days showing cloudiness, and on 11 days there was actual rain.

PHILIPPINES NEWSPAPERS.

Prof. Charles E. Hoye Sends Two Which Gives the Local News of Those Islands.

Prof. Charles E. Hoye, of this county, but now teaching in the Philippine Islands, has sent to this office two copies of newspapers published in those far away islands. While it takes a student of Spanish to read them, yet one of them is intelligible, for it has one column in Spanish and the next, containing the same article, in English. In this way the paper may be read. And from that which is read, it is easily seen that things in those islands are coming to American ways. An election is being held there and the issue seems to be to keep the church from dominating in the affairs of state; not to elect a man to an office purely on the ground that he is the member of some particular church. The paper advocates that the officials should be elected without any questiou as to what church he belongs to.

Prof. Hoye has found time during his pedagogical work in the Philipines to write us a letter describing an earthquake which occurred there on the 19th of April. The letter left Manila on May 15th and reached this office on July 1st. We take pleasure in calling attention of our readers to the earthquake description which is found in another part of this paper.

A Card of Thanks.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Will you kindly insert in your paper and extend my thanks and gratitude to all the kind citizens of Deer Park and vicinity who so nobly came to my sorrowing home and with loving words, soothed my troubled soul, after the sad and untimely death of my "wandering boy," on that fateful 21st of June last.

Fraternally Yours
Mrs. CYNTHIA MARVILLE.

CAMP MEETING WILL OPEN FRIDAY EVENING

Annual Gathering of Christian Workers at Mountain Lake Park.

BISHOP L. B. WILSON IN CHARGE

The Usual Corps of Workers Will Be Present—Efforts Being Made to Widen the Influence of Sessions—Several People Already at Park.

The annual session of the Mountain Lake Park camp-meeting will open at the Hall of Philosophy Friday evening. The meetings will continue ten days, ending Monday evening, July 8th. They will be under the supervision of Bishop Luther B. Wilson, of the Methodist Church.

It is useless to say that the meeting for 1907 promises to be up to and beyond the usual standard which is maintained in them from year to year. Many efforts have been made to make this session one of the most successful, one of the most far reaching in its beneficient results and one of the most powerful in saving souls, that has ever been begun. It is remarked by everyone who keeps in touch with the work, and notes all changes and improvements which are made from time to time that there is a steady and decided effort to make the meetings a greater agency for good as the years go by.

The usual corps of workers will be present and there will also be several others who are strangers to the people of this section. However, it is felt confidently that they soon will win a place for themselves in the hearts of those interested in the great work which is done each year by the camp-meeting at the Park.

A large number of people have already arrived and the depot has been filled to overflowing with trunks and people who have been coming in on every train.

American Rule in Philippines.

For the first time in its history Manila has passed a period of six months without a single case of infectious disease. No small-pox, plague or cholera has been reported in that time. Director Heiser of the Bureau of Health is credited with bringing about the present satisfactory conditions.

President Teachers' Association.

Mr. Albert S. Cook, of Towson, was elected Thursday to the presidency of the Maryland State Teachers, Association. The election took place at the Jamestown Exposition where the meeting for 1907 was held.

PENCILINGS BY THE WAY.

Graphic, Descriptive Account of the West by U. G. Palmer.

I am in Goldfield, the "hub" of the western mining world. It is in its infancy, but it is the huskiest infant that ever came out of the West. Three years ago, its population consisted of twenty people housed in nine tents. Today there are 20,000 people within the city limits.

It produced $3,000,000 of gold during the first year of its existence. Last years its output was $9,000,000 and it is producing today at the rate of $15,000,000 per year. This means that much added to the permanent wealth of the world. It is different from the production of corn, and cotton, and wheat which are consumed each year. The precious metals are not consumed but are permanently added to the world's visible wealth.

As I sit on the hotel porch, I can look out across the properties of the Goldfield Consolidated Mines Company, covering just about a half section of land that is selling on a valuation today of five times all the wealth of Garrett county. While it seems increditable, nevertheless it is true. One block of ground in this property, 373 by 700 feet, in 240 days ending Jan. 7, 1907, produced $6,830,000. This was from two leases on the world famous "Mohawk"—the magic word in Goldfield.

The sensation of the preceding year was the famous Reilly lease on the Goldfield Mining Company which produced $1,000,000 in 100 days.

This hunting for gold here reminds me of the old proverb "hunting for a needle in a hay stack." At Tonopah, the Tonopah Mining Company has an ore vein 40 feet wide which outcrops for hundreds of feet, off from which I gathered many samples assaying $500 to $600 per ton. This vein has been proven in places by underground work to a depth of 1000 feet.

In Goldfield, the situation is far different. "You get the ore where you find it," as the saying goes. The veriest tenderfoot stands the same show as the most skillful engineer of finding it. It occurs in pockets and has no definite trend. But when it is found it often goes from $10,000 to $100,000 to the ton, picture ore. When a person considers that a block of ore two feet each way contains two tons, the magnitude of the proposition of exploring thoroughly even an acre of ground to a depth of 500 feet and the possibilities it contains will begin to be realized. The whole mountain ridges here are covered with outcropping ledge matter but aside from the Jumbo out of which the leasers took the first year's production it shows little mineralization. In fact on the famous Mohawk, 1,200 assays were made before more than $1.80 per ton was found and on the Reilly lease above mentioned 250 assays were made before more than $2.50 per ton was found.

Of the 258 mines and leases here equipped with the very finest machinery that money can buy, scarcely a single one had any surface showings. The Atlanta is one of the very best properties here as far as location goes. It contains about sixty acres. There are twenty-two shafts on it and a million dollars has already been spent in prospecting and it is selling today on a basis of a million dollars for the property. Yet it has never produced a pound of ore. Its value is entirely speculative. There are not over a dozen producing mines here in which the Eastern investor, operating as he must at long range, can put his money as an investment. These investments of course will yield him a high rate of interest as money is high here and they are selling on a basis of the money rate here.

A gentleman who lives here and who has an abundance of money told me yesterday that he was making loans during this, the dull season, at 2½ per cent. per month and it was no trouble to get 1½ per cent. during the busy season.

And yet everyone seems to have money. I have talked with numerous business men and I find every one expects to make at least 3 per cent. per month on his investment after allowing himself $8 to $10 per day for his services and if he doesn't do that he will throw ever his business and get out.

And the bank have plenty of money. There are four here, no nationals, with deposits of $12,000,000. Pretty good for a town one half as large as Cumberland, one twentieth as old and still showing bank deposits twice as gaeat.

There are twelve absolutely fireproof buildings in course of construction here at a cost of $1,500,000 (from money taken out of the ground here) that for stability and architectured beauty would do credit to the city of Baltimore.

The new hotel in course of construction at a cost of $250,000 will when completed be the finest between Chicago and the coast.

The electric light plant is the equal of anything in the west. More automobiles are seen on the streets than in any other city of its size. As an evidence of the plentitude of money, $30,000 was recently subscribed in thirty minutes for the Gans-Nelson fight.

A great deal of the "wind" has been taken out of the situation in the west in the last six months and things are getting down to a commercial basis. But when the Eastern man says there is nothing here, that it is all "hot air" he simply talks without knowledge.

The fact that three plants, each with a capacity of milling 10,000 tons of ore in twenty-four, are in course of construction in the state, and a score of smaller ones, involving the expenditure of millions of money at the hands of the shrewdest and safest investors, should be enough to convince the most sceptical.

But the Eastern man who does not come to see or have someone on the ground that can be trusted should invest his money with great care. And it is mighty hard to find a man on the ground who can be trusted as every man you meet is a "booster" the "knocker" gets a black eye at the instance o every one.

In may next I will describe a trip down into the mines, one here and one at Tonopah.

U. G. PALMER.

Debate in Friendsville.

To the Editor of the Republican.

The proposition: "Nothing else is valid Bible baptism but the single immersion of the candidate entirely under water, by the administrator, according to the doctrine of the Disciple church," was debated for five evenings in Allen's Hall, as announced in The Republican, June 20th, inst, which grew out of a challange from the Rev. V. W. Wallace, that was accepted by the Rev. H. C. Salem, who showed that he was both a deep thinker and a scholar in the constitutional manner in which he handled the nagative side of the question, as well as the Christian spirit he manifested throughout the discussions, thus adding much to his popularity as a minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

The negative speaker adhered strictly to "the entire Word of God, only," by which he proved all his arguments, making it very clear to Greek and Hebrew Bible students, that no stress or efficacy is placed upon the mode, or form, by which water is applied in baptism, but that "the only valid baptism is God's word connected with water, as it is an outward sign of an inward grace, and when this 'grace' of God is in the heart, a baptised person will not dance, play cards or get drunk."

According to agreement, no decision was to be given by the moderators or congregation, as the debate is to be published in book form so all who read it may decide for themselves; all, however, who heard the arguments, have decided the question according to their individual belief from beginning to end, and no one will be apt to change their former opinions upon the subject of baptism.

This article is not published to produce an argument in The Republican or any other paper. While there are many who have agreed with these views, we have, nevertheless, given them only as our own, and will have no reply to any one who may have different views. Individual opinion, is a right we all possess. We have ours and the reader may have his.

Travelers Aid Society.

There are a great many temptations to the young ladies of the land to get them to Jamestown where they may be tricked into something of which they had no premonition whatever. In order to help protect them from these men and women of evil designs, the Travelers' Aid Society was organized to aid the young girl to escape the net of the wily, and do it by having published throughout the country the following advice to girls:

1st. Not to start without knowing where she is to stay at night and having money enough to defray expenses.

2nd. Not to answer advertisements for workers at Jamestown, without first writing to the Travelers' Aid Society who will tell her if it is an honest offer of employment.

The Travelers' Aid agents both in Norfolk and Baltimore will meet those who write to them in time.

IMPORTANT MEETING OF TOWN COUNCIL

All of the Members Were Present and Several Practical Ideas Discussed

LICENSE GRANTED MR. SWEENEY

All the Councilmen were Present—Five for License, One Opposed—Bills Ordered Paid—Mr. Hart Appeared Asking Lower Coal Weighing Rates.

At the regular session of the town council Monday evening, several important questions were discussed and decided upon. Mr. John Sweeney was granted a liquor license to conduct a saloon in the Bolden-West building, now owned by Mrs. Burk, which is located on Main street, near the Garrett National Bank. A boardwalk was ordered to be laid from the bridge by Mr. Michael Boyle's building to the railroad crossing. The police were instructed not to permit on the Fourth the discharge of large explosives. Repairs were ordered to be made to the fire engine. A committee was instructed to purchase 15,000 or 18,000 bricks for repairs to the streets of the town as well as for the crossings which are to be of brick. An order was passed to survey the street in front of the new court house building, in order to establish the true line of the street so that those who are building the new court house may not encroach upon the town thoroughfare; Councilmen Liller and and Harned have the work in charge.

The following bills were passed upon and ordered to be paid; Interest to First National Bank on note of town's for $2,391.19. Rent for fire engine room for six months to Mrs. Sweeney, $24.00. For repairing watchmen's clocks, $24. Abe Wotring's and others work upon streets, $55.35. Echard's work upon the streets, @ $13.00 per day, $61.10. Electric lights for June, $115.00.

Mr. J. W. Hart appeared before the Council and asked that a reduction be made upon weighing coal by the car load; that, in his opinion, the regular rate of twenty cents a load was enormously high; that to one who has so much weighed so often, that some ordinance should be passed whereby coal could be weighed at so much per car load. When Mayor McComas was called upon for his opinion upon the subject, he stated that the request was wholly within reason, but that the trouble with it was that there was no way that he could yet see whereby justice could in this way be rendered the smallers dealer, the men of the local mines, the men who sell coal to the people of Oakland, but do not get it in car load lots. The matter was laid over until the next council meeting, the committee being Attorney Offutt and Mayor Mc Comas.

A permit was granted Mr. Elwood Offutt to lay a water pipe to the site of his new building on Second street.

A report of the town weigh-master was made, whereby it was shown that the June scale business amounted to $11.20. Instructions were given that the weigh-master should give to driver of each coal wagon a certificate for the purchaser of the coal, showing exactly how much the load of coal weighed.

During the discussion about whether a license should be granted to Mr. Sweeney for the new saloon, Mr. S. T. Jones presented to the Council a petition signed by fifty-five "representative citizens" in which they asked that the Council refuse to grant the permit. The vote stood four for license and one against it, Councilman Painter casting the dissenting vote. At the close of the vote, Mr. Jones asked that the petition be returned to him; Mr. Sweeney asked to see it, but the Council ruled that, Mr. Jones having asked for its return, that it was his own personal property.

There being no other business before the Council, the body adjourned.

Marriage Licenses.

PENCILINGS BY THE WAY.

Graphic, Descriptive Account of the West by U. G. Palmer.

Tonopah, Nevada, June 23, 1907.

Three days ago I fully expected my next stop would be Tonopah, but the Idaho Main was late and I was compelled to wait 15 hours in Ogden. That is a beautiful city, the size of Cumberland, situated in the wonderfully rich Salt Lake Valley, surrounded as every garden spot of the west seems to be with snow capped mountains. It has many fine residences and its streets are lined with the universally used shade trees, the Balm of Gilead and the Lombardy Poplar, tall and stately and prosaic.

This railroading in the west is a fright and every traveler is cursing Harriman and his roads. My train, called the "China and Japan Fast Mail" reached Hazen, the junction point for the Goldfields, eleven hours late. We left Ogden with one engine and fifteen cars loaded to the "gunwales" and were obliged to stop every hour to make steam. These roadbeds are good and engines large, but the trains are too heavy. I noticed a tender with a water tank marked 9000 gallons, the largest I ever saw in the East being 6000 gallons. Everybody says, too much "business for the motive power." But they have to publish these schedules to get the passengers, but after they get them they don't care further.

This is the land of "Jap" cooks (I like American cooking better); barren, treeless, alkali covered plains and mountains for hour after hour; no human habitation except the little nicely painted houses of the railroad men at regular intervals along the tracks.

Just out of Ogden, the Southern Pacific for more than twenty miles crosses great Salt Lake on a fill and trestle. Then for miles and miles the track passes over an alkali plain, as white as the driven snow and as level as a house floor.

And at Tonopah we are out 600 miles on the treeless, waterless, sun-cursed desert where the principal freight of the train you pass is water, loaded in wooden tank cars about two-thirds the size of an ordinary box car. A man must have a "copper bottomed" stomach to drink this alkali water and eyes that are made of steel to withstand the alkali dust. You can't escape the dust but you can drink lemon soda if you care to buy it at the rate of three 15 cent drinks out of the ordinary pop bottle.

But everybody seems to have lots of money and wages are high. I met a carpenter on the train going to the Ely Copper company $8 per day for nine hours; the cheapest dago gets $4 for nine hours here and the ordinary miner $5, and the forman, machinist and other skilled labor, $6 to $8. And he needs it. The first time I was "held up" was at Hazen when I bought a ticket for Tonopah, less than the distance from Oakland to Washington, fare $10.60 and the peculiar thing about this is that the railroad was built and is owned by Eastern people, what is called the "Fourth Street National Bank Crowd," of Philadelphia.

I will write you tomorrow my impressions fully of this wonderful gold camp.

Tonopah, Nevada, June 24, 1907.

Tonopah has a population of 6,000 dependent absolutely on its mines and attendant industries. It is high toned and every luxury of the great cosmopolitan city is here to be had but it comes high.

It was discovered in 1900 and the ownership of its first mine came to Philadelphia people through O. A. Turner, a native of Wicomico county, Maryland, and who now resides on Mt. Vernon Place, Baltimore, in the house formerly owned by Major Alexander Shaw.

Turner is a graduate of the Maryland Law school and after spending some time in Philadelphia where he made the acquaintance of several capitalists connected with the Fourth street National Bank, he went west and drifted around among the mining camps without seeming results until the summer of 1900 he heard of the wonderful Mizpah veins of ore at what is now Tonopah. He walked out from Sodaville, 85 miles, and found the claims in possession of an old "desert rat," James L. Butler, who, to use Turner's words, "knew what he had but didn't khow how to convert them into cash."

A number of leasers were at work taking out a $600 ore and Turner, representing himself as a capitalist agreed to buy the claims, covering 160 acres, for $336,000,—$50,000 cash and the balances in two payments, in one and two years. He made the cash payment in a draft on John W. Woodside, of Philadelphia, walked back to Sodaville, and not having any money sent a telegram collect to Woodside telling him what he had done and asking him to sent two engineers to report before the draft reached him. This Woodside did and brought to the East the ownship of probably the greatest mine on the continent. Out of this $50,000 has grown the great "Tonopah Mining Camp of Nevada" as the royalty from the leases met the remaining payments.

The history of this company reads like a fairy tale. It was incorporated in 1900 with 336,000 shares of preferred stock and 1,000,000 shares of common par value $1. The preferred stock was sold for $1 per share and a bonus of two shares of common given with each share of preferred stock. Inside of two years the preferred stock was redeemed in cash at par leaving the original purchasers in possession of the common stock and costing them absolutely nothing. Today that stock is worth $15 per share and the markets of New York, Philadelphia and San Francisco are taking every share offered at that price. Lets see what it is really worth. I have been out over the property today under the guidance of one of the best engineers in the west We traced the veins where they outcrop an the surface for hundreds of feet, some places five feet in width—gouged here and there by leasers but hardly touched comparatively and shown to holes in the ground out of which from a quarter of a million up two as high as a million and a half in one instance was taken—holes so small that what was taken out was but "a drop in the bucket" as compared with what is left.

This mine has eight miles of underground workings, it has produced $9,000,000 to date and has paid $2,650,000 in dividends and beginning July 1st, will go on a basis of $2,000,000 dividends per year. It is just getting its own mills in operation and is crushing 16,000 tons of ore per month. It built and owns the railroad from Sodaville to Tonopah and Goldfield, ninety miles, which paid for itself in the first eight months of its operation and which showed net profits last year of over $340,000. Its last annual statement showed a surplus of cash in bank of over $3,000,000.

Two years ago John Hays Hammond, the greatest mining engineer in the world, now employed by the Guggenheims, but who has operated in every mining camp on earth from Klondyke to the Ram and who was the confidential adviser of Cecil Rhodes in South Africa until his death, said after an extended examination of the mines here that in four of them there was $100,000,000 worth of ore actually blocked out ready for extraction.

Since that time the Tonopah Mining Company has added to its ore reserves so that it is known that it alone has that much. Hence it becomes simply a big manufacturing proposition, the efficiency of which is daily becoming more nearly perfected. Its stock last Thanksgiving sold for $22.50 per share and it is asserted on good authority that beginning with next January it will begin the annual distribution of $4,000,000 in dividend when its stock should be worth at least $35 per share.

So much for this the king of all of them. Beyond this, among the scores of mining companies here, I feel that a man can count on the fingers of one hand the mines which would warrant the investment of any man's money. The Tonopah Belmont, the Montana Tonopah, Tonopah Extension and Tonopah Midway, are all great big producers, on a profitable basis and aside from two or three more smaller ones the eastern man who is not on the ground should let them absolutely alone unless he can buy at a prospect price and takes them as such and count on only one chance in ten of winning.

From what I have seen of Nevada, I am beginning to feel that its mines can be counted on a persons fingers but that its prospects and and wild cats are like the sands of the sea.

I met an intelligent young drummer on a Southern Pacific train the other day who has been traveling all over Nevada for twelve years selling mining machinery. He sized up the state this way: Tonopah is permanent with a half dozen big mines, Goldfield is the king of them all with several good ones, Silver Peak has two or three. Fairview has the Nevada Hills which may be the greatest of them all; Rhyolite is a long term milling proposition, Rosebud and Wonder have failed to make good and Greenwater is the greatest gold brick that Charley Schwab ever handed out to his friends on a copper server.

Before I leave the subject of Tonopah I must offer a few words about two or three of its citizens. George Wingfield and Senator Nixon were each accorded a fortune of $12,000,000 on January 1. J. L. Oddie, formerly of Orange, N. J., was the next wealthiest in the roll of millionaires and was accredited as worth $9,000,000.

A half dozen years ago, Senator Nixon was cashier of the bank at Winnemucca, a town the size of Oakland. Geo. Wingfield was a cowpuncher and Nixon lent him $1,000 to start the Tonopah Club-a glambling den and in which in two years Wingfield cleaned up $526,000.

Everything is wide open here in Nevada, twenty-four hours every day and seven days every week faro banks, roulette wheels, poker, bar rooms, dance hall, etc.

I shall go out to Silver Peak and perhaps Nevada Hill and make a personal inspection of the underground workings that I may be able to record just what a great mine is like.

U. G. Palmer.

The Friendsville Normal.

The Friendsville Normal has come and gone.

The time spent in this educational enterprise was pleasant to the teachers and profitable to the students, and we never witnessed a ten weeks which seemed to pass more rapidly.

We tried to direct and organize the work so as to make good results possible, but we are frank to say that the whole session was crowded with noble effort upon the part of the student class, which is always the price of success in school work.

The ministers of the town were both thoughtful and sacrificing in rendering assistance by their hearty cooperation and prayers in behalf of the school.

The "Teachers' Class" was one of great interest, and the students preparing for high school work also made good progress.

In this high school established by county school board there is opportuuity for great achievements in the educational realm.

The splendid talent from other communities, together with the intelligent pupils in Friendsville, all conspired to make the Normal fruitful of good results, even surpassing our most sanguine expectations.

We shall not soon forget our short stay in the pleasant hamlet of Friendsville.

PICTURES "WHITE DEATH"

Tuberculosis Exhibition Begins At St. Paul's House.

PLAN OF PREVENTION PROVED

Association Illustrates Methods Of Fighting Plague in Comprehensive Way.

A free exhibition under the auspices of the Maryland Association for the Prevention and Relief of Tuberculosis was given at Baltimore at St. Paul's Guild House, 539 Columbia avenue Wednesday.

The literature and signs used in the "fence" campaign were seen first. Beyond this was Section No. 1, which represented consumption as a contagious disease. The section consisted of unsanitary sweatshops, tenement houses that were dark and filthy, courts and also Baltimore's notorious "Lung Block," which has a record of from one to eight deaths in each house on both sides of the street.

One of the mottoes in this section was:

"Consumption is a filth disease; hence be clean."

Signs in reference to the danger of spitting and mottoes about dusting and sweeping, showing the real danger in spreading tuberculosis by germs in the dust, were also shown. The "right way to dust" showed a dust cloth that should be dampened, and the wrong way showed the use of dusting with a brush or broom.

Specimens showing different stages of diseases in the lung were shown. In some there were cavities three-quarter of an inch in diameter, which had been eaten away by the tubercle bacilli. There was also a booth showing the plaster jackets which were used in cases of tuberculosis of the spine. Next was shown a chart with the percentage of tuberculosis in different cities and the deaths due to consumption. There were also giving the ratio of tuberculosis to other diseases, such as pneumonia, bronchitis and influenza.

In the second section tuberculosis as a preventable disease was dealt with. The city's method of prevention — fumigation of the house after the removal or death—was illustrated. The supplies given by the Board of Health were also shown, as follows: Disinfectant and solution, 100 paper napkins, 2 waterproof pockets that were sewed inside the coat or dress, 100 paper sputum boxes and a boxholder. Dark and unsanitary rooms, where the nurses from the Visiting Nurses Association have found conditions that were dangerous to both patient and community, were pictured. In the last reports of nurses the number of cases of tuberculosis in the city was 763, and they are under the Nurses' Association. In the Southern and Southwestern districts there are 261 patients, in the Northwestern district 142 and in the Southeastern district 140. Three of these nurses are supported by the Maryland Association for the Prevention of Tuberculosis.

Section No. 3 showed the sanitary methods in different sections of the country. Pictures were shown of the outdoor life of St. Agnes' Memorial Sanitarium, at Denver, showing the avenue of tents and spacious halls in the buildings.

The Massachusetts State Sanitarium and the Adirondack Sanitarium were also on view. A series of photographs representing the Maryland Hospital for Consumptives, at Eudowood, was also on exhibition.

The exhibition was in charge of Mr. William T. Reynolds, assistant secretary of the association and a nurse of Bellevue Hospital, New York. It continued Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, with an address Thursday by Dr. John Girdwood, of Christ's Church Tuberculosis Dispensary, and on Friday by Miss J. E. Kemp, agent for the committee on improved housing.

A STRONG ADVOCATE OF TEMPERANCE.

Says Sons Must Be Sober Else Murray C. D. Palmer's Estate Will Go For Schools.

Murray C. D. Palmer, colored, provides in his will filed for probate in the Orphans' Court at Baltimore, that should any of his childern be addicted to the intemperate use of spirituous liquor or in any way not lead a sober, industrious and respectable life, when the youngest is 21 years old, his or their share of the estate shall become the property of the city of Baltimore and be used for the erection of schoolhouses for the free education of negroes.

Thomas Mackenzie and Henry Steffens are named as executors and trustees without bond. The will is dated May 14, 1904. Palmer died about two months ago,

Statistics of a Smoker.

A remarkable story of "swearing off" comes from a local man, who for 60 years has been an extraordinary heavy cigarette smoker, has decided to renounce the weed absolutely. He fixed his average day's smoke at 30 cigarettes, and upon this basis he has smoked in his life just 481,500. The local mathematician then indulges in the fellowing calculationt: He has used 602,250 matches, which amounts to 3,011 boxes of 200 each. A match averages about two and a half inches in length, and when 602,250 of them are strung in a straight line, one after the other, they stretch 1,355,250 inches, or 112,933 feet, making a total of over 21 miles. If Manhoh had all the tobacco he has used in his life and all the papers in one piece he could roll a cigarette that, if it were laid in a straight line, would extend 21 miles. Allowing three minutes for rolling and smoking a cigarette. Manhoff has thus spent 1,445,400 of his life. This amounts to 24,090 hours, or over 1,003 days. One thousand and three days are over two and a half years, and thus it is easily seen how this smaker spent about one twenty-fourths of his life in the satisfaction of his desire for smoking cigarettes.—Ex.

ALLIGATOR STRAYED AWAY.

Leaves Its Roland Park Home For The Harbor.

Craving for his mate and the haunts of his native river in Florida the pet alligator of Mr. Charles Hilbert, 417 Hawthorn road, Roland Park, Baltimore, escaped from his pen on Sunday afternoon, made his way to Jones' Falls, and followed the stream to the pier of the Savannah steamers at the foot of the Falls, to be captured on Monday by the steward of the steamer Chatham.

Allie was brought from Florida by Mr. Hilbert about three years ago. He thrived, and at the time of his escape was about four feet long. During the winter he was kept in a cage in the cellar, and during the summer he occupied an inclosure in the yard. The inclosure is of wire, the plot being about 5 by 20 feet, and contained a pool of water. The wire fence is about three feet high. Allie had one distinct characteristic. He was fond of colored people, and when he saw one he would hiss and swish his tail, while his unusally waterv eyes would blaze. It is probably due to this failing that he escaped.

On Sunday afternoon Mr. Hilbert and his family were away from home Allie was a great pet with the children, and, missing them, he became lonesome, and began to pine for the sunny waters of the South. After many trials and a little bruised from falls backward, Allie finally managed to climd over his wire prison and made for the woods and liberty. A colored girl employed by one of Mr. Hilbert's neighbors saw the alligator making for the tall timbers. The girl beat a hasty retreat to the house, and on the return of Mr. Hilbert told him of the escape of his pet. A hunt was made, but no signs of the alligator could be found. In the meantime Allie was making rapid progress, considering his short legs, for Jones' Falls and the harbor —Ex.

JULY WILL BE DRY.

But Not So Much So That You Need Resort to Red Lemonade.

Peter R. Smith hands in the following forecast for July:

July is not likely to be favored with an over amount of precipitation. The clouds formed during the periods of the disturbed meteorology will take on a blustry and threatening appearance, but on reaching a given height in the horizon they will disrupt the scatter, discharging light quanities of rainfall.

Local drouths may start early in the month. Summers in which drouths prevail have also favored localities which receive much above their due share of the rainfall and suffer from cloudbursts and much intensified local downpours. Local drouths are mostly confined to the middle central and eastern states, and general drouths to the western, southwestern, and southern states.

We may expect the allotted share of sunshine and warmth as of pasi summer years. Forgetting our fears of snow snowstorms, frost, and freezing in July, as has been watonly predicted, we still are a long way from a repetition of the year 1816, when snowstorms, freezing and frosts materialized in July and August and no corn in the crib in the northern states after corn harvest.

The first storm-period will develop touching the 1st, 2d, and 3d. The rains duriug this period of of disturbance will not be general in all parts of the country, nor excessive in quantity of rain.

A warm wave will spread over the country from the southwest and moving northeast, starting about the 7th and continuing to the 12th.

Local rains will be on transit from the 8th to the 11th, discharging in some parts refreshing rains and at other localities only bluster.

The 13th, 14th, and 15th will develop light showers in some places.

On the 19th, 20th, 21st, 22d, and 23rd a wave of disturbance will be in transit. The rainfall will be much below the needs of the growing corps.

Touching the 24th, 25th, and 26th local showers of a very limited area will be on transit.

After these storms the temperature will change to cooler. The last disturbed spell will be central on the 31st. During the passage of the wave the temperature will be high.

On the 24th a partial eclipse of the moon will takeplace 11:20 p. m.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Is Being Well Kept By the Government.

Until 1894 the Declaration was framed and displayed in a steel cabinet in the library of the department of state, where all visitors might see it, but in that year it was hermetically sealed in a frame and placed in a drawer of another steel cabinet constructed to protect also the original signed copy of the constitution. Here the Declaration still remains, locked and sealed by order of the late Secretary Hay, and it is no longer shown to any one, except by special direction of the state department.

Broaddus College May Move.

Clarksburg, W. Va., July 3.—A movement is on foot here to move Broaddus College, the leading Baptist educational institution of the state, from Clarksburg to Bridgeport, the well known village four miles east of that city. It is proposed also, as an additional inducement, to extend the trolly car system of Clarksburg to that point, which it is claimed will make it entirely and readily accessible to the patrons of the school who may desire to attend from there. A large sum of money has been tendered by citizens of Bridgeport for the location at the new site offered and there seems to be a disposition on the part of the managers of the school to accept the offers that have been made to make the change. The present building and grounds are said to be inadequate for the growing demands of the demands of the school. This is the reason for the proposed change of location.

BUNGLING M. O. OPERATION.

Freeport, N. Y., Is Paying Several Times Too Much For Street Lighting.

All the evils connected with municipal ownership have grown out of bungling municipal operation. A carefully wrought out plan, with those in charge held to responsibility, must be devised before municipal operation can be successfully carried on. Leaving the matter in the hands of new officials, elected every year or two, without any knowledge of how to carry on the business, cannot be successful except in very rare instances.

Take, for example, the municipal lighting system at Freeport. There is a valuable franchise which ought to bring in a fair revenue to the village treasury. Some time ago a wealthy lighting company, which understands the lighting business and can produce incandescent light at a small fraction of the cost of generating it at the Freeport power house, offered to pay $30,000 for the use of this franchise. Computed at 5 per cent, that meant a rental of $1,500 per year. The company also offered to light the village with a larger number of arc lamps than are now in operation for $3,000 a year. Deducting the rental of $1,500 from this annual payment, the village street lighting on an all night system would cost the taxpayers $1,500 a year. But the villagers thought it better to have the system operated by their elected officials, none of whom is an expert in lighting matters, and we notice that this year they propose to levy between $9,000 and $10,000 by taxation. They assure us that none of this money is for private lighting. If so, it must all be for street lighting. Thus the street lighting costs several times as much under municipal operation as it would with municipal ownership and intelligent business operation.

ASKS AN INVESTIGATION.

An Illinois Mayor Says Waterworks Are Wastefully Operated.

In asking the council of Galesburg, Ill., for an investigation of the water department Mayor Shumway of that city brought out some rather startling facts. He states that receipts from rentals are $1,400 a month and that $1,000 a month may fairly be allowed for hydrants, yet the operating expenses are $2,500, which thus exceed the income, although, according to the report, there is no allowance for depreciation or sinking fund and apparently none for interest on the $300,000 investment.

Even more remarkable is the mayor's statement that three-quarters of the water pumped is unaccounted for. To quote:

"From this condition of affairs it is manifest that the amount of water reported pumped is grossly exaggerated, or the leakage unaccounted for demands prompt and careful investigation."

To remedy these conditions the mayor makes several recommendations, among which are the following:

"First.—I suggest that a careful survey of the plant and report of condition of same, with suggestions for the placing of the plant on a paying and businesslike basis, be made.

"Second.—That the water rates be revised.

"Third.—That the free list of water takers be suspended."

But why should there be a free list? Or is that supposed to be a necessary incident to political management?

City Plants Are Inefficient.

In 1902 the United States department of commerce and labor published a special census report on electric light and power stations, compiled by T. Commerford Martin, editor of the Electrical World and a recognized authority on the subject. A comparison of the statistics of municipal and private plants given in this report demonstrates the far greater efficiency of the latter, as the following table shows:

| | Private. | Munic. |
| Output in kilowatts per wage earner* employed | 110,777 | 79,410 |
| Output in kilowatts per $1 of wages | 170 | 138 |
| Average wages per year | $650 | $577 |

*Only operative wage earners are considered, because in a large number of municipal plants all or part of the clerical work is done by other departments. The operative wage earners, however, perform the same duties in both municipal and private plants.

On the basis of wage earners employed the output of municipal plants is only 72 per cent of that of private plants, and in spite of the lower wages paid in municipal plants their output per $1 of wages is only 81 per cent of that of private plants. The chief loser by this relative inefficiency is of course the public that pays the bills.

Truth Explodes M. O. Fallacies.

There is a curious analogy between certain chemical and economic experiments. If, for instance, equal volumes of hydrogen and chlorine are put into a glass receptacle, they will remain a quiet mixture of gases so long as they are kept in the dark, but as soon as they are brought into a bright light they explode with violence. Similarly the truth and falsehood that are usually mixed in about equal proportions in the reports of municipal plants remain quiet as long as the report is kept in the dark, but as soon as the light of investigation is turned upon it—well, there isn't much left of the report.

New Light In Seattle.

Municipal ownership theories and socialistic doctrines are having their effect on Seattle's finances. Whereas two years ago Seattle securities were the quickest to be found in the west and the most sought, today eastern financiers seem to have been completely scared out.—Seattle Times.

SURELY SALOONS E NOUGH TO SATIATE.

It is not our purpose in this article to force our views of temperance upon anyone. Enough has been said already upon both sides of the issue which has been raised in this town by the granting of a license by the town council permitting another saloon to conduct business within our corporate limits. Furthermore, what we would say upon the question would have no weight upon the issue whatever; for those in authority have spoken and have said that there may yet be another dispensary for that which lives and fattens upon the souls, upon the hearts of mothers and children, upon crushed hopes, and upon the damnation of the unfortunate.

Furthermore, let us hope that the decision was for the best. For there may yet come good out of the way in which the council settled the matter. God moves in a mysterious way.

Some people already see the dawn of a better day for Oaklaud, and like them we make a prediction. We make it, not to prove ourselves as possessing greater foresight than do others, but as one of the many who can readily read the signs of the times. A better day for Oakland is seen in the prediction that the people of this town—the church members and others—will soon appreciate the fact that there are now too many saloons here, and the best way to limit the number and to cure the evil is to treat everyone of them alike, and do away with all of them.

It does not take a wise man to say that eleven places for selling lipuor are too many for Oakland; that there are too many temptations; and that the only way to remedy the evil is to treat all exactly alike, and do away with the whole business here.

Oakland has a population, let us say, of about 1,500. There are eleven places in which intoxicants are sold. This gives Oakland a saloon for every 136 people including women and children, within the corporate limits of this small town. Surely such a supply shall soon surfeit and make sick.

THE NEW FOURTH.

The fourth of July never comes but that it brings to the minds of the young of the country, firecrackers, pistols, guns, torpedoes, and all other forms of explosives. Anything which tends to make a resemblance to war, is seized by the young of America. Thousands of lives have been lost, and millions of dollars worth of property have been destroyed by fires from these explosives. Yet with each year, the craving for a mimic war, for this relic of barbarism, fires every lad of the land.

Recently, however, there has come a revolution in the way of celebrating the birthday of America. And that revolution has taken the form that there shall be no more fireworks. Especially is this true in the cities where laws are enacted to prevent the shooting off of explosives on the fourth. In the rural districts, however, there have been made no radical efforts to stop the discharge of explosives on the national birthday. With all of the demands for peace which are being made today, it seems that the firecracker has received the ban of the peace-loving people and that soon it will be a thing of the past.

Everything that has the semblance of war is being disliked more and more as the generations come and go. It is argued that if the love of peace can be inculated in the minds of the young of the land, then will come soon the era of peace, the day of triumph for the Hague tribunal. In the hands of the young lies the future of America, and what the next generation desires, is that which it will try to get. So there are being made many efforts to destroy the old fashioned Fourth for one without explosives, for one more in accord with the wishes and music of heaven. Each generation is learning more thoroughly the truth of the lessons of our Civil strife that war is hell.

The ideal way to spend the fourth seems to be to be quiet, to be peaceful, to be neighborly, and to think upon the achievements of our country and to recount the millions of blessings which are ours through being citizens of these United States.

Killed at Westernport.

"Thorney" Wilson, a former resident of Cumberland, fell from a train passing over the bridge spanning Wills Creek, at Westernport, Friday about seven o'clock, and was ground to death under the wheels. His body fell into the water below. Wilson, with his brother-in-law had started on a fishing trip. They had boarded a freight train and Wilson lost his hold as the train was passing over the bridge. He was aged about 45 years.

For Sale.

Two good fresh milch cows and two calves. They may be seen at my farm, "The Oaks", one mile from Huttons.

HOYES.

To the country child, the children's day service is the important annual event. The traning here recived cultivates grace and refinement, and prepares the child for religious duties. It is thus that habits are formed that enter into the child's character for life. The exercises were well rendered here on Sunday evening to a large and attentive audience. Much care and thought are required for the carrying out of these programs; but, after such successful efforts, should we not feel glad that we have helped the cause of God and of humanity?

A number of our people attended the annual review held by the Flatwoods Sunday School on Sunday afternoon.

Among the students of this place who have returned from the Oakland Normal School, and who took the examination are: Miss Dessie Callis, O. B. Lowdermilk, N. K. Welch, and Earl Smith; from Friendsville Normal, Misses Elizabeth Welch, and Olia and Bernadette Mattingly. All report a term of profitable work.

Miss Sadie Friend is home again, a graduate, in music, of Keyser, and has begun teaching music to a class of pupils of this place. Her father Rev. H. E. Friend, attended the Commencement exercises at Keyser, and the two were accompanied home by their relatives, Mrs. Blackburn and daughter, Miss Myrtle, of that place.

Mr. Jacob H. Cuppett with his family is visiting his parents at this place. Jocob was graduated recently in the Theological Seminary, Buckhannan, W. Va., and has now just returned from attending the Y. M. C. A. Convention at Niagara. Mr. Cuppett is preparing for the ministry; we wish him the highest success.

There was a family reunion at Geo. E. Bishoff's last week. Those attending from a distance were: Mrs. Henry P. Miller, Grantsville, Mrs Geo. W. Kemp, Harnedsville, Pa., Mrs. Henry M. Casteel, Oakland; and William Bishop, who has just been graduated from the Maryland State Normal School, Frostburg.

On Tuesday, there was a quilting party, well attended, closing with a social for the young people that evening The latter was enjoyed by a large number of friends.

Henry P. Miller arrived on Sunday and returned to Grantsville with his family on Monday.

Miss Ethel Welch a student of Western Maryland College, is home for the summer vacation.

Prof. A. W. DeWitt is in our village now.

Mr. William Glotfelty, of Sunnyside, spent Saturday and Sunday here, the guest of Mr. F. D. DeWitt. He was accompanied home by Mr. Daniel Turney of Friendsville.

Mr. Geo Glotfelty and wife, of McHenry, were the guests of Mr. Thos. E. Bishoff Sunday last.

Mr Allen Glover is visited by several of his relatives.

Before these few items are read in the colums of The Republican, the Forth of July will have come and gone. We need patrotic rallies. May there be a display of true patriotism, and not a flash of those blood and thunder times often observed.

HUCKLEBERRY FINN.

FIKE.

We have been having this past week some very hot weather, and rain. But the corn around here will be a very small crop.

The schools in this section are nearly all taken up although the Asher Glade School so far as the writer knows, has no teacher.

Mr. Isaiah Umble is helping to cut timber for Hileman & Markley.

Messrs. Asa Eike, Newton Fike and Daniel VanSickle are cutting logs for Mr. Garlitz, who is supplying Mr. Hollinger's mill, the mill being situated in what is known as "Glade Run Hollow."

There have been a couple of line Kilns built this last week, by Messrs Hiram Fike, and Wm. H. Thomas.

L. K. Fike has secured the McCabe school for the coming winter.

Wm. H. Thomas bought a horse a few days ago and he has proven good they say, with very high life.

Mrs. Minerva Fike and Polly Barnthouse were visiting one of their close relatives, Mr. J. M. Fike, near Awman.

Mr. Oscar Frantz is working for Mr. Owen Evans.

Mr. Wm. M. Fike is now making ready to build a new house and Mr. John Meyers has offered to take the contract of building the house.

Mrs Annie B. Barhthose, son and daughter, of Uniontown, Pa., here visiting friends and relatives but returned to their home on the 28th ult.

CARTER.

Wallace Mason Treasurer.

At the district meeting of the Epworth Leagues of this vicinity which was held at Bayard last week, Mr. Wallace Mason was elected to serve as treasurer for the ensuing year. The convention next year will be held at Davis, W. Va.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The Student Conference was a success in every way except in attendance. The talks and lectures were of the highest order. The lectures of Drs. Kirk and Sweet were especially pleasing to those priviledged to hear them. This Conference will be one of the attractions at the Park in the future.

So many summer visitors have come in since our last report that we could not name all, but will give a few only: Mr. and Mrs. Geo. I. Richardson, to their cottage on I street; a portion of Prof. Miller's family, to their I street cottage; a family to Heartsease cottage and Mr. William Baily and a few relatives from Wheeling to his cottage on H street.

Miss Maria Douhon, a deaconess, of Brooklyn, N. Y., is a guest at Haydenhurst cottage.

Mr. Charles Wilson, of the Insular Department, Washington, D. C., is here on a short leave of absence visiting his parents—and others.

The new postoffice building is about completed. The postoffice has been moved over to the new and more commodious quarters, and King & Martin will in a few days be ready for customers in the new building. Besides conducting a general mercantile business they will, in an adjoining room, serve lunches and in another serve ice cream to ladies and gentlemen. Their wareroom is in the basement.

Seaber Bros., of Westernport, Md., who leased the lunch stand in Chautauqua Park, have received their goods and will open up their stand to-day (4th).

The ice cream festival held for the benefit of the M. E. church, at Mrs. Hayden's cottage Tuesday evening, netted about twenty-two dollars.

The new cottage and other improvements being made on the Rev. J. P. McKee's lots on the corner of G street and Baltimore avenue, are nearing completion and will much improve the appearance of that prominent corner.

BITTINGER.

O, ye mighty politicians,
Come, git on ye'r campaign grin;
We kin tell what ye are huntin'
By the rattle o' ye'r chin.

Joe Kief, manager of the Jennings hotel, at Jennings, wears a new hat since last Thursday, but the extra flavor of his puddings is not due to that, but to the arrival of a new baby boy at his fireside.

Mrs. Oliver Beachy, who went to the University Hospital in Baltimore for treatment some weeks ago, returned to her home at this place last Friday much improved in health.

Asa J. Orendorf, youngest son of one of our progressive farmers, and Miss Amanda Ellithorpe, only daughter of School Commissioner C. E. Ellithorpe, both worthy young people of this village, were quietly married at Hotel Giessman, in Oakland, last week. The event was a complete surprise to many of the friends of the contracting parties. The happy couple are spending this week with the bride's parents in this village.

Jonas Bittinger drove up to Deer Park last week and brought home a new farm wagon.

Henry Meyers and grand daughter, Miss Naomi Lohr, of near Oakland, were visiting here last Sunday, and started for their home Monday morning.

The little four year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Orendorf fell from a fence, one day last week, and, in falling, pulled a heavy rail upon herself and was so badly hurt that it was necessary to call a physician, and for many hours the little one's life was despaired of, but at this writing she is improving.

Messrs. Lawrence Bittinger and Lewis Swauger, of Grantsville, were calling on friends here Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. John Bitzell were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Buckle Sunday afternoon.

The two daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Josephus Glotfelty were received into the Lutheran church at this place on Sunday morning by Rev. J. C. Shoup.

The "Union Depot" a Success.

The play given by local talent at the Opera House Friday evening by the Ladies Aid Society of the Methodist Church, was a grand success. Everyone acquitted themselves with credit. It would be impossible for us to speak of each of those who did well, for in order to do that, each one of the cast would have to be given great prominence.

Lumber Plant Burned.

The Large saw mill owned by R. Chaffey, of Elkins, W. Va., was destroyed by fire entailing a loss of about $20,000. The mill was situated at Williams, Tucker Co., W. Va., The mill was practically new and its supposed to have caught fire from a hot spindle. The handle factory at Williams depended entirely on this mill for their supply of wood. It will be necssary to close down the handle factory until lumber can be obtained elsewhere, or the mill is rebuilt, which will be as soon as possible. The loss is covered by insurance.

MAJOR BURNS APPOINTED.

War Department Orders Him to Report for Duty on Gov. Dawson's Staff.

Major J. M. Burns, of the United States Army, who is now at his summer home at Mountain Lake Park, is in receipt of an order from the War Department at Washington, directing him to report to Governor W. M. O. Dawson, of West Virginia, for duty on his staff in connection with the National Guard of that State. It is hoped that the Major will also be able to continue his lectures on Good Roads which he commenced at the University, at Morgantown, last winter while in command of the Cadet Corps.

HUTTON.

Mrs. Wm. Canty spent a few days in Cumberland recently.

Rev. E. Manges preached here Thursday evening.

Mrs. J. W. Laughlin, of Mountain Lake Park, visited Mrs. U. G. Palmer Friday.

Hutton has organized a base ball team.

Mr. and Mrs. Tom Pendergast are rejoicing over the arrival of a son.

Wonder what has become of the Journal correspondent since school closed?

Mr. C. Grussendorf recently purchased the Geo. Carney farm for $2,500.

Archie Connell entertained his young friends at a charade party on June 24th, the seventeenth anniuersary of his birthday.

Misses Helen and Carrinne De Berry, of Terra Alta, visited relatives in Hutton last week.

Frank Sanders gave a party Thursday night in his father's large new barn which was just completed.

The many friends of Mr. H. M. Miller will regret to learn that he has accepted a position in the Elkins tannery and will move his family to that place.

Messrs. John Notz and Thos. Nelson will move to Carney & Pendergast's new lumber setting neat Grafton.

Mrs. Joseph Poliski and children returned to their home in Berryburg, W. Va., Friday, accompaned by Miss Lattie Mosholder, who will visit them for a month.

The Hutton young men who are telegraph operators have been given permanent positions. Harold Glover is at Swanton, Edward Pendergast, at Frankville and Joseph Baker, at Deer Park.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MR. PETER CONNER

At his home in Oakland, on Thursday evening at 7:45, Peter Conner died from the effects of a rose cancer. He was buried in the Catholic cemetery, Saturday morning at nine o'clock, Father Connell conducting high mass and the usual services. He is survived by a wife and two grandchildren. The age of the deceased was about 80 years.

Mr. Conner thought that the cancer came from a cut by a razor upon his lip, made about two years ago. During the last year he has suffered a great deal from the affliction, yet he appeared never to have complained. His infinite faith in the power of his Church, and of his Christ, seemed to make him strong enough to bear the agony of the last hours without complaining. He was confined to the bed for only the day and half preceding his death. Father Connell administered the last whole rites of the church at noon Wednesday. The end was peaceful, and it seemed like a release to him to be freed from further torture from his affliction.

Mr. Conner was born in Ross Conner County, Ireland, about 80 years ago. He came to America when thirty years of age. In Oakland, on November 20, 1863, he married Miss Julia Kieff. No children survive him; but two children are with them left from an adopted daughter, Mrs. Ellen Rhone.

MR. THOMAS ROBERT WHITE.

At 12:15, on the morning of June 28th. Mr. Thomas R. White died at his home in Piedmont from catarrh of the stomach. He was buried Sunday afternoon in the Oakland Catholic cemetery, Father Connell conducting the ceremony. The deceased went to bed only the Saturday before he died. He is survived by two children by his first wife Ignatius, and William, now in Oakland, and by a widow and three children by his second marriage. The Fraternal Order of Eagles of which the deceased was a member were represented at the funeral services.

Mr. White lived in Oakland for a great many years, leaving here about two years ago for Piedmont where he has since made his home.

His first wife was Ruha Mattingly, of Cranesville, W. Va., whom he married in Mt. Lake Park in 1884; his second wife was Miss Kate Shaffer, of Oakland whom he wedded at Oakland in 1899. His second wife with her three children will make her home in Piedmont.

MR. THEOPHILUS WILT.

Died at his home in Swanton, Maryland, at an early hour Friday morning, June 21st, 1907, Mr. Theophilus Wilt, aged 75 years, three months and twelve days.

A strong constitution in a frame of exceptional endurance, enabled Mr. Wilt to survive for several years a stroke of paralysis that left his previously robust health in a precarious state and was the primary cause of his sudden and painless end while sleeping in the early morning. The subject of this mention was a son of the late John Wilt and was born in the old family homestead near the western bank of Savage river, now occupied by the flourishing and extensive lumber plant of Bond, in Garrett county. Before reaching the age of majority he obtained employment with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, then locating its mammoth |venture over the mountains and obstructions apparentlv rising as nature's barriers against railway possibilities, devoting to that service a life long loyalty and when disabled by age and infirmity, received from that corporation an annual stipend in recognition of services faithfully rendered.

Mr. Wilt was a law-abiding citizen of quiet temperament with strictly regulated habits and lived in peaceful relations with all of his fellows. He leaves a widow, four children, a sistor and an unusual lineage of grand children, great-grand children and remote relatives.

The funeral services were conducted Sunday morning, June 23rd, by the Rev. Dr. Johnson in the Swanton U. B. church, after which services the burial followed at Wilson's Store in the time-billowed city of the silent where, under the bloom of the summer's flower and the beat of the winter's gale, repose many revered and remembered no less honored type of the frontier axman in our western forest than upright fathers of an olden time.

RELLIM.

Baptists to Meet at Deer Park.

The annual meeting for 1908 of the Western District Baptist Association will be held at Deer Park from Tuesday, June 8th to 11th. Rev. R. A. Smith, of Montgomery County, was apgointed to preach the annual sermon, with Rev. B. O. Falls, of Westernport, as alternate. The meeting for 1907 was held at Frederick from Tuesday to Thursday, during last week. The representatives to this meeting elected that Deer Park be the next place for the 1908 meeting.

SERMON BY DR. ROADS.

Excellent Address Delivered at the Methodist Church Sunday Evening.

The Congregation at the Methodist Church enjoyed an excellent sermon Sunday evening delivered by Dr. Charles Roads, the traveling secretary of the union Sunday school association of Maryland. His line of talk was about children; bringing out particularly how each person must become as a little child before he or she can enter the kingdon of heaven.

The Doctor gave a very forcible illustration of how much faith a child can command, when older people can not muster up a grain of it. He illustrated the difference in the following way:

"At a meeting a short time ago, I made the assertion that I had something in my pocket I never had seen, and which no other person in the world ever had seen. I asked the children how many of them believed what I said. Nearly all of their little hands went up. The faith of children," continued the doctor, "in me was unlimited.

"I next asked the adults of the audience how many of them believed that I had something in my pocket that I never had seen and which no other person ever had seen. After great effort the hand of one old woman went up through sympathy. None of the adults could have faith in my assertion, but all of the children trusted me implicitly. But when I took from my pocket a peanut and broke it open, and showed the kernel to the audience, then I proved that I had something in my pocket which no one ever had seen. The children with the faith were led aright, and the adults with no power of faith, were mislead through their own credulity. Christains must have this same faith in their Heavenly Father. We must become as little children."

Two Teachers Elected.

Mr. Burns Lowdermilk, of Hoyes, has been elected to the principalship of the Mt. Lake Park school for the coming school year. The Deer Park school has been given to Mr. Norris K. Welch of Hoyes,

A Trip Through the Gold Fields of the West.

THE REPUBLICAN desires again to call the attention of its readers to the series of letters which are published from week to week in this paper, written by Mr. U. G. Palmer, of this county, who is traveling through the West. The letters are very interesting, and as there is no "chaff" in them, they furnish exceedingly profitable and readable material. After reading them one feels as though he or she had just taken a trip through the West.

Buy Big Timber Tract.

The well known timber firm of Carney, Pendergast and Hughes, of Hutton W. Va., has secured timber right of valuable tracts in Barbour county, W. Va. The tract comprises about 1,200 acres of virgin forest of hard woods lying along the Belington branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. Mills will be erected at once on the tract.

Hotel Engine Broke Down.

The engine at the Oakland Hotel electric light plant broke down Monday evening about 9:30. The cylinder head was blown out and two of the side rods were broken. The electric lights will be out for about ten days by which time it is hoped that the machinery may be repaired.

Died at Grafton.

Mrs. James H. Flanagan, wife of Rev. James H. Flanagan, of Grafton, W. Va., died at her home at ten o'clock Sunday morning. Her husband was a minister in the Presbyterian Church, being located at Grafton for many years. Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Peddicord, of Oakland, attended the obsequies.

Killed at Thomas.

The dead body of Mr. Frank Henry Sanders, of Cumberland, was found on the Western Maryland railroad, at Thomas, W. Va., Monday. It is presumed that he was run over by the cars.

Mrs. Howard, widow of the late Rev. Howard, of Bloomington, who with her two daughters, Misses Pleasant and Florence, is about to move to Winchester Va., and make that place her home in the future. Mrs. Howard severed her connection as teacher with the M. E. Sunday school on last Sunday afternoon. She had held the position for sixteen years and was seldom absent from her class. In recognition of her services and high esteem in which she was held a number of beautiful and handsome testimonials were presented to her at the close of the services. A silver service from the Sunday school, a Bible from her pastor and linen from the Ladies Aid Society comprised the most valuable gift.—Piedmont Independent.

Pension Issued.

Hon. Richard T. Browning, who served in the civil war, in the 2nd Md. Reg., P. H. B., has been granted an increased of pension, to $14 a month, for wounds incurred in the service, in the course of his four years service. He is a promient citizen of Garrett county. Mr. Jocob Brown was his attorney.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

A Romance In Its Aftermath.

By FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet.

CURIOUSLY enough it had never come home to Elizabeth Dunning that she was an old maid until this morning. She had been training the unruly arms of a chambering Seven Sisters rose when pretty Susie Wrenn came tripping by on her way to the mail.

"Oh, Miss Dunnin'," the girl had called, slacking her pace a little as she neared the gate, "ma wants to know if she can borrow your cake tins this mornin'. We're expectin' company, an' we've only got one."

"Why, certainly, Susie, you can have them and welcome. Stop on your way back from the mail."

"Thank you," moving up a little and then lingering as though wishing to say more, but hardly knowing how to proceed. "Them's awful nice roses you've got."

"Yes, they are nice," assented Miss Dunning, clipping off a handful and offering them across the fence. "You must come in some morning and look at my bed of teas and at my hedge of jacks." Then she smiled encouragingly into the blushing, upturned face. "Now, what is it, Susie?" she asked. "You have something else to tell me."

"Oh, it's nothin' much," protested the girl bashfully, but with eyes and cheeks which belied her words. "You see, I've only told ma so far, an' now it seems I must tell you next."

"Of course," with affected indignation. "Did I not know you as a baby in long clothes and have I not been your Sunday school teacher more than ten years? Certainly, you must tell me."

But still the girl hesitated, looking at her feet and down the street and across the fence to the pretty cottage whose verandas were embowered with clambering roses and honeysuckles. At last she broke into a frank, merry laugh.

"What a fool I am, Miss Dunnin'," she cried. "It's only that I'm goin' to be married. I'll stop for the tins comin' back," and she ran lightly down the sidewalk, only pausing for a moment to glance over her shoulder.

"It's Mr. Gray," she called with something that was almost exultation in her voice, "an' he's real nice, if I do say it."

Miss Dunning's face had been full of the kindliest interest, and its expression did not change now as she watched the girl speed buoyantly down the street. But her long, tapering fingers trembled slightly as they left the paling and turned to the rose clipping. Long years ago—she did not care to remember how many—she had tripped down the sidewalk like that and had been pretty and vivacious and hopeful. And with her in those days it had also been Mr. Gray, and she, too, had thought him real nice.

And still the golden oriole sang on, oblivious of all but his mate and the rapture of his own music. Miss Dunning listened with a tender smile on her face. Had she chosen for the best?

"YOU HAVE SOMETHING ELSE TO TELL ME."

She thought so unflinchingly, even when her very heartstrings were crying for redress. He had succeeded wonderfully, as he could not possibly have done had there been a weight to clog his flight.

She was glad to remember that she had told him to go, impetuously, with unflinching eyes and lips, and she was glad to remember also that he had looked at her with expostulation and entreaty and that he had flatly refused to consider so cold blooded a thing and then had flamed out and declared she did not love him as he did her and that he would follow her command and make ambition the rule of his life.

She had not been able to keep up with his progress very closely, for even a brilliant career on the other side of the world only comes back in stray paragraphs and the most meager of reports. But she knew the success was there and that it was of the kind they had dreamed.

Long ago she had given up all thought of their ever being to each other more than they had been. Perhaps they would never see one another again in this world. Even when she learned that he was coming home, renowned for his intellect and noble work, she looked forward to meeting him with unquestioning gladness. It was not so much her youth returning as it was the great success of her planning coming back for approval and commendation. Their youth was very near and dear, but it was something that was past and laid away in the lavender and rose leaves of her memory.

She had always remembered him as the young man who had gone away from her—strong, erect and with black, curling hair thrust carelessly back from his forehead. Now, looking clearly into the past through the revelation which had just come to her and without the glamour of her own love to idealize him, she had tried to imagine how this man who had been hers, but was now another's, might appear. He was older than her by two years. That meant he was forty-one. Here she broke resolutely from her retrospection. Why was she so foolish? Forty-one was young for a man, even as thirty-nine was old for a woman. Of course he was just the right age for pretty, simple minded Susie and would have the clear judgment and experience which she lacked, and of course a strong, beauty loving man who had been so long away from the world would prefer a pretty young girl to a faded old maid. But as she walked resolutely to the house, forgetting alike the roses and the perfect June day, there was for the first time a hard, bitter pain at her heart. She could spare him to greater usefulness, to a noble ambition, but this—oh, this was different!

And yet when she came from her room an hour later there was no sign of disquiet in her brown eyes or trace of agitation on the delicate flush of her cheeks. The rest of the unruly arms of the Seven Sisters were cut away or trained toward usefulness, and she was standing with her head tipped slightly to one side in contemplation of her work when again came the familiar tap, tap, tap down the sidewalk, ending with the sharp click of her gate latch.

"Here I am again, Miss Dunnin'," a blithe voice called, "beggin' for roses this time. The cows have eaten ours off clean, an' we must have a good spread for our company. I don't know what the place would do without your rose garden an' lilies an' strawberry bed—or we girls, for that matter, without you," catching a hand and raising it to her lips with a pretty, graceful caress that caused the older woman to throw an arm across the young girl's shoulder in sudden tenderness.

"Oh, I forgot to tell you, Miss Dunnin'," Susie cried roguishly. "He's come."

Miss Dunning's hand closed a little more closely upon the pruning shears, but her face was calm, even smiling.

"I thought he was not expected until next week," she observed. "At least that is what the paper said."

"Oh, I don't know," doubtfully. "We don't have the paper, but I think Charlie was expecting him before next week. Charlie's my brother-in-law, you know, an' owns that pretty house near the river. Mr. Gray's goin' to stay with him. They used to know each other. But, there! I'd better get the roses and be goin'. They're all comin' up this evenin', and ma said for me to hurry back an' get through with my fixing' an' fussin'. An', say, Miss Dunnin', if you don't mind, I'd like to bring him to see you 'fore he goes," looking up with a roguish pleading expression on her pretty, baby face.

"Of course," the strained lips forced themselves to say. "You must bring him by all means."

But after the girl's departure Miss Dunning left the roses and hurried away to the seclusion of her room. Bring him to her, this young girl who had been but a baby when the two had been so much to each other! What did it mean? And he had not even written to her or in any way announced his coming.

The next day was spent on the front veranda, reading or playing with her squirrels and dog or idly touching the strings of the guitar, which was another of her pastimes. But through it all her mind was elsewhere, listening for long absent but familiar footsteps, recalling incidents which she had stored away among the treasures of her memory and sending swift, eager glances to that point of the road at which Susie first appeared. She was getting old, she told herself weakly. This lack of self control was proof of it. But still she sat there and listened and thought and watched.

But the day wore away, and he did not come, and then the next and the next. Through all these years her eyes had retained their brightness and buoyancy, and her cheeks had lost but little of the delicate bloom of their youth. But now her face grew strained and piteous, and dark circles began to inclose her eyes. If only he had gone by once and lifted his hat or had given some sign of remembrance or recognition! But, no; he did not even pass along her sidewalk or in any way evince a consciousness of her existence. On the fourth day Susie hurried by to the postoffice and back, but was apparently too much occupied with her thoughts to glance at the rosebushes or vine inclosed veranda. Miss Dunning watched her until she disappeared behind a hedge of althens and then turned hastily in search of some work to occupy her tremulous fingers. Evidently Susie was too happy to divide her thoughts, and probably he was happy, too, but somehow, for the first time in her life, Miss Dunning could not bring herself in thorough sympathy with the happiness of others.

One day as she sat there with a book in her lap and her eyes fixed upon that last visible point of the street before it was shut out by the other hedge a firm, eager step came up the sidewalk from the opposite direction. But she did not notice until her gate latch clicked. Then she turned inquiringly.

She knew him in an instant, for the years had brought but a stronger step and nobler carriage, with perhaps a too liberal sprinkling of gray hair, which she could discern even from the veranda. She was conscious of a curious thrill of awe and tenderness as she rose from her chair, for even in that brief instant she remembered there was not a single gray intruder among her own soft hair, and his she associated with the work which had conquered obstacles and adversity.

There was no reserve or ceremony in her movements, and by the time he had closed the gate she was halfway down the walk. But it was an older sister greeting her brother hero, or, rather, as one who had sent her best thoughts out to conquer the world and was now eager to wreathe them with the laurel of victory.

"Alfred!" she said as she went forward with outstretched hands.

"Elizabeth!" And then he bent forward and touched his lips to her forehead. And she received the kiss with her eyes looking straight into his and with only the faintest possible color stealing into her cheeks. It was not a wrong to her girlish admirer or an act of presumption or breach of faith on his part. It was merely the seal of the success of their twenty years of joint labor.

"Come up to the veranda, Alfred," she said, with her eyes full of frank welcome. "I want to hear all about it. Of course I know in a fragmentary way, but it will seem new and more real from your lips."

And he told her, sitting in his old place behind the honeysuckle, with the swaying sprays sending alternate lines of sunlight and shade across his face in the same old way, and she listened, with eyes full and lips half parted and with her head nodding commendation or sympathy from time to time. It was a story of heroism and triumph, told in a straightforward matter of fact way, without egotism or self depreciation, knowing that it was her right to have it all, even as he had lived it.

"But it is good to be home again, Elizabeth," he concluded with a satisfied sigh as he leaned back in his chair and surveyed the veranda and rose garden beyond. "The memory of these flowers and their owner has been with me through all the twenty years, and many times have I been on the point of giving up the struggle and returning to them. And, indeed," a trace of reserve coming into his voice, "I might have done so but for what you said and the look you gave me when we last stood together among your honeysuckles. I knew I could only return to the sentence of a deserter who had forsaken his colors."

"But—you never wrote, Alfred."

"Yes, twice. One of the letters was lost, however, for I heard of the ship going down in midocean. The other I never heard from. Perhaps it was lost too."

"I never received it." Then, "But you have been in the place a week, Alfred, and only just called."

He looked puzzled.

"I came in on the train an hour ago, Elizabeth, and would have been here before but for a complication over a telegram. It seems there is another man of the same name in town."

"But Susie."

He raised his hand impatiently.

"Never mind, Susie. I have gone through my probation and have done my work with all the strength that God gave me. Now I have come 10,000 miles for my reward—for you. If there is more work, bid me do it, but for charity's sake do not refuse your companionship in the labor."

She was not looking at him now. Her heart was too full for speech, almost for thought. A squirrel ran down a pillar of the veranda and sought her lap, and the oriole lifted up his voice in a sudden ecstasy of song.

Then the gate clicked, and she roused herself with an effort. A young man whom she did not know stood before her, and with him was Susie.

"I've brought him at last, Miss Dunnin'," the girl cried merrily, "but I just had to drag him, he's so bashful. Mr. Gray, this is the Sunday school teacher I've told you about." Then, disregarding further formality and with bubbling gladness in her voice: "An' oh, say, Miss Dunnin', we've coaxed him to stay with us for good and all. He's goin' to open a grocery next the postoffice." Here she caught sight of the gray haired, soldierly figure in the background and stopped in sudden confusion.

"This is Mr. Gray, too, Susie," Miss Dunning said with something in her voice the girl could not understand, "and he, too, is going to stay here 'for good and all.'"

PHYSICAL CULTURE.

The Kind Hiram's Son Advised Him to Take.

Hiram in old age wonders why he can't do as much as he used to do. Hiram's son being away from home, he writes to him for information as to how he may regain his health. His son, being a good athlete and knowing the value of physical culture, thinks that it would be beneficial to the old man to take morning exercises and so writes, but his imagination runs away with him at times as follows:

"Dear Dad—In order for you to bring back your health and be as good a man as you used to be you should become an athlete and go through some good, strong and powerful exercises. The first thing when you rise early in the morning you should give a leap in the air, hit your snoot against the ceiling and clap your heels lightly nine times together before you touch the floor. By doing this once over it will give your blood a good circulation and strengthen your nerves. It will also prepare you for the next performance which you are about to undergo. Give a high kick and slap your toes against the ceiling and at the same time fall to the floor upon your head thrice. This exercise will strengthen the neck bone, harden your head and keep the brain in good order. After this you should hoist the lid and go out on the roof and take deep breathing exercises. Do the high comeflop. Walk off the roof as though you were walking through the air, but take good care that you fall flat to the ground on your stomach. This will prolong your wind, develop your breast, also make you see stars. Then you should walk in and get ready for breakfast and put up a growl about the victuals and all that's on the table. This exercise will prepare you for the difficult ups and downs of this world. All of these exercises should be undergone not less than once a day for a week, and if you are alive when your week is up you will be a healthy and ablebodied man."—Judge's Library.

A Captain of Industry.

A Kansas politician was asked by his wife to lay aside politics long enough one day to dig the potatoes in the garden. He consented and after digging for a few minutes he returned to the house and said he had found a coin. He washed it off, and it proved to be a silver quarter. He put it in his jeans and went back to work. Presently he went to the house again and said he had found another coin. He washed the dirt off of it, and this time it was a silver half dollar. He put it in his jeans.

"I have worked pretty hard," said he to his wife. "I guess I'll take a short nap."

When he awoke he found that his wife had dug all the rest of the potatoes. But she found no coins. It then dawned upon her that she had been "worked."—Philadelphia Ledger.

A Record "Break" (Billiard Term).

Master—What in thunder are you doing, John?

John—Well, sir, looks as if I was goin' to make a record break, sir!—Sketch.

Just Enough.

"I never could use money with a clear conscience," said Mrs. Goodsole, "that had been made in stocks. I never could forget that somebody else had lost it."

"That being the case," replied her husband, "I guess I'll give to some charity the $300 I made today."

"Oh, Charley! Did you really? That with the $300 I have saved will be just enough to pay for the European trip that I've been dreaming of for years."—Chicago Record-Herald.

He Wanted Pie.

"Mamma," said small Harry one day, "I want a piece of pie."

"It will soon be dinner time," rejoined his mother. "Have patience."

"But I don't want patience," protested the little fellow. "I want pie."—Pittsburg Post.

Cause For Complaint.

Real Joy.

Doesn't it warm you when
Some one comes in,
When luck has harried him,
Borrows your tin;
When a man thinks of you
On the down trend,
When life has battered him,
You are his friend.

But is there anything
Equals your glee,
Makes you as gladsomely
Glad as can be,
As when that same man comes
Loosed from the rack,
Basking in fortune's smile,
And pays you back?

ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE ACTIVE.

Gathering Church Voters Lists and Getting Picked Committees Appointed in Various Churches.

The Headquarters Committee of the Anti-Saloon League of Maryland has decided to enter upon an active political campaign and reports a decisive victory in the first clear cut contest for the next legislature.

Mr. W. L. Richards, of Brunswick, a member of the last House of Delegates, was active in trying to secure the repeal of the prohibition clause in the Brunswick charter and this year was a candidate for the senatorial nomination. He was opposed by the anti-saloon forces of Brunswick, ably seconded by the effective organization of the Frederick County Anti-Saloon League, working in harmony with the State League, and failed to secure the nomination.

The League is also sending to every pastor in the state a request for a list of the voting membership of his church, with the party preference indicated, and a suggestion that a picked committee of three be named from each church. These lists are to be used for the purpose of sending out information as to the attitude of candidates upon the temperance question just prior to the election.

COLER CUTS THE SOAP BILLS

But He Nearly Wrecked A Subordinate's Happy Home In Doing It

The mystery of the decrease in the soap bills of the public baths in Brooklyn, which has been puzzling Comptroller Metz, has at last been solved. A great light has been thrown on the matter by Borough President Coler, and the belief which was gaining ground in the Finance Department that the good folks of Brooklyn had contracted a sudden dislike for soap and water has happily been dispelled.

It appears that in the baths in Brooklyn about 100,000 cakes of soap are used each year. Some time ago one of the bright young men in the Borough President's office told Mr. Coler that the makers of a certain brand of soap, which was larkely used, would give a bar of soap for every five of their soap wrappers returned to them. Mr. Coler's mind immediately collided with an idea.

"I see a great chance to economize," said he. "With 100,000 wrappers we can get 20,000 bars of soap. Send for the man in charge."

In a few minutes the man through whose hands the supplies of soap pass stood before the Borough President.

"What do you do with the soap wrapper?" inquired Mr. Coler.

The soap man twirled his hat in his hand and gazed out of the window.

"Why, er—er—er I save them," he answered.

"Good," remarked Borough President. "Bring them here tomorrow."

The soap man shifted from one foot to the other and seemed to be ill at ease. But Mr. Coler did not notice his worried looks as he departed. On the following morning the soap man again presented himself before the Borough President.

"Mr. Coler," announced he nervously and gloomily, "the soap wrappers are here."

"Where?" asked the President, observing that the man carried no package.

For answer the soap man beckoned Mr. Coler to a window. Below in Joralemon street was standing a big truck loaded with furniture. There was a handsome oak sideboard, a brass bedstead, a whatnot, two or three rugs, several barrels of crockery, a morris chair and a lot of other things.

"There are the soap wrappers, sir," said the gloomy and apparently troubled official.

"What do you mean?" asked the puzzled Borough President.

Then the embarrassed man made a clean breast of it.

"The company which makes the soap," he explained, "gives premiums in exchange for returned soap wrappers. Learning of this, and thinking the city had no use for the wrappers, I saved them and furnished my flat with the premiums I obtained. As I could not bring you the wrappers, I brought down the premiums. I had to rip up my whole flat to do it."

Mr. Coler smiled. He was satisfied that the man, who was one of the most efficient subordinates, had been innocent of any intentional wrongdoing, and told him to take the furniture back to his flat. From that time the wrappers have been returned to the manufacturers for cakes of soap.—Ex.

A MAID OF ATHENS, OHIO.

A story of One of Many Thousands from which others May Learn.

Two months ago a beautiful young married woman left Athens with a man who was not her husband, her purpose was that of all humanity, to secure happiness. She had tired of her husband; had met the man who is always waiting to lead a beautiful wife astray, and finally concluded to give up respectability and all chance of an honorable reputation in the future, in order to gratify a probably transient infatuation for a scoundrel.

Well, she escaped the humdrum of quiet home life and the worry of her children, and she found the excitement and stimulation of a wicked adventure. Off to the West she went with her lover and presumably enjoyed to the full the physical and other pleasures which are said to accompany sinning in pairs. She had a change of scene, a change of air, a change of habit, a change of diet, along with travel, gaiety, total freedom from cooking, sewing and house-keeping together with the relief that comes from not always having to see the same face at meal time.

Of course this woman having had several years' experience with a genuine, lawful husband, supposed that her lover would cherish her forever after she had made the supreme sacrifice of duty, honor and virture, to gratify his passion for her. They all think that, but as unusally happens, the man in this case, being a villian to begin with, and having neither moral sense nor fear of God in his heart, soon tired of her, and left her in humble lodgings away offin Denver He simple "shook her," as the saying goes among men of that stripe; heartlessly deserted her to shift for herself.

It was then probably, that the beautiful young woman began to see things in their true light, and realized to the full what she had done in defying the laws of morality and of society. Now comes the news from Denver, under date of June 20, that she was found dead—a suicide—with a letter of forgiveness from her abondoned husband in one hand and his photograph in the other! Ah.—When lovely woman stoops to folly.

And finds too late that men betray; What charm can sooth her melancholly?

What art can wash her guilt away?

In this case we can all breathe a prayer for the soul of the wilful, passionate, heedless woman who, having made an irreparable error, finally came to her senses, and then, appalled by her guilt and shame, destroyed her life with her husband's letter of foregiveness in one hand, and his photograph in the other—mute witnesses, we trust of her abundant repentance!—Gallipolis (O.) # The Fourth of July GIRL

By ROBERTUS LOVE

COPYRIGHT, 1907, BY ROBERTUS LOVE

TRUCE to praise of patriot boys,
With all their Independence noise!
Now is the time to celebrate
The American maiden up to date.
This nineteen-seven athletic girl
At strenuous outings takes a whirl.
The swiftest mount she boldly rides;
She wrestles with the Jersey tides;
She plays at golf and likes it, too,
And she can paddle her own canoe.
This picture, if you need the proof,
Will show you she can raise the roof
With pyrotechnic hullabaloo
As well as any boy can do.

'Phrastus and the Fourth of July

By FRANK H. SWEET.

[Copyright, 1907, by Frank H. Sweet.]

"'N' SHE says I shan't spend one cent for crackers ner torpedoes, ner go down to see the p'rade, ner any of the boys. She says I've got to stay hum and keep still this Fourth.

"She says I kin take the old boss pistle 'n' fire it off once down behind the barn. 'N' I kin tie dad's flag to a broomstick 'n' wave it about all I wanter. Who wants an old broomstick round anyway? That ain't no Fourth of July."

'Phrastus sniffed—he almost sniveled. Harvey Harris laughed outright.

"Say, 'Phrastus, what under the canopy did you do last Fourth that makes Aunt 'Scilla settle down on you like this?"

"Nothin'," said 'Phrastus sullenly.

"Oh, pshaw! I know you, and I know Aunt Priscilla. She'd never corner you up so close without some reason. Honest, now, out with it, and I'll see what I can do for you."

"There was the cat," said 'Phrastus, digging his toes into the ground.

"What about the cat?"

"She told me to give him his dinner, 'n' I put a firecracker under the pan. It didn't hurt him none, but he never come for a week, 'n' he won't tech codfish sence."

"Oh, ho! What else?"

"The settin' hen," said 'Phrastus, scratching his right ear. "I knowed she was [illegible] up, 'n' I bet a comple o' crackers 'd do it."

"And did they?"

"You'd 'n' thought so! They set [illegible] 'n' most burnt up the chicken house." 'Phrastus actually grinned.

"Ah, ha! Go ahead, that wasn't all. What set on the [illegible] touch?"

"It was the [illegible] wash b'iler," said 'Phrastus, frowning. "We tuk it out behind the barn to fight a bunch [illegible] Then we [illegible] wash day [illegible] the b'iler was."

"And then they set it?"

"I had stepped on it," muttered 'Phrastus. "But I don't think folks [illegible] to hold things a hull year."

Harvey threw his head back and laughed heartily. 'Phrastus stopped [illegible] and chuckled.

"Now, look here," said Harvey when he had his breath out. "I haven't forgotten how you 'rounded' Prowsy for me last summer, and if you'll promise not to use them around the house or the barn or [illegible] where they'll disturb Aunt 'Scilla I'll put half a dozen packs under the big stone behind the barn for you Fourth of July morning."

"It's awful good of you!" 'Phrastus' eyes sparkled with delight. "There ain't nobody I'd rather 'n' 'scept me. I'll take 'em down to the woods. 'N', sech [illegible] does every time he gets [illegible] don't give any other feller the [illegible] they got in that watermelon?"

"It must be the English ram Mr. Turner's been [illegible]" said Harvey as he turned to look [illegible] for him I suppose I'll [illegible] down and see him when the [illegible] get."

"[illegible] for a sheep!" [illegible] or the fence and [illegible] side [illegible] for my sheep! Say, I'll bet I can get as [illegible] in a [illegible] 'n' a [illegible] ling 'steen of two o' them a bunches

"Just exactly."

"I bet I'd never pay them old British $200 for a sheep," said 'Phrastus.

"What do you know about the British, Bub?" asked one of the men.

"I know we whipped 'em twicet—Fourth of July," said 'Phrastus.

"Well, it seems they can beat us on sheep," laughed the man.

"I 'spect if Mr. Turner had looked round he'd got jest as good a one in 'Meriker for $10!" cried 'Phrastus. "They can't beat us on anything."

Having reached the ground safely, King George stamped his royal foot and shook his curved horns. Then, as Mr. Turner entered the yard by a side gate, the ram dashed forward with unexpected quickness, knocked his new owner's feet from under him and laid him flat on his back.

"Serves Mr. Turner right for spendin' so much money on an old British sheep," 'Phrastus whispered to Harvey.

Aunt Priscilla noticed with surprise that 'Phrastus neither whined nor pleaded when she reannounced her Fourth of July edict.

"You hain't been givin' him money for firecrackers or dossyin' him up, have ye, Ben?" she inquired of her husband.

"No, I ain't," responded Uncle Ben. "But jest think on't, Persilla! The heft of a boy's livin' is rumpus, and to choke him off on the Fourth! It's—well, it's plaguy cruel! He'll bust!"

"No, he won't. You jest let him alone, Benjamin Arbuckle. It's time he learned that cats and wash b'ilers and other folks had some rights on the Fourth of July 's well 's boys."

* * * * * * *

"Where you going, 'Phrastus?" she demanded when the Fourth at last arrived, as quiet in their immediate vicinity as if it had been a Sunday.

"Down to Mr. Turner's wood lot to sail my boats."

He had the boats conspicuously tucked under his arm. Aunt 'Scilla regarded him with a mixture of remorse and suspicion.

"You ain't fired off your pistol yet?"

"No'm. Don't wanter. Once ain't nothin'. It'd sound as if it'd lost itself."

"Your pa's flag is in there on the table."

"That's had too much powder a'ready."

'Phrastus had carefully studied up this smart speech in advance.

"Hum!" Aunt Priscilla sniffed. "Well, go 'long then. If you go to that p'rade, sir, you know what you'll get."

"Ain't goin'."

'Phrastus slouched off with an air of deep seated melancholy till the barn was between himself and Aunt 'Scilla's remorseful eyes. Harvey had more than kept his promise, and 'Phrastus executed the final steps of a war dance.

"Ain't he good, though? I'll hunt dogs for him all day. Look at those two big fellers! They'll do for Long Toms on the Chesapeake."

'Phrastus had planned a naval engagement that should reverse a fact of history. One of Uncle Ben's favorite stories was of the ship Chesapeake, when the English ship Leopard forced her to strike her colors in a time of peace. Uncle Ben's grandfather had been a sailor on the American vessel, and the story Uncle Ben loved to listen to as a child he loved to tell 'Phrastus.

But 'Phrastus had determined that those ships should meet again on Mr. Turner's pond with a very different result.

He began his preparations. The five cent flag rendered the Chesapeake top heavy, so he stuck it into the bank.

The Chesapeake was a full rigged schooner of [illegible] eighteen inches long, with two rows of firecracker guns on either [illegible] The English ship was [illegible] large—a block of wood [illegible] into the semblance of a boat [illegible] one cracker [illegible] mast. Her complement of guns was a meager half dozen—three on a side.

The two big firecrackers were placed in position at the Chesapeake's bow and stern, and the commodore, joyfully striking a match, stooped down to fire his guns.

Whack! 'Phrastus shot out into the pond, turning a somersault and scattering matches as he went. His line of motion was directly across the Chesapeake. Both her slender masts snapped, and the stately vessel careened till her whole armament slid off into the water.

'Phrastus' first thought as he emerged puffing and sputtering was that the heat had exploded the firecrackers all at once. But when he got the water out of his eyes he saw that the British had received unexpected re-enforcements.

King George XII., arriving unexpected from the rear, had disposed of the American commodore and now turned his attention to the stars and stripes, which he jammed into the bank with repeated blows of his wooly head. The patriotic blood of 'Phrastus boiled.

"Git out of that, you old British ram! Le' my flag alone! I'll hit you with a rock, I will!"

He dug vainly about with his fingers in the muddy bed of the pond, but found nothing larger than a small pebble. Meantime King George's pointed feet were tramping his ammunition deep into the soil. 'Phrastus lifted up his voice in reproach and lamentation.

"You're the meanest, meanest old sheep that ever was! We did beat you, we did, we did! Oh, my flag—boo—m'f'rrcrackers—hoo—he's a-sp'llin' every last one! I wish they'd bust 'n' turn him wrong side ou-ou-out!"

The howl drew King George's attention to the pond. He stood a moment with lowered horns and then plunged threateningly forward, drawing back, however, as his feet touched the water.

At the forward movement 'Phrastus turned and ran. He reached the shore as King George came galloping around the curve.

Up the nearest tree scrambled the small American. It was not a very large one and received a blow from King George's head that almost shook the climber loose before he reached a place of safety in the crotch.

For some time—'Phrastus afterward said, "The hull mornin'," but he was in no condition to judge—King George butted the tree, bringing down upon himself fresh explosions of tearful wrath and all the breakable branches 'Phrastus could reach. Afterward he nibbled about in the vicinity, returning at intervals to renew the assault and never going far enough away to permit the escape of his prisoner.

Aunt 'Scilla's dinner was late, for Uncle Ben went to the parade, but it was an exceptionally good one, and there was a puffy little turnover at 'Phrastus' place. Aunt 'Scilla rang the little bell, and Uncle Ben rang the big bell without bringing any small nephew forward to eat it.

"After all I've said," declared Aunt Priscilla, her lips growing ominously thin and tight, "that boy's been and gone to the p'rade!"

"Tain't agin nature if he has," said Uncle Ben. "When you stretch string too tight, it 'll snap."

"Something 'll snap," said Aunt 'Scilla. Her eyes did. "I've got to train up that boy in the way he should go, and I mean to do it. Don't you dast say a word, Benjamin Arbuckle! If he don't learn to go straight now, he'll go crooked all his life."

After dinner she cut two long lilac sprouts and trimmed them with ostentatious care. While she was washing dishes in the kitchen Uncle Ben slyly cut tiny slashes along the whole length of each switch.

It was the middle of the afternoon when a boy with a dirty, tear marked face and mud stained clothes shuffled into the house. Under his arm he carried a dismasted toy schooner and a dilapidated five cent American flag.

"So, Theophrastus Wilson," greeted Aunt 'Scilla, "you've been to the p'rade after all. Very well, sir, you're goin' to remember this Fourth of July as long as you live. Come straight here."

She flourished one of the switches, and it fell to pieces in her astonished hands.

"Guess I shell 'member it," whined 'Phrastus. "I hain't been to the p'rade. I hain't. I stuck up in a tree this ackerlastin' Fourth, with Turner's old ram a-buttin' at it, tryin' to [illegible] me down. I'd had to stayed there all night, too, likely, if Mr. Turner's Pete hadn't come along. You jest ast him!"

When Harvey Harris heard of it, he could not resist saying, "So the British boat, eh, 'Frastus?"

"Just the [illegible]" said 'Phrastus.

FOR SOME TIME KING GEORGE BUTTED THE TREE.

The Martyrdom Of Nathan Hale.

By WALTON WILLIAMS.

[Copyright, 1907, by C. N. Lurie.]

BY this time everybody has agreed upon Nathan Hale as the one supreme representative of American Revolutionary martyrdom. The last words of the young soldier just before the British hanged him as a spy have become a part of our most sacred national inheritance:

"I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."

Within fifteen years two splendid statues and several other memorials have been raised to the memory of Nathan Hale, a notable play depicting his life and death has been written and widely produced, scores of magazine articles on the subject have been published, and several complete and detailed biographies have come from the press. It is a curious fact that two biographies published the same year, 1899, bore these kindred titles: "Nathan Hale, the Martyr Spy," and "Nathan Hale, the Martyr Hero." This shows how students of American history and heroism vie with each other in paying tardy tribute to the young Connecticut patriot who gave up his life as a sacrifice to freedom on Sept. 22, 1776, only two and a half months after the first "glorious Fourth."

For seventy years the dust of the young hero lay in some unidentified spot on Manhattan Island before the first monument to his memory was erected. In 1837 the women of his native town, Coventry, Conn., conceived the plan of building a Nathan Hale monument. They worked for several years in raising funds, and the memorial was completed and dedicated in 1846, just seventy years after the execution of the hero.

The Macmonnies statue of Hale, which stands in City Hall park, New York, was dedicated in 1893, with imposing ceremonies, eloquent addresses and a military and naval parade. A few years later the alumni of Yale university, of which institution Nathan Hale was a graduate, raised a fund for the erection of a statue of the hero on the college grounds. There is also a Nathan Hale statue in Hartford, Conn. A handsome memorial in the form of a drinking fountain is an object of interest and comfort at Huntington, N. Y., where the youth was captured by British soldiers when he was about to start back to the American army. The Macmonnies statue in New York city is said to be the finest specimen of the sculptor's art that we have in America. It is a bronze figure of heroic size, mounted upon a circular pedestal, which bears the last words of the hero and the further inscription: "Nathan Hale, a captain in the regular United States army, who gave his life for his country in this city of New York, Sept. 22, 1776. Erected by the Sons of the Revolution."

This statue faces Broadway at one of the busiest points on that great thoroughfare. Millions of people pass by every year and see the pathetic figure of the young Revolutionary soldier, his arms pinioned for execution, standing there in imperishable bronze, an inspiration to all who love their country.

Other memorials of Hale, even more interesting, may be visited by the patriotic pilgrim. The quaint old house in which he was born is still standing in the town of Coventry. At New London, in the same state, the building in which Nathan Hale taught school is still preserved, though considerably altered. Hale was principal of this school when news was brought to New London by a messenger on horseback that a fight had taken place at Lexington between the British soldiers and the minutemen. He immediately enlisted in the army of independence, serving until his death at the early age of twenty-one years and three months.

STATUE OF NATHAN HALE, CITY HALL PARK, NEW YORK.

So far as history has been able to detach itself from hearsay and make a reliable chronicle, we have, nevertheless, a fairly satisfactory narrative of Hale's martyrdom. It is known that he served with the body of patriot soldiery called Knowlton's rangers on Long Island and Manhattan Island. After Washington's defeat at the battle of Long Island and his retreat across the East river to the northern part of Manhattan Island Lord Howe took possession of New York city and strongly intrenched himself. General Washington was sorely depressed. His forces were weakened by losses in battle and from disease and by desertions. He knew but little of the strength and disposition of the British forces. It was highly important to learn something, and accordingly he called for a man of intelligence to volunteer to enter the enemy's lines and acquire the information desired. Young Captain Nathan Hale, college graduate and schoolteacher, presented himself to Colonel Knowlton against the advice of his brother officers. He knew well that his capture meant his speedy hanging as a spy.

Hale left the American army camp above Harlem heights and proceeded to Norwalk, Conn., where he disguised himself as a schoolmaster. Then he passed into the British lines and spent two weeks studying the fortifications and the general disposition of forces, making drawings and jotting down valuable data in Latin. The drawings and other data he concealed between the soles of his shoes. He visited the enemy's forces both on Long Island and Manhattan Island, in the city of New York.

At last he was ready to return to his own army and lay his information before the commander in chief. At Huntington, N. Y., he was to embark in a small boat. It appears that through error he took passage in a boat from a British vessel, believing it in the darkness of the night to be the one which his friends were to send for him.

At any rate, he was captured there that night, Sept. 21, and was taken over to Lord Howe's headquarters, the Needham mansion, which was located about where Forty-first street and First avenue intersect in the present city of New York. His papers were discovered, Lord Howe, after a brief parley, during which Hale freely admitted that he was a captain in Washington's army and had entered the lines to get information, ordered his provost marshal, one Cunningham, to take the prisoner in custody for the night and hang him at daybreak next morning.

Hale was hanged, presumably from the limb of a tree, and his body was buried at once. During the night he wrote three letters—to his mother, his sister and the young woman to whom he was to have been married. These letters he handed to Cunningham with the request that they be sent to the addresses when convenient. Cunningham read them and tore them up in the presence of the prisoner. But for this miserable and infamous act our literature and history might now be enriched with the last messages of love from the splendid youth who has become by universal consent the epitome of independence martyrdom.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JULY 11, 1907. NUMBER 19

COURT HOUSE BONDS RECEIVED

Were Printed by a Bank Printing House in Chicago.

COST OF PRINTING THEM $150.

Everything Ready for the Sale for July 23—Hundreds of Inquiries from Bankers and Capitalists Being Received by Clerk Ross.

The County Commissioners have received the bonds from the Western Bank Note Co., Chicago, by whom they were printed. There are one hundred and fifty of them and they cost $1 each for the printing. They consist of two sheets, upon the outer one of which are the coupons.

They are all of the same denomination, but they are different in respect to the time at which they mature. There are ten which fall due each year after 1908. The coupons call for the interest to be paid every six monthf, the first of February and the first of August.

Clerk Ross is receiving hundreds of inquiries from large and small banking houses in the cities. They write asking concerning the details of the issue. The sale is to take place in front of the Court House on July 23rd, beginning at ten o'clock.

The fact that bonds are to be sold has been published in many of the financial journals of the country. It is in this way that the monied people of the cities knows that there is to be sale here of bonds. Many of the companies will send representatives. In view of the fact that the interest upon the bonds is so low, being but 4 per cent., it is thought by many financiers, that the bonds will not bring much above par value.

The County Commissioners will not have any more meetings until the day upon which the sale of bonds is to take place which is 23rd.

Haman Oyster Law Maps.

We have just received from the Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C., a copy of the report of the U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey in cooperation with the Maryland Shellfish Commission, describing the oyster bars of Anne Arundel county. We have also received from the Commission, maps showing the location of the oyster bars in Anne Arundel county and adjacent waters and exhibiting the points at which oysters may be planted under what is known as the Haman oyster law. The work seems to have been done skillfully and thoroughly in both cases.

CAMPMEETING IN SESSION.

The Usual Crowds in attendance, and the Meeting are productive of great good.

The campmeeting began at the Park Saturday evening. The attedance at the opening sessions was unusually large. Sunday was in ideal day so far as the weather was concerned with the result that there were great numbers present.

Among the faces of the principal speakers are seen many that are strange The session will continue every day this week, up until next Monday evening. Great multitudes are expected next Sunday, and if the weather is all favorable the tabernacle will be filled to overflowing.

The Sunday following the close of the campmeeting, the Foreign Missionary Society will have charge of the exercises for the day. And the Sunday following that, July 28th, the Home Missionary Society will conduct the exercises for the day.

A Unique Clock.

In the barber shop at the Ten Eyck hotel, in Albany, said a traveling man, at the Neil house, there is a clock which causes no end of amusement. It is so arranged that the hands mark time, and revolve in exactly the opposite direction and manner from a normal clock's. First-year legislators and others new to the place, when they enter the barber shop, invariably stand gazing at it with an air of complete mystification for some little time. Then they turn to some one and ask some such question as: "Is this twisted or am I?" The varying effect on different persons keeps the barber shop in an intermittent state of laughter and merriment. It is not until the customer mounts into one of the chairs and faces the mirror wall before him that he usually understands the reason for having the clock built on the reverse principle.—Columbus Dispatch.

Base Ball Out at Piedmont.

At Scottdale, Saturday, after the game of base ball the members of the Piedmont team left the grounds and each went to his home, disregarding their contracts to their manager. They claim that they had not received their salary and that they were not going to play any more under the same management. The players would not play the game at Scottdale until the manager there had paid to them the guarantee for the game.

Ira Culp for Governor.

At a meeting of the Socialistic party of Maryland held at Baltimore, Saturday afternoon and night, Mr. Ira Culp was nominated for the governorship by that party. Under his leadership, the party expects to make some decided increase in the number of ballots usually cast by the Socialists of Maryland.

ANOTHER ESCAPED PRISONER RETURNED

Fred Banks Again in Jail Having Been Caught in Meyersdale.

BROUGHT TO OAKLAND FRIDAY

Of the Seven Prisoners Who Escaped Last September, Four Have Been Recaptured—Sheriff Lee is Still On the War Path for Others.

Fred Banks, colored, one of the prisoners that escaped from the county jail on September 21, 1906, has been recaptured and was brought to Oakland Friday evening by Sheriff Lee. He was caught at Myersdale, Pa.

Banks says that as soon as he left Oakland upon the night of his escape that he went to Cumberland; from there to Myersdale; later to Little Washington; thence to Mt. Pleasant; and that he had returned again to his old home at Myersdale upon the morning of July 4th, last, when he was seen by the officials there and was caught and handed over to Sheriff Lee the next day. He is exceedingly indignant over his recapture; he will have to lie in the county jail until next December to wait to answer the indictment found against him in 1906.

The indictment charges Banks with having assaulted and robbed Mr. John W. Huff, upon a night of June 1906, at a place near Broderick's lake, near Oakland. Mr. Huff alleges that $87.50 cents as well as a watch were taken from him and that he had been severely beaten. Another negro, George Walker, who is also implicated with Banks for the same offense, made his escape at the same time with Banks, but has not yet been recaptured.

Of the seven prisoners which escaped on the evening of September 21st, past, four have been recaptured. The three yet at liberty are George Walker, Michael Gillispie, and William McGinnis. Sheriff Lee feels confident that he will soon have another one of these three.

Conductor has Foot Crushed.

Mr. H. Irons, a conductor on a 97 freight, had his foot mashed on the evening of July 4th. The exact cause of the accident is not made clear, but it seems that the freight came to a very sudden stop, and thus threw the conductor beneath the wheels where his foot was caught. Dr. J. E. Legge amputated the foot and Mr. Irons was taken to his home in Cumberland on No. 4 the same evening.

Judge Boyd for Governor.

A movement to have Chief Judge Boyd the Democratic candidate this fall for the governorship has been started. The idea has met with favorable comment by the Democratic press throughout the State. His present term as judge will expire next fall, and many of the Democrats predict that he would make a very strong candidate. There have been no interviews published as given out by Judge Boyd himself.

New Bridge at Fairmont.

Arrangements have been made at Fairmont, W. Va , whereby the traction company of that city agree to give $18,000 to help pay the cost of building a new bridge across the Monongahela river at that point. In return, the company is to have a right of way for its cars across it. The car line will extend across the river and cover all of the principal streets of Palatine, or what is now called the First ward.

Trolley Car Accident.

Sunday evening, heavily laden with passengers, an open trolley car on the Fairmont and Clarksburg traction company's system, jumped the track on the Grasselli division just outside the city limits of Clarksburg, and crushed over an embankment, instantly killled two, fatally injuring one and seriously injuring nine other. The cause of the car leaving the track is unknown.

Tolley Line to Coal Fields.

The Baltimore, Frederick and Hagerstown Electric Railway Company is understood to be planning extensions into the coal fields of Maryland, and possibly West Virginia and Pennsylvania, and will haul the product to tidewater at Baltimore. The plan, it is understood, proposes making the road an extensive freight-carrying line, and is said to involve an expenditure of $25,000,000. Surveys alread made are for a low-grade line, and it has been suggested for this reason that possibly steam, as well as electricity, might be used as a motlve power, but this has been denied.

EDITORIAL VIEWS.

Things as They are Seen by Various Editors Hereabout.

SENTENCE OF SCHMITZ.

In the sentence of Schmitz, the boodle mayor of San Francisco, the grafters of the Pacific Coast city have received their first taste of stern justice. The pitiful, cringing Ruef has been the nemesis of justice upon the track of his dupe and tool. By his confessions the one-time orchestra leader has been brought to book. In an effort to clear himself of the allegations of Ruef connecting him with the French restaurant graft, the convicted mayor paved the way for the introduction of the former's testimony, and this proved of the worst sort for the prospects of Schmitz.

Five years' incarceration is a sentence full of humiliation as well as of punishment direct. The spectacle of the mayor of a great city exchanging the direction of municipal affairs for the prison garb of a felon is a most unusual one, but it will doubtless have a salutary effect upon others there, and prove to be a deterrent upon boodlers elsewhere. The members of the city council who are under indictment have, in the sentencing of Schmitz intimation of the their own fate, although as dupes of the larger rascals they may not fare so badly.—Baltimore American.

ROCKFELLER THE ADEPT.

Rockefeller in court is about the same as Rockefeller out of court. He is as much of an adept at side-stepping questions as he is at side-stepping the officers of the law when they are looking for him. He evidently knows little and cares as much where his millions come from.—Grafton Republican.

GET OFF YOUR NEST.

The possession of ambition alone won't make your life worth while. Unless there's a firm purpose back of your desire to achieve, you will find the years slipping away with nothing to mark them but birthdays, the milestones on your journey to the grave. Most young men dream of triumphs to come; but only the wide-awake, hustling dreamer gets people running after his autograph or wrangling about whether or not his money is tainted. The measure of your diligence is pretty sure to be the measure of what you achieve. Success does not happen; it results from intelligent planning and resolute working. The world bids high for ability and pays promptly—but not in advance. Before you can make it come down with the coin, you must deliver the goods. Ambition is the first thing necessary to success. But other things just as important are determination, energy, and perseverance. Some one asked a great man how to achieve greatness. "Will it," was the response. And that's the whole thing compressed like a cake of yeast. Will it. Don't just sigh for it. Plan, work. Keep both mind and body active. There's no real pleasure in idleness. If you did not have to earn your bread, you would probably have no appetite. Strong muscles are developed through labor; so are strong minds. Give your brain a fair show. Make it tussle with the problems of your Instruction Paper. You cannot give the world what is not in you, no matter how glowing your ambition. A popular fable tells of an ambitious pullet that saw an industrious old hen lay an egg, and resolved to do likewise. But the old hen, when she saw the pullet settle in the nest, merely smiled and said: "My dear, before you can lay an egg, you must have an egg inside you." Then the pullet got off the nest, began to hustle for egg material, and pretty soon became the champion producer of the barnyard. The moral is obvious.—Ambition.

AS ENGLAND SEES IT.

Our friends in Auld England are amazed at the list of casualties in this country on the Fourth of July. These English people can't see why it is that the American people resort to powder and other dangerous noise making methods for celebrating the licking the thirteen American colonies gave King George some time back in the eighteenth century. England should remember that the United States still have a line of patriots who are just as ready to offer up their lives to a celebration of the victory George Washington won over the armies of the English as were the American patriots of '76 to lay down their lives for the independence of these United Ssates now grown to be the greatest and most enlightened nation in the world.—Grafton Sentinel.

SCANDALOUS EXTORTION.

There is much complaint of exhorbatant charges for everything in the way of entertainment at the Jamestown Exposition, and in some instances the charge amounted to extortion, or a mild phase of robbery. The Baltimore Sun mentioned several instances of flagrant imposition a few days ago, which elicited a warm denial, and a demand for the proof from an official of the Exposition. Nothing has been heard from the latter since the Sun promptly announced its readiness to produce the evidence, and to claim the reward offered it by the sanguine official on behalf of the persons robbed.

The Sun alleged that a lady had been taxed eighty cents for one tomato. It has the proof. It charged that a young man was required to pay $10 for some light refreshments for himself and lady friend. It has the proof. It alleged that another young man was assessed $1.25 for a cheap sandwich, and it is ready with the proof whenever the indignant exposition official is ready to pay the reward of $100 offered for evidence to sustain the charges stated above.

The press and public has heretofore paid but little attention to charges of extortion made by visitors to Jamestown, but when they are made specifically by so responsible an authority as the Baltimore Sun, it behooves the managers of the exposition to take up the matter with a view to prompt correction.—Cumberland Times.

DIED FROM INJURIES RECEIVED TUESDAY

Charles McCabe Lived a Day After Being Struck by a Piece of Timber.

NO FUNERAL ARRANGEMENTS

Was Employed by Kendall Lumber Company—Was 18 years of Age and Was a Brother of Carl McCabe Who Lives at Crellin.

Mr. Charley McCabe died yesterday afternoon at 2.30 from an injury received in the stomach. The blow was received Tuesday afternoon from a piece of timber which was thrown by two circular saws of the edger on the plant of the Kendall Lumber Company, at Crellin. Dr. J. E. Legge was summoned, but having been injured internally, Mr. McCabe was beyond medical skill.

He was 18 years of age and lived at Crellin with his brother, Mr. Carl McCabe. The mother of the deceased was at Tunnelton at the time of the accident. She was telegraphed concerning her son's death and will be at Crellin today to make arrangements for the funeral.

Mr. McCabe was very popular among the workmen at the mill and his death has caused many expressions of sorrow because he was taken away from a life just beginning upon manhood.

Mr. Emanual Custer, of Swanton was in Oakland Wednesday, on his returned trip from Preston, Minn.

NEW RAILROAD IS COMPLETED

Morgantown & Kingwood Line Extended to Rowlesburg, W. Va.

The Morgantown & Kingwood railroad company has just completed its line from Morgantown to Rowlesburg a distance of about 50 miles. The work on the road has been in progress about two years. The line can be extended to Parson, W. Va., about 26 miles, there connecting with the Western Maryland and Dry Fork railroad, opening up a coal and lumber district.

The road starts at Morgantown, connecting with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, 103 miles south of Pittsburg and ends at Rowlesburg on the Baltimore and Ohio, cutting off from Morgantown to Baltimore and the East 28 miles. Before the completion of the Morgantown and Kingwood railroad freight and passengers from Morgantown and vicinity going East had to go by way of Fairmont, Grafton and Tunnelton, or by the way of Connellsville, 30 miles further than by the Morgantown and Kingwood cut-off. The road from Morgantown to Kingwood has been in operation two years.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. AGNES C. HERMAN.

At her home near Chaffee, W. Va., on Friday, July 5th, Mrs. Agnes Catherine Caffee died. She was the wife of Mr. John E. Herman, who died last February at the age of 51 years.

Mrs. Herman leaves ten children, twenty-seven grand-children, two brothers, and one sister. One of her brothers is Mr. Joseph W. Cogley, of Oakland.

Mrs. Herman was buried by the side of her husband in the Turner graveyard. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Rau, of Bayard, W. Va., and pastor of the United Brethern Church, of which the deceased was a member.

LAKE SUPERIOR FISH YARN.

The Ciscowet From Away Down and a Giant Among Trout.

"If one may believe all they tell him about the ciscowet up in the Lake Superior country," said a New Yorker who has heard it all, "he may readily concur in their declaration that the ciscowet is the rarest and one of the oddest of all our fresh-water fishes. It is found only in Lake Superior, they will tell you, and never at a depth of less than 30 fathoms.

" 'The ciscowet," said the encyclopedic native who described this and its ways to me, "was formerly believed to be a hybrid from a cross of the white fish and lake trout, but that was long ago disproved. It grows to the weight of 30 pounds, and the female almost invariably contains spawn. This has led to the belief that the ciscowet is always spawning, but the more probable theory is that it spawns twice a year, which in itself is enough to give it a unique place among fishes, fresh water or salt.

" 'The ciscowet is unique in another particular. It is the fattest of all known fishes, and its flesh is so deliciously flavored that it is palatable without being cooked. Its name is said to have been derived from that peculiar quality, ciscowet being "Sis-Ko-Wet," an Ojibwa term meaning "Cooks itself."

" 'Owing to the great depth at which this fish persists in making its habitation it is a rarity in the market, and is never seen away from the Lake Superior country—although,' said my encyclopedic natives, warningly, and I thought apprehensively, 'you will find ciscowet listed on the bills of fare of all the hotels as you travel through, big and little, good and bad, and if you are deluded into ordering it on the belief that you are to regale yourself on this rarest of piscatorial delicacies you will wonder what sort of a palate that man must have who can declare ciscowet to be that delicacy.

"The fish they will place before you as ciscowet will be not ciscowet, but will be an inferior lake trout known as bear trout, which resembles ciscowet in outward appearance. The Indians capture these trout for the market, and their beautiful white meat has no merit but its beauty.'

"There is another peculiar fish of the lake trout family in Lake Superior, they informed me. It is the true naymacush, they said, but has ways all it own.

"It travels all by itself, no two ever being seen in proximity, keeping always near the surface, and sometimes swimming on the surface. This is a giant among trout, frequently weighing more than 100 pounds, although it is never fat.

"It is called the racer, from the alleged circumstances of it occasionally traveling with railroad speed along its course. This giant trout scorns bait or lure, and the way in which it must be captured, if at all, according to what they told me, seemed to be about as remarkble as the fish itself.

"Men with big spears go out in boats and stand on a runway, as one might say, while other men in boats, stalking about, sight a racer and drive it to the men in boats with spears, who harpoon the fish as it speeds along, and the harpooner, so they told me, needs to be skilful with the barb, or he will see it plowing the water space behind the big fish, while the latter skims on its course unharmed."—New York Sun.

Prof. Trotter.

Professor Frank B. Trotter, who has for a numbers of years been vice president of the West Virginia Wesleyan college at Buckhannon, was recently elected to the chair of Latin in W. Va. State University at Morgantown. He is a graduate of Roanoke college and Harvard University.

Professor Trotter is the one professor of Buckhannon by whom the Methodists swear when they enter the University—if they swear at all.—Morgantown Post.

Chinese As Soldiers.

One of the greatest assets possessed by Chinese as soldiers is in their marching power; another is their ability to manage with the smallest amount of transport, owing to the hardy outdoor life and climate to which they are accustomed, and to the fact that they live almost entirely on rice. Two other points in their favor are that they have no caste prejudices, and have already learned the virtue of descipline before they enlist. Drunkenness is practically unknown among them, but they have the national failings of gambling and opium smoking.

My own experiences leads me to class more native soldiers as grown-up children and perhaps the most child-like is the Chinaman. All the traits which have to be studied in dealing with children are so many keys to open the door to understanding their nature. Most amenable to kindness, he is at times quite capable of taking advantage of it.

Firmness he not only appreciates, but prefers; that is, once he realizes as boys say, that it is no use to "try on." Above all, he admires and will do anything for those who he realizes are trying invariably to be just to him. Whether gratitude is to be set down as a characteristic opinions may differ.

My own is that he has it, and would exhibit it more often did not the hide-bound conventions by which Chinese unwritten law surrounds him make it sometimes nearly impossible. Whatever feelings may remain in the hearts of those whose fate it was to go through the unique experience of serving his gracious majesty as soldiers in the late Chinese regiment of infantry, I feel that I am on sure ground in saying that the memories of those who trained them will long retain the happiest recollections of the trials through which officers non-commissioned officers and men passed together. —United Service Magazine.

Ancestors May Have Had Horns.

There appeared before Magistrate Whitman, in the Yorkville Court recently, Thomas Toye and his brother Edward, whom the former accused of giving him a black eye in a headbutting contest.

Edward explained that he had brought Thomas over from Scotland and wanted him to pay back some of the passage money. They fought it out on Saturday in a Third avenue restaurant.

"We fought the way they do in the old country, your worship," said Edward, in broad Scotch.

"How's that?" asked the magistrate.

Just to show how it was done, the brothers grabbed the lapels of each other's coats and started in to butt their heads until they had to be separated by the court officers. When they had been pried apart Magistrate Whitman told them to go home and behave themselves. —New York Tribume.

Slight to Flag Resented.

CHARLESTOWN, W. Va., July 11. —Gov. Dawson was required to intervene recently to prevent bloodshed at Fairmont, where Americans took exceptions to conduct of Italians at the royal Italian consulate, G. D. Caldara, agent, when they had a flag raising exercises, putting the flag of Italy above that of the United States.

The consul wire to the governor for protection, and action was at once taken through Mayor W. A. Arnett, of Fairmont, who, with the entire police force, succeeded in quieting the citizens.

Consul Caldara made a fervent appeal to the governor, and it was believed for some hours that the State troops would have to send to the scene of disorder.

The message from Mayor Arnett indicated that Italians had become unduly excited and that there was no particular danger of a riot between the Americans and the foreigners, although the latter were required to pull down the flag and place that of the United States above it.

OLD VIOLINS.

Reasons why Ancient Fiddles Are Better Than New.

Fabulous prices are sometimes paid for old violins, and many an enthusiastic musician would part with his last dollar to possess one of the masterpieces of Stradivarius or Guarnerious or another of the famous makers of a century or two ago.

The questioned superiority of these old and often battered instruments has been variously ascribed to the peculiar quality of the varnish used in their construction, to the elasticity of the wood employed and to the ripening and improving effects of age and long use.

Of late years, however, much credence has been given the suggestion of an eminent authority that the real cause of the superiority of the old instruments is due to a peculiar warping of the wood to a higher arch, a buckling caused by the position of the "F" holes and sound post.

It might at first thought be supposed that the same effect could be produced by giving an equal arching to a new instrument, but the effect, if attained, is not permanent, because with age the arching increases until too great a degree of rigidity is the result.—Philadelphia Record.

Weighing Mails.

The weighing of all classes of mail is in progress at the Oakland postoffice since Monday and the work will cover a period of six months, ending December 31, 1907. This is a longer time than has heretofore been given to this work. The object is to make a computation, with the view to getting the mails hauled cheaper by the railroads. The weighing of the mails is general throughout the country. Mails are weighed at transfer offices as well as at the postoffices.

When a Girl Marries.

Mothers weep when they give their daughters away in marriage. A mother may have striven hard to make a brilliant match for her daughter; but she cannot repress tears as the husband bears away the girl. At the final moment the mother regrets all that she has done. She thinks only that the daughter whom she loves, the daughter to whose welfare she has dedicated her life, the dear companion and condfidant of many years, belongs no longer to her. These tears are natural, they are inevitable; but for all they are quite foolish. Instead of weeping a mother ought to be elated and proud as her daughter turns from the alter on the arm of a clean, strong man. At that moment a mother should have a triumphant sense of having done her work well and justfied her own life.

Nobody performs a finer or nobler work in the world than the mother who rears her sons and daughters. Men may leave monuments, books or buildings or the memory of glorious deeds, but there is no more excellent monument than honorable and useful children fitted to carry on, according to their several talents, the world's work.

The mother, viewing her daughter at the marriage altar, should feel as the painter feels when he beholds his canvas hung on the walls of the saloon and marked for the grand old prize; as the man of letters feels when his book is demanded by all discriminating men women; as the student feel when he discovers a new truth or the statesman when, bending the world to his will, he accomplishes some great enterprise for the peace and benefit of mankind. —San Francisco Bulletin.

Eclipses.

There will be an annular eclipse of the Sun on Wednesday, 10th inst., but it will be invisible in North America. A partial eclipse of the Moon on Wednesday night and Thursday morning, 24th and 25th inst., will be visible generally in central and western Europe, Africa, South America and North America, except the northwest portion; the end visible generally in western Africa, South America and North America, except peninsula of Alaska.

Theory of Falsehood Expounded.

Some almost irritating conventional remarks in the baccalaurate sermon of President Hadley of Yale seem to class him definitely with the old fogies. For example:

"The evil of a lie to society is due to the fact that it undermines men's confidence in one another, so that they cannot do business together. The evil of a lie to the man that tells it is something deeper and more subtle than this. It is due to the fact that he has got momentary considerations out of proportion to the demands of character."

This theory of falsehood served well enough in Prof. Hadley's time. It will not do now, says the New York Sun. A lie is not what it used to be. To say "You lie" or "You're a liar" is merely to say that you differ in opinion from the speaker; that it is convenient for the purpose to represent that you misrepresent him; that you have caught him where the hair is short, so to speak; recalled impolitically conversations that he wishes forgotten.

"You lie," "You're a liar," "That's a lie," these expressions convey no opprobrium to the second person. They save the face of the first person. They have become part of the furniture of self-preservation. Society cannot be injured by unlied lies. How can there be evil in a lie which everybody knows to be a form, a symbol, an official means of protection and a common garniture of official literary style?

If it be averred that, if the party of the second part be no liar, the party of the first part, who "hurls the lie" at the former, must of necessity be a liar, the inevitable answer is that there are no such conclusions. There is, indeed, a vulgar or demotic truth, a common world in which truth—if anybody can find it—and the lie may be face to face or back to back, as happens.

We cannot suppose that President Hadley means to waste the time of his senior class on matter so ancient and palpable. They are modern boys. They must rise and prosper by the most modern methods. They cannot help noticing that there is a higher and hieratic standard of truth and falsehood; indeed, there is now an infallable source of secular and moral truth, which is calculated, like the longitude, from Washington.

It was a grave error not to make clear to those buds of promise at New Haven the distinction between ordinary and esoteric or official truth and falsehood. Fortunately their minds are fixed, as are those of all decent Americans, upon the soul fount and criterion. They must see that when some, in fact many, most respected and distinguished citizens have been "branded" as liars without any injury to their reputations, and with a constant increase of the glory of the brander, a "lie," still so-called undermines no confidence and is a positive benefit; and the "branding" of it is a healthful exercise.—Ex.

New Laws.

With the ushering in of the new fiscal year Monday, the Government put into effect a number of new laws. Hereafter ten cents worth of ordinary stamps in addition to the required letter postage, with words, "Special Delivery" written across the envelope, will be acceptable as a substitute for the regular special delivery stamp. The new ten dollar gold certificate made its debut, bearing on the face an excellent likeness of Michael Hillegas, the first Treasurer of the United States. Nearly twenty thousand postal clerks and more than twenty-four thousand city letter carriers come in for a share, as do also the railway mail employes. The new immigration laws went into effect. A reorganization of the artillery corps went into effect, also the Department of Commerce and Labor commenced investigation into women and child labor. The United States will be allowed the right to writ of error in the Supreme Court of the United States in certain criminal cases.

JUDGE McCOMAS TO WED.

Bride a Beautiful Widow from Old Kentucky.

Justice Louis E. McComas has formally announced his engagement to Mrs. Hebe Muir, the young and beautiful widow of the late Judge Upton W. Muir, of Louisville Ky. The formal announcement is as follows;

"Mrs. Muir, the young and beautiful widow of the late Judge Upton W. Muir, of Louisville, Ky. is to wed Judge Louis E. McComas of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, formerly Congressman and United States Senator from Maryland. Mrs. Muir, nee Harrison, of Virginia, spent the last winter in Washington with her mother, Mrs. Julian Harrison, of New York. Mrs. Muir, and Judge McComas will be quietly married, probably in New York, and will sail on the Adriatic on July 17 and spend the summer on the Continent. On their return they will reside at their new home, 2101 Wyoming avenue, on the corner of Connecticut avenue, Washington."

Marrying a Girl With Money.

When Mr. Blank was thinking of marrying a girl 'with money' a friend advised against it, according to the New York Times.

'My boy,' he said, 'before I was married my wife inherited $500 from her grandfather. The whole town knew it. When I built a store they smiled.

' 'His wife's money,' they said.

'When I built a house the same smile went around

' 'His wife's money.'

'After a while I took stock in the new gas and electric company.

' 'Ah!' said the treasurer. 'I see you are investing some of your wife's money.'

'All my life that poor little $500 has received the credit for everything I have been able to achieve.

'As a matter of fact, my wife spent the money the very day she got it for a diamond ring and a piano. She lost the ring a week later, and I guess some of the neighbors wished heartily that she would lose the piano.'

Fourth of July Proverbs.

Accidents will happen in the best regulated fire works.

A shot in the gun is worth two in the hand.

A little burning is a dangerous thing.

He who shoots and runs away may live to shoot another day.

Never look a gift cannon in the mouth.

Cannon crackers alter faces.

One good burn deserves another.

Patriotism covers a multitude of sins.

Whatsoever thy hand findeth to shoot, shoot with thy might.

It's an ill bomb that blows up nobody good.

It's a wise father who knows his own child—the day after.

Uneasy lies the head that wears bandages.

A living boy is better than a dead patriot.

Never put off till tomorrow what you can fire tonight.

Celebration is the thief of time.

All's not cold that smoulders.

A good aim is rather to be chosen than great stitches.

Insurance is the best policy.

A new bomb sweeps clean.

Not Always the Editor's Fault.

A dearth of local news often leads to murmurs on the part of those who prize local gossip above everything else, and it is not always the fault of the publisher. Any live publisher will not fail to give all the local news worthy of note, therefore, when the local department is short you should not rail at the editor, but remember you might have committed suicide, got married, quarreled with your neighbor, stolen chickens, let your team run away, or done a hundred other things to make a local. — Diamonddale (Mich.) News.

GORDON HOTEL, KINGWOOD, BURNED THURSDAY MORNING

A Leading Hostelry Goes Up In Flames.

On the morning of the July the 4th, at fifteen minutes to five o'clock, night policeman George Menear of Kingwood, discoved the Gordon Hotel in that city to be on fire, and within a short time afterward the well-known hostelry was a mass of ruins. The fire had started from a defective flue in the rear building, and when discovered by Mr. Menear had gained great headway. It fact, the night watchman perceived at once that the inmates of the building were in imminent danger, so he raced to the hotel as quickly as possible, alarmed the occupants and helped to get them out. A few moments afterward and alarm became a general one and hundreds of people hurried to the scene to do what was possible. All the guests, about twenty, the proprietor and his family, made their escape from the burning building without accident, but a number had narrow escapes. The guests saved their trunks, clothing, &c., but Mr. Chas. W. Sandrigde, the proprietor and family, lost all their belongings while assisting the guests. The Gordon Hotel was the property of Dr. and Mrs. S. A. Pratt of Kingwood, and was under lease to Mr. Sandridge. The latter gentleman is well and favorably known in this section. The Gorden Hotel was one of the best known hotels in Preston county and had very bright prospects for the season just beginning in the mountains. There was four thousand dollars insurance on the building. The property was valued at fourteen thousand, which included of course the stables, which did not burn, and the lots which are among the most valuable in Kingwood.

Room For New Trusts.

"There's plenty of room for the trusts still," said a real estate man Washington Heights, "and I'd like to predict where the next strike will be made—in a nice clean business at that."

"Soap or sandpaper?" queired a listener.

"No, sir—laundries. We have a few big ones now, of course. But laundries are increasing in New York at an astonishing rate—two or three, it seems to me, for every new block of apartment houses; and there are several hundred of these new blocks.

"Watch out for a combination, with big capital, to capture the country's washing. It's bound to come.—New York Globe.

Reciprocity.

A newspaper is in no sense a child of charity. It earns twice over every dollar it receives, and it is second to no enterprise in contributing to the upbuilding of a community. Its patrons reap far more benefit from its pages than its publishers, and in calling for the support of the community in which it is published it asks for no more than in all fairness belongs to it, though generally it receives less. Patronize and help your paper as you would any other enterprise, because it helps you, and not as an act of charity.—West Point News.

MUNICIPAL LUNACY.

By JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

Has anybody yet thought of the desirability of municipal ownership of the barber shops? If not it is respectfully suggested that the matter be looked into, for under private control it is undeniable that many abuses have grown up. No misplaced respect for alleged private rights should be permitted to take the lather out of the mouths of the public.

The Brooklyn Eagle says that "you simply can't marry business and politics." Ah, but you can. Misalliances are always possible. The real trouble will come when you try to divorce them, even for cause.

Only a fool would suggest managing gas companies, street car companies and so on regardless of cost.—Hearst's New York Evening Journal.

Now, William, stop calling yourself names. Leave that to your enemies.

One thing is very certain. If capitalists refuse to take the municipal bonds that are being offered on the markets, it won't take more than fifteen minutes for an alert common council to pass an ordinance requiring them to take them. Better be warned in time, ye money sharks. When that ordinance is passed, who knows but that one of its provisions will set the price of a hundred dollar bond at $125?

Too much credit has ruined many a man. Wherefore the city that cannot sell its mortgages for over 83½ is just that much further from ruin as 83½ is from par. Q. E. D.

There seems to be a general suspicion in New York city that the more flourishing of its pool rooms and other gambling institutions are controlled by a committee of municipal officials acting ex officio. This is one of the few varieties of municipal control which can be said to realize enormous profits.

Northfield, Vt., before starting in upon municipal ownership owed $2,082. At the close of the experiment it owed $47,319, a nice little profit of $45,237.

Opera Note of the Future.—Now that New York city has assumed charge of the Metropolitan Opera House and opera has been thoroughly municipalized the music lovers of the city are looking forward with much curiosity to what promises to be an interesting season. The appointment of Mr. Fassett, the well known plumber, to its management by the common council will infuse new spirit into the institution, though there are still timid souls who doubt whether the artists he has engaged, notably Mr. O'Brien, the livery stable keeper, and Miss Maggie Dugan of Lacey's ribbon counter, to sing Romeo and Juliet are vocally equal to the roles assigned them. Those who have heard Miss Dugan summon a cash boy are perfectly familiar with the wonderful quality of her voice, especially in its higher altitudes, and her enunciation of the word "cash" is bell-like in the clarity of its tone. Mr. O'Brien, however, is more of an experiment; but, while we must confess we have only heard him address his horses in the past, there is no denying that there is a superb quality to the notes of his middle register. Signor Cospetto di Napoli, the popular dealer in confetti in Mulberry street, who will lead the orchestra on Italian nights, comes of a musical family, his parents having toured the country with a barrel organ for many prosperous seasons.

"The People Must Foot the Bills."

A city of some 40,000 inhabitants not long ago decided to change its street lighting from gas to electric and proposed building a municipal plant. The local electric company offered to pay $500 toward the expense of getting an estimate by a first class expert, with the proviso that it would supply lights at a substantial reduction from the expert's estimate of what it would cost the city to furnish its own lights. The offer was rejected, one member of the council voicing the general sentiment of that body in these words:

"It doesn't make any difference what the cost will be, the people want the plant, and the people will have to foot the bills."

Which of the parties to this offer was working for the best interests of the city? When you answer don't blink the fact that the self interest of the company that wanted the contract was fully balanced by the shortsighted self interest of the councilmen who desired re-election.

M. O. Employees Badly Paid In Vienna.

The Chicago Daily News states that the wages of a first class motorman on the municipal street railways of Vienna is 72 cents for a twelve hour day and that a large number of the employees of the municipal gas works earn barely 50 cents a day. These low wages are paid to enable the city to make a profit on its undertakings. A special cable says that a general revolt against the miserable wages of city employees is threatened.

Profit In Baiting Corporations.

The celebrated Edward W. Bemis, whose efforts to extirpate gas monopolies have brought fame and fees, is suing the city of Peoria, Ill., for $1,000, which he asserts was earned in the service of Peoria when the authorities of that alcoholic spot were endeavoring to put the Peoria Gas company out of business.—American Gas Light Journal.

JAPANESE WAR BOSH.

The newspapers of the large cities as well as of many of the smaller towns, during the past week have been having leading articles about a war with Japan. The discussion has been going through the press for the past several months. Because a division of the United States Navy has been sent to the Pacific, the newspapers feel sure that now there is to be war sure. In truth, the American people have no fight on with Japan. No American feels any special grievance towards the Japanese, and until that feeling comes there will be no war demanded by the American people, from whom war in this country must originate.

It is easily seen, however, why the newspapers will publish articles purporting to set forth that there soon will be war, and there should be war. The war in fact exists only in the cranium of some reporter who has for his motive the desire to get the good will of his editor-in-chief, who always promotes the reporter who gets the good article; and what is meant by a "good" article is that which will make the paper be in demand by the American people; the aim of the publisher always is to make a paper that will sell.

The result of the whole affair cannot be seen. By some it is thought that the continual jabbering by the newspapers may cause the Americans to become prejudiced against the Japanese, to feel suspicious of them, and soon cause a desire to go to war with them over some trivial affair that might take place somewhere in the world between an American and a Japanese. It is up to the American people not to let themselves be driven into a war with a nation now heavily in debt, but with the alliance of England could prosecute a war which would surely cost both sides the lives of many citizens.

A Voice for Temperance.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN.

Never having seen a whiskey advertisement in your paper and believing you stand alone in this respect, I would therefore ask you to mention a little incident which took place in our town a short time ago when our town council met and voted whether another saloon should be added to the long list of "death traps," shall we call them? For do they not ruin and blight the hopes and lives of our fellowmen? After the votes were counted it was found that but one of all the six had voted against it; only one, and he the only NON-church member of the lot; but, we believe, a Christian, for was not that Christ-like? He was working for the up-building of humanity and he had the welfare of his neighbors and his neighbor's children at heart and peace for our beautiful town.

We always love to read of heroes, those who stand out as great lights to the world, but here we have one in our midst, a real, true Hero at home, an humble, law-abiding citizen, not ashamed to do the right, although he stands alone. Oh, that we had more such men as he! Then the people would have a voice in their own affairs, for was there not a petition signed with the names of our most prominent citizens against more saloons and was it not passed by unnoticed? The voice of the people was it not unheard? Shall we lie down supinely on our backs and permit the demon drink to bind us and our children hand and foot, and thus make our boys debauched, drunken men, and not try at all to prevent it? Answer this yourself.

A MOTHER.

New President of Weslevan.

The Rev. H. D. Clark, of Charleston, pastor of the State Street M. E. Church one of the most prominent and wealthiest churhes in the State, has been prominently mentioned as a successor to President John Weir as the head of the W. Va. Wesleyan school at Buckhannon. While the executive board of the college does not meet until today at Clarksburg to take up the election of a successor to President Weir, from a source that was authentic it was stated that the Mr. Clark stood high in the consideration of the church in the State and stood a better opportunity of being the next president of the college than any of the other candidates. This statement is significant and as a result interest in the election has been intensified.

LATER. — Yesterday afternoon at Clarksburg, Rev. Carl G. Doney, Ph. D., pastor of Hamline Methrdist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C., was unanimously recommended by the executive committee of the board of regents, to the presidency of Wesleyan College at Buckhannon. The election will take place today.

Ice Cream Supper At Swanton.

The Ladies of the Epworth League will have an Ice Cream Supper, in May's Hall, Swanton, on next Saturday evening July 13th. Ice Cream and various other refreshments will be served. The proceeds will be used to purchase lamps for the M. E. Church. Come and help along this good work.

PENCILINGS BY THE WAY.

Graphic, Descriptive Account of the West by U. G. Palmer.

Goldfield, Nevada, July 1.

My trip through the Montana-Tonopah mine is one long to be remembered. This is the third greatest mine at Tonopah if not the second. When the company was organized a few years ago with $1,000,000 shares of stock to develop its 160 acres of ground it had absolutely no surface showings and its stock was sold at a few cents per share as the stock of every legitimate "prospect" should be. In fact a man who pays more than 10 cents share for the promotion stock of any company which has no ore in sight or is not on proven ore veins is a fool. For it is nothing but a gamble—pure and simple.

And let me degrees a little farther here and relate a bit of my experience. Last July I bought a few hundreds shares of Atlanta and a few hundred of Frances-Mohawk—both of Goldfield—the former costing 18 cents per share and the latter 19 cents. The former has sold as high as $1.25 and the latter $1.60 but the second day I reached Goldfield and realized I was on the outside of the game I sold the former at 49 and the latter at $1.00. The latter has already paid me 55 cents per share in dividends. Within twenty-four hours after selling, Atlanta sold at 42 and Frances-Mohawk at $1.25. I was on the outside and didn't know the game.

I have since broken the "crust" and in a future letter will give you a few glimpses from the standpoint of those who are in the game. The Montana-Tonopah has issued 835,000 shares of its stock, it has done more than 30,000 feet of underground work, or nearly six miles. It has already paid $150,000 in dividends and has $85,000 surplus in its treasury. It will have in operation by the time the reader gets this letter, its new mill crushing 200 tons per day which will enable it to pay dividends of 50 per annum per share and still accumulate a surplus at the rate of $200,000 per year. The ore bodies comprising hundreds of thousands of tons have been proven to a depth of 800 feet in a vein 14 to 16 feet in thickness. Its powerful hoisting plant as well as its miners machine drills are operated by electricity and compressed air, with a complete steam plant in reserve ready for work at all times in case it is needed.

It is lighted by electricity throughout and as no water is found even on the 800 foot levels, the visit in wandering around teveral hundred feet beneath the surface, through its thousands of workings, one might perhaps think himself in the New York subway.

The revenue from this mine so far have all come from ore shipped to distant mills, and as the entire cost of production hereafter will be less than the freight paid heretofore, a person can readily comprehend the difference it will make in its net earnings. Its stock has risen from a few cents to $3 per share today. The entire original investment in this property which is now worth fully two and half million didn't exceed $75,000.

Sacramento, Cal., July 2.

Women, wine, game and deceit,
Make the wealth small and the want great.—Franklin.

Goldfield is the land of the broker and promoter. There are hundreds of them. Nine-tenths of them are making money out of their Eastern clients instead of for them. But business is quiet there during the summer, the heat is oppressive and the dust almost unendurable, and the big fellows have gone to a more congenial clime. And the brokers with few exceptions are on the 'bum." I gleam from Goldfield's own papers for the past week: "Failure of Kenneth Donnellan and Company; Creditors of J. C. Kind and Co. appointed a committee and order an investigation. None of the firm to be found;" "Five assayers arrested with 1500 pounds of Little Florence ore valued at $50,000;" "The January Jones Company in trouble," etc.

By the way, January Jones was a partner and received one-fourth of the output of the famous Reilly lease which two years ago produced $1,000,000 in 100 days. What has become of it? Of course I do not know in specific cases what is the cause of these failures but it is easy to determine in a general way. There are a number of rich, reliable brokers but there will be a new crop Jan. 1, 1908, as compared with Jan. 1, 1907. The same Goldfield papers will help solve the problem.

I clip the following:—

On July 3 the Northern saloon will declare its second annual dividend of 25 per cent. Only a few weeks ago the company, which is incorporated, paid a dividend of 30 per cent., of which $1000 a day from gambling alone was a good part.

"Fourth of July at Tonopah—round trip tickets $2."

"Morgan Williams vs, Terry Mustain, admission $5. Reserved seats $10."

An engineer told me he had seen a broker buy a case of champaign for his friends at Palm Restaurant at $5 per bottle night after night, and that he had seen the floor and table linen literally saturated with champaign—and "the suckers paid the fiddler."

To get to the bottom of the matter I looked up the brokers throughly and selecting one of the best I went to him and said I would like to buy a few stocks. I haven't much money; suppose I put up 33⅓ per cent. of the cost of them as margin, you furnish the rest and hold the stocks vs. security, what rate of interest will you charge me. He held up his hands in horror and said there was no money for such accounts at any reasonable rate of interest, &c. I said, well, I don't want to buy anything, but do you have any such accounts offered and he said many every day. I inquired what rate of interest could you make $50,000 loan carrying such accounts and he said during the busy season 5 per month with a guarantee of 36 per cent. per annum. I asked him if he didn't know that this was nothing short of highway robbery and he said it was simply a business in which he assured himself of absolute sufety and that his customer was a gambler pure and simple. This same broker then told he was carrying a lot of such accounts for his old customers, but would take on no new ones, and that in extreme cases he received as much as 20 per cent. per month interest.

This brokers' commissions on purchases and sales alone at times has amounted to $1000 day and in a few instances has risen to $45,000 per month.

The first bank was started in Goldfield two years ago last December $50,000 capital. That bank now has $7,000,000 on deposit and one of the original stockholders told a friend of mine that he bought $12,000 of its stock when it was organized and that he was taking $20,000 per month out in profits.

In spite of all these things the reliable substantial kind of men here seem to be getting on all right. I found a young man here or rather he found me, for I didn't recognize him, who was a student of mine at Canton, Pa., sixteen years ago. He is carpentering at $7 for 8 hours and living in a club at about $35 per month and staying away from the dance halls, bar rooms and gambling dens. He says he wants no better place to lay up something for old age. And he told me about a friend of his who in eighteen months in a little 12x15 grocery store cleaned up $35,000 and "had gone back to God's country to live," as he expressed it.

So much for Goldfield. I left there at 5.20 last evening and at 6.30 this morning I was at Reno, back on the main line of the S. P. R. R. bound for the coast. And it seemed good to see the flowers bloom and the grass grow and hear the birds sing and the rippling of the waters once more.

San Francisco, Cal., July 4, 1907.

The Southern Pacific Company is delivering its trains—continental passengers into San Francisco from six to twenty-four hours late. Upon inquiry I find the road is moving fifty trains a day on a single track over the Sierra Nevada mountains. The passenger traffic is enormous. It is said 1,000 colonists per day are settling in California, attracted by its delightful climate, cheap lands and productive soil.

It is easy to see how the Harriman lines are earning 15 per cent. net on their enormous capitalization and paying 10 per cent. in dividends while only a few years ago they were all in the hands of receivers.

But there will soon be another and competing line—the Western Pacific—paralleling the Union and Southern Pacific, on which millions are now being spent by the Wabash, backed by the Goulds, the Diamond Match Company, of Chicago, and the Baldwin Locomotive Works, of Philadelphia. This is part of the system to which belongs the Western Maryland and the West Virginia Central.

The brick colored soil high up on the mountain sides is said to be ideal for fruit growing and I noticed peaches, pears and other kinds of fruit trees planted among the sage brush and I wondered if these represented the California fruit farms the western real estate men are selling to their eastern friends at so much cash and so much per month!

The locomotives here all burn oil and the tender is a huge tank lying horizontally and divided for carrying oil and water and a familiar sight is a whole train of tank cars loaded with fuel oil.

This is certainly the land of flowers and fruits, where the former abounds on every hand in a profusion, with little cultivation, bewildering to eye; and the latter are the staple articles of production as lumber and coal and potatoes and buckwheat are in Garrett.

It is also the land of irrigation and while the canal is the usual method of getting the supply from miles and miles away, far up in the mountains, I was impressed with the redundancy of windmills in the vicinity of Stockton. This section is only a few feet above sea level and the derricks for windmills are as thick as in the West Virginia oil fields.

The great square stacks of baled hay and straw piled up uncovered and the sacks of wheat lying in rows across the flelds where the combined reaper and thresher left them is a novel sight to a person living in the rainy belt.

Denver, with a population which will soon reach a quarter of a million, is the only large city between the Mississippi and the coast. Across that 2,000 miles of territory what a lack of density of population. In five hours' ride in the the east a person may take in Washington, a quarter of a million, Baltimore, two thirds of a million, Philadelphia, a million and a quarter, and greater New York four millions.

From St. Louis to the coast, three days travel, Salt Lake City with 60,000 people is the largest city. But we approach Oakland, California, across the bay from San Francisco, and find a beautiful city with a population of nearly 100,000. In the distance on the rocky hillsides across and water, silent and majestie in her desolation and woe, sits San Francisco with her 400,000 people—rising like tne fabled Phoenix from her own ashes, the commercial and industrial metropolis of our Pacific coast.

BITTINGER.

[The editor of The Republican feels that he should make some public acknowledgement of thanks to the popular correspondent for Bittenger, Mr. J. B. Emory. His letters are always well written; while it is true he is blind, yet his letters make a better appearance than many of those which are written by people who possess all of their five senses in perfect condition. Possibly, it is because the majority of us prossess so many blessings that we fail to improve any of them as we should. Futhermore, the spirit of the Bittenger letters coming as they do from the blind, are not in the least pessimistic, or doleful; on the contrary they are always bright and cheerful; for instance, study the four lines of verse with which his letter begins this very week.—Edito..]

'Tis false, O doleful pessimist,
That life's a gloomy day;
There is no morning veiled in mist,
But sunbeams kiss away.

C. E. Ellithorp returned last week from Jamestown Va., where he reports having spent a very pleasant week viewing the exposition.

Amos Reckner and children spent the Fourth over at Confluence Pa.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The camp meeting is now on and absorbing most attention, although some people in our neighborhood act as though they had no interest in the meeting. The attendance so far has been fully up to that of former years and the results satisfactory to the management. A great crowd is expected next Sunday.

It would be impossible to note late arrivals in detail, but we mention some who are known to many of your readers: Rev. S. W. Davis and wife, Rev. Willis Dean and family, Mr. McCormick and family, of Parkersburg, W. Va.

Among those attending the meeting from a distance are Bishop Wilson, Revs. C. W. Baldwin, Dunham, Hyde, Aura Smith, Baker, Elijah P. (Ramshorn) Brown, Dolbow, and many others.

There are still a few furnished cottages for rent, running in price from $75 to $300.

We claim one of the best, cleanest and best managed bowling alleys in the State. It is under the management of the Ladies' Civic Club, and a number of the members of the club are always present to see that the most perfect order is maintained and to show every courtesy to visitors. What would be a nicer way for our Oakland young people to spend an afternoon or evening than by forming a bowling party and visiting this institution.

Mrs. M. M. Ashby and daughter, Miss Orpha, were at Bittinger Saturday and Sunday.

ASHBY LUMBER COMPANY INCOPORATED.

Garrett County Capital to Operate west Virginia Timber Tract.

Yesterday, under the laws of the State of West Virginia, the Ashby Lumber Company, composed of Garrett countians, was incorporated with a capital of $50,000.

The incorporators are Messrs. Charles A. Ashby, Albert Ashby, George M. Brown, Milton Rodamer and Dr. John E. Leege. Officers of the corporation will be elected at a meeting shortly to be held.

This company has secured a timber tract containing 5,000,000 feet of excellent timber located within two miles of Belington, West Virginia, upon which a band mill having a capacity of 30,000 feet per day will be erected as soon as it arrives from the manufacturers. The machinery to be installed will be of the latest labor-saving construction.

The main office of the company will be located in Oakland with rooms in the opera house block.

MR. GUSTAVE BAURMANN STRICKEN WITH PARALYSIS.

His Home is in Chicago But is Spending the Summer at Monte Vista.

Mr. Gustave Baurmann, who is stopping for the summer at Monte Vista, was stricken with a paralytic stroke early this morning, the left side being effected. Dr. H. W. McComas was summoned and rendered medical assistance.

The winter home of Mr. Baurmann is at Chicago. He is about fifty years of age.

Biggs-Meese Nuptials.

Mr. Harry William Biggs and Miss Lillian Meese, both of near Loch Lynn Heights, were quietly married at the Methodist Episcopal parsonage by Rev. J. B. Workman, Sunday evening. Both of the contracting parties are well-known in this section and their friends extend to them the best wishes for a happy wedded life. The bride is the daughter of Mr. Joseph Meese, and has lived near Loch Lynn for many years; while the groom has lived at Loch Lynn practically all his life.

Mr. Stephen G. Ashby, of Bond, was in Oakland last night on business, returning to Bond this morning.

Rates to be Posted.

The Mountain Lake Park Community has passed a law that the transfer wagons shall post in their hacks the standard rates of transfer about the local points and between the Park and Oakland. The step was opposed by some hackmen but the Community insisted that it was proper that there should be similar rate for both stranger and those who know the prices by living here. Complaints had been made of over charges on the part of some hackmen.

Valuable Military Lots for Sale.

By virtue of a power of attorney from the real owner, I offer for sale Military Lots 225, 293, 435 and 1257. Direct chain of titles from the soldier, which supercedes all Escheat Patents. The first three lots lie on the South side of Backbone Mountain and are underlaid with all the coal veins in that region, and covered with oak timber. For further particulars apply to

HIRAM P. TASKER,
Hotel Manhattan, Oakland, Md.

Teachers' Saleries Raised in Pennsylvania.

Pennsylvania has made a state law making the minimum salary for school teachers in that state $480.00 a year or $40.00 per month. This is one of the evidences which go to show that there is being placed a higher dignity upon the profession of teaching as the years go by. In our own State of Maryland the mininum salary is $300.00 per year, or $25.00 per month.

Land Transfers.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

From Minimum to Maximum.

By WILLIAM F. BRYAN.

Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.

Out of the night came the sound of galloping hoofs and the staccato bark of small arms. Little Bradley, who had arrived at the Shaw ranch that evening on his first visit west, promptly dropped under the billiard table. The others, to whom it was an old story, glanced out of the window and went on with their game.

"Looks like a part of the B 4 outfit," remarked Callendar carelessly as he chalked his cue. "Come on out, Bradley. They're merely some joyous cow punching souls on their evening out. Going down to the Palace, I imagine."

Bradley, red both from exertion and chagrin, emerged from beneath the table and picked up his cue. "I thought that people out here had quit those fool tricks," he explained, his teeth still chattering.

"They have, except for special occasions. But when they do turn loose they generally give us a salute in passing."

"The Palace is that drinking place down the road?"

"Just that. You see," explained Callendar, "when Colonel Shaw bought his ranch there was one quarter section he could not get hold of, owned by a stubborn brute of a fellow who would not let go. That was the foundation of the town of Minimum."

"Funny name!" commented Bradley.

"That's why they took it. The original holder has been dead some years now, but the town goes on. You see, it's nearer the mines by ten miles than the railroad town, and between the miners and the cowboys things are kept lively."

"They don't like the colonel because he objects to the rum holes they run, almost at his door, and when things are mussed up, they generally ride past and give us a salute. It's only once or twice that the shots have come through. As a rule they fire into the air."

Some one called Bradley to make his shot, and the matter was not again taken up until late that evening, when Bradley and his host sat chatting in the smoking room, and the guests good naturedly told the story of his fright.

"I'd give half a million to have that collection of dives moved away," said Colonel Shaw bitterly. "I suppose when the railroad comes it will be still worse."

"The L. C. L. cutoff?" asked Bradley. "Are they coming through here?"

"Right past the town," assented the colonel. "I think I shall have to give up the idea of living here. I had hoped to buy up all the land and have the finest place around here in my old age."

"How much are you really willing to spend?" demanded Bradley. "I mean business."

"And I meant the half million. I offered old Pete $300,000 for the quarter before the town grew up, when he just had a little saloon down in one corner."

Bradley gravely put out a hand so white and slender that men seldom anticipated the strength of his grip. "I'll do it and make a profit in the end," he announced.

Colonel Shaw shook hands gravely enough, but he smiled beneath his heavy mustache. A six footer himself, he had all the big man's contempt for the little fellow. How could Bradley, with his five feet seven, conquer where his six feet two had failed?

But he rather liked Bradley in spite of his handicap of size. Of course, he was impossible as a suitor for Nancy's hand, though personally he was a good sort of chap.

The following morning Bradley strolled down to the Palace for a drink, and in ten minutes he had picked up an acquaintance with the proprietor. That evening at the dinner table his announcement that he found Pete Buckley rather a companionable sort of chap created an even greater sensation than had his performance of the night before.

"He didn't throw you out?" cried Colonel Shaw in amazement.

"Not a bit of it," said Bradley comfortably, blissfully ignorant of the fact that the colonel himself had been subjected to that indignity, as well as all and sundry of his previous guests who had strayed into the Palace. "We had a couple of bottles of champagne and quite a long chat."

All of the guests were regarding Bradley curiously, but that did not affect Bradley. He was chatting with Nancy, and he did not even hear the colonel's muttered explanation:

"He was so little they were ashamed to hurt him."

Bradley's visit was the first of several during the week, and when he started back to town it was with a bottle of "Buckley's best" (which was very bad indeed) in his traveling bag and a hearty sendoff from the "regulars."

He was back again in a couple of weeks, and the colonel regarded curiously the smile of contentment that played about his lips when Minimum was mentioned. Bradley refused to divulge any of his plans and diverted discussion by the announcement that the L. C. L. had decided to run the line three miles farther to the south.

The statement was received with incredulity until Bradley pointed out the advantages to be gained, and the colonel sighed contentedly. Not only would the line leave his property untouched, but Minimum would not be a railroad town.

Down at Minimum the news was received with less placidity. Buckley promptly decided that it was the colonel's work and was for immediate extermination of his neighbor. Only Bradley's arguments induced him to abandon the plan, and when his excitement had cooled somewhat he and Bradley went into executive session.

That evening as Bradley strolled in to dinner the smile had broadened, and he looked pityingly at young Callendar, who was generally supposed to be the colonel's choice for a son-in-law.

It was when the others had gone off to play billiards that he dropped into the library, where the colonel sat writing.

"It's going to cost you about $30,000 and two half sections of good land," he announced. "Will that be all right?"

"Which half sections?" queried the colonel.

Bradley indicated them on the map.

"I'll deed them to you tomorrow," agreed the colonel. "How did you do it?"

"Sympathized with Buckley," explained Bradley. "Told him it was a shame that the line of the road was transferred south, without explaining that it took me a week to argue my uncle into changing the route—Uncle Jim's president of the road, you know. Then I pointed out that we could get some land to the south where we could spread out as we never could in Minimum, and I undertook to induce you to give up the land.

"Then I volunteered the promise that you would duplicate the town buildings on the new site as a bonus, and Buckley gets the extra quarter section for more town lots. He's so profoundly grateful that he wants to take me in as a partner."

"And all this has taken you less than three weeks," said the colonel, admiringly. "Why, man, I've worked for twelve years to get that quarter section."

"'By force alone ye shall not conquer,'" quoted Bradley softly. "Even we little fellows have our uses, colonel. I guess I'll see if there's a chance to get into the game in the billiard room. We can fix up the titles and the contracts in the morning."

He strolled out, but the colonel did not resume his work. He wheeled about, staring into the fire.

It was a twelve mile drive to the county seat, where the papers were recorded, and as they drove home in the twilight of the next evening the colonel reined in his horse in front of Minimum. Across the front of the Palace was an oilcloth sign which read:

On or before July 1
This hull town will Remove to Maximum
Three miles down the road.

"My name," chuckled Bradley as the horses moved on. "Suppose we celebrate by making a bonfire of the town?"

"That'll be a good site for you to build when you marry Nancy," chuckled the colonel—"that is, if you still want her."

"If?" echoed Bradley. "It was to gain her that I worked so hard."

"You've earned her," assured the colonel. "I'm proud of you, my boy."

Pat's Reasoning.

An Englishman and an Irishman were walking along a country road when they crept into a farmyard and stole a horse from the stable. Pat, thinking that the horse was no good without the cart, stole a cart from the same place. The news at once spread about that Farmer Giles had had a horse and cart stolen, and the police were soon on their track. The policeman, meeting the Englishman with the horse, inquired of him where he got the horse, the Englishman replying that the animal belonged to him.

"How can you prove it?" asked the policeman.

"Because I have had it since it was a foal," was the answer.

Pat overheard this conversation. He was pulling the cart along when the policeman stopped him, asking him if the cart belonged to him.

"Sure," said Pat. "Why, I have had this cart ever since it was a wheelbarrow."—Judge's Library.

BOWSER AS AN ACTOR

Thinks He Can Take the Parts of Hamlet and Romeo.

WAS ALSO TO BE "ANGEL."

Theatrical Promoter, However, Touched Him on the Start For Too Great a Sum—As Usual, Mrs. B. Has Laugh on Him.

[Copyright, 1907, by Homer Sprague.]

Mrs. Bowser was puzzled and perturbed. Mr. Bowser was going about striking strange attitudes and muttering to himself, and he had cried out in his midnight sleep:

"Lay on, Macduff, and damned be he who first cries, Hold, enough!"

Something was up, but just what it was Mr. Bowser was keeping to himself. She made cautious inquiries as to whether he was looking for a farm, investing in a flying machine or experimenting with a new hair dye, but he only smiled in a knowing way in answer. When the cook was asked in a casual way if she had noticed anything queer about him of late she promptly answered:

"Yes, ma'am, I have, and I was thinking of giving notice before he broke out and set the house on fire or killed us with the ax. He acts just as my sister's husband did before he blew up the house with a bomb and jumped into the river."

"What have you noticed about him?"

"Well, ma'am, he got out into the back yard the other evening and threw his arms around and muttered. He jumped ahead, and then sideways and backward, and all the time he was muttering to himself. I went to a theater on the Bowery once, and Mr. Bowser acted just like an actor I saw there. Did you ever hear of an actor called Mr. Hamlet, ma'am?"

Feared For Her Life.

"Then that's what he's trying to be, and if you can't stop him I must quit my job. I'm the sole support of an invalid mother, as you know, and I don't want to be suddenly blown high sky and leave her to go to the poorhouse."

Mrs. Bowser felt that she now had the key of the mystery in her hands. That evening she was watching for Mr. Bowser's return from the office. She saw him drop off the street car at his usual hour and noticed that he stepped off with a one-two-three stride. As he entered the house he bowed ceremoniously to her, and during the dinner hour he was lofty and superior. When they had returned to the sitting room he began pacing up and down, and presently she said:

"Mr. Bowser, I want to talk with you for a few minutes. You have been acting rather strangely of late. Have you got some great trouble on your mind that you are keeping from me?"

"My mind was never more clear of trouble," he answered, with a bow and a smile.

"But you have got some plan on hand."

"If I have, oh, woman, thou must restrain thy curiosity till such time as I see fit to unfold."

"Are you thinking of acting on the stage?"

"Methinks thou hast hit it close."

"Then tell me about it. As a wife I am interested in your welfare."

States the Case.

"Well, here's the case," he said as he descended from his high horse. "About a week ago Mr. Horatio Blank, the celebrated actor and manager, happened in the office just as I was repeating Hamlet's soliloquy for the benefit of Green, and when I was through he was pleased to shake hands with me and ask if he could offer any inducement for me to go on the road with a company he is organizing to play Shakespeare's plays. I said nothing to you about the matter, knowing that you would treat it with your usual sarcasm, but I have had two or three talks with Mr. Blank since. He is satisfied that I will make the greatest Hamlet ever seen on the stage. I shall also play Romeo."

"You speak as if it was a settled thing," said Mrs. Bowser

"It is about as good as settled. He is coming here this evening for a final talk. He thinks he can pay me a salary of $400 per week, but is going to let me know. We intend to introduce a new feature in theatricals—play the whole year through. He believes, and I quite agree with him, that people long for Shakespearean plays in summer more than in the winter. Thus it will be $400 per week for fifty-two weeks in the year. Is there anything bad about that for an income?"

"Does Mr. Blank want you to put any money in the enterprise?"

"Y-e-s, a few dollars. I think he wants me to advance enough money to pay for the printing. He will pay me back double the amount when we get out on the road. He has had twenty-one companies, and all have made money. He is said to be worth $1,000,000."

"Then why does he want you to advance anything?"

Might Leave Him In Lurch.

"Why? Why? I don't know exactly why, but to show that I am in earnest, I suppose. I might engage with him and then leave him in the lurch."

It was an explanation, but it didn't satisfy the explainer. He saw a smile on Mrs. Bowser's face and began to flush up as he said:

"That's always the way with you—doing your best to find some fault. I wish I hadn't said a word until the company was ready to start out on the road."

"I am not finding fault, Mr. Bowser. I am simply asking for information There's a ring at the bell. It is probably your man Blank. Go ahead and make your arrangements with him. I shall expect a box all to myself on the first night you play 'Hamlet.'"

Mr. Bowser ushered his theatrical manager into the library and carefully closed the door, and they took seats at the table. The said manager didn't look to be worth $1,000,000. In fact, he didn't look to be worth much over 15 cents. His silk hat had witnessed many ups and downs in the world, and his tightly buttoned frock coat was worn and shiny and showed that it had often stood before the free lunch counter and taken in the bean soup. His cuffs were frayed and his necktie faded, and the hand that had darned one knee of his trousers must have held a darning needle. He had his assurance with him, however, and that was the main thing.

Needed About $7,000.

"Oh, this dross, this worldly dross!" he sighed as he sat down. "It should have nothing to do with our noble profession, but unfortunately we cannot escape it. I have been figuring this afternoon, and I find that it will take about seven thousand to put us on the road in good shape. Of course it will all come back to you sooner or later. There are ten or twelve parties who are anxious to furnish the money, but as none of them can play Hamlet I have turned them down."

"Um!" grunted Mr. Bowser, who had an idea that twenty-five or thirty dollars at most would be wanted.

"As for the part of Hamlet, of course you couldn't expect to go right on and play it at the start. You must gradually work up to it. For the first two weeks you will bring the spade to Hamlet to dig the grave with."

"Um! Um!"

"I wish we could make you a foot taller somehow. You are rather short and chunky to play the part."

Mr. Bowser turned red and white.

"We must also get you a wig to hide your baldness. Do you think you could reduce your weight by sixty or seventy pounds? Hamlet has no bay window on him, you know."

"By thunder, man, what are you talking about!" shouted Mr. Bowser, as he rose up.

Hamlet Not a Bowser.

"Calm thyself, Horatio," replied Mr. Blank in soothing tones. "Hamlet must be Hamlet. Hamlet cannot be Bowser."

"Hamlet be durned! Sir, you have insulted me!"

"Tush, tush. I like thy spirit, but the tones of thy voice hath a clarion sound. Sit thee down and we will talk of the long green. Seven thousand"—

"Seven thousand nothings! I don't like your style. I don't want to deal with you. This interview is closed."

"And you haven't offered me a glass of wine nor a cigar. I was mistaken in you. You couldn't play Hamlet any more than a bull could play a church organ. Good night, sir. I can find my way out. If I hear of a brickyard for sale I will put you next."

Mrs. Bowser was in the sitting room. As Mr. Bowser came out he was all a-bristle and ready for battle, but she simply looked up and smiled and said:

"Isn't it a rather cold night, dear, for this time of year?"

Mr. Bowser didn't answer, but he thought it was—for him.

Trusts Are All Right If Honestly Conducted.

By Rev. Dr. LYMAN ABBOTT.

WE are moving out of a state of individualism into another state, which I shall call fraternalism. Whether we like it or not, we are no longer BOUND BY PRECEDENTS. We are making our own precedents, and I believe that we shall make the twentieth century as grand a century as our fathers made the nineteenth.

What is a corporation? Ideally it is a democratic contrivance for CONCENTRATING WEALTH for the purposes of administration and distribution. Men combine and put their dollars in a single purse to build factories, and when the goods are manufactured they each take a share of the profits.

It is the abuses that have crept into these corporations AND NOT THEIR EXISTENCE which have made some of them so obnoxious in the public eye. The Standard Oil trust began with forty-five original owners, and now there are more than three hundred. The same is true of the sugar trust, which began with only a few stockholders and now has six hundred. The tendency of the trusts has been to increase the number of owners. The Pennsylvania Railroad company has 45,000 employees, and it also has 45,000 owners. This certainly means the DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH.

When Jesus lived men who had more money than they needed for food put it into costly raiment or palaces, or they dug holes in the ground in those days and hid their wealth away. THEY HAD NO MEANS OF INVESTMENT, but now we put our money in savings banks, and the banks put the money into bonds and stocks of railroads and other enterprises, so that all of the capital of the people is working for them.

We want more trusts and corporations and means of investment. BUT WE WANT THEM CARRIED ON HONESTLY. Two great organizations, trades unions and corporations, are carrying us far beyond the prosperity ever attained by any other nation.

JUST BECAUSE WE FIND ABUSES GROWING UP IN THE BUSINESS WORLD WE MUST NOT RUB ALL THEIR FIGURES OFF THE SLATE AND START NEW ON THE PRESUMPTION THAT WHAT HAS BEEN ACCOMPLISHED HAS BEEN ALL WRONG.

Principle of Arbitration.

By President W. H. FAUNCE of Brown University.

THE athletic field is perhaps the CLEAREST EXPRESSION of the temper and genius and character of the school or college. There it comes right to the front. It is a student enterprise managed by the students and expresses most clearly their ATTITUDE AND TONE AND TEMPER, but they are accustomed in every one of those contests to see every disputed point referred to the judges, supposed to be impartial, and no decent college man would ever be found kicking, as they say, AGAINST THE DECISION of an umpire.

The athletic field is a training, not only in endurance and courage and loyalty, but in EVERY PRINCIPLE OF ARBITRATION. It is a declaration—the entire athletic system and the intercollegiate system in general—a declaration that only he has his quarrel just who is willing to submit that quarrel to the impartial judgment of his fellows.

THAT APPLIES JUST AS TRULY IN INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS AS IN INTERCOLLEGIATE CONTESTS.

Present Agitation Will Hamper Transportation Interests.

By W. H. TRUESDALE, President Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad.

A CAMPAIGN of agitation against railroads having its origin in high authority is being waged throughout the country. As it passes down the line each subordinate and each state and local authority strives to surpass his superior in zeal AND INCREASE ITS VIOLENCE.

Railroads are the greatest factor in the upbuilding of the nation. They are an INTEGRAL PART of our daily life, the foundation of our commercial prosperity. They are held to be no longer private corporations, but a part of the public service. This is the theory on which the interstate commerce law rests and is made the basis of federal and state regulation. There exists a UNIVERSAL AND PRONOUNCED FEELING OF HOSTILITY toward these corporations and their managements, which is finding expression in many states in radical and severely restrictive legislation.

At the same time there is manifest everywhere a spirit of unrest and distrust regarding general FINANCIAL conditions and the continuation of our great prosperity. Publication is made from time to time of indications and of expressions by prominent men. There is complaint among financiers that they cannot sell bonds. Several railway companies have been compelled to issue short time notes AT HIGH RATES OF INTEREST, instead of long term bonds, to raise money to carry on their improvements.

I am not a financial expert, and I do not pretend to analyze these monetary conditions. I have belief in the GENUINE PROSPERITY of the country, but I also believe that we are living in a time of as great inflation as during the greenback days following the close of the civil war. I may be extreme in my comparison, but the prices of both labor and commodities cannot go on forever increasing WITHOUT A DAY OF READJUSTMENT. And the campaign of fomenting distrust of every kind will not tend to make easy this settlement of disturbed conditions.

TENDENCY IS TO GO TO AN EXTREME WHICH WILL NOT SERVE MERELY TO REMEDY CONDITIONS AND PRACTICES THAT NEED ATTENTION, BUT EXTENDING FAR BEYOND WILL SO CHECK AND IMPEDE THE OPERATION OF RAILROADS AS TO AFFECT GENERAL BUSINESS INTERESTS.

When You Need Printing Done

You want it to be of the very best kind. As you expect your printed matter to make business it is necessary it should do the talking for you. Poor or indifferent printing cannot do this as it lacks the strong points required to gain and hold the interest of the patron.

FOURTH CELEBRATIONS HAVE COST 37 LIVES

Over Two Thousand Persons Injured —New York Hospitals Crowded.

Chicago, July 5.—The Tribune today says 37 men, women and children are dead and 2,153 are maimed, lacerated or burned as a result of yesterday's excess of patriotism in the United States. The number of the dead does not include five drowned during the day. The roster of the dead is four more than last year's mortality. A year ago 33 persons were dead on the morning after the Fourth, not including five drowned. Unfortunately, the deaths will increase day by day, and even the late days of August will witness additions to it. Tetanus claims its victims by scores, and even by hundreds, for weeks after the Fourth.

New York leads all the cities of the United States in the number of killed and injured. Ten persons are dead in that city, while six more are so seriously hurt that it is expected they will die within a few hours. At the New York hospitals 423 injured persons were treated. No record was made of the dispensary cases cared for.

There were 116 fires in Greater New York during the day. These figures break all Fourth of July records for the big metropolis.

Pittsburg ran New York a close second in the grim races, nine persons yielding up their lives on the altar of frenzied patriotism. Chicago, although the second city of the country, added only two dead to the nation's total. Springfield, Ill., supplied three victims, Chatham, Ill., two and Aberdeen, S. D., two.

The total number of injured, 2,153, is under last year's figures, which were 2,789.

The figures show that this year, as last, the most of the casualties were due to carelessness in handling firecrackers and other forms of "harmless explosives."

The crusade against the deadly toy pistol seems to be bearing fruit, as this year only 205 victims are reported, as against 304 last year.

The direct causes of the fatalities are as follows:

By fireworks, 17; by cannon, 4; by firearms, 9; by gunpowder, 3; by top pistols, 1; by runaways, 3.

Injured:

By fireworks, 1,046; by cannon, 222; by firearms, 9; by gunpowder, 3; by top pistols, 205; by runaways, 41.

EARTHQUAKE DAY.

A Descriptive Account of a Quake in the Philippines, Sent by a Former Garrett County Citizen.

One day last week was "earthquake day." We were wakened at about 5 a. m. by the creaking and violent swaying of the house. I ran to the window and looked up at Mayon volcano, which is only six miles away, to see if there were signs of unusual activity, but observing none and feeling no more shocks, we slept again.

As most houses here, ours is of bamboo with palm leaf roof and walls, built on strong posts which stand in the ground and reach to the roof; the floor is raised six feet above the ground. Such a house could be thrown down only by the severest shock and even then the occupants would probably not be injured.

No damage was done here, though in a nearby town two Chinamen were killed by a falling stone wall, and in Manila a frightened American jumped from a second story window and broke his arm.

At 8 a. m. the same day I was grading examination papers in the office of the superintendent of schools in the provincial government house, when the stone walls began to move and a burst water tank above sent a stream of water to the office floor; within ten seconds all the offices were vacant and everyone was standing in the yard; shocks continued about forty-five seconds, the earth seeming to rise, then sink again, giving us a slight feeling of seasickness like that experienced on ship board. The iron roof creaked ominously and the stone wall cracked in one place. I noticed one native kneeling on the ground with his arms around a banana plant, while he audibly called on "Jesus and Maria, Madre de Dois," for protection. One native woman died of fright (heart failure).

After this shock we soon returned to work, but they continued at frequent intervals, so I took my papers to my own house in order to work in safety away from the stone walls. There were more than nine distinct "quakes" during the day, extending in length about three hundred miles through Luzon Island.

This section of the Philippines lies in the volcanic and earthquake region which extends through the East India Islands and Japan; earthquakes are frequent and volcanoes are characteristic of the islands. The Philippines have not been visited by any very destructive shocks since 1863, when many buildings in Manila were thrown down. To escape danger the houses are almost invariably only one story high, though this story is raised several feet above the ground. Churches are built of stone with walls several feet thick.

W. VA. MINERS TO ORGANIZE.

Efforts to be Made to Bring the Coal Miners of W. Va. into the Miner's Union.

At Indianapolis, Ind., Monday, the United Mine Workers of America, prepared to make the most vigorous campaign for the organization of the West Virginia miners. John Mitchell, the president of the Union, is to head the campaign and thirty organizers, backed by a fund of half a million dollars, are to carry on the work throughout the West Virginia mining regions. The coal companies of West Virginia have made efforts continually to prevent union among the miners. They control newspapers, public speakers, and the leading men at the different mines are made friends of theirs on the quiet. In this way good words are always said about the companies.

The reports shows that out of more than 60,000 miners in the State not over 7,000 are organized and it was determined that all the other 50,000 or 55,000 should be brought into the union if the organizer can do it. Special efforts will be made to organize the men in the Fairmont field, where some 20,000 non-union miners are employed. West Virginia, particularly the Fairmont region, has long been a menace to the organization and no step will be left untaken to unionize the men there.

There is a fund of $500,000 in the treasury of the United Mine Workers and this will be drawn on freely in pushing the West Virginia work. The thirty organizers will begin work soon in various portions of the State, but it will be two months before President Mitchell will join them. He will establish headquarters at Charleston and direct the work from there.

Gas For Westernport.

The Western Maryland Gas Company and the people of Westernport have made a compromise by which gas will be put into Westernport at once. The work of laying the mains will begin immediately. Last fall, when the gas company got to Westernport, the citizens voted that the gas company should pay $200.00 for the franchise, but the company refused to pay anything whatever. The residents have seen since that they were out both the gas and the $200.00, and so now have made arrangements whereby they will get at least the gas if not the money.

HOW FEATHERS ARE MIXED

A Trade That Is Hard to Learn—Method of Sorting Grades.

Feather mixing is one of the hardest trades to learn, but when mastered is also one of the best paying methods of earning a living. The worker who intends to make this trade his lifework must start when he is young, for it takes on an average 13 years for a man to work up from the pillow filler to feathers mixes.

Feathers that have been plucked from hens, ducks, turkeys and geese are the only kind of feathers that are used, says the Chicago Tribune. One kind of feathers at a time is placed in the drum, to be beaten and to be sterilized by hot air process. The drum is a large machine not unlike the washing machine used in laundries. In the center of each machine is an exile with eight beaters attached. The beaters make over 200 revolutions a minute, beating the dust out of the feathers and cleaning them thoroughly. A thin screen on the front and back of the machine lets the dust out.

This part of the feather work is the most unhealthy, for the windows in the drumroom are not allowed to be opened, and the dust that comes from the feathers is inhaled by the worker. Many of the drum men contract consumption in a year or more during this work, and are compelled to give up and seek other employment. The work is not so unhealthy as it was in former years, for the men now are allowed to leave the room while the machine is in operation.

After the feathers have been beaten and sterilized in the drum they are placed in the blowing machine to be sorted and to be deodorized by the cold blast. As in the drum, the kind of feathers are put in the blower separately. The blower is the most simple and yet the most wonderful machine that is used in the feather business. The machine is built with a large funnel shaped mouth on top, and always is placed at one end of a large room.

The feathers are placed in the funnel, through which they fall down into the center of the machine. The cold air blowing from the fan deodorize them, and they leave the machine in a steady stream, flying all over the room. The worker finds himself in what looks like a miniature storm, for the feathres fly around as high as the ceiling. An onlooker well might wonder where the sorting comes in of the maze of feathers.

It is here that the wounderful part of the machine lies, for the air pressure is so arranged that the heaviest feathers, which are also the cheapest, will fall in a bin 15 feet away from the machine, and the rest of the seven different grades of feathers will fall accurately in binds that have been provided for them. The down, which is the most expensive, flies, around in the air the longest, but when it comes down it falls into the bin that is placed over 75 feet away from the blower. Thus the seven different grades of feathers have been sorted, each kind in a bin and without having been touched since leaving the blower.

The drum and blower man, after putting in five years at this kind of work, and also learning the different grades of feathers, takes another step upward in the business and becomes an assistant to the mixer. His work consists of weighing feathers and learning the different combinations that are used in stuffing pillows. In a few years he probably will know how to mix some of the combinations, but usually it takes five years of experience before an assistant can become a mixer.

The combination used in the cheapest pillows is hen and turkey feathers Duck and turkey combination is used in a little better grade of pillows, and the best combination of all is duck and goose feathers. The most expensive filling is made of downy feathers from geese. These combinations have different prices and the mixer must know these prices and, when he can, experiment with the various kinds of feathers to try and get a cheeper combination that will last as long as the dearer kind.

ANOTHER VEIWPOINT.

About Friendsville's Latest Religious Debate.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Believing that your columns are open to a fair presentation of both sides of public questions, it is desired, in this article, to correct some misstatements (either deliberate or otherwise, but, nevertheless, misstatements) of the writer of the article entitled: "Debate in Friendsville." which appeared in your issue of the 4th inst., signed "Observer."

In the first place, the writer says that the debate "grew out of a challenge from the Rev. W. W. Wallace, that was accepted by the Rev. H. C. Salem," thereby endeavoring to create a false and prejudicial impression upon "sand foundation."

The fact is, that exactly the reverse of this is true. Mr. Wallace received (and still has in his possession) a written challenge from Mr. Salem, this being the first intimation that Mr. Wallace ever had that Mr. Salem desired to take issue with him on this question, which challenge Mr. Wallace promptly acceipted, and readily agreed to the terms outlined by Mr. Salem as a basis for the debate.

In this connection, the further statement is hereby made that, prior to the recept of this challenge, Mr. Wallace did not even know that there ever existed such a person as H. C. Salem, and consequently, without this knowledge, was in no position to challenge him.

In the second place, the writer of the article in question says: "The negative speaker adheared strictly to 'the entire word of God, only,' which he proved all his arguments making it very clear to Greek and Hebrew Bible Students that no stress or efficacy is placed upon the form, or mode, by which water is applied in baptism, but that "the only valid baptism is God's word connected with water, as it is an outward sign of an inward grace, and when this 'grace' of God is in the heart, a baptised person will not dance, play cards or get drunk."

As to this argument, the statement is here made, the fact publicly announced, that the negative speaker, H. C. Salem, came upon the platform with ready prepared manuscript, consisting of both typewritten matter and pasted clippings the latter not from the Bible, and that he adhered almost exclusively to these during the entire debate, notwithstanding the tremendous effort of the affirmative speaker in an endeavor to get him to answer some of the affirmative arguments, while the affirmative speaker, according to our judgement, (we having no desire to pass judgment for others) tore to shreds every argument he advanced, backing his own argument with plain scriptural readings from the Bible.

As to that part of the statement which says: "Making it very clear to Greek and Hebrew bible students, that no stress or efficacy is placed upon the mode, or form, by which water is applied in baptism," would observed that not a single word of Hebrew was used in the arguments advanced, and that, in the Greek, not more than four or five words of this language were used, they being used by the negative speakers, so repeatedly and continuously that to the uninitiated, it possibly conveyed the idea that the Greek language was being seriously drawn upon. These words consisted of such as eis, bapto, baptidzo, baptismois. These Greek words may have given a great deal of comfort to Greek ond Hebrew students, but, unless with the exception of Prof. McDairmod, of Bethany College, Moderator for the affirmative speaker, none such were in attendance at the sessions of the debate.

We are quite satisfied that the "common people" have already had to much Greek and Hebrew; particularly in religious matters, and that what they most need and want is plain, simple English.

One truth we heartily recognize and quite as heartily endorse, in "Observer's" article, is: "Individual opinion is a right we all possess," yet the very recognition and possession of this right does not give us the right to force others, by bluff er otherwise, to accept our views.

The official board of the Church of Christ, Friendsville, has no desire to force upon the public any individual views, but are willing and quite prefer to let them judge for themselves. Their one desire is to see that absolute truth prevails in relation to the matter and that the people be given the opportunity to judge it strictly upon its merits. The debate will appear in printed form, in due time, when those of independent mind and thought will have full opportunity to weigh the matter, each deciding for himself, upon the evidence produced.

The prayer of these officials is: That the book be widely disseminated, that it be carefully read and compared with the word of God, and that, thereby, many may have their feet securely planted upon the rock "Christ Jesus."

Those desiring to procure a copy of this debate, when published, can do so upon application to the official board, Church of Christ, Friendsville, Md.

By order of the Official Board, Church of Christ, Friendsville, Md., July 9th. 1907.

No Corn but Buckwheat.

The spring season being so backward, it being so wet and cold, the corn which the farmers of this section had planted did not come up with any sort of success. The blades were exceedingly sickly and pale, and in places moreover, it did not come up at all. As it is too late to replant, the farmers in many places are disregarding the corn and are sowing buckwheat on the same ground.

SCHOOL BOARD MET LAST FRIDAY

Teachers Were Appointed to Oakland and Blaine Schools.

SCHOLARSHIP FOR MISS GONDER

Contract Awarded Mr. Crim for Addition to Blaine School House—New School House for District Number 7.

The County School Board was in session at Superintendent Browning's office Friday afternoon and evening. All of the board was present with the exception of Mr. Ellithorpe. New school buildings were discussed, teachers were appointed and a scholarship was awarded.

Miss Jennie Miller, who taught at the Mount Zion school this year, was elected to the vacancy in the Oakland school caused by the resignation of Miss Virginia Johnson; and Miss Emma Hamill, teacher at the Armstead school last winter, will take the work vacated by Miss May Hamill-Lowerditch. The vice-principalship of the Oakland school was not supplied. An application for the position was received from Prof. J. C. Beahm, to the Accident school; the election was deferred, however, until the next meeting of the board when Mr. Ellithorpe would be present.

Teachers for the Blaine school were elected as follows: principal, Mr. William E. Bishoff; assistants, Misses Anna McAlister, Alice Campbell and Cora Michael.

The board awarded the contract for the erection of a four room addition to the Blaine school to Mr. M. V. Crim, of Oakland. A school building was order to be built in the Haney neighborhood, in District No. 7.

The free scholarship for St. Mary's Seminary, in St. Mary's county, was awarded to the only competitor, Miss Anna Gonder, of Oakland, and a member of the Junior class of the local high school.

Officers Ashby Lumber Co.

The stockholddrs of the Ashby Lumber Company held a meeting at their new offices in the opera house building. Officers were elected as follows: Charles A. Ashby, president; George M. Brown, vice president and manager; Milton Rodamer, secretary; and Albert Ashby, treasurer.

Estray Notice.

There came to the farm of S. J. A. Turney, on May 25th, a yearling heifer with a few white spots on sides. The owner will please come and identify the animal and pay all costs and damages and take same away.

TRAMPING IN GARRETT COUNTY

Delightful Excursion Led by Rev. and Mrs. A. H. Thompson of Frostburg.

Rev. and Mrs. A. H. Thompson, conducted a party of young people on a delightful tramping excursion through part of Garrett county, last week.

The party left Frostburg at seven o'clock on Tuesday morning, going over the old National road to the Stone House eleven miles west of Frostburg, where they made the first stop and ate lunch. From there they went to the home of Mr. Miller, leaving the pike on their right and traveling about seven miles reaching Mr. Miller's home about sundown. After supper they spent several hours in roaming over the farm and enjoying the pleasures of natural surroundings. The party divided, part of them staying at Mr. Miller's and part going about a half a mile furher to another for the night. After a good night's rest and an early breakfast Mr. Miller took the party on a hay ride to visit the great lumber camp at Jennings. Several hours spent there, a lunch in the woods and starting back, the party was caught in a heavy thunder storm. On arrival at Miller's again some of the party were obliged to go to bed while their clothing was drying.

On Tuesday morning Mr. Miller hitched four horses to a large wagon and brought the party out to the pike at Shades Mills, where they took dinner and rested until three o'clock, when they started for Mr. Hugh McMahon's home, about five miles west of Frostburg, where they remained all night Thursday night. After an excellent breakfast and a rest of several hours, at ten o'clock Friday morning they started for home arriving at the M. E. parsonage at twelve o'clock. Several had cameras with them and a number of pictures of scenes along the way and of the party in picturesque groups and amid beautiful surroundings, were taken.

"A more enjoyable outing was never had," is the general opinion of the members of the party.

Mason-Beckman Nuptials.

Mr. C. Columbus Mason and Miss Jennie Beckman, both of Meadow Mountain, were quietly married at the Evangelical Lutheran Parsonage in Cumberland, by Rev. McCoy, Friday, the 5th inst. Both the contracting parties are well known in this section and their many friends extend to them the best wishes for a happy wedded life. The bride is the daughter of Mr. Theo. Beckman, a very prosperous farmer of this section, she is very popular with all who know her. The groom is the son of Mr. Buckner Mason, contractor for Mason Bros., and has hundreds of friends in this community where both bride and groom have lived all their lives.—By Meadow Mountain Correspondent to The Republican.

A Horrible Murder Near Bloomington

Discovery of the Mutilated Remains of Victim Disclosed Crime Which Was Committed Sometime During or After July 4th—Investigation Being Made by State Officials and Arrests May Follow.

One of the foulest murders ever committed in Garrett county was brought to light Sunday at noon with the finding of the body of Joe S. Harris, an aged and highly respected resident of Bloomington. Harris had been missed since the Fourth of July, and just when people had begun to wonder what could have become of him his body was found one-fourth of a mile from Bloomington lying upon its face within sight of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad bridge which spans the Potomac river at that point. The body was discovered by Lorenzo Buckhannon, a young man who was chasing rabbits. The body was in a bad state of decomposition and was covered over with brush and leaves. Young Buckhannon immediately made known his discovery and within half an hour a big crowd of people had gathered at the spot. A coroner's jury was immediately impanneled and the ground surrounding where the body was found was given a careful examination.

It was about five o'clock when the jury completed its investigation. Near the body was found two or three large stones; an iron bolt with a tap on one end; a roll of money containing eighty dollars; a copy of the Union City Eagle, printed at Union City, Indiana, under date of January 27th, '07; a pay check coupon issued in 1903 by the West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company at Piedmont; a number of cigarette butts, some empty whiskey bottles and other things that would indicate that a camp had been maintained there over night. The pay check is considered the best evidence offered, as the number thereon will correspond with the check and the name to whom it was issued.

The body of the old man, while badly decomposed, was easily recognized. It was dressed in a suit of clothing given him some time since by Dr. H. M. Kemp. The skull of the old man was badly mashed, a large portion being torn entirely away. The rocks were covered with blood, and the supposition is that they were used to do the killing. It is more than probable that the old man was murdered for the money he was suppose to carry with him, but from the finding of the roll of green backs it is thought that the murderers lost at least a part of the money in leaving the spot.

The old man Harris was a quiet, sober and industrious citizen. He came to Bloomington about fourteen years ago from Martinsburg. While he lived in some respects the life of a hermit, he was well and favorably known all about there. He worked in gardens and did all kinds of odd jobs whenever they offered, doing his work well and satifactorily. So far as is known he has no relatives in this immediate section. It is said that he has a sister in Clarksburg but efforts at communication with her failed.

After making a searching investigation about the premises the coroner's jury adjourned until this evening, at which time a large number of witnesses will be summoned and put through a rigid examination. Prosecuting Attorney Fred. A. Thayer of Oakland, will be present and aid in the investigation. The fact that the old man was last seen on the evening of July 4th, going into the woods to gather wood, it is thought will lend some ease to the investigation, as about everybody there was enjoying the holiday that day and people were scattered all about the woods. Some believe that the old gentleman was murdered by Yeggmen camping in the woods there, but many others lay the murder at the door of some local characters. It was with out doubt the most brutal murder ever occuring in Garrett county, and the authorities will sift it to the bottom. It would not be at all surprising should arrests follow the examination this evening.

A FISHING EXCURSION

Three Young Men have an Excellent Time In the Wilds of W. Va.

On the afternoon of July 2nd, I joined George Wilson and Simon Cesner, fellow disciples of Walton, at Wildell, W. Va., for a fishing trip in Shaver's Fork of Cheat River. After stowing our supplies, each fellow adjusted his pack of forty pounds and hit the trail. The climb up the mountain forming the waterhead between the Greenbrier and Cheat was no easy task but that trip down the mountain to the Cheat river haunts me like a nightmare. All the Cheat river country seems to be covered with almost impassable thatch of laurel and the fellow who laid out our trail seemed to have found the roughest possible course. It was one continual climb down ever fallen trees boulders and laurel bushes and all of this through a pouring rain.

We then went up the river for what the fellows called a mile. In behalf of the peace of their souls, I hope it was true, but it was the longest drawn out I have ever traveled. It was crawling over boulders and wading all the way. I fell behind and a short distance from camp I felt that I could go no farther. George soon came back and offered to carry my pack but I explained that I was not at all tired but just enjoying the scenery. I reached camp later with my pack intact.

At our first stopping place we found an old camp in good condition, with a roaring fire and a good supper comfortably tucked under our belts we spent the night in refreshing, dreamless sleep. One of my companions while taking an early morning fish, hooked a twelve inch trout but lost him and later fell into the drink but got out safely. The other in jumping on a sloping rock sat down so hard that he had an impress of the stone on his trousers for several days.

Next day Burton Wilson joined us and we decided to move up the river about eight miles to another camp near where some small creeks joined the river. Most of the way the scenery was magnificent. Great high mountains came down almost to the water's edge for the valley here is very narrow. The white azalea grows in dense clusters along the banks. They were in full bloom and the air was heavily laden with the rich fragrance of their showy blossoms. On both sides of the country is covered with a dense growth of black spruce and laurel and the only way to get out of the valley is to go byway of some small stream flowing down from the mountains. Practically all the way the river is one continuous rapid with numberous deep pools interspersed. We saw a large golden eagle along the river and numerous signs of deer and bear on the mountain side. For thirty miles along the river not a tree has been cut. Truly it is a forest primeval.

The upper camp was located on a narrow piece of level ground by the side of an ice cold spring and there we stayed the remaining days of our trip. For solid comfort, that camp cannot be excelled. With a thick layer of "jackass feathers" (spruce boughs) under you, a roaring fire in front and the murmering of the river nearby, who is there that could not rest in peace? The fishing was fairly good; what we lacked in number we made up in size. George Wilson, a benedick of a few months standing, caught the largest—a speckled beauty fourteen inches in length and with commendable thoughtfulness took it home to his wife.

The end of our outing came only too soon. When we reached civilization again the hardships we had endured paled into insignificance and left only the memory of a most fascinating experience.

NARROW ESCAPE FOR THE JUDGE

While automobiling Sunday, Judge Henderson got in a Mix-up.

A HORSE BECAME FRIGHTENED.

While Attempting to lead the Animal past the Automoble, it Became Frightened and Threw the Judge off his Feet.

His Honor Judge Henderson while out automobiling Sunday afternoon with Mr. Howard H. Dickey, of Cumberland, had a narrow escape from being seriously injured. While near Oakland, on the road leading to Sunnyside, the automobile met a horse and carriage being driven by Mr. Jacob Gortner. The horse become frightened and could not be driven past the machine and stepping up to the horse the Judge led it. The animal led well for a little ways, but as it neard the automobile, its fear increased. As it came beside the machine the horse gave a plunge, throwing the Judge from his feet. He held fast, however, for a little while until he was compelled to let go by the rearing of the animal. Finally, the machine was passed, and neither the Judge nor the horse was any worse off for the tussel, although the Judge was highly congratulated upon his bravery and upon getting out of thh mix-up without being seriously injured.

WATER CAME DOWN BY BUCKETSFULL

Many People Think a Cloud Burst Near Oakland Wednesday Morning.

THE RUN OVERFLOWED ITS BANKS

The Culvert Beneath the Railroad Track too Small Caused the Water to Back Up and Enter Several Business Houses.

The citizens of Oakland were awakened yesterday morning early by a very heavy rain. Some people think that there must have been a cloud burst, so heavy was the fall of water. The run that flows through Oakland rapidly rose and soon overflowed its banks, flooding the street between the Garrett National Bank and the Opera House.

The culvert beneath the railroad that usually carries the water of the run, soon became too small for the on-rushing torrents, with the result that water backed up so high that it entered Lauer's Bakery, Dixon's Meat Market, Bolden's furniture store, the Opera House and the Garrett National Bank. A stream six or eight inches deep flowed through Bolden's Furniture store for over an hour, causing considerahle loss. Mr. Bolden managed to get many of the articles up out of the water although many became soaked.

It seems that the rain was general throughout this section, for trains, owing to washouts and slides, were unable to be on time during the whole day. Many of the rural route mail carriers had to return, owing to the fact that they were unable to make their way along the flooded roads and over the swimming bridges, many of which have been carried away and others damaged.

TEACHERS GET THE CERTIFICATES

Papers all Examined and Mailed to the Teachers on Tuesday.

14 FIRSTS. 137 SECONDS. 16 FAIL

Marks Above the Average—Honors for Firsts were Divided Between Students of the Oakland and Friendsville Normals.

The certificates awarded by the County School Board to the teachers were mailed Tuesday. These are for the examination which was held at Accident and Oakland on June 20th and 21st. There were fourteen first-grade certificates issued and one hundred and thirty-seven second-grade. There were but sixteen failures. The work done this year by the teachers in the examination was far above the average and goes to prove that there is being made a gradual improvement in the teaching corps of the county.

The honors for the two Normals of the county were evenly divided. The best first-grade certificate was won by a student of the Friendsville school, Miss Mattae Riley. The certificate of of the second-grade with the highest average was attained by Miss Grace Browning, a student of the Oakland Normal.

Death of Glenville H. Castle.

Mr. Glenville H. Castle, a native of Kingwood, while running to catch a train Saturday, the 6th, fell dead at Keyser, the cause being heart failure.

He has been in the service of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad for 36 years, and at the time of his death he was employed as a conductor on the third division. He was 68 years of age. The burial took place Monday following his death.

DISCUSSIONS ON CURRENT EVENTS

The School Trustee is Given an Excellent, Free Portrait of Himself by the Montgomery Press—Other Subjects Well Handled.

The county school commissioners have handed out a new batch of appointments of school trustees, and in most cases conferring trouble as well as honor upon the apointees. The office of school trustee is an honorable one, and charged with responsibility, and all that. It is big enough to make the new trustees believe they are climbing the ladder of fame. It is dangerous to appoint a school trustee, since no one can tell where it will lead, but it is worse to remove one from office. A school trustee, like a judge of election or registration officer, is an important man in his community. The trustees have great authority in one particular—they can order the winter's supply of fire wood for the district school. Of course the real fun is to "visit the school," and when the children keep so still and look so scared the trustee knows how it feel to be a great man. It's nice to be a school trustee.

War While You Wait.

War, war wholesale or retail, war in twenty-four hours, war in a week or war in six months. Anyone who wants war can get just the sort he requires by picking his newspaper to that end. There are even some old fogy sheets declaring there will not be any way at all. And probably they are just as far right as any of the rest. This is, of course, war between Japan and the United States—war talk is so rife that it is almost unnecessary to mention the compatants. There probably will be war, but it is not in sight, and when its comes the voyof the battle-ship squadron around Cape Horn will have passed into history and been half forgotten. A decade is not a week in the life of a nation, and probably it will be a decade before Japan thinks she is in a position to fight the United States. When she thinks she is in a position, physically and financially, the fight will come. The provocation may be a restaurant row in San Francisco or our oppression of the natives in the Sulu Archipelago. The provocation does not matter much. It will be found when it is wanted. But for the present Japan knows she is not in condition to fight us, and we do not want to fight Japan. There it can rest. But those who want a paper war of any sort can get it by subscribing to the right sort of a paper.—Fairmont West Virginia.

The Month of Disillusion.

In March they woo, in April they quarrel, in May they make up, in June they wed, and in July they think it over. Here we have the grand hymeneal sequence or matrimonial chain. Prose follows poetry as headaches follow holidays. The romantic bridegroom of June, with his pink cheeks and flashing eyes, his shiny cuffs and tall silk hat, becomes the mute and melancholy married man of July. The bride, once an enchanting fairy, becomes a cook.

A couple of weeks ago they set out upon their nuptial pilgrimage, with rice in their hair and a great joy thumping at their hearts. To him, she seemed beautiful beyond all dreams of beauty; to her, he seemed nobler than Bayard, handsomer than Faversham and braver than Bat Masterson. To both the world appeared as a gorgeous pale-pink meringue, standing upon a golden plate studded with diamonds, sapphires, amethists and rubies.

Today they are home again—home in their little flat, with its pseudo-hardwood mantels, its near-gilt electroliers and its quasi-satin wallpaper. They are happy still, but it is with a chastened, pianissimo happiness. He kisses her goodby in the morning—and as their lips meet his thoughts fly forward to the labors of his day. It is osculation that leaves something lacking. It is a kiss that has lost its old element of glorious surrender and immolation. So soon, indeed, as one may think of other things, while kissing, the act itself becomes a hissing and a mocking. A perfect kiss is staggering and anesthetic. It makes mind a blank and the heart a bass drum.

But let not Clarence groan, nor Gwendolen inflame her pretty eyes with weeping. It is well for the wicked old world, alas! that love grows commonplace and pale. If it flared like an arc-light and raged like a hurricane forever, the work of the world would fall entirely upon bachelors and grass widowers Kissing would interfere with fighting and robbing. There would be none to bear burdens in the heat of the day—none but the aforesaid bachelors and grass widowers. The morning farewell, beginning at 8.15 a. m., would last until 5 p. m., instead of ending at 8.15¼ a. m., as it does now. And the result would be famine, drouth, pestilence, panic and sorrow in the home.—Baltimore Sun.

GRANT AND THE NOMINATION.

Jesse R. Grant, son of the late Ulysses S. Grant, seems to be an active aspirant for the Democratic Presidential nomination next year. Mr. Grant is now in the West with H. H. Childers, a former Taxas newspaper man, who was connected with the speakers' bureau of the Democratic National Committee in the halcyon days of 1904 when that organization had its headquarters across Thirty-fourth street from the Waldorf-Astoria, in New York city and "Tom" Taggart, August Belmont, William F, Sheehan, Urey Woodson and Delancy Nicoll fought their daily battles and mismanaged the Democratic campaign with such a degree of masterly inefficiency as to attract general attention. Mr. Childers seems to be acting as Mr. Grant's press agent, or, at least it appears that Mr. Grant is being press-agented, and the former newspaper writer is naturally picked out as the responsible person.

Mr. Grant, to whose Presidential aspirations and personally some attention has already been paid in this country, was born in St. Louis. It evidently is the purpose of his friends to seek Southern support for his boom on that account. He looks like a Southerner and he dresses like some Southerners—somewhat like Representative Burleson, of Texas, for example, or John Sharp Williams. He is modest, but not averse to high office to which he aspires, if remarks attributed to him in the St. Louis papers are to be accepted. At one time, it appears, he even admitted that Henry Watterson might have had him in mind when telling of the famous dark horse with a mustache. Unfortunately, from the standpoint of the son of the famous Union general who was afterward President, Mr. Grant's face is innocent of hirsute adornment. "It seems that somebody besides Mr. Bryan is wanted," one St Louis paper quotes Mr. Grant as saying, "and I see no reason why I should not have an excellent chance. There are 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 men in this country, any one of whom could fill the Presidential chair, and I believe I am one of them." He will decide finally whether to try for the nomination or not after touring Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana and other Southern States.—Washington Herald.

HOT SAND HARD ON AUTO TIRES

Baltimoreans Have Peculiar Experience In Nevada.

"While going across the central portion of Death Valley, in Nevada, the sand was so hot that the inner tubes of the tires on our automobiles grew so hot that they cemented themselves to the outer tubing, and when after a thrilling run from Green Water to Ubehebe, and thence to Bonnie Claire, a total distance of 185 miles, which we made in seven hours and a half, the tires were all in one piece. The thermometers showed 120 degrees," thus spoke Mr. George B. Ackerman, of Goldfield, Nev., while sitting in his room at the Belvedere last night, enjoying what he thought was delightfully cool weather. He was telling of the experiences of a party of Baltimoreans who returned last night from an 18-day trip to the copper mines of Nevada. The party reached Baltimore at 6.30 o'clock on the chartered Pullman car Rainbow, and went immediately to the Belvedere for dinner.

The party was under the care of Mr. Jack Salsberry, president of the Ubehebe Mining and Smelting Company, and the trip was for the purpose of having the gentlemen who are largely interested in the mines at Ubehebe, inspect a particularly rich vein that has just been struck, and also to devise means of building a railroad to connect with the Bonnie Claire, a distance of 45 miles from the works.

Bonnies Claire was the first stop made on the way out. Here the party embarked in automobiles for Tonopah, where they rested for one day before venturing through the northern portion of Death Valley.

"You would be surprised," said Mr. Ackerman last night, "at the use to which the automobile is being put in the West. It has practically revolutionized the means of mining there. Where before a mine could not be opened because it was too far from the base of supply and at a distance which made it almost impossible for a mule team to haul enough food, now the automobile is used as a freight carrier into the desert. The ride over the desert is made just as quickly as the car will go, every car being in the hands of an experienced chauffuer, who has goggles and a coat to protect him from the sand, and the assurance that if he tries to go faster than 10 miles an hour there will be no bluecoat hiding in a prairie-dog hole waiting to take him to some justice of the peace. There, the lid is always off for speed.

"After leaving Tonopah, our party was taken to Greenwater, where we stayed two days, looking over the mines and inspecting the newly found vein. It was on our return trip, that, striking right through the center ot the desert, we found the heat so oppressive. Going along at a 65-mile-an-hour clip, with the small particles of sand striking the exposed portion of your faces like hailstones, and with the air so close and dry that one has to gasp sometimes for breath, it is exhilirating to say the least. The sand burns the tires until the odor which the Eastern man complains of when riding behind a moving automobile is made stronger by the smell of smouldering rubber. When we examined our tires they had all melted into one piece.

"We next went to Goldfield, Nev., the place where gold comes from, and remained for a day. Mr. Henry Merry, the young son of Mr. H. G. Merry, remained there, and I understand will stay for several months to get a taste of Western life. On our way home we made Cheyenne, our Fourth of July stopping place, and it was there that I sacrificed a finger."

Mr. Ackerman exhibited a bandaged hand, which he said had held the business end of a firecracker in a moment of absentmindedness, and after lighting it, he had stopped to make some offhand remark to one of the members of the party. As a result, one of his fingers was blown off.

ABOUT PARASOLS FIFTY YEARS AGO

The Advantage of the Modern Affair Over the Ancient Shade.

When men and women now fifty were small boys and girls parasols were made with hinged handles. Later came a time when those parasols went entirely out of use. supplanted by a modern parasols with solid sticks. Now folding handle parasols have come in again and there are now to be found also—they were never heard of in old times—folding handle umbrellas.

The handle of the old-fashioned folding parasols was secured and held in position when set straight by means of a sliding band, and unless this band fitted very nicely and snugly the handle was likely to wobble more or less. The modern folding handle umbrella or parasols has joints so made that when the umbrella is set up complete for use the joints are invisible and the whole handle is as rigid as a solid stick.

Instead of being held together when straightened out in place by a sliding band, the sections of the handle of a modern folding umbrella are screwed together.

But while in this modern revival of folding handle parasols and this present day production of folding, handle umbrellas the jointed handles are largely of this new form of constrnction; there is now made and sold a smaller folding handled parasols called a parasolette in which the old-fashioned sliding band to cover the joint in its stick near the top, so that its top when opened can be returned down against the stick, in which from it might in some circumstance be conveniently useful as a protection against the sun, one of the uses of the parasolette being found in driving. Closed, and with it handle folded, the parasolette is scarcely more bulky or cumbersome than a good sized folded fan, and so it can be conveniently carried.

There are now made for those who desire them umbrella cases of sole leather, the umbrella case, which is among the newer of the many and varied forms in which luggage equipment is nowadays to be found, being a slender and tapering but stout leather holder of size sufficient to contain a folding handle umbrella with the handle folded.—New York Sun.

A FAMILY OF MOONSHINERS.

How The Tusings Turned Corn Into Profit.

Deputy United States Marshal Brown left yesterday with Nathan Tusing for Hampshire county, where Tusing will spend at least five months in jail for distilling in the wilds of Hardy county. Judge Dayton also fined him $1000, but he declares he will never pay the money.

Nathan Tusing is a moonshiner by birth. His father was a moonshiner, and it is said that his grandfather engaged in the business. Nathan Tusing does not think there is any harm in making whiskey. He says he cannot draw a distinction between turning corn into whisky and turning it into chop feed. Of all the men who have distilled in Hardy county and that section of the county. Nathan Tusing probably went the longest before he was caught. It is said that he started in the business before he was of age, and he is now between 60 and 70 years old. He bought all the corn and chop in his county and turned into whisky and operated the largest stills known in the State.

The evidence before the court showed that he held a number of sales every year, but he was always fortunate enough to elude the officers. He would never hold a sale close his still, locating the selling place at least ten miles from the still. He would send the word around among the mountaineers of the sale, which was scheduled for midnight, and would last until 4 o'clock in the morning. It was a bad sale if he did not get rid of $500 worth of liquor.

SHORT STORIES OF LINCOLN.

They Were Homely and Old Fashioned and Full of Humor.

Lincoln's stories were never long, but they were always funny and laughter-provoking, and usually effective in their purpose of proving a point or answering an objection. There were homely and old fashioned which terms will express their general character. This is only natural and to be expected, in view of his rude surroundings in early life, before telegraph had done more than thread its slender way through the forests and over the prairies of our broad land, bringing in its later development the current news of the world for the enlightenment of the masses and calling for attention with each successive edition of the daily press. In those almost primitive days of our nation's history, the post-office, the country store, and the court house were the rendezvous, especially of the young men who, ten or twenty years later would be the leaders of public opinion; and around the blazing fire in these places of resorts during the winter days and nights, or on the street or sidewalk close by in the summer time, were congregated the talkers, listeners of the town, and the man who could hold his own in argument or command the attention of the crowd, whether politics, religion, or gossip was the topic of discussion, was the most ready with a story to illustrate a point of parallel some other story that had just commanded a general laugh. In these trials of wit and humor, Lincoln, from all accounts, must have been at the head of his class; and the habits thus formed held their grip upon him even to the end; for in his last public address, on the evening of April 11, 1865, which he delivered from the porch of the White House, and which I had the pleasure of listening to on my way home from the War Department, he made this remark concerning the progress of reconstruction measures in Louisiana: "Concede that the new government of Louisiana is only to what it should be as the egg is to the fowl, we shall sooner have the fowl by hatching the egg than by smashing it."

This form of argument left no sting behind it; and the opponents of his Louisiana reconstruction plan, at least those of his own political party, must have admitted later that his policy of "malice toward none; with charity for all," was superior to theirs.

A great many anecdotes and stories have been attributed to Lincoln. It is certain that not all so called were his. Indeed, it is probable that the most of them were not. As the years go by it is becoming more and more difficult to decide which are genuine—that is to say, those which originated with Lincoln or were known to have been repeated by him. Many stories said to be Lincoln's were no doubt his own by right of first calling; others may also be called his because of his apt selection and manner of telling, with his own unique wording and application: but it is probable that by far the larger number of stories now current are associated with his name merely because he happened to be present when they were told by some one else.

THESE CITIES AGAINST IT.

Municipal Ownership Turned Down In Various Places.

The voters of Colorado City have refused to sanction a bond issue for a municipal lighting plant.

The proposition to bond Willisville, Ill., for an electric light plant was defeated at a recent election.

The city council of South Sharon Pa., has decided not to issue bonds for an electric light plant.

Lake Forest, Ill., voted down the proposition to buy the works of the Lake Forest Water company. The vote stood 292 to 68.

The Pittsburg (Kan.) Headlight states that at a recent election the proposition to bond the city for the purchase of the waterworks was defeated by 836 to 303.

The Waterloo (Ia.) Reporter states that Strawberry Point, in that state, after employing experts to investigate the matter has decided against a municipal light plant and in favor of a franchise.

The final abandonment of municipal ownership by Muncie, Ind., is an assured fact. The machinery of the electric light plant, which broke down a year ago after being in operation fourteen years, has been sold at a fraction of its cost. The city had invested $36,000 in the plant.

Apparently the voters of Bryan, O., do not regard municipal ownership as so much of a success that they want more of it, for they have defeated an ordinance providing for a bond issue of $40,000 for the improvement of the lighting and water plants. This illustrates one of the evil results of the system, for the money was needed to equip the plants with new and more economical machinery.

Van W. Welsh, village clerk of Beverly, O., writes as follows in response to a request for the reasons for the sale by that village of its electric light plant: "Will say the greatest reason for selling the plant was that the village could get no satisfactory service from plant in the manner it was being handled. The plant has been sold to local parties with the hope of getting better service in the future."

Rutherford, N. J., has decided not to go into the lighting business. This decision was reached at a public meeting called by the mayor to act upon the report of a committee of citizens which had been for a year making a thorough investigation of the subject. The report was unfavorable to the establishment of either a gas or an electric light plant and stated that a study of the subject showed that "there have been more failures than successes." There was no hostility to municipal ownership as a theory, but a grave doubt as to its practicability.

GETTING READY TO SELL.

Valley City, N. D., and Souderton, Pa., Tired of Their Electric Lighting Plants.

Valley City, N. D., has decided by a vote of nearly three to one to sell its electric light plant, every ward in the city voting in favor of the sale. In explaining the cause of this action a local banker writes that, like most such enterprises, the Valley City plant "has become a burden to the city" and has been furnishing poor lights for the past two years. For this reason and because of increasing prices many have deserted the service.

The dissatisfaction with the service has been growing a long time. Two attempts were made to dispose of it three years ago. The first bids were rejected as being too low. The next bid, accepted by the council, was not in accordance with the specifications, and another bidder secured an injunction restraining the sale. Many business houses have installed private gasoline lighting systems of their own.

According to the Electrical World, the town council of Souderton, Pa., is considering the proposition of abandoning the borough electric light plant and purchasing electricity to operate the borough lighting system, the West Telford Electric company having offered to furnish electric energy at a lower price than the borough can manufacture it.

Why Committee Reported Adversely.

An unfavorable report on municipal ownership was made to the city council of Kaukauna, Wis., by an aldermanic committee that visited Bellefontaine, Columbus, Richmond, Reeseville and Evansville. Alderman Martin said the lighting plant at Bellefontaine cost $73,000; that the city owes $322,000 bonded debts and has a tax rate of 4 per cent. The city owns waterworks, gas and electric lighting plants, conducts extensive improvements and pays its public officials high salaries for tending the plants.

Alderman Martin further says that in other cities, in the effort to make a good showing, plants are allowed to run down until the amount they are bonded for would not be covered by the present value of the property.—Municipal Journal and Engineer.

Covering Up Wastefulness.

The present evil of municipal ownership is the extravagance of political management of industries. This is generally masked by putting part of the cost on the taxpayers by borrowing money on the credit of the city or spending it out of the general revenues. The ultimate and oppressive evil of municipal ownership as illustrated in the history of British provincial cities is the steady progress toward bankruptcy made by continually increasing the city's debt to render all kinds of service to the public at a constant loss, continually made up by taxation and borrowing till the city's credit is gone.—From an Editorial in Minneapolis Tribune.

AN EXPERT'S ANSWER

Why Cities Cannot Get Good Men to Run Their Plants.

The Superintendent of a Municipally Owned Electric Light Works Tells How He Was Overruled by "the Board" on Many Points—M. O. "Practically Wrong, and Results Prove It."

The question is often asked by defenders of municipal ownership why cities cannot secure and retain to operate their plants as good men as private concerns have in their employ. An answer is suggested by the following letter from the superintendent of a municipal plant, which was printed in a recent issue of the Engineer:

"Some time ago I bumped into what I call 'peanut legislation.' I took charge of a lighting and pumping plant owned by a city. The plant consisted of two very good water tube boilers, 125 horsepower each; a 14 by 18 inch semi-Corliss engine, a 100 kilowatt generator, two pumps 8 and 12 by 8¼ inches with a twelve inch stroke, a 6 and 4 by 6 inch feed pump, a 600 gallon steam fire engine and a board of public works. I was supposed to have charge of the entire plant, but not of the board, but it was necessary to take charge of it at first.

"The plant was less than a year old and after the fashion of municipal plants had already obtained a good start on the road to rack and ruin. The engine pounded and had in less than a year's time imbibed ten barrels of oil, in spite of an oil filter's efforts. Probably the waste oil made fires a bit hotter. The boilers were scandalously dirty both inside and outside, and the grate surface was one-third larger than was necessary to carry the peak load. An open feed water heater did business to the tune of 100 degrees Fahrenheit. The pumps had been denied proper lubrication and loudly proclaimed the fact. Fully one-fifth of the electric service meters were out of business and customers paying a minimum rate as a result. Water services were not metered at all, and customers used water as they pleased, at such times as they found most convenient, regardless of sprinkling hours, and in some cases paid what they pleased or not at all.

"After these things had been severally and collectively attended to the coal heaving was cut squarely in two, the oil pouring divided by 10 and the receipts almost doubled. In fact, a plant which had been losing money on a winter load was more than running even in April. ### Illogical Municipal Ownership Talk.

Loose thinking and careless writing are responsible for a lot of the trouble that we mortals bring upon ourselves. Take, for instance, the following editorial paragraph, which appeared in the Buffalo Times:

"The doctrine of municipal ownership rests upon the broad principle of republican self government. To say that a community is incompetent to own and operate the means of transportation of its citizens, for instance, is about as sensible as to assert that a nation is unfit to fight its own battles or that it should farm out its armies and navies to private individuals or trusts to wage war with."

If for "transportation" in the above paragraph we substitute "housing, clothing and feeding," it would be quite as logical. Self government has nothing to do with the providing by state or city of the necessaries or luxuries of life.

AN EXPERT'S ANSWER

Why Cities Cannot Get Good Men to Run Their Plants.

The Superintendent of a Municipally Owned Electric Light Works Tells How He Was Overruled by "the Board" on Many Points—M. O. "Practically Wrong, and Results Prove It."

The question is often asked by defenders of municipal ownership why cities cannot secure and retain to operate their plants as good men as private concerns have in their employ. An answer is suggested by the following letter from the superintendent of a municipal plant, which was printed in a recent issue of the Engineer:

"Some time ago I bumped into what I call 'peanut legislation.' I took charge of a lighting and pumping plant owned by a city. The plant consisted of two very good water tube boilers, 125 horsepower each; a 14 by 18 inch semi-Corliss engine, a 100 kilowatt generator, two pumps 8 and 12 by 8¼ inches with a twelve inch stroke, a 6 and 4 by 6 inch feed pump, a 600 gallon steam fire engine and a board of public works. I was supposed to have charge of the entire plant, but not of the board, but it was necessary to take charge of it at first.

"The plant was less than a year old and after the fashion of municipal plants had already obtained a good start on the road to rack and ruin. The engine pounded and had in less than a year's time imbibed ten barrels of oil, in spite of an oil filter's efforts. Probably the waste oil made fires a bit hotter. The boilers were scandalously dirty both inside and outside, and the grate surface was one-third larger than was necessary to carry the peak load. An open feed water heater did business to the tune of 100 degrees Fahrenheit. The pumps had been denied proper lubrication and loudly proclaimed the fact. Fully one-fifth of the electric service meters were out of business and customers paying a minimum rate as a result. Water services were not metered at all, and customers used water as they pleased, at such times as they found most convenient, regardless of sprinkling hours, and in some cases paid what they pleased or not at all.

"After these things had been severally and collectively attended to the coal heaving was cut squarely in two, the oil pouring divided by 10 and the receipts almost doubled. In fact, a plant which had been losing money on a winter load was more than running even in April. The next year the rate per kilowatt hour was cut from 10 cents to 8 1-10 cents, with the character of the service much improved. Mark me not, I pray you, for conceit, but rather as a narrator of plain, unvarnished truth. During all this time the board was 'skidoo 23.' What happened just about that time? ## MARYLAND'S VOTE.

When the Baltimore Sun, the leading Democratic newspaper in Maryland admits that the party is in bad shape it is not worth while for the small fry to make much of a kick. The Sun of yesterday in a long editorial frankly says the Democratic party in this state has very slim chance, at the present showing of winning in the gubernatorial contest this fall. Here is what the Sun says:

"At the last election in this state, that of November, 1906, the following counties gave Democratic majorities:

"Baltimore, 1,996; Caroline, 32; Carroll, 109; Queen Anne's 139; Worcester, 334; Howard, 566—six counties in all.

"The followihg counties gave Republican majorities:

"Alleghany, 1,438; Anne Arundel, 1,382; Calvert, 657; Charles, 1.048; St. Mary's 637; Cecil, 13; Frederick, 1,506; Garrett, 765; Harford, 89; Wicomico, 235; Montogomery, 191, Prince George's 738; Somerset, 938, Kent, 147; Talbot, 525; Dorchester, 1,090; Washington, 1,-094.

"Seventeen counties went Republican and six counties Democratic. The 17 Republican counties gave an aggregate majority of 12,403. The six Democratic counties gave an aggregate majority of 3,176, leaving a net Republican majority over the Democratic in all the counties of the State of 9,227.

"Every county on the Eastern Shore but Queen Anne's and Caroline went Republican. Every county in Southern Maryland was Republican. Every county in Western Maryland, except Carroll, was Republican. Baltimore city gave a Democratic majority of only 2,327. It is well understood, of course, that the election of November, 1906, was for Congressmen; that it was not a State election; that the issues were national and not State. But the result had a significance which should be considered practical, for it revealed the existence of certain political conditions in Maryland that are suggestive, to say the least. Is there any improvement in the present condition of the party since last fall? It is understood that the Eastern Shore was liberally financed for the Republicans by Congressman Jackson last November. In fact, Congressman Jackson admitted it. It is rumored that he aspires to the United States Senate, and politicians except that he will be equally liberal in his financing this year. If this is true, there is no reason to suppose that the result on the Eastern Shore will not be the same, unless the Democrats nominate an exceptionally strong ticket and conduct an exceptionally vigorous campaign. When it comes to financing an election and distributing among the voters what Congressman Mudd facetiously terms "campaign literature" there is no one in the Democratic party in this State who can compete with Mr. Jackson, even if it were proper to attempt competition of that sort."

Devoting some space to factional conditions of the party in the various lower counties, the Sun continues:

"From this analysis of the situation the most hopeful and enthusiastic Democrat will be forced to admit that if the Democratic party is to win in the coming election, all divisions and dissensions must cease and the party must enter the field under the strongest and most aggressive leaders that can be found. As the situation stands today, the Democratic party must depend almost entirely upon Baltimore city to elect the candidate for Governor and other State offices. The Republican party is under the leadership of adroit and resourceful politicians. It has the support of the Federal Administration frankly and openly given. It is likely its treasury will be full to overflowing."

Things are also in bad shape in Baltimore city, "essential to Democratic victory," says the Sun, concluding its honest and manly exposition as follows:

"In the little more than three weeks the State convention will assemble. It it is getting to be high time for public sentiment to center upon some proper candidate for Governor. And the candidate to be nominated should be one who can be trusted to carry Baltimore city by a substantial majority, who can redeem the Eastern Shore and who can keep down the Republican majorities in Republican counties. If the various factions of the Democratic party will get together behind a strong ticket and will make an aggressive, enthusiastic and determined campaign there is no reason why it should not sweep the State. But without such harmony on the part of the leaders and with a ticket that does not appeal to all classes of Democrats, it is evident from the cold, impartial election figures cited in the earlier part of this article that it would have little chance of success."

The Ancient Art Of Helping Yourself.

Ever go to a Sunday school picnic when you were a boy? Course you did.

Remember how all the women folks used to spread the tablecloths end to end on the grass, then dump 'em thick with the best eatables you ever ate? My! Fried chicken 'bout every two foot, with roll jelly cake in between. Well, yes!

Recollect how the Superintendent would stick his handkerchief under his collar and say cheerfully:

"Now all help yourself!"

Then everybody fell to and helped himself. If you were a timid boy and held back till all the chicken was gobbled up, you regretted it—you regret it still. You didn't help yourself, and nobody else helped you.

Remember that picnic when the gang of fellows from the city happened along and lit into the fried fowl? City chaps are always hungry. They helped themselves, and there wasn't anything left for the town boys but the bones.

Life is a picnic. Not a Sunday school picnic—not exactly. But it's a picnic dinner all the same. The feast is spread for you. Everybody help himself now!

SUPPOSE YOU'RE A MERCHANT IN THIS TOWN. THERE'S FRIED CHICKEN AND ROLL JELLY CAKE ALL AROUND YOU, BUT YOU LET THE CITY CROWD COME IN AND SNATCH IT RIGHT FROM UNDER YOUR NOSE. ALL YOU GET IS THE BONES AND SCRAPS.

The city fellows are helping themselves. They reach out long fingers—the mail order monthly and the price catalogue—and pick up the choice bits. Why don't you try a few fingers of advertising in your local paper, dive in ahead of the gang from outside, get there first and help yourself to the chicken?

"Now all help yourself!"

PENCILINGS BY THE WAY.

Graphic, Descriptive Account of the West by U. G. Palmer.

Reno, Nev., July 2, 1907.

Reno is a hustling town of 12,000 to 15,000 people, the distributary center for a section af Nevada as large as the the state of Maryland, abounding in mines, ranches and farms. The trip west from Reno is the one "we read about." This is where the Union Pacific Railroad crosses the Sierra Mountains, travelling for miles and miles through snow sheds. The track follows the Truckee river to its source, a rugged mountain stream, furnishing water for irrigation and power for manufacturing.

The mountains have been covered here with tall and stately timber and many pulp and paper mills are to be seen. One in particular attracted my attention because of the fact that its power is developed by huge turbine water wheels, the water coming to the plant with apparently 50 feet fall through a pipe line made of lumber, like a barrel girded with hoops made of round iron not over one foot apart and carrying a stream of water ten feet in diameter. There are several beautiful lakes near the top of the Sierras which afforded the finest kind of fishing and hunting for the summer people during the season. While the highest point on the railroad does not exceed 7,000 feet between Reno and Frisco, still we travel several hundred feet above the snow line and today, July 2, riding along in a beautiful summer sun, we pass through snow on both sides of the track for fully an hour, from one to ten feet deep. No wonder that snow sheds are an essential to railroad operation in January when it is one of the enforced luxuries of July.

I noticed that our train consisted of 14 cars and two engines and a peculiar difference between Eastern and Western railroad operation is that here the second engine helps the passenger train down the muontain as well as up. Some idea of the abruptness of the descent may be gained from the fact that the rims of the wheels and the brake shoes smoke like "hot boxes" and at one stop a boy passenger amused the travelers by lighting pieces of newspaper from the brake shoes.

On the west side of the mountains are seen the results of gigantic schemes of hydraulic mining for gold, where whole mountains have been washed down and through sluices to catch the precious metal. One thing that impressed me here and also in the Rockies is the elegant system of public roads; hundreds and hundreds of miles, every rod of which is superior to the Oakland-Deer Park Road.

San Francisco, Cal., July 12, 1907.

The most wonderful city I have yet visited is Los Angeles, and San Francisco must guard her laurels zealously or Los Angeles will snatch from her the supremacy of the Pacific. With only about 100,000 peaple in 1900 she now has over 250,000, rivaling Denver and almost equaling Washington.

While Washington is beyond question the most beautiful city on the American continent, had Los Angeles one fifth as much spent on its parks and public buildings it would far surpass Washington. The flowers, drives, parks and gardens are simply perfect. How beautiful to one unaccustomed to such sights are the low broad concrete and adobe residences of a Japanese and bungalow style of architecture and surrounded by gigantic ferns, cacti, magnolias, palms and other prolific eudogens. While it is seemingly an over grown town, with so few skyscrapers and so many low buildings, even the United States post office being a one story stone and brick, yet it has all the advantages of the most cosmopolitan city. I notice that it has 35 banks with $100,-000,000 of deposits. It spent $20,000,000 last year in new buildings. Think of it! Twenty-five miles of new buildings! It has 250 miles of electric roads within the city limits and 500 of interurban roads, employing 3000 men and disbursing $1,800,000 annually for labor. It has three great lines of steam railroads, 5000 employees of which live in and around the city and who receive in wages more than seven and one half millions of dollars per annum. It has 3,720 acres of public parks, than which there certainly cannot be found more beautiful ones anywhere. One of these embraces 3,000 acres and is said to be the largest municipal park in the world.

Allow me to digress here and relate one of the most delighted little incidents of my whole journey. Sunday afternoon, I took a trolley and took and went out to Woodside Park and there I met Mr. B. B. Savage and his sister, Miss Della, former Garrett county people. Happening as it did, an absolute surprise, made it all the more pleasing. Many of THE REPUBLICAN readers will remenber Miss Savage as one of Garrett's best teachers during the year I was superintendent of the schools and Mr. Savage has a host of relatives and friends scattered all over the county.

The hoteis and rooming houses have accommodations for 60,000 guests; and prices, my, a person can live here "cheaper than at home." For 35 cents you can get as much as for 50 cents on the Atlantic slope or $1.50 at Tonopah and Goldfields. And just see what a production the territory has of which Los Angeles is the shipping point. Last year it produced 350 carloads of Cauliflower; 450 carloads of raisins and dried fruits; 1200 carloads of canned goods; 2500 carloads of celery; 30,000 carloads of oranges and lemons.

Think of it, carloads!

It also produced 400 tons of cheese 6500 tons of nuts; 2500 tons of butter; 35,000 tons of beet sugar. It also produced 200,000 gallons of pickled olives; 1,250,000 gallons of olive oil; 1,200,000 gallons of wine and brandy; 200,000 barrels of beer; 400,000 barrels of flour; 30,000,000 barrels of petroleum.

These figures are official although apparently incredible; surely this is a great country of ours and the Pacific slope is doing her share to add to its greatness. All hats off to Los Angeles

U. G. PALMER.

A Wonderful Genius Gone.

Mr. Hiram P. Tasker has just received from the United States patent office at Washington, D. C., lithographic copies of the detailed drawings and specifications for eleven patents granted to his son, Vernon Compton Tasker, now deceased.

These patents are for "improvements" in the breech loading mechanism of "Rapid Fire Guns," all of which have been approved and adopted by the ordnance department of the United States army and navy. All guns hereafter manufactured for the government, either in Europe or America, are required by the contracts, to contian the "Tasker Improvements." Some ten years ago, Compton organized the United States Ordnance Company and established his offices in the Home Life Building, Washington, D. C., where he secured contracts from the government to supply the army and navy with improved rapid fire guns, shells, ammunition, etc. The business of the United Ordnance Co. is still being conducted by A. Y. Leech, Jr., a confidential and trusted friend of "poor Compton's."

Mr. Tasker hereby extends a cordial invitation to the many schoolmates and friends of "poor Compton" to call at his room, No. 8, Hotel Manhattan, Oakland, Md., and examine these evidences of the results of Compton's wonderful inventive genius, brainwork, handicraft and will power.

After the death of his mother last fall, his only sister, Mrs. Reed Hanna, went into spasms and her life was dispaired of. Here Compton's big hearted generosity and affection asserted themselves. In order to save the life of his sister he sacrificed his own. For many years Compton's left lung was affected with tuberculosis, superinduced, so the specialists say, by drinking the milk of cows affected by that dreadful malady. After the prostration of his sister, Miss Wilson of Calvert county, their cousin and faithful nurse, accompanied them both—"Babe" and Compton—on a long trip to the health resorts of Mexico and the southern states. On their return they took a steamer at New Orleans for a trip up the Mississippi river. When between Natchez, Miss., and Memphis, Tenn., all the doctors on the boat were called to Compton's hammock. Among the number was Dr. Johnson, of Cumberland, Md., who stood by his side when he died.

My reason for publishing these facts is to avoid the necessity of answering so many questions on a subject that is exceedingly painful and distressing to me. Very truly yours,

HIRAM P. TASKER.

N. B.—I forget to say that several years ago Compton visited all the large gun works at Essen, London, Paris, etc., and produced patents for his invention in England, Germany and France. The United States Ordnance Co., of which he was president and chief stock holder, will hereafter receive royalties on all guns made in those countries. It is a sad and melancholy reflection that after he had climbed to the very topmost rung of the ladder in his profession, that he should be stricken down in the zenth of his glory and usefulness.

TO BE TWO PRIMARIES.

One in authority to speak says that there will be two county primaries this year. The first one will be held soon in order to elect delegates to the state convention to nominate a governor for the Republican party which will be held in Baltimore in early Augest. At this same time there will be made an effort to have the county committee secured for the next two years, so that it may be approved by the state convention.

The convention for the nomination of candidates for the county offices will not be held until in the fall, probably September. It is thought that if the campaign is short that it also will be sweet; that if it is brief there will result more harmony and a more vigorous campaign by the aspirants for the various offices to be filled this fall.

EDUCATION GOES A-BEGGING.

A few weeks ago a competitive examination was held in the Oakland school house in order to award a scholarship to St. Mary's Seminary, in St. Mary's county. The school is an excellent one, and yet there was but one young lady in the county of Garrett who showed enough desire for a larger education to come forward and try to win the reward. Surely in this day in this section there are many who do not prize sufficiently the advantages of an education which the State offers free to the young men and women within its borders.

It is not true that in all sections of the State, however, that there is but one who tries to win a free scholarship. In many of our counties there are often fifteen or twenty young people who try to win when one is about to be awarded. Yet in our county of Garrett there are seldom more that three of either who try to secure one of these opportunities to be educated free by a high institution of learning.

There is not a man or woman in all of the United States who has reached the age of thirty years who would regret if he or she had a better education. No, not one. Every day makes it more difficult for the uneducated person to make a living. It is true that men and women have lived in days gone by who were practically unlearned at all, yet who won both renown and fame. Those men and women, however, lived in another year than 1907 and 1925; as the days go by, everyone sees that the person with an education has great advantages over the ignorant. In these years the strongest competitors of every man and woman are educated. Therefore it behooves every boy and girl today to seize every opportunity for self-improvement, for education, in order that they may be better fitted to meet on equal grounds the men and women with whom they will live and with whom they will compete in 1925.

Surely, there should be more than one try to win a scholarship which gives the privilege of being educated without costing practically a cent.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MISS MAGGIE STEVENS.

Miss Maggie Stevens died at the home of her mother, Mrs. E. F. Stevens, in Oakland, on Thursday, July 11th. She was buired Saturday morning in the Oakland cemetery, the funeral exercises being conducted by Rev. J. B. Workman, of the Methodist Church. The deceased was a little over 44 years of age, and is survived by a mother, four brothers and three sisters, one of brothers being Mr. David Stevens of Oakland.

Resolved, That the above named persons are hereby elected to membership in the Junior League through life or good behavior.

NEW DEPOT FOR GRAFTON.

Information Has Been Received That the Plans Have Been Approved by Fitzgerald.

It has been asserted on good authority that Grafton is to have a new freight depot. This depot will be located where the present one stands but will be so arranged that the entrance will be much better. It has been proposed that the building be a two story one with the freight department on the second floor and the general offices on the first floor, with an elevator running from the first to the second floor. The entrance for wagons will be from Latrobe street. There will be a bridge running from this street to the building.

The old wholesale building owned by the Pugh-Beavers Grocery company and which was formerly occupied by the Ruhl-Koblegard Co., will be bought or leased by the railroad company for the storage of freight. This will also have an entrance on Latrobe street. The estimated cost of this building is in the neighborhood of $20,000.

FOOT CRUSHED OFF BY TRAIN

Dennis Grady, of Swanton, Falls in Attempting to Board Car.

Dennis Grady, aged 18 years, of Swanton, Md., fell under a Western Maryland railroad freight train he was attempting to get on, at Westernport, near Hoban's livery stable, Friday evening about 8:30 o'clock, and had his right foot crushed off at the ankle. Dr. Z. T. Kalbaugh rendered the young man aid and Mr. Grady was taken to Cumberland on the Baltimore and Ohio passenger train No. 12 and taken to a hospital. He formerly worked at the tin-plate mills in South Cumberland, where it is stated he lost several fingers. An amputation of the crushed foot was performed at the Western Hospital by Drs. Twigg and Wiley, of Cumberland and Dr. Kirk, of Paw Paw W. Va.,

NEW KIND OF POSTAL CARD.

Users May Write on Face Side and Attach Sheet of Paper.

Post-master General Meyer promulgated an order, effective August 1, providing that the face side of a postal card may be divided by a vertical line placed approximately one-third of the distance from the left end of the card; the space to the left of the line to be used for a message, and the portion to the right to be used for the address only.

A very thin sheet of paper may be attached, if it completely adheres to the card and such a paster may bear both writing and printing, advertisements, illustrations, or writing may appear on the back of the card, and on the third of the face. Postal cards bearing particles of glass, metal mica, sand, tinsel or other substance are declared to be unmailable.

The Night Errand of a Knight Errant.

By JEANNETTE H. WALWORTH.

Copyright, 1906, by James Schreiber.

THE Panola people are exclusive. So are the mountain peaks. Both are lonely. Also both inspire awe in the beholder.

There are five of the Panola people to share the exclusiveness and the loneliness they have elected to maintain, a mother and four daughters. The mother looks as young as the youngest daughter, and the youngest daughter looks as old as the oldest. The entire group has a contemporaneous appearance. They talk contemporaneously, and they think in a batch. They have the effect of being preserved in amber for the consideration of future students of their kind. They would well repay the cost of the amber and the labor of preservation. They are the peculiar product of a day that is done.

Locally they are always spoken of as "the Panola ladies." Panola is the Indian word for cotton. As their lands are given over to the exclusive cultivation of that staple the name stands justified. Even in their industries, you will perceive, they were exclusive.

Whenever the demands of the larder render it imperative that provisions shall be conveyed from the store to the plantation two of the young ladies go for them. It is not at all easy to decide whether it is the youngest two or the oldest.

It was on one such occasion that Bixby, the storekeeper, bubbling over with the best intentions, gave some advice and invited his doom. Few people ever ventured to advise the St. John Daltons. No one ever did it successfully.

In a spirit of veiled apology for the meagerness of the purchases he was stowing under the seat of their old buggy, one of the young ladies thus plaintively alluded to the stringency of the money market:

"What with our cabins out of repair and the restlessness of tenants it is impossible to keep such a large estate as ours in proper condition at the present price of cotton."

Bixby beamed benevolently upon the two pinched aristocrats, blundered and fell from grace: "Right you are, my dear young ladies. But, I say, why not cut the blarsted old place up into small farms and sell 'em off to darkies? You could keep enough right around the house to do for a garden and a corn patch for old Highflyer here and live in clover on the proceeds of the rest."

The stiff leathern reins were gathered more tightly by the small, thin hand of the driver. Her finger tips showed through the frayed fingers of her gloves. The flash of a diamond ring pierced the third finger of the old gloves. Its wearer looked vaguely over Bixby's head:

"Did you put up 10 cents' worth of laundry soap, Mr. Bixby?"

Bixby quailed before her frigid glare, but answered meekly, "Yessum."

"And a package of cooking soda?"

"Best bi-carb. Soda's all right."

"Thank you. That is all this morning. Get up, Highflier."

After the manner of a woman practiced in rubbing things in, the storekeeper's wife added a last drop to his cup of bitterness:

"Maybe some of these days, Bixby, you'll know enough to save your breath to cool your porridge. When folks gets to giving advice to them St.

"RIGHT YOU ARE, MY DEAR YOUNG LADIES."

John Daltons it's time for the cows to come home with butter on their horns. Come to your dinner, Reuben."

She had found him conferring affably with a strange man. From Mrs. Bixby's point of view measureless possibilities of iniquity attached to every strange man.

"Ladies from top to toe," Bixby was saying, "but in a fair way to come to actual want with silver and gold enough tucked away in jewelry and tableware to keep them in comfort all the rest of their days."

"How about the men of the family?" the strange man asked with what Mrs. Bixby declared "vicious alertness."

"Got none. Father and two boys picked off at Chickamauga. Mother writes poetry about 'em and about old times. Daughters scuffle round some sort of fashion to keep body and soul together."

"How far do they live from here?"

"About three miles straight back todes the swamp. A lonesomer spot never was. Hanged if I don't think it's a deadly risk for a lot of unprotected females to be livin' in such a place with no locks and no men folks."

At which juncture Mrs. Bixby had appeared on the store gallery and given her peremptory invitation to dinner with such an accompaniment of frowns that Bixby accepted it without delay. When they reached the family quarters behind the store Mrs. Bixby turned upon her spouse to rend him.

"Heaven help you, Reuben Bixby, for a first class idiot! For you to up and tell a strange man, from the Lord only knows where, exactly how he can help himself to all he wants out at Panola. If they are every one of them murdered in their beds tonight, poor creatures, they will have you to thank for it."

Bixby's flesh turned rough with terror. He blanched at the picture of his wife's drawing. She beamed her satisfaction at results.

"So you begin to see it, do you?" she went on.

He began to see it. In great distress of soul he took counsel with his bookkeeper. What should he do to prevent those five innocent aristocrats from being murdered in their beds or, to them a much worse fate, being despoiled of their ancestral belongings, the things which were more than meat or raiment to them?

Bixby's bookkeeper was young. More than that, he had long entertained a hopeless adoration for the youngest of the Miss Daltons. He was fired with the chivalric resolve to protect the whole batch of Panola ladies from the possible consequences of Bixby's indiscretion.

By the time his own supper was disposed of that night the bookkeeper's plans were perfected. He would drop in at Brent's, where the fellow had left his sample trunks, and find out what he was about. It was clearly his duty not to lose sight of the villain. But at Brent's, where a laughing story telling group of knights of the road were filling the air with smoke and chatter, that particular drummer was not to be found.

The inference was plain and blood curdling! He had already started for Panola with heaven only knew what diabolical schemes in his head. Interception then must be his own role. It was a good three miles' tramp along a dark and muddy lane, but immortal glory awaited him at the other end. "The fellow" must have had a good start of him. There were no signs of the villain anywhere. Not even when he reached the much bepatched fence about the Panola house were there any signs of travel in that direction save the footprints he was himself leaving in the heavy mud.

Under that lichen covered roof slumbered five timid, helpless females, all of them lovely, one of them adorable. They would never know it, for he, their guardian angel, would steal away with the first gray shaft of dawn, having kept vigil over their slumbers through all the hours of darkness.

Or, greater glory yet, he might fall a victim to his chivalric duties. With a shuddering sense of his own inferiority he recalled the stalwart proportions of the inquisitive villain. But to die in defense of such a creature—his soul clung to the singular number—would be bliss provided he might only hear her say before his last gasp, "Jonas, live for me!" which of course he would politely decline doing.

As a group the Panola ladies were interesting. As an individual Miss Maude was absorbing. He had never yet addressed her as an individual. She knew him only as a fetcher and carrier of brown paper parcels from Bixby's shelves to their buggy.

The world had doled out happiness to Jonas with but a niggard's hand. But tonight he would wipe out all old scores. He groped his way through the wreck of a highly ornate front gate. He advanced boldly up the broken brick walk. As the villain had not preceded him he was still to arrive. Fortune had given him the field. Tonight he was only Bixby's clerk. Tomorrow he would be—

Bang!

He spun about, with his hand to his pistol pocket. Where was the miscreant?

Bang! Bang!

Heavens! Those shots came from behind those faithless doors. The miscreant had already effected his entrance.

Bang! Bang! Bang!

There must be twenty men there. He promptly put a tree between himself and annihilation.

As the smoke of this one sided battle cleared away a gentle unshaken voice floated across the intervening space charged with inquiry:

"Kindly let us know who that is skulking behind that pecan tree. Speak distinctly, please, so that no mistake shall be made between foe or friend before we fire again."

Bixby's bookkeeper preferred not to speak at all. He was making a mental map of the premises he had traversed with a view to strategic movements toward the rear. Again that sweet unshaken voice:

"Please let us know who that is behind our pecan tree. We do not want to hurt any one, but we ought to tell you that there are still three loaded pistols on hand."

A dim vision of flying legs and fluttering coat skirts was vouchsafed the fair garrison briefly. The big gate groaned on its rusty hinges impelled by a wild push. There was nothing but a straw hat left on the battlefield.

With a momentary disregard of values, Miss Maude Dalton laid her still smoking pistol down upon a priceless Florentine table. She glanced at the weapon frowningly.

"I must take it to pieces tomorrow. It is getting hard on trigger. Rusty from disuse, I suppose."

The oldest Miss Dalton picked the weapon up and wiped off the Florentine table carelessly with the sleeve of the wrapper she had drawn over her nightgown.

"Maudie, you show our dear old table no more respect than if it were kitchen deal."

Miss Maude followed her sister's movements abstractedly. "I do wish we knew who it was," she said.

The five St. John Daltons laughed contemporaneously and contemptuously.

"Some one who has yet to find out that women can protect themselves in the hour of need. Mamma, dear, I do hope this untimely disturbance will not give you one of your bad headaches," said the eldest.

Bixby's clerk stopped in at Brent's tavern on his way back to the store. He really felt the need of something to quiet his nerves. Moreover, he might incidentally learn something about the movements of that fellow. Agitation, disappointment and perplexity struggled for the supremacy in his knightly bosom. The night clerk at Brent's bar must have made the toddy Jonas ordered unusually strong, or perhaps fatigue did it. He fell asleep on the cane settee soon after imbibing it.

When he awoke it was midnight, and the inquisitive villain was giving an order to the night clerk. Bixby's bookkeeper was intensely wide awake in half a second. His tired eyes opened to their fullest capacity when he discovered in the fellow's hand the straw hat which he was last conscious of as it had dropped from his fleeing head.

The fellow came over and seated himself by the dazed owner of the hat.

HE DISCOVERED IN THE FELLOW'S HAND HIS STRAW HAT.

He passed a long gentlemanly hand gently over its soiled ribbon as he said:

"I picked this up in the Panola front yard a little while back, and as it is not likely I shall be going back to Mr. Bixby's perhaps you will be so good as to leave it on his counter so that the owner may find it."

The baffled knight errant fell into the trap. "Then it was you that fired all those shots?" he asked.

A demure smile wrinkled the corners of the "fellow's" lips. "I? No, I am afraid I cannot claim the laurels of this occasion. I suspect it was my cousin Maude," he said.

The jaws of his hearer dropped disconsolately. Your what?"

"My cousin and, as it will be generally known by tomorrow night, my fiancee."

"The devil! A St. John Dalton marry a drummer?"

"As to that, she might and never regret it. In point of fact, she is not."

"But those three big sample trunks?"

"Contain Miss Dalton's trousseau. I am treating you with great confidence, you perceive, because I have a favor to ask of you. In some mysterious way I have lost the box containing the wedding ring. Girls are so superstitious about such things that I did not care to let Miss Dalton know of my arrival until the ring I have telegraphed for reaches here by the boat. I stepped up on Bixby's gallery just after my cousins had driven away, and the talk there going on made me uneasy, so as I had to ride out to the landing to send my telegram I came back by way of Panola."

"And was there when I"—

This time the "fellow" permitted himself a well bred laugh.

"No, 'pon honor, the girls did it all before I got there. But it was a matter of some speculation while I was there as to why you did not answer when you were spoken to. You see, the name in your hat gave you away."

"Oh, dear! And I went there to protect them against you."

"Really? That was tremendously kind of you."

The little bookkeeper was red and writhing. "But you said you had a favor to ask of me," he stammered.

"Yes. The ring ought to come up by boat at daybreak. It will come to Bixby's care. Would you be so good as to see that I get it by 6 o'clock in the morning?"

A Seasonable Wish.

Mrs. Outatown—Jack, dear, they say that new neighbor of ours is a frightful somnambulist. Last night he got up in his sleep and milked his cow.

Mr. Outatown—Is that so? I wish he'd wander over here and mow our lawn.—Houston Post.

WON'T DO IT AGAIN.

The Barbers Said a Thing or Two About Their Customer.

Quietly entering a barber's shop, the stranger removed his hat and coat and, taking a card from his pocket, wrote on it:

"I want to be shaved."

A barber stepping forward read the card and, pointing to a chair, said to his brother artist:

"Deaf as a brass kettle and dumb as an oyster."

The man straightened himself out in the chair when his manipulator began lathering his face.

"This deaf cuss has a cheek like a stone wall," he said, when a general laugh followed.

"Stick a pin in him and see if he is entirely dumb," said another.

The victim remaining undisturbed, the following shots were fired at him by the delighted tonsorial artists:

"He needs a shampoo. His head is dirtier than a public house doormat."

"Shave him with a stool leg. Don't spoil your razor on that stubble."

"Gracious, what a guy! He'd make a good bird frightener."

"He ought to rent that nose for a locomotive headlight," etc.

While all these complimentary allusions were flying about him the operation of shaving was finished, and the man arose, put on his coat and then, turning to the astonished barber, said:

"How much for the shave and compliments?"

"I—I—I—I" gasped the astonished man. "Oh, nothing—nothing—call again—excuse"— And as the stranger left the shop the discomfited barbers swore that they would never believe in a deaf and dumb man again until they had first fired a ten pound cannon about his ears.—Boston Herald.

The Associated Charities.

A lady whose cook had suddenly taken her departure went in search of another whose address had been given to her.

Reaching the alley, she rapped at the door, which was opened by a portly colored woman. A still larger one was occupying a rocking chair in the room. The lady stated her errand.

"No'm, I isn't 'tendin' to wuk dis yer winter. I's gwine to rest."

"Then perhaps you know some one who would like the place?"

"No'm. Fac' is, de cullud ladies in dis alley all means to tek a rest. We goes to de 'sassinated charities fo' what we wants."—Woman's Home Companion.

To Be Exact.

"What's that sign you're making there?" asked the grocer.

"'Fresh Eggs.'" replied the new clerk.

"H'm! Make it read, 'Fresh Laid Eggs,' while you're about it."

"What for? Everybody knows the eggs were fresh when they were laid."

"Just so, and that's all it's safe for us to say about them."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Ready to Sacrifice Himself.

"I suppose," said the beautiful girl, "you believe in art for art's sake?"

"Yes," replied the painter, "but I'd be willing to give it up if I were to marry a rich woman and she insisted on having me live for her alone."—Chicago Record-Herald.

Lifelike.

Lytsute—So poor Jones, the toymaker, has gone out of his mind!

Stryppes—Yes. He had been busy for three months on a mechanical tramp, and he couldn't get it to work.—Ally Sloper.

But Against the Grain.

"What did Plunger say when you accused him of being in that wheat deal?"

"He tried to deny it, but I made him acknowledge the corn."—Minneapolis Journal.

All Broke.

"I wonder why the poets always speak of the breaking waves?"

"I guess they must have spent a few weeks at a seaside resort."—Brooklyn Life.

The Remedy.

Is your nose turned up or down?
Massage it.
Wears your brow a constant frown?
Massage it.
Is your neck a scrawny rope
With a henlike forward slope?
Do not grieve or give up hope—
Massage it.

Seems one arm than t'other slimmer?
Massage it.
Is one eye than t'other dimmer?
Massage it.
Is one shoulder out of level,
Giving you a sort of bevel?
Just you rub it like the—mischief—
Massage it.

Do you fear a double chin?
Massage it.
Grows your cheek too pale and thin?
Massage it.
Does your eastward ear protrude
In a manner weird and rude?
Do not have the thing unscrewed—
Massage it.

When War Will Disappear.

By W. S. SCHLEY, Rear Admiral U. S. N., Retired

THE profession of arms is one of the oldest in history, honorable and useful alike to the state. As a member of that profession I could not be expected to have much sympathy with those who misrepresent the value of its work or who DECRY THE USEFULNESS of its duties. In these days we hear much of peace congresses. In behalf of those of my cloth, I would say that it has been my privilege to meet and know some of the great soldiers and sailors of my time in most of the countries of the world. It is only just to them to say that they were uniformly gentle and UNIVERSALLY HUMANE. They were in no sense fond of war because the study of their life had better equipped them to wage it, but when brought face to face with the fact that their nation was unable to find common ground upon which to stand in adjusting differences with another they were ready to step into the breach, with all that might mean of SACRIFICE FOR HOME AND COUNTRY.

No one appreciates more than I do the motives of peace societies or the credit due THEM FOR THE GOOD they WOULD do, but the day is distant when the lion and the lamb can lie down together, and when they get up the lamb can be certain that he is not in the northwest corner of the lion. It is hardly too much to say that the era of a thousand years of peace is almost too far off to hope that any of us now living may ever see its beginning, but in the meantime might it not be well that we should constitute ourselves a living force for the protection of law and order against those other forces within the state which are DESTRUCTIVE TO ITS PEACE AND QUIET?

I would welcome such conferences as that at The Hague. All men who look upon war as a calamity will rejoice to know that there is a spirit of willingness prevalent among nations TO LIMIT THE SCOPE OF WAR, or to eliminate from its code some of the causes which now lead to it and to substitute for these the method of arbitration. If no other good results from such conferences than to strike from its code a few of the causes which now lead to that misfortune, the effect will be to lessen its possibilities and to make resort to it more and more rare. I know of no nation today, however, that, UNDER THE PRESENT DISPOSITION OF HUMAN NATURE, can afford to discard her defense while there is so much class restlessness under restraint or class impatience of authority as we see in every country around us. No, it is a far cry to the day when liberty will be able to hold footing without the protection of arms in the hands of men who are TRAINED TO USE THEM in her defense.

I AM AMONG THOSE WHO BELIEVE THAT WHEN THE KINGDOMS OF THIS WORLD SHALL BECOME VERITABLY THE KINGDOMS OF CHRIST ON EARTH, THEN, AND ONLY THEN, WILL WAR DISAPPEAR AND THE RUMORS OF WAR CEASE AMONG MEN.

Socialistic Arguments Are Only Speculation.

By M. M. MANGASARIAN of Chicago, Political Economist.

THE arguments which may be found in socialistic literature are PARADOXICAL in the extreme. And for some reason advocates of the movement maintain silence on the question of how much property the government is to own, and they do not tell us how we are going to dispossess the PRESENT OWNERS of their property. On this subject one writer says that after the Socialist party has captured the government THE REST IS EASY. They evidently intend to club a man over the head and take his property away from him. But who is to decide the question of REMUNERATION?

The truth is that wealth is produced by men of ability and INDUSTRIAL GENIUS. These are hard truths for the workingman, and the best friend of the physical laborer is the man of ability, the man WHO CAN ORGANIZE. Therefore it is muscular labor that is dependent upon mental labor, which is a scarcity, and if the worst came to the worst the man of brains could take a shovel and wheelbarrow and earn his living.

In the history of man the majority has ALWAYS been controlled by the minority, and it takes an optimist to see the day when the majority will control.

Today every city is managed by a group of men, and so is the nation. Socialism is still on paper. It is a prospectus—a speculation.

Colleges Help Arbitration.

By President C. F. THWING of Western Reserve University.

THE college is ordained to train men and to DISCOVER TRUTH. In training men the college promotes the cause of international arbitration, for a certain element of character which the college trains holds most intimate relationship to the great cause of arbitration. One characteristic mark of the educated man is SELF RESTRAINT. Self restraint is a function of the will. It represents calmness when one is tempted to be impetuous, humility when one is tempted to be arrogant, reticence when the provocation is to speak. But self restraint is MORE THAN A FUNCTION OF THE WILL. It stands for the simplicity, quietness and soberness of the gentleman. It is remote from bumptiousness, extravagance and what in both metaphor and fact is called LOUDNESS. Such a quality the college trains.

Self restraint, however, is never to become atrophy or self negation. It represents repression at one point in order to gain force IN ANOTHER. It is the dam built to give greater power to the pent-up stream. The man of self restraint is the man who best can arbitrate.

THE COLLEGE, THEREFORE, BY TRAINING MEN OF SELF RESTRAINT, IS HELPING FORWARD THE CAUSE OF ARBITRATION.

IN # Ward Seven.

By TEMPLE BAILEY.

Copyrighted, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.

"Nurse," piped the small boy in cot 3, "the doctor's dead stuck on you."

"Hush," said the nurse and bent over him and tucked him up.

Her cheeks were very red as she went out of the ward, and when she was alone in the diet kitchen she said under her breath, "The idea!"

That afternoon she carried a wee bunch of violets to the small boy and pinned them on his little white nightshirt. "I picked them in the yard," she told him. "Spring is coming, and I saw a robin on the lawn."

The small boy eyed her adoringly, and when the doctor came he whispered, "The nurse gave 'em to me—the pretty one with the blue eyes."

"Nurse Isabelle?" asked the big, fair haired doctor.

"Yep," said the small boy, "the one you're stuck on."

The doctor stared at him through his thick eyeglasses. "The idea!" he said, then with the red coming into his face, "Don't talk, Jimmie; it's bad for you."

But when he had tended the poor little throat and the boy lay weak and pale on his pillow the doctor whispered, "May I have a violet, Jimmie?" and the small boy nodded, and the doctor laid the little blue flower carefully in his pocketbook between the prescriptions and the unpaid bills.

Unpaid bills were the reason that, in spite of his thirty-five years, the doctor had not indulged in romance. Notwithstanding his success in his profession, the expenses of city living and a mortgage on his mother's farm kept him in a state of chronic insolvency, with a consequent constant shabbiness.

At the door Nurse Isabelle helped him on with his rusty overcoat.

"There's a button off," she told him. "I'll sew it on if you will wait."

And as she took deft stitches the doctor looked down at her white capped head. From beneath the cap little blond locks curled against her round throat.

"Jimmie's right," he said aloud, and when Nurse Isabelle said "What?" in a startled way he stammered: "Oh, nothing. Let me know how the boy is," and went away.

That night he took an account of ways and means and found that it wouldn't do. There was a big balance yet to be paid on the mortgage, and he must still travel the path of loneliness.

"Oh, I say," Jimmie informed him a week later, "you ain't doin' it right."

"Why not?" the doctor asked.

"Aw, you ought to bring her a rose or some violets," Jimmie told him. "She likes 'em."

"I haven't time for foolishness," the doctor stated briefly, and Nurse Isabelle, coming up, heard him.

With her head held high she helped him examine Jimmie, and after the doctor had gone the small boy said shyly:

"Well, anyhow, I'm dead stuck on you, nurse, dear." She kissed him with her cheeks blazing.

That night she telephoned to the doctor, "Jimmie is worse."

When he came, the small boy was fighting for breath. "Tell—me about—the robin," he begged feebly, and Nurse Isabelle bent over him and sang softly,

"The robin is dressed in his feathers and down,
With warm, red breast and his wings of brown," and then she stood back that the doctor might see him.

She knew that things were very wrong. The doctor gave orders quickly, and she followed them, and for hours they fought with death.

At midnight they thought that the end had come. Jimmie lay very still with his little face gray in the shaded light.

Isabelle, bending over him, began to cry, silently at first, then hysterically.

"Oh, why can't you save him?" she gasped. "Why can't you save him?"

"Hush!" the doctor warned. "Hush!"

But she was worn out, and the sobs came faster and faster as with shaking hands she tried to hold Jimmie up.

The doctor took the boy from her.

"Go and get me hot water," he ordered—"plenty of it. I'm ashamed of you."

When she came back, he had his coat off and his sleeves were rolled up. "It's the last chance," he said, and she helped him lift Jimmie into the bath.

The tears ran down her cheeks and dripped into the tub. Once she looked at the doctor. "I am so ashamed of myself," she whispered. "But—I have not many people to love me." And she sobbed under her breath.

The doctor's hair was wet, his face was red, and his shirt was open at the neck, showing the cords of his strong neck. He lifted the little steaming body in his arms and held the boy while Nurse Isabelle enveloped him in a heated blanket.

Jimmie opened his eyes as they laid him on his little cot. "Tell me about the robin," he murmured dreamily and went to sleep, holding tight to Nurse Isabelle's finger.

The doctor, warm and rumpled, looked at the two.

"You haven't any business nursing," he said to Isabelle.

Her startled eyes met his. "I was afraid you would say that," she quavered. "I was such a—fool."

"You are not a fool," the doctor blazed, "but some women aren't any more fitted to be nurses than I am to be the angel Gabriel."

Nurse Isabelle was not so sure of his unfitness for the sacred office as he stood there in his strength and dignity, with his halo of fair hair.

"If I had anything to offer you," he remarked abruptly, "I'd marry you."

"Oh!" Nurse Isabelle tried to rise, but Jimmie's thin fingers held her. "Please, don't," she begged.

"Don't disturb my patient," was the doctor's peremptory command. He ran his fingers through his hair. "If I wasn't so dead poor," he ruminated.

"A woman who breaks down at such an important moment isn't fit to be in a hospital," he continued. "She ought to be in a home where the tenderness would not be wasted."

He came around to Nurse Isabelle's side. It was very still in the big room. The screen around Jimmie's bed hid them from such wakeful patients as might be in ward 7.

"In my home it would not be wasted," he said softly.

Jimmie stirred slightly. Nurse Isabelle rose and bent over him. When she straightened up she was within the circle of the doctor's arm.

"Oh!" she gasped, all pink and white and beautiful.

"You're such a little thing to take care of yourself," the doctor whispered. "And I'll make ends meet."

As she raised a radiant face Jimmie opened his eyes and took in the satisfying situation.

"I told you he was dead stuck on you," he chuckled weakly.

How the Months Got Their Names.

The months of the year obtained their names from widely varying sources. January was named from the Roman god Janus, the deity with two faces, one looking to the east and the other toward the west. February comes from the Latin word februo, to purify. It was the ancient Roman custom to hold festivals of purification during that month. March owes its name to an old god of war. Among the Saxons this month was known as lenst, meaning spring, which was the origin of our word Lent. It is claimed by some that April was named from the Latin word aperire, open, in signification of the opening buds. In Saxon days it was called eastre, in honor of Eastra, the goddess of spring, from which comes our word Easter. May was named after Maia, the Roman goddess of growth or increase, and June was from the Latin juvenis (young). Julius Caesar himself named July in his own honor, and August was likewise named by Augustus Caesar. September is from the Latin word septem, meaning seven, it being the seventh month of the year according to the old Roman calendar, and October, November and December likewise retain the names they were known by in the old Roman calendar.

The Saddle.

The heavy man should be most particular about his saddle and that it shall be not only broad seated, but long in the tree, that his weight may be distributed over as large a surface on the horse's back as possible and should exercise great care that not only is it well stuffed, especially about the withers, but that the stuffing is constantly worked light and kept from caking or becoming lumpy anywhere. Neglect of these precautions will inevitably lead to chafing and bruising of the back or painful pinching and bruising of the withers, this latter injury leading very possibly to further complications in the way of fistula, etc., which may result in permanent and very severe complications. The individual of lighter weight is more fortunate in these respects, as he is not so likely to injure his mount severely by the mere amount of weight he represents, but even he must be duly careful not only upon the grounds of self interest, but upon those of ordinary humanity.—F. M. Ware in Outing Magazine.

The French For "Kittie."

If you attempt to coax a French kitten by calling "kittie, kittie, kittie," the animal will stare at you with absolute indifference or shrug its shoulders and walk away. The dictionaries and phrase books will give you no help, one and all ignoring the theme. It took me months to discover the proper call. When I asked, "How do you call it?" the natives always replied, "Un petit chat." If I continued, "What do you say when you wish it to approach you?" they respond, "Venez ici." I had about despaired of succeeding in my quest when I chanced to hear a little girl summoning her pet. She said, "Mi, mi, mi, mi, mi, mi," and "kittie" came running to her as obediently as could be. Of course mi was pronounced "me."—Travel Magazine.

THE BUSY WIFE.

See dat, signore? See, dere she go.
Ah, look, she wave her hand!
She's Rosa; dat's my wife, you know.
Oh, granda girl, my frand.
Ees notheeng look to me so sweet
An' mak' me feel so good
Like Rosa walkin' down da street
Weeth bigga loada wood.
So easy, wee'h eet on her head,
She seea sweeng along.
You theenk eet ees a hat instead—
Eh? How ees dat for strong?
I no could find een all da worl',
You justa bat my life,
Anuddor soocha fina girl
Like Rosa for da wife!
Eh? Sure, I gatta mon' enough.
Eh? W'ata for I mak'
Her carry home sooch heavy stuff?
Oh, my, you are meestak',
I do not mak' her do dees theeng.
I mighta be a cop—
I mighta even be da keeng—
I no could mak' her stop.
She like for doin' deesa way;
She gat her work to do
For keep her beezy alla day,
So lika me an' you.
Eh? Sure she ees Eetalian,
An' I am proud—Eh? W'at?
"She no be gooda 'Merican
So long she doin' dat?"
I s'posa w'at you say ees true,
But den, you see, signore
Ees playnta theeng dat she might do
Ees gona hurt her more.
Of course, som' day I want dat she
Be gooda 'Merican,
But not so good dat she weell be
Ashame' of dago man.
Som' 'Mericana girls, of course,
Dey theenk dey are so good,
Dey radder work for gat divorce
Eenstead for carry wood!
So, notheeng look to me so sweet
An' mak me feel so good
Like Rosa walkin' down da street
Weeth bigga loada wood.

Suitable Diet.

A jury in Blankville were sent out to decide a case, and after deliberating for a time came back, and the foreman told the judge they were unable to agree upon a verdict. The latter rebuked the jury, saying the case was a very clear one, and remanded them back to the jury room for a second attempt, adding, "If you are there too long I will have to send you in twelve suppers."

The foreman in a rather irritated tone spoke up and said, "May it please your honor, you might send in eleven suppers and one bundle of hay."—Lippincott's.

No Excuse.

Uncle John—Whew, we must stop now! The horse is tired.

Willie—You aren't a horse, Uncle John; you're an automobile.—Woman's Home Companion.

The Test of Endurance.

"Gracious, the way you theatrical people travel from place to place!" exclaimed the innocent person. "I should think it would take a great deal of endurance to be an actor."

"Oh," replied the actor absentmindedly, "long practice has made it possible for me to get along with very little food."—Des Moines Register.

Singular and Plural.

"Whenever she gets to thinking how much they're in debt it affects her nerves."

"Huh, the way it affects her husband is singular!"

"How singular?"

"Just singular. It affects his 'nerve.' He tried to borrow a hundred from me today."—New York Life.

He Proved It.

"Young Muggins is a mollycoddle, all right."

"What makes you think so?"

"I called him one."

"And what did he say?"

"He said he didn't think that was a nice term to apply to him and added that he felt quite vexed with me."—Pueblo Chieftain.

More Fashionable.

"The man of the house," said the man at the door who was taking names for the city directory, "is a blacksmith, I believe?"

"Yes," replied the young woman with the prominent pompadour, "but papaw is quite wealthy now, so please make it 'blacksmythe.'"—Philadelphia Press.

The Boy's Opportunity.

"Now, wouldn't it be funny," said Popley playfully, "if I were to become a little boy again?"

"Mebbe it wouldn't be so funny for you, pa," replied his bright young son. "If you was to be littler'n me, pa, I think I'd square up a few things."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Modern Convenience.

"Do you approve of automobiles?"

"To some extent," answered Miss Cayenne. "They enable one to clean one's gloves with gasoline without exciting suspicion."—Washington Star.

Goldfield, Nev., July 10, 1907

To The Republican,

Oakland, Maryland.

I have secured five mining claims here and am organizing a company to develop same. The Eastern Directors will be in the majority and control the company, while the Goldfield Directors agree to furnish two-thirds of the money as against our one-third. The showings for a mine are twice as good as the famous Mohawk--now $85.00 per share--at the same period of development. We offer a limited number of shares for sale--proceeds to be used in development--at ten cents per share cash (par value $1.00) or eleven cents per share payable three cents cash and two cents monthly. No subscriptions for less than one hundred shares. Remit to me at Hutton, Md., or Goldfield, Nev. As the number of shares is limited, we can promise that the prompt subscriptions only will be filled. I will be at the Frantz Hotel, Oakland, Thursday, July 18", and Saturday, July 20", in person.

FIKE.

Most of the people in this vicintiy have finished sowing buckwheat and we all hope it will prove better than the corn did this year.

Mr. Geo. F. Wass, of near Addison, Pa., was through this section last week selling fertilizer for wheat.

Mr. L. K. Fike has about completed a couple of rooms in his house at which he has been working for sometime.

Wm. H. Thomas and son are cutting frame timber for a barn which will be built soon.

Dr. Meyers, of Markleysburg, Pa., was called to Mr. John S. Fike's on professional business, Mrs. Fike being sick.

Mr. F. T. Fike has made an early start to take out his lime stone for he and a hired man have already commenced to quarry stone.

Mr. Wm. R. Fike, the mail carrier from Fearer to Fike, declares he is a good Republican, but he won't vote for Pearre any more for he is tired of carrying so many books especially in hot weather. Mr. Pearre certainly does not forget his constituents for hundreds of pieces of valuable literature are received every year.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The camp meeting closed Monday night. The attendance was larger than last year and there were more conversions in the immediate neighborhood than at any meeting heretofore. The usual amount of money was pledged for the meeting next year.

The Annual Meeting of the Community was held yesterday, when the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Maj. J. M. Burns; Secretary, Rev. L. A. Rudisill; Annual Committee, Maj. J. M. Burns and Dr. J. W. Laughlin; Treasurer, E. E. Friend; Policeman, Henry E. May; Street Commissioner, Jabob L. Echard.

Mr. W. A. Workman and family, of Canton, Ohio, arrived Tuesday, and will probably occupy the small Harmison cottage for the season.

Mr. Hanson Lewis, proprietor of the Columbian Hotel, lost a valuable horse this week.

Many of the camp meeting people are remaining in the Park and taking drives to nearby points of interest.

Rev. B. B. Evans, formerly of this conference, but now of Kankakee, Ill., accompanied by his wife and daughter, is here for a stay of three or four weeks.

Rev. Arbuthnot and family took in the camp meeting.

Supt. Davis made a business trip to Baltimore yesterday.

MEADOW MOUNTAIN.

Our Sunday school is progressing very nicely under the careful superintendency of Mr. Harmon Bittinger.

Mason Bros. have purchased a large boiler and engine to install in place of their present equipment. The object is to double the the capacity of the plant. The new boiler will be forty-five horse power, with a forty horse power engine.

Mr. A. R. Barnard is preparing to erect a very substantial barn in the near future.

Mr. Urven Custer has greatly changed the appearance of his property. Mr. C. is a hustler.

BITTINGER.

Our thanks are due to the generous editor of THE REPUBLICAN for the kind words of commendation and appreciation inserted in last week's issue, as the thing we do under disadvantages and difficulties become a real pleasure when they meet the approval and appreciation of others.

Crops generally, and corn especially, have made rapid growth in the past two weeks and farmers are again looking cheerful.

Death claimed from our midst last week an aged and highly esteemed neighbor, when Mary, wife of Samuel J. Brenneman, was called to a better life, on Wednesday evening, July 10th, aged 66 years, 10 months and 19 days, leaving to mourn their loss and aged husband, three sons, Mahlon and Edward, of this place, and Lewis of Grantsville, two daughters, Mrs. A. J. Oester, of this place, and Mrs. Amos Bittinger, of near Oakland, and one brother, C. J. Otto, of New Germany, and a host of other relatives and friends. The interment was made at this place on Friday afternoon. Revs. Shoup and Miller having charge of the services.

The following lines are dedicated to the sacred memory of Mrs. Mary Brenneman, wife of Samuel J. Brenneman, who departed this life at her home near Bittinger, Md., on Wednesday evening, July 10, 1907, aged 66 years, 10 months and 19 days. An aged and devoted husband, five children, a brother and a host of relatives and friends are afflicted by the taking away of this noble companion an loviug mother.

Visions come back from the years that have vanished,
Visions my memory shall evermore bless;
This shall remain, though others be banished—
Memory of Mother's fond loving caress.

Time's silent tread o'er the vista of ages,
Waken sweet echoes still slumbering there;
I may forget the wise council of sages,
But never the memory of dear Mother's prayers.

Over the billows of life's stormy ocean,
Thunders may crash, then calm for awhile;
I can forget earth's frightful commotion,
But never the sweetness of dear Mother's smile.

Boundless the depth of a mother's devotion,
Reaching wherever child-footsteps may roam;
Kindling ever life's purest emotion,
Bringing us visions of Mother and Home.

Elias Orendorf sold the tract of timber adjoining his farm at this place last week to C. Wright, of Somerset, Pa., who will move a mill in and begin operations next spring.

Mrs. J. T. Lohr and children returned to their home at this place Friday, after a few days visit at Sunnyside.

Squire Wade H. Lohr and little son, of Swanton, were visiting here Sunday and Monday.

Laura Fazenbaker is visiting friends at Gortner and Oakland this week.

Mrs. John L. Beachy is on the sick list this week.

Mrs. S. O. Wiley, who has been visiting here for a week or two, went over to Cove Sunday for a few days visit with her brother.

Misses Ida, Jean and Ella Ralston went up to Oakland last week, where they will be employed for the summer.

Order of Publication.

No. 1479 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland.

Emma Fike vs. Ezra B. Fike.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree divorcing the plaintiff from the defendant a vinculo matrimonii.

The Bill states that the plaintiff was married to the defendant on the 6th day of November, 1898; that no children were born to them as the result of said marriage; that during all of the time that the plaintiff lived with the defendant, the defendant treated her with great cruelty, harshness and brutality, and that about two years ago he deserted her and has provided nothing for her support or maintenance since said time.

The Bill further charges that after the defendant deserted the plaintiff, that he resorted, cohabited and lived with one A. Lowery; that the said defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, for an order of publication and for general relief.

It is thereupon, this 17th day of July, 1907, ordered by the Circuit Court of Garrett county, in Equity, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 16th day of August, 1907, give notice to the said defendant of the object and substance of this Bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 2nd day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to pass as prayed.

TRAGIC DEATH SATURDAY OF MR. HENRY P. WEBER

Was Found Unconscious In Poultry House and Expired Four Hours Later

DEATH UNDOUBTEDLY ACCIDENTAL

The Cause of Death Was a Rifle Ball, Which Penetrated His Brain—No Eyewitnesses To The Occurrence and No Evidence of Suicide.

The funeral of Henry P. Weber was held at the family residence Monday, July 22nd. The services were conducted by W. E. Van Amburg, Allegheny, Pa. Many relatives and friends of the deceased were present from other places, also a large gathering of neighbors and local friends. Mr. Weber has lived in this community for twenty-four years and had made a host of friends by his genial manner and business integrity. He was the eldest son of the late Henry Weber. He was a devoted husband, a loving father, a kind neighbor and his loss will be keenly felt by all who knew him. He is survived by a wife and five children, his mother, five brothers and five sisters. The interment was on the home farm beside his father.

The report has spread abroad that the deceased had committed suicide, but all circumstantial evidence is to the contrary. He had planned to go to Pittsburg to receive treatment from a specialist. Arrangements had been nearly completed. Mr. Van Amburgh had been expected to be with the Webers over Sunday, the 21st, for some special meetings and friends from various places had been invited to partake of the hospitality of the home and enjoy the privilege and fellowship of the meetings. Mr. Weber had arranged to go to Pittsburg with Mr. Van Amburg Sunday evening. Friday night he seemed in somewhat better spirits than usual and retired quite early. Awakening early in the morning he remarked to his wife that he was feeling better than on the day before and rose to make a fire and attend to the chickens and do the morning chores. His wife, rising a little later and not finding him on coming down stairs, made search for him and found him lying unconscious across his rifle in the chicken coop. He had purchased a rifle some years previous for the purpose of shooting minks and skunks which were destroying many of his chickens. It is thought that he had heard a disturbance in his chicken coop and had taken his rifle with him with the thought of possibly shooting the disturber. It would have been impossible for him to have held the weapon in such a manner as to inflict the wound which caused his death, as the weapon was a rifle and not a revolver as had been currently reported. The ball had entered the head somewhat above and back of the left temple and taking a course toward the mouth, lodging just above the roof of the mouth, without having held it so close to the head as to have singed his hair or blackened the skin, neither of which was in evidence. Probably the exact cause of his death will never be known definitely, but it is probable that he may have stumbled as there was a step down into the part of the chicken coop where he was found, and having thrown up his hands to protect himself the gun may have been thrown from his hands striking the ceiling above and was discharged causing the wound. At all events there is no evidence that there was any intention of self destruction.

The deep sympathy of the community is extended to all the friends.

Following is a brief report of th ediscourse by Mr. Van Amburg:

The speaker took his text from John 11:35-37. "Jesus wept. Then said the Jews, behold, how he loved him! Then some of them said, could not this man who opened the eyes of the blind have caused that even this man should not have died?"

The speaker called attention to a similar scene in the Bethany home some nineteen hundred years ago, and of the deep sorrow of the two sisters who had lost their loving brother and how they had sent word to the Lord, but that he had not hastened to their relief but had tarried until Lazarus had died. At first thought this might seem very peculiar on the part of our Lord to thus wait; but, as he expressed to his disciples, it was for a purpose—"To the intent that ye might believe." The speaker then spoke of the return of the Lord to the home and of the awakening from death of the brother and the great rejoicing in the home that would naturally result, and that the rejoicing would be greater because of the previous depth of sorrow. Also that it was the return of the Lord that had brought this great joy. He then spoke of the question that has been in the hearts of all mankind from the first death even to the present time: Could not the Creator have caused that all mankind should not have died? He called attention to the Scripture narration of the creation of man in perfection of beauty and God-likeness and with opportunity and conditions such as would have resulted in a life without end, but by his disobedience he was condemned to death. He quoted copiously from the Bible showing the condition of death—that it is an absence of life. He then called attention to the Scripture, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life." How could we harmonize this declaration of love with the facts before us of misery, sin, sorrow, suffering and death which we know to be the experience of mankind from the day of condemnation to the present? He then cited from the Scriptures various passages showing that it was God's intention to bring about a very great blessing to all the families of the earth, but that this blessing was delayed, "waiting for the return and manifestation of the Son of God." He called attention to the great miracle which had been performed in calling Lazarus forth from the dead and explained how this shadowed forth the glory of the Lord when he should return from heaven to call forth all from their graves, quoting the Lord's words, "The hour cometh in the which all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of Man and shall come forth." Various other Scriptures were quoted in harmony with this. He showed that as the return of the Lord to this home in Bethany brought rejoicing and gladness and return to life from the dead, so the return of the Lord from heaven would result in great blessings to all the families of the earth, the setting up of the kingdon which he had promised and for which he taught the disciples to pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven." Then followed a brief description, quoting freely from the Scriptures, of this wonderful kingdom which God is to establish here upon the earth and that its establishment shall mean the doing away of sorrow and crying, pain and death. But the world at the present time has very little if any knowledge of this kingdom, but the Lord has revealed it unto his people through his Word. Answering the query which is in the hearts of so many—Why does the Lord so long delay? he cited from the Scriptures how the Lord at the present time is choosing out from amongst the people such as would respond to his invitation, and that those who responded he was teaching, training, sanctifying; making them ready to be associates with himself in the great kingdom which he should establish here upon the earth, and again referred to the Scriptures for his declaration, that after the present period for the election and selection and calling of those who were endeavoring to follow in the Lord's footsteps should be ended, the kingdom would then be established. The question might arise in the minds of some: Why should the Lord permit this particular accident to have happened in this particular way? He then suggested: Why did God permit our Lord to suffer so much ignomy and shame? Why did the Lord permit his disciples to be so treated and have their names cast out as evil and also the declaration that "all who would live godly in this present life shall suffer persecution" and have all manner of evil spoken against them, and how history had corroberated this fact, showing by the Scriptures that this was one of the means by which God was testing and trying those who would make their calling and election sure, in order that they might be proved worthy of the position of honor and trust which should be granted to them in the kingdom.

He then spoke of the deceased as one who had endeavored to follow his Lord to the best of his ability, and that if he had seemed peculiar to some, it was evidently because he was seeking to follow the directions of his Lord, making that the first business in life. He then called attention to many very comforting scriptural promises of the Lord to assist and sustain his people as they were going through deep waters and fiery trials and that the faith of his people was very pleasing in the Lord's sight, and that although his way might seem dark and cloudy at the present time yet each could be assured that "behind a frowning providence he hides a smiling face," and that eventually all should be made clear and the darkness removed.

The speaker was listened to very attentively throughout the entire discourse. The services were very simple. The music was furnished by the choir of the Methodist church. Following the singing of the last hymn the pallbearers quietly removed the casket to the grave followed by the relatives and friends present, a short prayer was offered at the grave and the lowering of the casket completed the services. The simplicity of the services added very much to their impressiveness.

NOTABLES TO BE AT MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK

Governor Wm. M. O. Dawson of West Virginia, And Our Own Governor Edwin Warfield Will Participate In The Silver Jubilee of The Association

The present year of 1907 marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Mountain Lake Park Association, and the management having this fact in mind, has arranged to properly celebrate the event, which will be commemorated next week, beginning on Tuesday evening at eight o'clock when a reception, with suitable addresses to the occasion, will be held.

On Wednesday evening at eight o'clock Col. George A. Pearre, of Cumberland, will be the speaker.

Thursday, the final day of the three-day celebration, will be the most interesting of them all, which has been designated "Governors' Day," when Hon. Wm. M. O. Dawson, Governor of West Virginia, himself a native Garrett countian, and His Excellency Governor Edwin Warfield of Maryland, will be the guests of honor of the Association and both will make addresses. Thursday's program, beginning at 10:30 o'clock in the morning, is as follows:

GOVERNOR EDWIN WARFIELD OF MARYLAND

Addresses, Rev. Dr. C. W. Baldwin, representing the Association; Rev. Dr. W. L. Davidson, representing the Chautauqua; Major J. M. Burns, representing the Community; Rev. J. M. Davis, representing the County. Responses, Hon. Edwin Warfield, Governor of Maryland; Hon. Wm. M. O. Dawson, Governor of West Virginia; President Oscar Murray, or a representative of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

At three o'clock an informal reception to the Governors and other guests.

At eight o'clock in the evening address, Hon. Edwin Warfield, "The Influence of The Chautauqua on Popular Education;" address, Governor Wm. M. O. Dawson, "The Mountain Chautauqua and Its Influence on the Contiguous Territory."

With the two Governors at the Park, both of whom have many admirers in Garrett county and the adjacent territory in West Virginia, great crowds are expected to be present.

Garrett County to the Front.

The summer meeting of the State Horticultural Society will be held at Jamestown on September 24th. Owing to the fact that Garrett county won out so noble last fall in the apple exhibition contest, at Baltimore, and thereby attracted so much attention, the management of the society feels that some recognition should be given this county on the program that is to be given on that occasion. Senator Brown accordingly has been invited to make the address of response to the words welcome to the society to be delivered by President Tucker of the exposition.

First Gas in Garrett County.

The mains for gas for the town of Kitzmillerville, and the connections therefrom to many of the houses have been laid. The gas will be turned on as soon as the repairs to the principal main at Parsons are completed. At this point the pipes were torn out by the recent great rains which visited this section.

$71,861.50 REALIZED BY SALE OF COUNTY BONDS

Highest Sold for $498.25 and Lowest for $476.00.

118 GO TO ALLEGANY COUNTY.

Thirty-two Were Purchased by Citizens of Garrett County, James Cary, of District No. 9, Getting Ten of Them.

The sale of the bonds for the new court house was conducted before the old court house on Tuesday, the sale taking the whole day. The bonds were sold as follows at the price affixed:

1 at $496; 1 at $495; 10 at $498.25; 2 at $495; 1 at $492; 2 at $491; 5 at $490; 2 at $483; 2 at $483; 6 at $479; 59 at 476; 59 at $476.

The net returns from the sale were $71,861.50. This sum falls $3,138.50 short of the $75,000 which the law specified that the County Commissioners should provide for the erection of the new building. The building committee expects the Commissioners to provide this deficit, either by special levy or by some other way for the building committee has contracted to spend on the new building $75,000 which sum the law provided should be spent upon the new building.

While the bonds sold below par, yet the sale was an excellent one. The money market at present is exceedingly stringent, and none of the bankers at the sale would figure on taking the bonds unless 5 per cent. could be realized from the investment, money today being far more valuable that 4 per cent. As it is, the Commissioners are paying an actual interest of 4⅛ per cent. a very low rate for today. It was the people of the county who refused to buy the bonds at 4 per cent., so there was nothing else to do but to sell them to parties outside the county at the best figures possible, which was done, the majority going to two banks in Allegany county.

Had the bonds been placed on a 5 per cent. basis, the total amount of interest then would have been $6,500 more than the 4 per cent. basis. And there is nothing to make the authorities think that they then would have sold much if any above par. While $3,138.50 were loss by the bonds selling below par, yet more than that amount was saved by keeping the bonds at 4 per cent. rather than at 5 per cent.

THE WRITTEN AND UNWRITTEN LAW

Intelligent Criticism of Its Recent Application.

THE LAW OF ILLEGAL SHOOTING

Legislation Upon the Subject Suggested—A Strong Condemnation of What is Beginning to be Accepted as Unwritten Law.

The hurried acquittal of Mary E. Bowie for shooting to death Hubert Posey, by a jury of Charles county, invention called upon what is of late invention called unwritten law, is an addition to the harmful and odious list. This dangerous verdict comes quite soon after similar ones in Virginia for like homicides. All these verdicts are condemned by right thinking people. The Thaw case was somewhat similar, but there was also a dim plea of insanity in it. But no verdict by the jury. Another trial coming.

How can there be such a thing as unwritten law in the face of or in lien of our laws which are in the form of written statutes, the old common law and decisions of our higher courts? To give play to the myth called unwritten law would be nothing short of an ignoring of the living laws of the land. Many centuries ago there was such a thing known as an unwritten law, but when civilization came it was dropped, for written or printed laws for our guidance and government.

The fact was Mary E. Bowie deliberately and openly shot and killed Herbert Posey when her own life and safety were not endangered by her victim. True she had been deeply wronged in her feelings, but this was no justification for her offense. She had adequate remedies for her wrongs under the plain written laws of Maryland, but nothing therein to authorize her to be her own avenger, tho' she was a wronged woman. The written laws are for the safety and protection of innocent persons. The unwriten law is a violater of the living paramount law.

Now let us see what the law of Maryland is in regaid to illegal shooting. The act of Assembly of 1853, Chapter 99, and Act 27, Section 189 of our Code, provide: "If any person shall unlawfully shoot at any person or shall maliciously attempt to discharge any kind of loaded arms at any person," every such offender and every person, and every person counseling, aiding or abetting such offender shall, up on conviction thereof, be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for a period not less than eighteen months, and more than ten years.

Now who, be he lawyer or layman, can say, that the shooting of Herbert Posey was not illegal? There can be no such thing as legal shooting a human being. The shooting in this case no matter what the feelings or provocation were, was clearly a violation of this written statue of ours, now a half a century old. But strange to say this plain and well intended statutes has been resorted to but once according to recollection in in Western Maryland, probably through over sight. In that case an impulsive man fired a shot gun and a few shot struck the hand of a young man with only a slight injury. The offender was without hesitency found guilty by a jury and sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of years. But after thorough repentance and loss of health he was very properly pardoned by Governor Carroll. This was a touching case at least to one.

It is true the Constitution of Maryland of 1867 by Art. 15, Sec. 5, provides: "In the trial of all criminal cases, the jury shall be the judges of the law as well as of fact." But this provision does not authorize the jury to ignore the positive law of the State, now bearing the misnomer of unwritten law. This ought to be plain and clear to even ordinary minds.

The purpose and wish of this paper is to aid people to some extent at least to give thought, attention and action to this growing evil before it reaches to provocations other than those relating to female chastity. If not checked in some preventory way, it will soon find its way to quarrels, and disputes between persons about ordinary affairs. It is nothing less than a mild form of anarchy, which means a substitute for law, order and government for the whole people. What is needed and should be procured from our next Legislature is a careful and well considered law on this subject, disavowing and discountenancing the so-called unwritten law, which a few would have place above the living law it self. A law should be enacted, disallowing juries from considering this legal whim. There ought to be a law to authorize and require the courts in criminal cases to advise and instruct the jury as to the meaning of the law, where there is doubt. Juries in their verdicts should obey the law, not ignore it.

NEWSPAPER DONT'S.

We do not know Miss Susan Glaspell of Davonport, Ia,, but she evidently knows things, and she is deserving of a place in the roll of honor in American newspaper circles. She recently gave the clubwomen of her city some interesting facts in relation to the newspaper business, included in her paper were some valuable "dont's" that will meet the approbation of every newspaper man. They ought also to meet the eye of every person who has to do with the newspapers in an unofficial way and be followed. Here they are:

Don't come to the newspaper office Thursday with something that happened Monday. Come on Monday.

Don't come at two minutes of 3 o'clock when the paper goes to press at two minutes after. The assassination of the president of the United States would be resented at that hour.

Don't ask a reporter to run a olumn of reprint stuff which may serve your cause, but has practically no news value, and then when you have a good live story give it to the other paper. The reporter don't like that a bit.

Don't go to the managing editor and ask that a legitimate news story be kept out. It would be just as unreasonable and just as indelicate to go to the banker and ask him to give you money or to the lawyer and ask him to give up one of his cases. A newspaper is a business enterprise. When you ask it to keep out news, you ask it to injure its own business.

Don't blame the reporter if something you gave him or her does not appear. It is not the reporter's fault. The city editor is the court of last appeal, and he works on the principle of the survival of the fittest. The fact that your committee is going to do something may be very important to you, but fact that some girl drank carbolic acid is more impor. tant to the city editor.

Don't say, "I can't understand why the papers make so many mistakes." If you had ever been in the business, you would say instead, "I think it one of the miracles of the age that newspapers can do that amount of work under that amount of pressure and make so few mistakes."

We doff our hats to Miss Glaspell. She has earned the thanks of every newspaper editor by her clear enunciation of many the cardinal principles of the relations between the editor and his occasional contributor. — Newburyport (Mass.) News.

SAW VISION OF DEATH

Rev. Dr. Rollings Has Remarkable Hallucination.

Rev. Henry Rollings, now taking a special course as a medical missionary in the New York Homeopathic Medical College, Sixty-third street and the Eastern Bouleyard, has had an experience which may result in the postponement of his actual labors after his graduation until he can be induced by the several psychical societies in the large cities to describe the remarkable mental condition into which he fell, when he saw, as in a vision, his father at the point of death when the father was 3,000 miles away. The death-bed scene was corroborated two weeks later in every detail in a letter from England.

Dr. Rollings received his thelogical education in England and was ordained in the Established Church He came to America with Bishop Sullivan, whose ecclesiastical title was the Colonial Bishop of the Church of England. His first experience was among the Hudson Bay Indians. He had no superstitions and did not believe in hallucinaitons except those that came from an impaired digestion, so that his subsequent experience, attested as they were by documentary evidence, are all the more startling. His whole life had been devoted to study and he was so ignorant of business forms and procedures that he fell an easy victim to Dave Rothschild, to whom he intrusted a sum of money intended originally for the education of his son in college. In addition to what he deposition in the Federal Bank he turned over $700 in cash to the president of the bank without taking any receipt.

After his investments with the Rothschild gang had about impoverished him, he went to Rochester, and was appointed curate of St. Andrew's parish, of which Rev. Algernon S. Crapsey, subsequently convicted of heresy for denying the physical resurrection of the Saviour, was the rector. Dr. Rollins said yesterday:

"My father was Geoffrey Rollins of Bedfordshire, England, and between us the tie of consanguinity was strong. We kept in constant communication by mail, and my father knew of all my trials and all my triumphs—if I had any. After a particularly arduous day, I threw myself on a bed exhausted. I fell into a slumber, from which I was awakened by a vivid picture. I sat up in the bed and saw my father as distinctly as I ever saw him in my life and heard him call out 'My boy, my boy, I am dying.'

"The picture that was presented to me was that of my father lying in bed in a room I did not reconize I could tell by the general furnishings that it was English. I saw all my relatives there except my sister, and why she was absent at such a moment. The scene was as sharp and plain as if I had been in the auditorium of a playhouse watching the actors on the stage.

"I saw my father sink back on the pillows, and I knew that he was dead.

"Then my second self, or whatever you see fit to call it, seemed to revolve itself back into my material body and I awakened, arose from the bed and cried out that my father was dead. I was told that I was suffering from nervous prostration and should return to bed. I obeyed and fell asleep for about eight hours.

"When I got up the vision of my father came to me in my waking hours with greater vividness than when I saw it in my subconscious state.

"Two weeks from that day a letter came from England telling of the death of my father at the exact hour and day when I had seen him and with the additional information that just before he breathed his last he had seen me standing at his bedside.

"The letter announcing my father's death told us that the family had removed from the old homestead to another house in Bedfordshire, which I never had seen. Subsequent inquiry showed that the room as I saw it in my strange metal condition was precisely as it was in fact. My sister's absence, as I learned at the same time and which made a marked impression upon me, was due to illness."—New York World.

ROMANCE VIA OAKLAND, MD.

Nurse Marries Conductor She Nursed to Health in Hospital at Clarksburg.

Cumberland, Md., July 13.—Nursing an injured man to health culminated in a romantic marriage at Oakland, Md., recently. Last spring, Mr. Wilbut Perine, trolley car conductor of Clarksburg, was injured in a wreck near Wilsonburg, and was taken to St. Mary's hospital, Clarksburg. Miss Mary McCann was regular nurse and was assigned to the patient. An acquaintance was formed and their marriage at Oakland was the result.

The marriage was quite a surprise. Miss McCann has been away from the hospital for a week, presumably nursing a patient, but she was in reality prepering for her wedding, a fact of which the sisters of the institution were unaware.

OVERWORK ON FARMS.

Anyone who has lived on a farm knows of the strain under which the American farmer lives during the five months of spring and summer. His workday is from 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning until 8 or 9 o'clock at night, including chores—fifteeen to seventeen hours of the hardest kind of physical labor, and every minute of it at high tention, especially during harvest.

Then comes a peroid of relaxation in the fall, the one time in the year when he has just enough muscular exercise to keep him in health; later, the winter season, approaching stagnation, in which he takes on flesh, gets logy, and then a famous debauch of hard labor through the spring and summer again.

No wonder that by forty-five he has sunstroke and 'can't stand the heat,' or has a 'weak back,' or his 'heart gives out,' or a 'chill makes him rheumatic;' and when you add to this furious muscular strain the fact that the farmer sees his income put in peril every bad year, so that each unfavorable change in the weather sets his nerves on edge, it can be readily imagined that the real 'quiet, peaceful country life' is something sadly different from the ideal.—Harper's Magazine.

FINDING MISS FILSON

By NORA BAYNE.

Copyrighted, 1907, by C. H. Sutcliffe.

"Find Miss Filson," directed the "old man," and Andy Brant, with a prompt and respectful "Yes, sir," tucked the letter into his pocket and finished adding the column of figures upon which he had been working.

Had Lowell & Lowell told him to go out and find the north pole Andy would have replied in precisely the same tone and would have started on the trip in precisely the same spirit. Nominally the assistant bookkeeper, Andy Brant was the general utility man. It was he who had given first aid to the injured water pipe with a piece of rubber overshoe and some adhesive tape from his bicycle kit and who had treated the office cat when it had fits.

But the present quest was not so promising. A correspondent had asked that his daughter be located. "We know that she was to have gone to the Y. W. C. A.," wrote the westerner. "No doubt it will be easy to locate her."

Andy grinned as he replaced the letter in his pocket and started for the association office.

The elderly woman in charge was willing to tell what little she knew when Andy showed his letter as authority. Miss Filson had come to them three months before, but had soon moved to an address far uptown. She smiled approvingly upon Andy as he thanked her. She liked this clean skinned, honest eyed young fellow, and she even unbent so far as to venture the hope that he would meet with success.

"I'M FRANCES ELIZABETH FILSON," SHE EXPLAINED.

Andy's answer was a grimace. Young women had a trick of losing themselves in New York. Miss Filson had left the association three months before. It was not likely that she could endure life in one cheap boarding house for that length of time. Most places were endurable for less than a month.

His suspicions were verified when he reached the uptown address. Miss Filson was dimly remembered by the rosy cheeked servant girl who answered the door. She stayed only two weeks and departed on an express wagon, explaining that she could not trust the driver with the trunk. It was this incident and the fact that she did not leave her new address that fixed her more clearly in the girl's mind than most of those who came and went.

Andy interviewed express wagon drivers in an increasing circle for the remainder of the morning and wound up so conveniently near his own boarding place that he stopped in for lunch.

Mrs. Lennon's establishment was different from the average New York boarding house. Andy had lived there for a year and still liked it. Now that golden haired Bess Saunders had taken up her residence there he was willing to remain indefinitely. Andy was not susceptible, but the first time Bess had come into the stuffy dining room he had fallen in love, so deeply in love that when she had lost her position as stenographer and could not pay her board bills, unknown to Bess, he had arranged with Mrs. Lennon that he would be responsible for the bills until Bess found a new place, when the landlady should reimburse him.

"Any luck?" he asked as he slipped into his seat opposite the girl. She shook her head.

"Well, I have some good news for you," he went on. "Our typewriter is to be married week after next. She's going to quit the job, and the 'old man' says you may have it."

Bess clapped her hands delightedly, and Andy beamed upon her.

"Let's celebrate," he suggested. "I've got an order that I can't fill. Let's go to the matinee, will you? Might as well do that as tramp around town for nothing."

Bess nodded, and Andy sat on the front steps smoking a cigarette and building air castles while the girl dressed. They had only cheap seats in the rear of the balcony, but it was a treat, and occasionally Andy could feel the slight pressure of the girl's arm against his own, emphasizing her nearness. He did not think much of the vaudeville performance. What mattered the accomplishments of the trained seals and the toe dancer when he could lean back with closed eyes and conjure up visions of light housekeeping with Bess as the housekeeper He was earning enough salary for two. After all, she need not take the place with Lowell & Lowell.

"Isn't that great?" asked Bess. Andy roused himself with a start to observe the accomplishments of a pair of acrobats.

"Sure thing," he assented. "I was thinking of something bigger and greater."

"What's that?" she demanded.

"I was thinking," he explained, "that perhaps you wouldn't need Miss Austin's place in the office. What's the matter with our getting married? We could get a bit of a flat and live—not board."

Andy's voice made the distinction eloquent, and the girl's gray eyes grew.

"But you don't know anything about me," she protested wistfully.

"I know you're the girl I want to marry," he insisted stoutly. "Mrs. Lennon's known me for a year, and the 'old man's' had me working for him for three years. You can write to Brewsterville and find out the rest about me if you want to. I'm not from Missouri where you're concerned."

There was a sudden darkness as the lights went out for the motion pictures, and in the gloom a tiny hand sought his and was quickly captured.

"Is it yes?" he asked, his breath coming in sharp aspirations.

"I can't write back home," she said softly. "But if you will take me as I am, Andy, it's—yes."

"There's nothing wrong," he declared stoutly, "but if you were a shoplifter I'd marry you just the same." The audience was filing out before the last pictures were thrown on the screen, but he leaned over and kissed her.

"We're engaged," he declared, "but you'll have to wait until Saturday for the ring."

The lights flashed on again, and unwillingly enough Andy gathered up their belongings and prepared to join the departing crowd. The boarding place was but a short distance away, and they decided upon walking. Andy's feet touched the sidewalk, but he felt as though he were in the clouds that dotted the evening sky.

"I don't want you to think I've done anything wrong," whispered Bess. "It isn't that, dear. It's just that I have no family and don't want ever to be reminded of them. My father married a second time, my stepmother and I did not get along well, and I"—

"Lit out," he said. "I don't blame you. Lots of girls won't put up with a secondhand mother. I'm looking for one this very minute—that is, I'm supposed to be," he added.

"That was what took you out of the office this afternoon?"

"Yes. You see, her father buys goods from us, and he wrote Lowell & Lowell to look the girl up and tell her that her near mother had decided to be good and begged the girl to come home. It's too far for him to come and look for her in the busy season, but we're to find her and ship her back to Elton, O."

"Elton?" she echoed. "Andy, is his name Filson?"

"Sure thing. Do you know her?"

"I'm Frances Elizabeth Filson," she explained. "Saunders was my own mother's name."

"That let's me out," sighed Andy. "Why, your father has seven different kinds of money."

"But I am richer, for I have you," she whispered.

"Do you mean it? You still want to marry me now you've won your father back?"

"You know I do," she said reproachfully.

"And to think," mused Andy, "that I was cussing the old man for chasing me out on such a fool job."

Bess laughed. She knew what Andy meant.

The Tomb of Walter Scott.

In Dryburgh abbey, standing among the ruins of the ancient choir, with the afternoon sun shining upon it, we saw the tomb of Walter Scott in St. Mary's aisle. A noble block of Aberdeen granite marks the last resting place of Sir Walter and Lady Scott. The simple inscription records the dates of birth and death of the husband and wife. Here also are the mortal remains of the novelist's children and of his son-in-law and biographer, John Gibson Lockhart, of whom Scott wrote affectionately, "Lockhart is Lockhart, to whom I can most willingly confide the happiness of the daughter who chose him and whom he has chosen."

As we turned from the grave of Walter Scott and wandered across the now roofless and grass grown refectory we recalled his last connected words to Lockhart: "My dear, be a good man—be virtuous—be religious—be a good man; nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here."—Book News.

The Change In Surgeons.

"The surgeon of the past was a huge, coarse, red faced brute, a very terror," said a surgeon of the present. "And no wonder. What type of man but the brute type could cut off legs or saw through the skull while the patient, perfectly conscious, howled and wept? In the past surgery was barred to gentle and refined men. Whatever their interest in anatomy, in medicine, they shunned surgery. They could not endure to operate upon a conscious subject. The advent of anaesthetics caused the advent of new men into surgery. Men of delicacy, of sympathy, of imagination—a higher type—took the profession up. That is why surgery is continually advancing now, whereas in the past it stood dead still."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

JUGGLING CITY ACCOUNTS.

Lincoln (Neb.) Citizens Kept In the Dark as to the Cost of Their Street Lights.

Lincoln, Neb., is getting an unenviable notoriety through the attempts of its officials to make it appear that its expensive municipal electric plant is supplying arc lights at a low figure.

In the report of the city auditor for the seven months ended March 31, 1906, although some of the elements of cost were omitted, the evident intention was to give a fair showing. But unfortunately it was shown that the cost ($73.68 a year for lamps burning only 2,580 hours) was larger than the contract price for lamps supplied by private companies in neighboring cities. This was unsatisfactory, of course.

Accordingly in the annual report for the year ended Aug. 31, 1906, there was a deliberate omission of depreciation and interest charges on that part of the plant's cost not covered by bonds —$21,691, or one-quarter of the total construction cost. Apparently, also, the lighting schedule had been reduced to keep the cost down, as the report shows that the lamps burned only 1,936 hours during the year. By these devices the cost was reduced to $50.09.

Soon after the appearance of this report the mayor gave out in a newspaper interview that the plant had been grossly maligned and that it was furnishing lights all night and every night at a cost of $51.12 a year. It is charitable to suppose that his honor was unaware of the fact that to give all night every night service the lamps must burn 4,000 hours a year instead of 1,936, as shown by the report quoted above.

At about the time the mayor's investigation appeared an investigation of the plant was made by Professors C. H. Richards and G. H. Morse of the University of Nebraska. Their detailed report gives the cost per arc per annum as $98.84 for an all night service, nearly double the cost claimed by the mayor. This report was made by the city's consulting engineer, but Mayor Brown, who is a candidate for re-election, has apparently not accepted its findings, although, according to the Omaha Bee, he now places the cost at $63.29.

It is worth noting that the original estimate for this plant was $55,000 construction cost and $25,165 annual expense. The actual construction cost, as shown in the auditor's report, was $86,691, nearly 58 per cent in excess of the estimate. The annual expense, as shown by the expert report, is $32,519, exceeding the estimate by 23 per cent.

This is a typical example of the sort of underestimating that leads cities to adopt municipal ownership and also of the official juggling of figures by which the public is temporarily prevented from learning that it has a white elephant on its hands.

STEAMERS BOTHER LONDON.

Council Can't Sell Them—Will Run Them Awhile—Wages and Fares to Be Cut.

Those who have made statements to the effect that the new London county council is not opposed to municipal ownership will find it hard to explain the report recently submitted by the committee having in charge the matter of the Thames steamboats.

In this report it is stated that they had tried in vain to sell or lease them and that their final decision to run them for four and a half months during the summer "must not be taken as indorsing the previous policy of the council or as implying any intention that the boats should be worked after the summer season. On the contrary, it is put forward as the best, if not the only practical, method of dealing with the problem presented to us." The committee also proposed to reduce fares and to diminish the wages of the employees, which they consider in excess of what is equitable.

In regard to the scheme for an enormous municipal lighting and power plant, the preliminary steps for which were taken by the old council, the present council has put itself on record to the effect that if this scheme goes through under no circumstances will the city operate the plant.

The Figures Would Open Their Eyes.

There can be no doubt that all the water supplied free by municipal water departments should be paid for by the particular bureaus or departments that use it, just as would be the case if they were supplied by a private company. The water so used is a debit to the taxpayers of the town, and if the statistics of free water were published the eyes of water consumers would be opened as to how much they are taxed for the payment of water to sprinkle boulevards, streets in front of nonwater paying tenants and water to protect the property of people who make their tenants pay for their supplies of water.—Editorial in Fire and Water Engineering.

Figured Profits the Usual Way.

Although the last annual report of the Crawfordsville (Ind.) municipal electric light plant shows a "net profit" of $6,727, the trustees have just made a 10 per cent advance in the charge for street lighting. This may be accounted for by the fact that the "profits" are figured before allowing for interest and depreciation, which amount to nearly $10,000 a year.

The municipal electric lighting plant of Knightstown, Ind., is in need of extensive repairs, and it is proposed to issue $10,000 in bonds if approved by a referendum vote. The members of the city council contend that prices for electric service must be greatly increased to make the plant self sustaining.—Electrical World.

$4,000 BAIL REQUIRED OF CHARLES HOOD

Habeas Corpus Proceedings Held Tuesday and That Sum Named.

CRIME TOOK PLACE HERE JULY 18

Clingan, using vulgar Language, became embroiled with Hood of the Restaurant, with result that he in some way lost his Life.

Habeas corpus proceedings were instituted before Judges Boyd and Henderson on Tuesday, by Mr. Quintain Hood, of Fairmont, W. Va., so as to get his son, Charles Hood, released on bail from the county jail, where he is confined for the murder of Robert Clingan, of Rowlesburg, W. Va. After hearing the testimony for the State, conducted by Attorney Thayer, as well as testimony for the defense, conducted by Counsel Peddicord, the judges decided to give the tresspasser his liberty for $4,000 bail. The father stated that he would furnish the required sum in a few days. The judges stated that they felt justified in granting the prisoner bail, because it would be a source of great expense to the tax payers of the county [illegible] imprisoned until December.

The crime with which Charles Hood is charged is the murder of Robert Clingan. The crime took place in Oakland, on Thursday afternoon. Hood worked in Hinebaugh's restaurant on Railroad street. His wife was above the restaurant and they had been married but about three weeks.

Clingan, intoxicated, came up to the restaurant and got a shoe shine from Holmes Browning and Charles Whetzell. While in front of the restaurant, he used some very vulgar language. Hood requested him to stop but he kept on. Hood then went and asked his wife if she had heard the vulgar remarks. When Hood learned that his wife upstairs had heard the vulgarity, he went after Clingan, a struggle ensued, in which one witness testified at the habeas coapus proceedings, Hood used a pop bottle with which he struck Clingan once over the head. Another witness contradicts this.

After the struggle before the restaurant, Clingan seems to have staggered to a telegraph pole on the platform nearby, Hood still continuing the pommeling with his fists. Later, Clingan seems to have been thrown upon the railroad track, unconscious either from the continual hammering or from a blow upon the head by a blunt instrument like a bottle, either of which caused a gash upon the left side of the head above the ear. Did Hood hit Clingan with a pop bottle? Upon the answer to that question hangs the fate of Hood. The court next December will decide which testimony to accept, and in so doing will decide whether Hood is guilty of merely assault and battery or of murder. The court will decide whether the blow on the side of the head was received by falling upon the railroad or from a bottle in the hands of Hood. The answer to that question will throw the scales of justice either for or against Charles Hood.

On Friday morning after the day of the deed, a post mortem examination was carefully conducted by Drs. Legge and McComas, and the former testified at the proceedings Tuesday, that Clingan had come to his death from hemorrage of the brain, caused by a blow from some blunt instrument striking the left side of the head above the ear. The doctor stated that he was unable to testifiy whether the blow there had been inflicted by a solid body in the hand of some person or whether it had been caused by the head's striking upon some object like a tie or a rail. The doctor also stated that Clingan had died before he could be gotten to his office; apparently about five minutes after the blow was struck.

WHEAT EXCELLENT IN GARRETT COUNTY

Much Better Crop Than Many Believed We Would Have.

MEANS MUCH TO OUR FARMERS.

Tomatoes, Cucumbers, Will Remain High Until the Local Crop Materializes—Wheat Crop Short in West.

It is stated by persons well posted that Garrett county will produce its usual amount of wheat this year. The lateness of the season had led many to think that the crop would be far below the average, but this seems to be a mistake. In Garrett county there will be an average yield, and yet prices are high.

Hay is going to yield an excellent crop; potatoes will produce enormously; corn will be far below the average, much of corn-lands having been replanted in buckwheat. Buckwheat itself promises to multiply well and bring an excellent crop.

Tomatoes, cantaloups, cucumbers, and other similar vegetables, seem to hold the high price with which they began when the season for them opened. All of them for this year have been shipped in and the prices remain high. The prices will likely remain where they are until the products of Garrett county are brought to market.

The report comes from the eastern sections of the State that Maryland will produce more wheat this year than Texas, Oklahoma and Indian Territory combined, and with the present high prices of wheat, it is expected that the Garrett county farmer will reap a harvest.

According to the Government crop report of last year, Maryland produced 12,902,416 bushels of wheat. This sold, according to the Government, at an average price of 71 cents a bushel, and the farmers of this State obtained a total of $9,160,715.

This year, while the figures are not yet complied, it is known that the Maryland crop is in excellent condition, and more wheat will be produced than last season.

Wheat this year is bringing about 20 cents a bushel more than last season, the price of Southern wheat now being over 90 cents a bushel. Thus the Maryland farmer will not only harvest a larger crop, but will get bigger prices.

On the other hand, the crops of Texas, Oklahoma and Indian Territory are short this year. On July 1 the Government estimated that the State of Texas would produce only a half crop. Last year the Texas crop amounted to over 14,000,000 bushels.

The receipts of Southern wheat today were heavier than any previous day this season. They amounted to 35,958 bushels. The total receipts of Southern wheat for the season amount to 216,473 bushels. This does not compare favorably with last year, as at this date in 1906 the total receipts amounted to 692,812 bushels. This is explained, however, by tee backward season this year, owing to the cold spring.

COILS OF JUSTICE SEIZING GUILTY

Every Effort Being Made to Secure Murderers of Joe S. Harris.

MANY POINTS ARE WON BY STATE

Thirty Witnesses Examined at Bloomington Thursday and Efforts to Arrest Guilty are Greater Today than Ever.

More than thirty witnesses were examined by State's Attorney Thayer at Bloomington last Thursday evening, and the proceedings were continued until about one o'clock in the morning. While there has not yet been evidence enough gotten to cause an arrest, yet the authorities feel that their labors are not without their reward for they are fully confident today that the coils of selves upon the party or parties who in cold blooded murder took the life of Joe S. Harris, near his home town of Bloomington, between July 4th and 18th.

There are several points of evidence which are very valuable to the state officials but as yet they are not ready for publication. But no stone is being left unturned to bring the guilty parties to justice.

AGENT WASHBURN RESIGNS.

Local Office in Charge of J. W. Martin, Until Regular Man is Appointed.

Mr. V. V. Washburn, who has been agent at the Oakland station for several years, on Monday sent to the railroad management his resignation as agent here. The reason assigned by Mr. Washburn for the resignation is that the railroad company refuses to send him help enough to do the work that is to be done at the local office. In the summer, the work is greatly increased, and it seems impossible for the same force to do the work the year around.

Mr. J. W. Martin, a relief agent for the company, is at present doing the work at the local office; he will stay here until another man to fill the position permantiy is secured. Mr. Washburn has no other plans at present except to stay at Oakland during the summer months.

MASONS TO LAY THE CORNERSTONE

Local Lodge Has Been Invited to Conduct the Ceremonies.

SEVERAL ELOQUENT SPEAKERS

Ample Preparations Will Be Made to Make the Ceremonies Appropriate to the Laying of the Cornerstone of the New Temple of Justice.

The building committee of the new court house appeared before the County Commissioners Tuesday, and asked that the Oakland Lodge of Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons be invited to conduct the ceremonies of laying the corner stone of the new temple of justice now in course of construction at Oakland. The commissioners readily coincided with the request, giving the organization the honor of conducting the ceremony.

The Masons met the same evening and accepted the invitation. Plans are now being formulated by the local lodge whereby many organizations and noted and eloquent speakers will be asked to take part in the exercises. The aim will be to make them of such a character that they will not soon be forgotten, and so that they will reflect credit upon our county to those visiting Masons, to those members of other organizations who are present, and to the visiting orators who will be present when the ceremonies are conducted, which will take place in about one month.

In the corner stone which will be laid, there will be placed valuable records of Garrett county, of current events, many newspapers, records of the corner stone laying, and accurate biographies of those men who are building the new court house, as well as of the men who have made the edifice possible. Such records will be exceedingly vauable to future generations, should the building ever be torn down or destroyed. The papers and all such records always keep well preserved in corner stones.

That Debate in Friendsville.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Believing that your paper is a public journal, willing to hear the other side, I write in reply to the article that appeared in THE REPUBLICAN of July 11.

1. As to the authorship of the article in the issue of July 4th, I will say that I was not the author of it, nor did it come from the Lutheran church. Therefore, the attack in the issue of July 11th was entirely uncalled for.

2. In regard to challenging, I am willing to let the citizens of Friendsville be the judges as to which side threw out the challenges, especially those citizens who attended the meetings. I accepted his challenge to the world, which I had a right to do. The article says that my opponent did not know that there was such a person in existence as H. C. Salem, and consequently without this knowledge, was in no position to challenge him. If he did not know of my existence then, I hope he knows of it by this time. Now I ask, when a person challenges the world, or any person, whether it is necessary for him to know the person who is going to accept the challenge before he makes the general challenge?

There are many challenges thrown out by men. When they make then, they do not know who is going to accept the challenge. I am willing to have the document published in the county papers and let the reader judge for himself, if it is a challenge or an acceptance of a challenge, provided that the entire document is published.

3. In regard to the manuscript and clippings I will say that I prepared my matter with a great deal of care, writing out most of the arguments, which every man should do when he debates. I preferred to have some system about my debate, some logical order about it. My opponent had notes too. The only difference was that I had written mine with a typewriter and he had written his with a pen or pencil. Why did not the author of the article find fault with the other speaker for having notes? When we wish to get passages of scripture, must cut them out of the Bible or can we not copy them from the scriptures? In regard to the pasted clippings, let me say, that several years ago I collected a number of passages of scripture in which the Greek preposition occurred and showed conclusively that they were used in a variety of meanings in the New Testament.

I had the article published in one of the church papers. During the debate my time was divided between a very sick child and the debate. I felt that it would save my time to transfer my article to my manuscript. The matter being plain Bible facts which I had collected, I had a right to transfer them to my manuscript. The writer of the article never came up to the stand to see the clippings whether they were from the Bible or not; whether they were proper material for the debate or not. How does he know that they were not from the Bible? Not one of the three moderators ever objected to the matter going into the debate. Now, I demand of the write of the article of July 11th, that he produced the proof that the matter I used was not germane to the debate. I require him to do so. It is one thing to make bold assertions and another thing to prove them. My opponent made a bitter attack on me for transferring the matter to my manuscript. I demand a public apology for the attack, he never made a public nor private apology. I had about concluded that the reason why the attack was made was because, perhaps, the Bible material on the affirmative side was getting scarce and the attack was to fill in or kill time.

I am willing that the matter on the Greek preposition shall go before the world for criticism. And I am positive the unprejudiced Greek schools will sustain my position on the prepositions and on all my matter in the book, and say that my position is logical and correct.

4. When you come to read the book, you will find that the author is very badly mistaken when he says that no Hebrew words were used. The fact is there were more Greek and Hebrew words used than the opposition cared about hearing. I am willing to let the book show whether I defined.

The Hebrew and Greek word that I used and where I defined them by the Bible or by the opinions of men. The articles casts a slur upon the moderator on the negative side. No man can be graduated from any Lutheran Theological Seminary unless he can stand an examination in Hebrew and Greek scriptures, nor can he be ordained a minister unless he stands a rigid examination on every branch of theological learning. My moderator did not make any great display of his learning, but he can stand an examination with any of the men in my opponent's church.

5. The author of the article pass as by in silence the part about getting drunk, playing cards and dancing.

6. In regard to the tremendous arguments of the affirmative speaker, I wish to notice that they were made up to a large extent of mere personal abuse in violation of the conditions which said that the debate must be free from personalties. Now on the last evening the affiirmative speaker instead of giving plain Bible readings, quoted Sam Jones, Clark, Moody, Talmage. Now I wish to ask the writer of the article whether these quotations were "plain scripture readings" or simply the opinion of men? I demand a yes or no answer. Beecher and the Catholic church were quoted at the afternoon session. Now while these quotation were being made I could come to no other conclusion than that the Bible material on the other side was getting scarce.

In speaking of the tremendous arguments do not think the author refers to the illustration of the rag and bason when the other speaker borrowed my bason and rag and confirmed my illustration. Coming over on my side, for both speakers were agreed on that illustration; or the swine illustration for both speakers were in accord; also the illustration about hitting the horse with the whip to get motion. Both speaker agreed on this illustration.

7. In regard to the bluff and forcing our views on others, it is not necessary for the Lutheran church to do so. Our church has had a remarkable growth since she was founded in this country, having doubled her membership every seven years since 1638. This was done, not by bluff, proselyting from other churches, but by immigration, preaching the pure word, and taking good care of her children by training them up in the faith. Her growth since 1638 in this country has been, not spasmodic, but conservative, steady and solid. According to Dr. Carroll's statistics for 1900, the Lutheran church increased five and nine-tenths per cent. A very large percentage. A cause that must be built up by proselyting deserve to to perish and the sooner the better.

I wish to congratulate our Lutheran people of Friendsville on their loyalty to their confirmation vows. Not one has forsaken the solemn vows taken.

8. I hope that the published book will have a large sale, that it will pass through several editions and will never get out of print. The book will be for sale by me, and I will be glad to supply copies to all who may want them. Read the book through several times and form your own opinion as to which side adhered the more closely to the word of God. Let the truth prevail. Weigh every sentence in the book in the crucible of word and plant yourself squarely on the solid rock. Decide for yourself whether the proposition has been defined and proven. Do as the bereans did, who search the scriptures daily whether those things were so. I assure the public that they will find no quotations from Beecher, Talmage, Clark, Sam Jones, on the negative side, in the book. Weigh the tremendous arguments of my opponent.

9. Shortly after the debate, I received an anonymous slurring postal in regard to the debate. It was mailed at Confluence, Pa. The name and address had been written on the card and then erased, and the name and address printed on the card. Part of the writing is yet visible. I regarded the card as a last echoing gun of a lost cause. The card had on the words "all rights reserved," so I concluded that the sender, who ever he is, has taked the advice I gave during the debate about the patent right. I have been keeping the card as a sort of curiosity, any one wishing to see it can do so free of cost by calling at the parsonage. I would however, caution all your readers not to imitate the picture on the card because all rights are reserved by the sender, who ever he is. The citizens have been hearing a great deal of late about blockheads. I conclude that the postal must have come from some blockhead, who did not have the moral courage to sign his name. In regard to the proposition I say, farewell, rest in peace.

In conclusion I wish to thank the writer of the contribution in your issue of July 11th for writing the article. The appearance of the article has done more to solidify public sentiment on my side than anything he could have done. He has my thanks.

Oil Well News.

The directors met Saturday, and made a contract with the oil well drilling company to carry the well one thousand feet deeper. This makes the contracts in all call for the well's being three thousand feet deep. The action of the directors was taken only after considering that every indication seemed to approve the new contract.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 45 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Order of Publication.

No. 1479 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland.

Emma Fike vs. Ezra B. Fike.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree divorcing the plaintiff from the defendant a vinculo matrimonii.

The Bill states that the plaintiff was married to the defendant on the 6th day of November, 1898; that no children were born to them as the result of said marriage; that during all of the time that the plaintiff lived with the defendant, the defendant treated her with great cruelty, harshness and brutality, and that about two years ago he deserted her and has provided nothing for her support or maintenance since said time.

The Bill further charges that after the defendant deserted the plaintiff, that he consorted, cohabited and lived with one Mira Lowery; that the said defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, for an order of publication and for general relief.

It is thereupon, this 17th day of July, 1907, ordered by the Circuit Court of Garrett county, in Equity, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 16th day of August, 1907, give notice to the said defendant of the object and substance of this Bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 2nd day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to pass as prayed.

A Fourth of July Story.

By FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet.

"NO, there won't be no celebratin', an' ye won't go traipsin' off to no town either. I went there last Fourth, an' the boys scairt my horse so he run off an' broke four dozen eggs. Nobody's goin' to step a foot off this farm tomorrer, not if I know it. The Fourth's all humbug an' foolishness."

"But ye said I might have a day off for workin' so hard through the spring," ventured the boy, a little rebelliously.

"Mebbe I did, an' mebbe I didn't, but 'tain't to be on the Fourth. Ye'll have the day some quiet time, when there ain't horses to scaire an' leadin's on to mischief. If ye're sensible ye'll wait till huckleberries are ripe, when ye c'n pick enough 'n a day to buy a pair o' shoes."

"But we furnish Reub's clothin', Enos," remonstrated his wife hesitatingly. "You know that was our 'greement with his uncle. An' Reub has worked awful hard since he come an' been a good boy."

"Reasonable clothin', Anna," impatiently; "that's the 'greement. I've had one suit o' clothes the last year, an' Reub's had one; I've had one straw hat an' one homemade cap, an' Reub's had jest the same, an' last Christmas I bought two pair o' fine dollar shoes. Mine's good yet, an' Reub's jest about gone. Talk o' being reasonable! Not many men would treat their help jest like themselves. When my shoes are worn out I'll buy two more pair. An' now, Reub," turning again to the boy, "ye'd best be gittin' off to bed. Ye must be up early tomorrer. Them stones must be all out an' the ground leveled by next week, so we c'n be gittin' in the turnip seed. How's it comin' on?"

"Pretty well, I guess, sir. I've got about forty big rocks drilled."

"Forty?" with some appearance of surprise, which, however, was instantly checked as he went on. "Seems to me ye might have done more'n that if ye'd hurried. Well, soon's they're all done they must be set off, so we c'n gather up the stones an' cart 'em away. If ye hurry like ye'd ought to mebbe ye can finish 'em tomorrer. Then I'll help carry down the powder, an' we'll set 'em off. Better do it 'fore it's fairly light, on account o' the pasture bein' next the main road. Some fool horse might git scairt an' the owner be pesterin' us 'bout damages. Come," as Reuben stood silent, but with an odd look on his face. "Didn't ye hear me tell ye to be gittin' off to bed? An' don't come home tomorrer till the last o' them big stones is drilled."

Reuben slipped quickly from the room, glad to escape any direct questions. In spite of the hard work and lack of commendation, he had never tried to evade the truth. Enos Judkins was suspicious by nature and sometimes not overscrupulous, but he knew that he could trust the boy to do just as good work when off in a field by himself as when in full view of the house and that whatever the boy said could be relied on as being absolutely true.

"Be ye goin' to let Reub help set the rocks off?" asked Mrs. Judkins as the receding footsteps grew fainter up the attic stairs. "Powder's mighty unreliable for boys to mix up with."

"Reub's safe enough," gruffly. "He helped me last year an' has helped other folks. He don't do so much work as he ought, but he's better'n the common run o' boys. An' I don't mind sayin' he drilled them rocks quicker'n I'd 'a' b'lieved anybody could. If he finishes 'em tomorrer—which, of course, he can't—I shall be with him the day arter to look out for the blowin'."

At that very moment Reuben was throwing himself upon his cot bed in the attic, shaking with merriment. Not come home on the morrow until the last one of the rocks was drilled? Lucky Mr. Judkins had been too busy to go to the road pasture during the last few days, and lucky that tree grew just outside his attic window, so he could shin down when he wanted to do a little extra work by moonlight. Wouldn't Mr. Judkins be surprised if he knew that a considerable portion of the powder had disappeared from its dry storage in the barn and was at that moment packed solidly in the bottom of a hundred or more deep holes drilled in about forty rocks, each with a fuse leading a few inches away from the top? And he had told the truth, for there were only about forty rocks altogether. He had counted them, and Mr. Judkins had not. And, not only that, had not Mr. Judkins' words implied that he wanted the rocks "set off" just as soon as they were ready? Well, he would attend to it and would see that they were set off before it was light enough for travel to commence on the road.

Enos Judkins was an extremely early riser, sometimes not waiting for the first call from the barnyard to be up and out. But the next morning even the most alert of the roosters was asleep when there came a crash which shook the very windows of the house. Enos Judkins threw himself half up then fell back with a snarl.

"Them loonatic Fourth o' Julyers," he grumbled; "they're startin' wuss'n they did last year. I never heerd them winders rattle afore. Folks 'd think 'twas right in the next room 'stead of in a village a half mile off. Huh!" for another tremendous crash, louder even than the first, again set the windows to rattling. "What they got over there, anyhow, gov'ment artilleries or Mount Pelees? The cannon they had last year didn't make quarter that noise. L-a-n-d!" as a succession of half a dozen explosions, followed by an almost continuous rumble, with scarcely an appreciable space between, shook the earth. "What is the matter, anyhow—the world comin' to an end?" He rose hastily and began to dress, for the roosters were now all crowing and the dogs barking, and from the barn came a frightened bellowing and stamping of cattle. In the darkness and utter stillness of the night the crashes were terrifying. Before he could don his clothes and get outside there were a dozen or fifteen more explosions, some coming singly, others in a long, scarcely broken rumble or in one great crash.

But, once outside, the mystery was partly explained, for the air was strong with the smell of burned powder. It was the Fourth of Julyers, as he had first thought, but how in the name of reason had they managed to make so much noise?

Then came the last crashing explosion, and he started, at first blankly, then with a sudden comprehension. The crash had not come from exactly the direction of the village, but from the road pasture.

"The young reprobate!" he cried wrathfully. "He's been settin' off them rocks, an' I told him plain they was to be let be till all was drilled. I might 'a' s'picioned from the way he took my scoldin' an' then slipped off upstairs. He needs a good larrupin', that's what he needs, an' I feel jest the right way now to give it to him." Then something of the humor of the situation seemed to strike him, for he commenced to chuckle, which was, however, instantly suppressed. "Didn't he make a noise, though!" he went on. "Whew! He must 'a' been up all night gettin' that powder ready. I wonder what the village Fourth o' Julyers are thinkin' of 'bout now, gittin' beat at their own game by a little farm boy they won't ask to none o' their doin's. I've a good mind to walk down that way an' see an' then come back an' give Reub his larrupin'. If 't wa'n't that he didn't wait like he was told I'd be minded to let him off easy jest for shakin' the village winders. I ain't heerd so much as a torpedo from there yet. P'raps they ain't been able to catch their breath back."

He stood hesitating for a few moments. Over in the east a long line of daylight was beginning to appear. Then came a loud barking from the road pasture, toward which the dogs had rushed at the very beginning of the explosion; then he heard Reub's voice calling the dogs. Well, he was glad the young scamp was not hurt, though of course there had been no real danger. He had never known the boy to be careless about such matters.

Suddenly he seemed to make up his mind, for he turned and walked rapidly toward the village, muttering as he did so: "I've got to larrup Reub for not waitin' till all the stones was drilled, of course, but I'm glad 'twas done so early, 'fore travel begun. I've laid awake nights lately thinkin' 'bout accidents an' damages."

The village was awake, as he had expected, but none of its own celebrating seemed to have yet commenced. Apparently its enthusiasm was momentarily paralyzed by the unexpected and tremendous noise which it could not hope to emulate. As he appeared among them, Enos could see fingers begin pointing toward him from the various groups, and he raised his head defiantly. He was accustomed to pointing fingers and even to hooting from the younger boys. He had not been a public spirited man, and the village had resented it. None from his farm was ever asked to join in the "doin's."

But now something very strange happened. Behind the pointing fingers he began to see smiling, admiring, even cordial faces. Several of the prominent men started toward him with extended hands.

"Well, Enos, you certainly did us up that time," chuckled the doctor as he held on to the horny hand and looked at its owner admiringly, "and, what's more to the purpose, you did up the folks in the town across the river. They've been crowing over us for ten years, setting themselves up as the most patriotic village in the county, and I'll admit they did make an outrageous racket on the Fourth. But this year we made up our minds we'd beat 'em if it split the last gun. And here you come in, without so much as a horn blowing on ahead, and do us both up. Well, it serves us right for not asking you to join in, though none of us thought you cared for such things. But how'd you come to hatch out such a plan, Enos?"

"'T wa'n't me. That boy Reub"—

"Oh, yes. We know that boy Reub did the firing. And I must say he's a prime hand at it. Some of the smaller boys started for your place at the first explosion, but when they got in sight of the field the air was so full of rocks and smoke they got scared and scurried back. Then some of us older ones went out and saw your boy Reub running the field like an engineer at his throttle. Well, it was certainly a great plan."

"But I tell ye 't was Reub"—

"Tut, tut! You've been having those rocks drilled for two weeks past. I've been by there and know. One day I saw you working with the boy yourself. And there hasn't been a single explosion in two weeks. Needn't talk to me. You've been saving up for this morn-

"HAD'D YE SET THEM STONES OFF FOR?"

ing. But there's something else. We're planning for a pretty big day, and we want you and your folks to join in. It's late asking, I know, and we feel ashamed of having overlooked you, but you must let bygones be bygones. There's to be a big dinner in the hall, and some speeches, and in the afternoon games, and then fireworks and ice cream and some other things for the evening. And, by the way, we want that boy Reub of yours to help let off the fireworks. He's a prime hand. No," as he saw protest on Enos Judkins' face, "there isn't to be any ifs or ands. You just hurry home and tell your wife to get ready and then come right over to my house. We'll start from there. But excuse me," as a figure passed them on the sidewalk, "there goes one of my patients. I want to see him a minute."

Enos Judkins walked back toward his farm in a dazed manner. They, the villagers, wanted him to join them in everything—to be one of them. It seemed incredible. His farm people had always lived apart from the village in a social way. Even his father had felt and been considered outside. 't was their way.

But something in the cordial grasp of the doctor's hand—which he had never felt before—and in the new way the people had looked at him was stirring a strange, unknown chord in the crabbed old man's heart. He had never voluntarily given a dollar for public good, and he understood that being one of the village people in a social way would involve this also, but for some reason the thought did not make him wrinkle up his face as it would have done an hour before. Indeed, it would almost seem that he found the thought a pleasant one, for more than once on the way to the road pasture he muttered: "Mebbe 'twould be wuth it; mebbe 'twould be wuth it. An' he's a real nice man, that doctor."

But when he came opposite the pasture and saw Reub working among the stones, whistling, his face hardened.

"Come here, Reub," he called angrily. Then as the boy approached, "What'd ye set them stones off for when I told ye to wait till they's all drilled?"

"They was all drilled," answered Reub. "I drilled the last rock an' had the powder all in 'fore I went home last night."

"Then why didn't ye tell me?"

"Ye didn't ask. Ye said they was to be set when all was done, an' ye said ye didn't want 'em set by daylight, when travel was goin' on. An'—an' today's the Fourth."

Enos Judkins' eyes twinkled a little, but his face remained grave. He continued to regard the boy for some moments in silence.

"Yes, 'tis the Fourth," he said at last. "I guess ye'd better go on to the house, Reub, an' put on your good clothes. An' tell Ann to git ready. We're goin' over to the village to help with the doin's."

Something to Wash Down.

One day last July little Freddie and his mother went to visit the boy's cousin, Martha. The day being very warm, Martha served lemonade and cake. Freddie, who was very fond of cake, ate all of his piece before he had drunk any lemonade. Martha, noticing this, said:

"Freddie, drink some of your lemonade and it will wash the cake down."

Freddie drank a little lemonade and sat looking longingly at the cake on the table and finally said:

"Please, Martha, can I have one more piece of cake, so as to have something to wash down with this lemonade?"—Judge's Library.

Two members of the Princeton faculty during a recent hurried trip to New York were on a Broadway car when it was stopped by a blockade. As they were near their destination, they decided to get out and walk. The blockade was, however, soon lifted, and the car overtook them.

A Fourth of July Story.

By FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet.

"NO, there won't be no celebratin', an' ye won't go traipsin' off to no town either. I went there last Fourth, an' the boys scairt my horse so he run off an' broke four dozen eggs. Nobody's goin' to step a foot off this farm tomorrer, not if I know it. The Fourth's all humbug an' foolishness."

"But ye said I might have a day off for workin' so hard through the spring," ventured the boy, a little rebelliously.

"Mebbe I did, an' mebbe I didn't, but 'tain't to be on the Fourth. Ye'll have the day some quiet time, when there ain't horses to scaire an' leadin's on to mischief. If ye're sensible ye'll wait till huckleberries are ripe, when ye c'n pick enough 'n a day to buy a pair o' shoes."

"But we furnish Reub's clothin', Enos," remonstrated his wife hesitatingly. "You know that was our 'greement with his uncle. An' Reub has worked awful hard since he come an' been a good boy."

"Reasonable clothin', Anna," impatiently; "that's the 'greement. I've had one suit o' clothes the last year, an' Reub's had one; I've had one straw hat an' one homemade cap, an' Reub's had jest the same, an' last Christmas I bought two pair o' fine dollar shoes. Mine's good yet, an' Reub's jest about gone. Talk o' being reasonable! Not many men would treat their help jest like themselves. When my shoes are worn out I'll buy two more pair. An' now, Reub," turning again to the boy, "ye'd best be gittin' off to bed. Ye must be up early tomorrer. Them stones must be all out an' the ground leveled by next week, so we c'n be gittin' in the turnip seed. How's it comin' on?"

"Pretty well, I guess, sir. I've got about forty big rocks drilled."

"Forty?" with some appearance of surprise, which, however, was instantly checked as he went on. "Seems to me ye might have done more'n that if ye'd hurried. Well, soon's they're all done they must be set off, so we c'n gather up the stones an' cart 'em away. If ye hurry like ye'd ought to mebbe ye can finish 'em tomorrer. Then I'll help carry down the powder, an' we'll set 'em off. Better do it 'fore it's fairly light, on account o' the pasture bein' next the main road. Some fool horse might git scairt an' the owner be pesterin' us 'bout damages. Come," as Reuben stood silent, but with an odd look on his face. "Didn't ye hear me tell ye to be gittin' off to bed? An' don't come home tomorrer till the last o' them big stones is drilled."

Reuben slipped quickly from the room, glad to escape any direct questions. In spite of the hard work and lack of commendation, he had never tried to evade the truth. Enos Judkins was suspicious by nature and sometimes not overscrupulous, but he knew that he could trust the boy to do just as good work when off in a field by himself as when in full view of the house and that whatever the boy said could be relied on as being absolutely true.

"Be ye goin' to let Reub help set the rocks off?" asked Mrs. Judkins as the receding footsteps grew fainter up the attic stairs. "Powder's mighty unreliable for boys to mix up with."

"Reub's safe enough," gruffly. "He helped me last year an' has helped other folks. He don't do so much work as he ought, but he's better'n the common run o' boys. An' I don't mind sayin' he drilled them rocks quicker'n I'd 'a' b'lieved anybody could. If he finishes 'em tomorrer—which, of course, he can't—I shall be with him the day arter to look out for the blowin'."

At that very moment Reuben was throwing himself upon his cot bed in the attic, shaking with merriment. Not come home on the morrow until the last one of the rocks was drilled? Lucky Mr. Judkins had been too busy to go to the road pasture during the last few days, and lucky that tree grew just outside his attic window, so he could shin down when he wanted to do a little extra work by moonlight. Wouldn't Mr. Judkins be surprised if he knew that a considerable portion of the powder had disappeared from its dry storage in the barn and was at that moment packed solidly in the bottom of a hundred or more deep holes drilled in about forty rocks, each with a fuse leading a few inches away from the top? And he had told the truth, for there were only about forty rocks altogether. He had counted them, and Mr. Judkins had not. And not only that, had not Mr. Judkins' words implied that he wanted the rocks "set off" just as soon as they were ready? Well, he would attend to it and would see that they were set off before it was light enough for travel to commence on the road.

Enos Judkins was an extremely early riser, sometimes not waiting for the first call from the barnyard to be up and out. But the next morning even the most alert of the roosters was asleep when there came a crash which shook the very windows of the house. Enos Judkins threw himself half up then fell back with a snarl.

"Them loonatic Fourth o' Julyers," he grumbled; "they're startin' wuss'n they did last year. I never heerd them winders rattle afore. Folks 'd think 'twas right in the next room 'stead of in a village a half mile off. Huh!" for another tremendous crash, louder even than the first, again set the windows to rattling. "What they got over there, anyhow, gov'ment artilleries or Mount Pelees? The cannon they had last year didn't make quarter that noise. L-a-n-d!" as a succession of half a dozen explosions, followed by an almost continuous rumble, with scarcely an appreciable space between, shook the earth. "What is the matter, anyhow—the world comin' to an end?" He rose hastily and began to dress, for the roosters were now all crowing and the dogs barking, and from the barn came a frightened bellowing and stamping of cattle. In the darkness and utter stillness of the night the crashes were terrifying. Before he could don his clothes and get outside there were a dozen or fifteen more explosions, some coming singly, others in a long, scarcely broken rumble or in one great crash.

But, once outside, the mystery was partly explained, for the air was strong with the smell of burned powder. It was the Fourth of Julyers, as he had first thought, but how in the name of reason had they managed to make so much noise?

Then came the last crashing explosion, and he started, at first blankly, then with a sudden comprehension. The crash had not come from exactly the direction of the village, but from the road pasture.

"The young reprobate!" he cried wrathfully. "He's been settin' off them rocks, an' I told him plain they was to be let be till all was drilled. I might 'a' s'picioned from the way he took my scoldin' an' then slipped off upstairs. He needs a good larrupin', that's what he needs, an' I feel jest the right way now to give it to him." Then something of the humor of the situation seemed to strike him, for he commenced to chuckle, which was, however, instantly suppressed. "Didn't he make a noise, though!" he went on. "Whew! He must 'a' been up all night gettin' that powder ready. I wonder what the village Fourth o' Julyers are thinkin' of 'bout now, gittin' beat at their own game by a little farm boy they won't ask to none o' their doin's. I've a good mind to walk down that way an' see an' then come back an' give Reub his larrupin'. If 't wa'n't that he didn't wait like he was told I'd be minded to let him off easy jest for shakin' the village winders. I ain't heerd so much as a torpedo from there yet. P'raps they ain't been able to catch their breath back."

He stood hesitating for a few moments. Over in the east a long line of daylight was beginning to appear. Then came a loud barking from the road pasture, toward which the dogs had rushed at the very beginning of the explosion; then he heard Reub's voice calling the dogs. Well, he was glad the young scamp was not hurt, though of course there had been no real danger. He had never known the boy to be careless about such matters.

Suddenly he seemed to make up his mind, for he turned and walked rapidly toward the village, muttering as he did so: "I've got to larrup Reub for not waitin' till all the stones was drilled, of course, but I'm glad 'twas done so early, 'fore travel begun. I've laid awake nights lately thinkin' 'bout accidents an' damages."

The village was awake, as he had expected, but none of its own celebrating seemed to have yet commenced. Apparently its enthusiasm was momentarily paralyzed by the unexpected and tremendous noise which it could not hope to emulate. As he appeared among them, Enos could see fingers begin pointing toward him from the various groups, and he raised his head defiantly. He was accustomed to pointing fingers and even to hooting from the younger boys. He had not been a public spirited man, and the village had resented it. None from his farm was ever asked to join in the "doin's."

But now something very strange happened. Behind the pointing fingers he began to see smiling, admiring, even cordial faces. Several of the prominent men started toward him with extended hands.

"Well, Enos, you certainly did us up that time," chuckled the doctor as he held on to the horny hand and looked at its owner admiringly, "and, what's more to the purpose, you did up the folks in the town across the river. They've been crowing over us for ten years, setting themselves up as the most patriotic village in the county, and I'll admit they did make an outrageous racket on the Fourth. But this year we made up our minds we'd beat 'em if it split the last gun. And here you come in, without so much as a horn blowing on ahead, and do us both up. Well, it serves us right for not asking you to join in, though none of us thought you cared for such things. But how'd you come to hatch out such a plan, Enos?"

"'T wa'n't me. That boy Reub"—

"Oh, yes. We know that boy Reub did the firing. And I must say he's a prime hand at it. Some of the smaller boys started for your place at the first explosion, but when they got in sight of the field the air was so full of rocks and smoke they got scared and scurried back. Then some of us older ones went out and saw your boy Reub running the field like an engineer at his throttle. Well, it was certainly a great plan."

"But I tell ye 't was Reub"—

"Tut, tut! You've been having those rocks drilled for two weeks past. I've been by there and know. One day I saw you working with the boy yourself. And there hasn't been a single explosion in two weeks. Needn't talk to me. You've been saving up for this morn-

"WAT'D YE SET THEM STONES OFF FOR?"

ing. But there's something else. We're planning for a pretty big day, and we want you and your folks to join in. It's late asking, I know, and we feel ashamed of having overlooked you, but you must let bygones be bygones. There's to be a big dinner in the hall, and some speeches, and in the afternoon games, and then fireworks and ice cream and some other things for the evening. And, by the way, we want that boy Reub of yours to help let off the fireworks. He's a prime hand. No," as he saw protest on Enos Judkins' face, "there isn't to be any ifs or ands. You just hurry home and tell your wife to get ready and then come right over to my house. We'll start from there. But excuse me," as a figure passed them on the sidewalk, "there goes one of my patients. I want to see him a minute."

Enos Judkins walked back toward his farm in a dazed manner. They, the villagers, wanted him to join them in everything—to be one of them. It seemed incredible. His farm people had always lived apart from the village in a social way. Even his father had felt and been considered outside. 't was their way.

But something in the cordial grasp of the doctor's hand—which he had never felt before—and in the new way the people had looked at him was stirring a strange, unknown chord in the crabbed old man's heart. He had never voluntarily given a dollar for public good, and he understood that being one of the village people in a social way would involve this also, but for some reason the thought did not make him wrinkle up his face as it would have done an hour before. Indeed, it would almost seem that he found the thought a pleasant one, for more than once on the way to the road pasture he muttered: "Mebbe 'twould be wuth it; mebbe 'twould be wuth it. An' he's a real nice man, that doctor."

But when he came opposite the pasture and saw Reub working among the stones, whistling, his face hardened.

"Come here, Reub," he called angrily. Then as the boy approached, "What'd ye set them stones off for when I told ye to wait till they's all drilled?"

"They was all drilled," answered Reub. "I drilled the last rock an' had the powder all in 'fore I went home last night."

"Then why didn't ye tell me?"

"Ye didn't ask. Ye said they was to be set when all was done, an' ye said ye didn't want 'em set by daylight, when travel was goin' on. An'—an' today's the Fourth."

Enos Judkins' eyes twinkled a little, but his face remained grave. He continued to regard the boy for some moments in silence.

"Yes, 'tis the Fourth," he said at last. "I guess ye'd better go on to the house, Reub, an' put on your good clothes. An' tell Ann to git ready. We're goin' over to the village to help with the doin's."

Something to Wash Down.

One day last July little Freddie and his mother went to visit the boy's cousin, Martha. The day being very warm, Martha served lemonade and cake. Freddie, who was very fond of cake, ate all of his piece before he had drunk any lemonade. Martha, noticing this, said:

"Freddie, drink some of your lemonade and it will wash the cake down."

Freddie drank a little lemonade and sat looking longingly at the cake on the table and finally said:

"Please, Martha, can I have one more piece of cake, so as to have something to wash down with this lemonade?"—Judge's Library.

Naval Battles Won by Tidal Waves.

By NIKOLA TESLA, Famous Electrician.

A NOVEL engine of war—a vessel of any kind, submarine or aerial—carrying an agent of unlimited potency of destruction, WITH NO SOUL ON BOARD, yet capable of doing all it is desgined for, as fully equipped with a fearless crew in command of its captain, must needs bring on a revolution in the present means of attack and defense.

The time is not far distant when all the tremendous wastes of war will be stopped, and then if there are battles they will be fought with water power and electrical waves.

Everything points to the development of a small vessel with internal combustion engines, extreme speed and few weapons of great destructiveness. But the new leviathan is admirably adapted to the practical requirements of the day. In attack it could alone annihilate a nation's fleet. It is equally effective in defense. If equipped with proper acoustic and electrical appliances it has little to fear from a submarine, and an ordinary torpedo will scarcely hurt it. That is why the first of these monsters, built in England, has been named Dreadnought. Now, there is a novel means for attacking a fortress of this kind, from shore or on the high seas, against which all its gun power and armor resistance are of no avail. IT IS THE TIDAL WAVE.

Such a wave can be produced with twenty or thirty tons of cheap explosive, carried to its destination and ignited by a noninterferable telautomaton.

IT IS FUTILE TO CONSIDER THE EFFECT OF AN ERUPTION OF, SAY, THIRTY TONS OF NITROGLYCERIN COMPOUND ON A VESSEL SITUATED NEAR BY, HOWEVER LARGE. THE ENTIRE NAVY OF A GREAT COUNTRY, IF MASSED AROUND, WOULD BE DESTROYED.

But it is instructive to inquire what such a wave could do to a battleship of the Dreadnought type at a considerable distance from its origin. A simple calculation will show that when the outer circle has expanded to three-quarters of a mile the swell, about 1,250 feet long, still would be more than 100 feet in height from crest to normal sea level, and when the circle is one and one-quarter miles in diameter the vertical distance from crest to trough will be OVER 100 FEET.

The first impact of the water will produce pressures of three tons per square foot, which all over the exposed surface of, say, 20,000 square feet may amount to 60,000 tons, eight times the force of the recoil of the broadside. THE FIRST IMPACT MAY IN ITSELF BE FATAL. During more than ten seconds the vessel will be entirely submerged and finally dropped into the hollow from a height of about seventy-five feet, the descent being effected more or less like a free fall.

IT THEN WILL SINK FAR BELOW THE SURFACE, NEVER TO RISE.

Railroad Development Is Dependent on Finance.

By F. A. DELANO, President of the Wabash Railroad.

RAILROAD development depends on the FINANCIAL question. In the old days men expected to get 8 to 20 per cent returns. Too often their success led to arrogance and contempt for public opinion. This, I believe, brought about hostile legislation, the first example of which was the granger legislation. The granger movement gave rise to the INFLATION OF STOCK.

This practice is vicious, if it does not actually destroy confidence. I look for a more conservative future. With the growth of the railroad, capitalization should increase from 5 to 10 per cent per annum. This is SMALL when we consider that the growth of the country's traffic in the same length of time is $1,000,000,000.

There will be less bold pioneering. Railroads will not be built WHERE THEY ARE NOT NEEDED. Existing roads will be less prone to build lines into others' territory. Railroad accounts will be as well kept and as open to the public as those of our insurance companies and trust companies.

Every step of government regulation necessitates a step BY THE GOVERNMENT TO PROTECT PROPERTY ALREADY INVESTED.

The steam locomotive will undoubtedly give way to electricity. The entire railroad traffic of the country will soon be done by ELECTRIC MOTORS. In the matter of transportation the steel cars will take the place of wooden ones. In passenger traffic railroad development is very much hindered by the disposition of legislators to limit passenger fares.

PROBABLY THE EFFECT OF ALL SUCH LEGISLATION, WHILE INJURIOUS TO THE RAILROADS NOW, IS IN THE END FAR MORE INJURIOUS TO THE PUBLIC, IN THAT IT ABSOLUTELY CLOSES THE DOOR FOR SOME YEARS TO COME TOWARD ANY DEVELOPMENT.

Aeroplane In Modern Warfare.

By Rear Admiral C. M. CHESTER, U. S. N.

WE old fellows have seen the sailing vessels give way to the armorclad steam warships, and I predict that the future will see the AEROPLANE FIGHTING MACHINE.

The aeroplane will be used for scouting purposes. With it the enemy can be seen 100 miles away, which is now impossible, and with it the SUBMARINES can be attacked.

From the aeroplane, high above water, the submarine can be located beneath the waves and explosives dropped upon it, which is the only EFFECTIVE way of fighting it.

THE AEROPLANE IS THE FIGHTING MACHINE OF THE FUTURE.

PEN PICTURES OF CALIFORNIA.

Percy proctor presents several for readers of The Republican.

To the Editor of The Republican:

From several causes the cost of living in Los Angeles and Southern California is higher than in the East. The chief cause in the high freight rates on everything. Southern Pacific Railroad, the Harriman line, controls transportation absolutely and relentlessly, the rates to and from Los Angeles were much higher and until the city acquired a strip of land twenty-two miles to the Pacific Ocean and annexed the fort of San Pedro, thus becoming a sea-fort city and securing the same freight rates as prevail in San Francisco and other coast cities where there is water competition. Another cause is the rapid growth of Los Angeles at the time when labor was scarce and cost of building material was high. Many people are forced to live in rooms and get their meals when and where they can at restaurants and boarding houses of scarcity of houses and help. A third cause is the fact that Los Angeles is a tourist-city, the headquarters for people who come from the East in early winter, travel though Southern California, and return in the spring. It is customary to charge these people two and three prices for every thing, and these inflated prices do not come down much the other six months of the year. Wages are high and people willing to work can earn nearly double what they do east of the Mississippi river, but the increased cost of every thing leaves them little or any better off. Professional men, lawyers, doctors, ministers, architects, and civil engineers, earn no more in Los Angeles than in cities of equal size in the East, but artisans, mechanics, clerks, stenographers, cooks maids trolley car men, teamsters and others who work more or less with their hands, are in demand. Laborers are usually Mexicans, negroes or Japanese coolies. These last are unlike the small neat and polite brown men one meets with in the East, but are heavy, ignorant and repulsive looking. It is the presence of these in the same classes with little white boys and girls in public schools to which Pacific Coast people object.

Although there is more work than there are workers in Los Angeles, yet there are more loafers and idlers on the streets than one sees in an eastern city, except possibly in the South where the negro population is large, they either are unable to find the job that exactly suits them or are indisposed to work at any kind. At present the demand for bricklayers, carpenters and others engaged in the building trades is less than for several years, the high cost of building material and the demand for men in San Francisco since the fire and earthquake a year ago last spring, put a stop to much new construction in Los Angeles. Now the people of San Francisco have spent all the money they got from insurance companies, and building there is on a limited scale, throwing many men out employment, the workmen there got big wages while the money lasted; bricklayers a $1.50 an hour, for example but the goose that laid the golden egg has been killed and eaten; most San Francisco merchants laid in stocks of cheap goods after the fire, thinking that the people would have little money to spend, but some store keepers were caught with consignments of expensive silks and satins the big wages earned by mechanics enabled their women folks to indulge in luxury of apparel unknown to them before, and the suppiy of the costly dress materials was sold at top prices. Somebody has the money now but not the men who made it.

The climate of Los Angeles is better from November to May than is the climate of any eastern city. It rains a great deal; in fact, all of the rain of the year falls in these six months, but it never snows nor freezes. One can work every day in the year, as far as weather is concerned. It is very hot and dusty the other six months, both increasing each month until September and October become almost unbearable to people not used to sun every day and no rain to cool the air and lay the dust. As well as the writer can see, Los Angeles offers no advantages, other than climate to those unable to bear cold weather, over Eastern cities to men and women who work for a living, with brains or hands or both together. It is a busy, bustling, growing place which may in time become a pleasant city to live in and do business, but now it resembles Chicago in its dirt, disorder and disregard for human life.

Riverside, about fifty miles northeast of Los Angeles, is the county seat of Riverside county, which is as large as the State of Massachusetts, and is the orange growing industry of Southern California, the lower third of the whole state. Less than a generation ago the country around Riverside was a desert; between November and Jnly this year nearly 7,000 car loads of organes, or 2,500,000 boxes containing three hundred and fifty million oranges, selling in Riverside for $3,000,000, were sent East. This change is due to irrigation, industry and courage. The town is beautifully laid out, all the streets being buried with ornamental trees. Magnolia avenue. with a double row of Pepper trees, is ten miles long, one hundred and thirty feet wide. Oranges groves, surrounding the bungalows of owners. are on either side. It is said to be the richest community, per inhabitant, in the United States. There is a magnificent hotel, built in the style of the old missions, covering a city block. The county building, also in mission style, extends across the middle of another block, occupying about one-third of the space, the remained, in front and rear, being made into lawns. The Albert S. White Public Park contains an unrivaled collect of cacti. One of Mr. Andrew Carnegie's libraries, beautifully located in an appropriate building, is just across the street from the hotel. The three railroads, the Southern Pacific, the Salt Lake and the Santa Fe, have made their stations conform to the general architecture, have planted the yards with semi-tropical trees and flowers, and have trained vines over adjoining and back buildings, to aid in making Riverside attractive. Sherman Iustitutute, a celebrated Indian School, is out on Magnolia Avenue, and at the foot of Roubidoux Mountain, on the edge of the city, the Government has an experiment station for bees, small fruits and vegetables and poultry. This mountain rises out of the plain, and to its summit a most perfect road has been built, going around the mountain twice upward, at a six per cent. grade, and once downward at ten per cent. grade, so that vehicles all go one way and do not meet. The views are indescribable; in every direction rows and rows of orange and lemon trees, handsome houses, the city of Riverside, winding railroad tracks and tree-lined roads, irrigation canals, reservoirs of water and snow capped mountains. On the summit is a huge California redwood cross; sixteen feet above ground, that can be seen for miles, placed there by Mr. George Miller, Riverside's best known citizen. This man, a native of California, been able to induce the railroads, other corporations and his fellow citizens, to develop Riverside on harmonious and appropriate lines, and it is a fine example of the money-value of attractiveness, neatness and beauty in a residential city. One street is given over to business and both sides of it are lined with most excellent shops, carryings stocks of best goods, which is evidence of the taste and purchasing power of the community. The population is about 10,000; there are many handsome churches and school houses.

Redlands, ten miles from Riverside and seventy miles northeast of Los Angeles, it is the gem of Southern California. It is in San Bernardino county, but is not the county seat. The population is about 8,000 and the proportion of people living in Redlands in the winter and somewhere else in the summer, is much greater than in Riverside. About 3,000 carloads of oranges were shipped from Redlands this season. Twenty years ago there was no town where this beautiful city flourishes today and its development is largely due to one man, Mr. Albert K. Smiley, the owner of the celebrated summer resort, Mohonk Lake, in the Catskill mountains, New York. Mr. Smiley is a Quaker and is now eighty years of age, hale and hearty. His twin brother died less than two years ago. Redlands is situated on a ridge which rises abruptly to the height of five hundred feet above the valley of the San Jacinto mountains and slopes down gradually to the valley of the San Barnardino mountains. Water is brought in canals and pipes from Bear Valley 6,400 feet above sealevel in the latter range of mountains, a distance of forty-one miles; a gigantic reservoir having been found by building a dam across a mountain gorge, the water is coming from springs, melted snow and rain in winter. The water is carried up to the top of the ridge and the side toward town is irrigated, while the abrupt side toward the San Jacinto canon, through which runs the Southern Pacific railroad, is not. On one side of the water line are oranges, lemons, grape fruits, apricots, figs, plums, date palms, olive and many other kinds of trees, and such flowers and roses as are to be seen nowhere else than in Southern California—nasturtiums growing wild and seeding themselves, geraniums five feet high, hedges of Gold of Orphir roses, sweet peas more abundant than garden variety, and many other kinds in profusion. Mr. Smiley owns about a hundred acres and his property is said to be worth $350,000, the profits from the orange grove supports the estate. About twenty acres next to Mr. Smiley's have been bought by W. C. Green, of the Green Copper Co., and he is putting up a house to costs $100,000. Shere are many other priuate places owned by well-known people, and two beautiful parks, a country club, with golf links, a university club for men and a club house for women, who also maintain a musical society, a large Y. M. C. A. building, a handsome opera house, fine school houses, including an enormous high school that cost $150,000 and stands in ground big enough for athletic sports. In the center of the town, surrounded by s group of small parks, is the Smiley library, which, with the small parks, were a present to the city, a gift in money worth at least $100,000. City buildings, long aud low, as suited to the climate, are to be built in one of these parks and on the opposite side of town the Baptists are to build a college for both sexes, to cost $400,000, a citizen of Redlands, a large real estate owner, having given forty acres and other citizens having subscribed $100,000 in cash. The city also maintains a ten mile clime above the valleys, from which ever changing views can be had. Every day from Los Angeles the Santa Fe and the Southern Pacific railroad each sends out excursion train through the orange groves, and stops of two house each are made at both Redlands and Riverside, that their beauties he enjoyed. At in Pasadena and Riverside, the streets of Redlands are tree lined, the business is confined to practically one section, and the churches are among the handsomest buildings.

There are no drinking saloons in eithof the three model cities. The loafing places are billiard rooms in the rear of cigar stores. in which soft drinks are sold. Those who want intoxicating liquor go from Pasadena to Los Angeles, ten mlle by trolley, or to San Bernardino from Riverside and Redlands, each ten miles also by trolley.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

On Tuesday evening next, the large auditorium in Mountain Lake Park, Mrs. J. Sumner Stone, of New York, is to give an illustrated account of her recently completed trip around the world. Young ladies dressed in the exact costumes of the inhabitants of Hawaii, Japan, Korea, China, Philippines, Java, India and Egypt, will impersonate the women of those countries. Those who have heard Mrs. Stone will know how great a treat is in store for them. She will be assisted by the eminent artist Mrs. Myrtle French Kursteener of grand opera fame, who is now the leading soprano in Dr. McArthur's New York church. This entertainment is under the auspices of the Woman's Civic Club of Mountain Lake Park.

Visitors are coming in rapidly and the hotels and boarding houses are filling up with people from all sections of the country seeking rest and recreation.

Mr. and Mrs. U A. Clayton arrived yesterday and are occupying their beautiful cottage on I street.

Mrs. P. T. Garthright, who spent some time in a hospital at Hagerstown, returned to her home here last week much improved in health.

Mrs. Collins, members of her family and friends are occupying the handsome Collins cottage on G street and Oakland drive.

ACCIDENT.

The seasons here is ideal. The prospects for wheat are good.

David Bittinger and Wm. Frazee had large barn raisings last week.

Wm. Gohringer took a trip to Pittsburg Sunday.

Both the English and German Lutheran churches here had interesting sermons Sunday.

Prof. J. C. Beahm has purchased a valuable Accident property from Mr. H. J. Georg known as the "Jacob Boyer property."

Mr. Englehart and Mr. Kight have returned from an extended trip South. They report a pleasant time in a warm climate.

Charles Speicher and family were at Oakland last week.

Surveyor of the port of Baltimore, Dr. R. A. Ravenscroft, has returned to his post of duty in our state's metropolis He has been doing some valauble work for the Government in making wonderful discoveries of irregularities and frauds by officials, etc. Would that we had men in every station of public service like the Doctor.

Prof J. E. Beahm and family started Monday on an extended trip to Virginia the Old Dominion state, for the purpose of holding meeting visiting relatives, etc.

Mr. B. W. Frantz entertained a number of friends and relatives at his pleasant home Saturday evening. Refrnshments were served.

Mr. Frantz will teach the "Rush school" this winter.

Miss Mae Ravenscroft spent a very pleasant Sunday at the home of Russell Rush near Accident.

Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Speicher, who have been visiting friends and relatives at Meyersdale, returned home Saturday.

Chas. Myers. of Pittsburg, has been spending a few days with his uncle, Mr. B. W. Frantz.

Many of our young folks anticipate attending the picnic at Cove on Saturday. We wish them all a good time.

Mrs. Glodfelty, of near Pittsburg, is visiting her daughter, Mrs. Kight, of Accident.

English preaching at the German Lutheran church is postponed until next Sunday owing to the fact that Rev. Halboth, a former minister here, and brother Oscar, have been visiting friends at Accident for several days. Rev. Halboth preached an interesting sermon in German Sunday.

Mrs. John Miller, of Westernport is spending some time with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Richter.

The teachers of this vicinity are receiving their certificates and all seem well pleased. We wish them all great success the coming session.

BITTINGER.

Hay-making begins in earnest this week, and in spite of early predictions the crop will be good.

James Bowser and Paul Beachy went up to Oakland last Monday to be present at the sale of court house Bonds on Tuesday.

Miss Pauline Bittinger, of Harrisburg, Pa., is visiting her cousin, Mrs. J. T. Lohr, here this week.

J. T. Lohr and Mrs. J. B. Emory drove down to Frostburg Monday to attend the funeral of Jacob Lohr, who was killed by train near that place on Saturday evening.

S. A. Hollingshead and family gave an exhibition of moving pictures in this village last Saturday evening, remaining here over Sunday.

Mrs. S. O. Wiley, who spent last week visiting relatives in The Cove returned to this place on Sunday.

Mrs. Hattie Engle and two little daughters came up from Baltimore last week and will remain during the summer.

Mr. C. E. Ellithorp, of this place, attended the meeting of the stock holders of the Garrett county Telephone Co., held at Hoyes last week.

The ladies of the Lutheran congregation at this place will hold an ice cream supper and festival in Ellithorp's Grove Saturday evening. Everybody come.

Free, for Catarrh, just to prove merit a Trial size Box of Dr. Shoop's Catarrh Remedy. Let me send it now. It is a snow-white, creamy, healing antiseptic balm. Make the free test and see then for yourself what this preparation can and will accomplish. Address Dr. Shoop, Racine Wis. Large jars 50 cents. Sold by all dealers.

BOUNDARY TESTIMONY ENDS.

Last testimony being taken today in the Long Continued Dispute.

Senator Price, of Charleston, W. Va., is here today to be present at the meeting wherein is being taken the final testimony in the West Virginia—Maryland boundary disputd. Full data will be taken at this meeting from those who have been working at the boundary. This will all be properly codified and sent to the Attorney General of the State of Maryland, with whom rests the prosecution of the case before the Supreme Court of the United States as to the ownership of the lands at the western extremity of Maryland.

If the Supreme Court decides in favor of Maryland, there will be no difference in the printing of the maps of Maryland, for on the present ones is included to Maryland the land that is in dispute. But there will be a change in the collection of taxes on the lands in the disputed belt, for as it is today, the state of West Virginia collects the tax money, which Maryland claims and the recent survey proves, belongs to her since the land is within her borders.

Senator Brown has been connected with the work of gathering the data for ten years, and to all of those directly connected with the work it seems like a large job well done.

FIKE.

When days are bright and clear,
The wheat is shining here,
Like gold upon the land,
Where our farmer boys stand.

Mr. Matthias Frazee has completed some repairs to his dwelling house.

Mr. T. F. Umble is helping to cut timber for Mr. Bazil Garlitz.

The teachers around here are recieving their Certificates and are now awaiting the institute.

Mr. Francis Fike is working for Mr. Isaiah Umble.

Mr. James Frantz rides around with a high head, and when at home sits out on the porch with his shot gun in his hands. The reason for this is that a new daughter arrived at his place on July. 14, 1907. Of course he can offord to watch his house carefully.

On Wednesday morning about 4 o'clock, we had the hardest rain that the people of this vicinity have experienced for years. The rain fell in torrents and considerable damage was done to bridges and to spring houses.

Mr. Frank Bowser put up his lime kiln last week.

Mr. John Miner, a farmer that lives about one and half miles from here, across in W. Va., has lost his mind and they kept him tied for some days in hopes of his recovery in a few days, but he kept getting worse all the time and on Friday July 19th, his parents sent him to Weston W. Va., to the asylum. We all hope for Mr. Miner's speedy recovery. He is about 45 years of age.

Mr. J. A. Fike and wife made a business trip to Markleysburg, Pa., one day last week.

The stone masons are at work laying the wall for Mr. Wm M. Fike's new house.

Mrs. Louisa Fike has returned from her visit and is at home.

Master Roy Fike fell into a lime kiln and the skin of one leg was burned off.

CARTER.

I will mail you free, to prove merit, samples of my Dr. Shoop's Restorative and my Book on either Dyspepsia, The Heart or The Kidneys. Troubles of the Stomach, Heart or Kidneys, are merely Simptoms of a deeper aliment. Don't make the commen error of treating the symptoms only. Symptom treatment is treating the result of your ailment, and not the cause. Weak Stomach nerves the inside nerves—mean Stomach weakness, always. And the Heart, and Kidneys as well, have their controlling or inside nervs. Weaken these nerves, and you inevitably have weak vital organs. Here is where Dr. Shoop's Restorative has its fame. No other remedy even claims to treat the "inside nerves." Also for bloating, biliousness, bad breath or complexion, use Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Write me to-day for sample and free Book. Dr. Shoop, Racine, Wis. The Restorative is sold by all dealers.

SYSTEMS CONTRASTED

European State Owned Telephone Service Woefully Deficient.

How the Talking Wire Is Operated as a Business Proposition—Not Only Is It Conducted Much More Efficiently In America Than Abroad, but Employees Are Better Paid and Better Treated Here.

By WALTER W. BURGESS.

It is my opinion, based upon a study at first hand, that the state owned telephone systems of Europe compared with the telephone systems of this country, both as regards development and from a financial and service standpoint, are woefully deficient. So ludicrous is the comparison that it puts me in mind of the American gentleman who, when traveling in Asia Minor, insisted upon the similarity of the rivers in that country with the rivers in Ohio—because there were salmon in both.

I have been greatly impressed with what I might term the telephone habit of the people in this country. The various telephone companies appear make every effort to foster and develo still further this habit, both by attractive schedules of rates, graded so tha they make provision for the most moderate user, and by adopting improvements which will tend to make the use of the telephone more frequent. Contrasting this with the state of affairs in Europe—take London, for example—it is a common occurrence and within my own personal knowledge that nine months have elapsed between the date of the order being given and the actual installing of the telephone. In Germany there are two stated periods during the year in which telephones are installed. Should a person require a telephone installed apart from either of these two set periods a special charge is made. In addition to this, all intending subscribers must first obtain written permission from their landlords.

The rates for long distance service in this country are much higher than in Europe, but the service given, which is the real criterion, is correspondingly much more satisfactory. Although the rates in Europe are low, you cannot get service. In continental Europe especially the toll lines are so limited that practically throughout the busy hours of the day up to late in the afternoon the lines are continually blocked. This has led to the establishing of what are termed "urgent rates." For instance, if you require to communicate with a subscriber promptly by paying three times the amount of the ordinary rate your call takes precedence over the ordinary message. In Great Britain a toll line can only be held for a six minute period, when the line must be relinquished, a restriction which only a government department would dare to enforce and which would not be tolerated by the business men of this country.

The contrast between the operators is most marked. I have been impressed with the intelligence, vim, snap, call it what you will, of the American operator. When I consider the number of calls they handle, their speed and accuracy seem to me little short of marvelous. I was astonished at the length the companies go in looking after their physical welfare. After looking through an exchange in Chicago I was shown over the operators' retiring rooms. I could not help contrasting the pleasant surroundings with those of an exchange I visited in Paris. There the switchboard was in an extremely dirty condition, and the switch room had evidently not been cleaned for days. No retiring or lunch rooms were provided for the operators, who apparently were doing just as they pleased. Some were reading, and some were indulging in animated conversation, the answering of calls being quite a secondary consideration. In Berlin, Stockholm and London the surroundings were certainly much better, but nothing to be compared with what I saw in Chicago, and the operating was terribly slow. I attribute this difference to the fact that, whereas in America the operator's position and advancement depend upon her ability, in Europe the operators, being a part of the civil service, cannot be discharged and thus, having obtained a position for life, have no further incentive and rapidly absorb the well known inertia of that department.

As far as my investigations go, the telephone systems in this country are managed along commercial lines. Rates are fixed with regard to the actual cost of giving service, improvements are adopted as soon as their efficiency has been demonstrated, and a plant which, owing to improvements in the art, has become obsolete is at once discarded. This is far from being the case in Europe. There the business is conducted by methods that are neither practical nor commercial. Considerations which are quite foreign to the business enter in. Rates are fixed without regard to the factors which should govern them. For instance, in Switzerland the same rate is charged in Davos, a city 8,000 inhabitants, as in Zurich, with 150,000 inhabitants. The tendency is also very great to oppose any improvement or any change which tends to make additional expenditure necessary. Berlin is now just adopting the common battery system after operating for years with a cumbrous and old fashioned grounded line magneto system. It has been periodically announced that the telephone system of Paris is to be reconstructed on modern lines, but each year there is a new excuse, and Paris is still struggling along with a most miserable and hopelessly antiquated system.

INSTITUTE PROGRAM IS NOW COMPLETED.

Efforts Being Made to Have Excellent Institute This Fall.

DR. ARMSTRONG ON THE PROGRAM

"Stepping Stones to Literature," Title of New Text Book Introduced. Addition Being Made to Hutton School Building.

The program for the County Institute which is to be held in the local school house from September 9th to the 13th, has been completed by Superintendent Browning. Among the prominent speakers who have been engaged are Prof. R. A. Armstrong, of the West Virginia University, Prof. Gibson, of the Baltimore State Normal, and Dr. Thos. D. O'Bolger, of the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. In the three, the teachers of Garrett county will find a trio filled with excellent ideas in teaching, and capable of inspiring renewed vigor in the pedagogical work for the coming school year. Dr. O'Bolger is the only stranger of the three and he comes with flattering words of commendation from other places where he has engaged in institute work. While here, he will speak upon grammar and English branches in general.

The county superintendents delegated for Oakland are Dr. S. Simpson, of Carroll county; Mr. Earl B. Wood, of Montgomery county; and Dr. E. W. McMastet, of Worcester. Dr. Stevens, state superintendent, will be present and preside the usual number of days.

Dr. Boone, who has been lecturing to the teachers of this county for the past several years at their institutes, will not be here this year.

The school board has introduced a text book to be used in all the schools throughout the county. The title of it is, "Stepping Stones to Literature." Four hundred copies of the book have been ordered, to be used in the third grade only.

A contract for building a one-room addition to the Hutton school building has been let to Mr. E. C. Weimer.

Wonderland.

A most marvelous moving picture show will open for the public in the Townshend building on Alder street in Oakland at an early date. A new and lately improved Edison machine will be operated every evening and all the latest productions in that line will be shown. Look for a later announcement. Admission only five cents. 1t

Write a postal to Mr. U. G. Palmer, Hutton, Md., for prospectus of "Maryland Mining Company," now ready.

WEATHER FOR AUGUST.

Frequent Showers Will Help Humanity Bear the Heat.

Peter R. Smith hands us the following forecast for August:

August will be warm and dry during most of the month. Some very intense electric showers will develop, but the showers of rain will be scattering, limited in quantity and area.

About every five or seven days the winds will change around to the west, which will relieve the heat very much for a short period.

The disturbed and cloudy weather at the opening of the month will continue to the 3d with a tendency to rain. A very high temperature will spread over the country from the 5th to the 7th, attended by thunder showers, remaining cloudy to the 9th or 10th, when clearing weather westerly winds will bring a very agreeable temperature.

A return to the heat and storm conditions will materialize on or touching the 11th to the 15th, when thunder and light showers of rain will be in transit, passing, eastward. The general drouth will not be entirely relieved, but the heat will be lessened for several days and fresh ozone will come in as a strengthening friend.

On or touching the 18th or 19th local showers will prevail, relieving the heat for the present.

From the 22d to on or touching the 25th the heat will be intense and showers will be on transit. As the showers pass all given points in their passage the western winds will rush in behind the stormwave and relieve the heat.

The last disturbed period will be at or near the close of the month, when fresh ozone from the northwest will relieve the heat touchidg the 1st or 2d of September.

PYTHIANS AT NEWBURG.

Local Lodge Makes a Visit to that Town and Performs Some of its Wonders There.

A large delegation of the members of the local Lodge, Knights of Pythias, went to Newburg W. Va., on Monday afternoon and evening and conferred the third degree upon several uninitiated citizens of Newburg and thereabouts. The Oakland delegations reports and excellent time, and says it enjoyed the visit very much.

Among those who went were Messrs. Semmes Hamill, Thomas Little, N. S. Heindel, Eugene Baugartner, W. J. Whorton, Ernest Townshend, Roy Winters, Luther Brown, Wade Hinebaugh, Madison Casteel, D. V. Vaughn, Arther and william Lawton, Harper Bartlett, Erbie Lantz, C. A. Bolden, C. J. Rathbun, Henry Lauer, Elsie Naylor, Walter Morrison, W. D. Dixon.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK'S SILVER ANNIVERSARY

Famous Summer Place Celebrates Its Twenty-Fifth Anniversary.

GOV. WARFIELD CAME LAST NIGHT

Congressman Pearre Spoke Last Night on Universal Suffrage—Regular Session of Mountain Chautauqua Opens Tomorrow.

The silver jubilee anniversary of the Mountain Lake Park Association, the twenty-gifth anniversary of the association, found the Park looking its very best in its summer garb. A large number of cottages, with but a few exceptirns here and there, are all occupied with their summer residents. More than a dozen States are represent d among the cottagers. These cottages are tastefully furnished and are all happily located for the summer season. A number of events such as the student conference, the interdenominational camp meeting, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, anniversary conference of the home mission and church extension board in connection with the anniversary of the Woman's Home Missionary Society, all proved helpful and every one of them was a success.

Prominent missionaries, such as Dr. Harris E. Kirk, Dr. S. C. Sweet, Dr. Charles Roads, Bishop L. B. Wilson, Dr. J. H. Fitzwater, Dr. C. W. Barnes, Dr. Franklin McElfresh, Dr. T. E. Cramblet and many others of eqal prominence and influence in the church have taken part in these services.

Immediately before the reception beginning at 8:30 under the auspices of the Woman's Civic Club, Mrs. J. Sumner Stone, of New York City, gave a unique entertainment entitled "Around the World in Sixty Minutes." Mrs. Stone has just returned from this trip and told where she was, what she saw and showed the people of the countries visited in their national costumes. In the beginning, by request, she told of her experience in a shipwreck of the Manchuria in August last. She described Hawaii, Japan, Korea, China, Philippines, Java, Burma, India and Egypt.

Madame Kursteiner, better known to the public as Myrta French, of grand opera and oratorio fame, rendered two very fine selections to the delight of the audience. The accompanist was Mr. Roland, of Philadelphia, who gave a very fine selection. A Japanese story and a Chinese yamen, Oriental draperies and plants made fine stage setting.

The address last evening by Col. George A. Pearre was listened to by only a handful of people, there not being over three hundred in the amphitheater. "Universal Suffrage" was the subject of Congressman Pearre's address. He advocated woman suffrage and showed the need of laws to curtail bribery and the use of liquor at the primary election polls. His address, which was read, occupied about an hour and a half.

Governor Warfield will be the center of attraction today. He arrived last evening on No. 1 coming in a private car. He will take part in the exercises of the entire day. Governor Dawson, of West Virginia, sent word yesterday that owing to the great rush of business at the West Virginia capital he will be unable to be here today.

Tomorrow, the regular session of the Mountain Chautauqua opens and will continue until the 28th.

On Friday and Saturday after leaving Mt. Lake Park, Governor Warfield will join the party of officials of the Consolidation Coal company for an inspection of its property in the region of Fairmont, W. Va. The officials of the company and their guests will travel in a special train, leaving Baltimore at 9 o'clock on Thursday night, and will be joined at Mountain Lake Park by the Governor. The tour of inspection will last two days, and will end with a dinner at the Deer Park hotel on next Saturday night.

S. H. Bartlett, of Grafton, and Miss Jesse E. Kuhn, of Rose Hill, W. Va.

VICTORY FOR LOWNDES.

A Revolution in Affairs Political in Our Neighboring County.

Mr. Lloyd Lowndes was victorious in the primary elections held in Allegany county on Saturday, he securing 28 districts out of a total of 39, Congressman Pearre winning but 11. The landslide for Lowndes was a great surprise to the politicians of the State. The Republican County Central Committee was selected at the convention held Monday, and all of its members are Lowndes men. Ex-Senator Dick took an active part in the campaign and so again is in with the leaders of the Republican party in Allegany county. No delegates were elected to the state convention to be held at Baltimore, a mass delegation having been decided upon. This victory of Lowndes will make the contest between Pearre and Lowndes for political honors in Allegany sharper and more hotly contested even than it has been during the past few years.

THE DEATH RECORD.

JOHN G. RILEY.

At his home near Kearney, this county, at three o'clock Friday afternoon, John G. Riley passed away from this life. He was buried Sunday morning at ten o'clock, in the White church cemetery, funeral services being conducted in that church by Rev. E. P. Idleman, the pastor of church of which deceased was a member. He was 75 years and 8 months of age, and is survived by a widow, three sons, and five daughters, among whom are Dallis, William and Luther Riley, Mrs. James D. Harvey, Mrs. Norman Shellinberg, Mrs. Laura Lantz, Mrs. Emma Bowers, and Miss Grace Riley. The deceased was born in Hampshire county, W. Va., coming to this county when 23 years of age, residing in Garrett ever since he came except about two years in the west. Forty eight years ago he was married to Miss Ellen Biggs, of Garrett county. Mr. Riley was very active in church work and is well known throughout the county for the exemplary citizenship which he set forth in his life.

HAL SMOUSE.

Hal Smouse, eight months old, and one of the twin children of Mr. and Mrs. Howard Smouse, died at the home of the parents in Loch Lynn Heights, Sunday evening about six o'clock. The remains were taken to the church in Loch Lynn where services over them were held, and later were interred in the cemetery at Oakland. A large number of friends and sympathizers of the parents attended the obsequies.

MRS. ELLEN ZINKAN.

Mrs. Ellen Zinkan, 61 years old, widow of Henry Zinkan, died Friday morning at her home, in Accident, Garrett county, Md. Mrs. Zinkan was born at Cove, Md., and since her marriage, which was in 1868, has made her home in Accident. Her husband died 20 months ago. She is survived by two sons and three daughters. One son is dead. The children are Messrs. Edward and William Zinkan, the former unmarried; Mrs. Mary Burkhard, Mrs. Amelia C. Hartig and Mrs. Matilda Goehringer. The funeral took place Sunday morning and the services were conducted by Rev. Blievernicht, pastor of the German Lutheran church. The remains were buried in the German Lutheran cemetery.

She fell asleep in Jesus
The one we loved so well;
How much we truly loved her
No one but God can tell.

Oh, parent, could you but speak to us
Or could you live again,
Our aching hearts would then be glad,
But this we wish in vain.

She is gone but not forgotten,
Still we miss her more and more,
Yet to earth we'd not recall her
From the bright eternal shore.

BY HER LOVING CHIDREN.

INTEREST STRUCK IN BONDS.

Interest on County Bonds are Figured Out By Specialists.

"The Daily Bond Review," of New York city, one of the leading bond authorities in America, has published a report on the recent sale of bonds which was made in this county for the erection of the court house. The rate of interest is there given as 4.657 per cent. This is considered a very low rate by financiers here, and the County Commissioners are considered lucky in having disposed of them at such a low rate of interest, in these days when money is held at such high rates. Many other sales of Bonds are reported in the same issue of the "Review," and very few sales are reported as below 5 per cent., with many of them being near 6 per cent.

HOOD'S BOND NOT YET FORTHCOMING

Owing to Citizenship in West Virginia It is Difficult to Get Bail.

VISITED DAILY BY HIS WIFE

Several Fairmonters Agree to Secure Any Marylanders Who Go Upon the Bail—Hood Very Cheerful Throughout It All.

Charles Hood is still imprisoned in the county jail, not having yet provided bail to the sum of $4,000, which amount was set by the judges at the habeas corpus proceedings conducted Tuesday, July 23rd.

Mr. Quintain Hood, the father of the accused, has been making every effort to secure citizens who will obligate themselves to that amount. He has had difficulty because he nor his son are not very well known here, both being from Fairmont. The father, however, has the names of several prominent citizens of Fairmont who will secure any Maryland citizens who can be gotten to go upon the bond, cttizens of Maryland being required by our law.

In it all, Hood himself maintains the most cheerful spirit and feels that everything will come out for the right and in his favor at the end. Never once, has he allowed himself to become dejected nor melancholy, but has kept up the most cheerful spirit throughout all the days. And if he is to be incarcerated until December, he says that he can make up his mind even to endure the long imprisonment.

He is visited each day by his wife. They have half-hour interviews in the presence of the warden of the jail. The wife is a constant source of help and inspiration to her husband during his long hours of lonesomeness.

"Whistle Your Hat Back."

It isn't safe to deceive children, even in fun. This was shown very plainly at one time by an experience of an Englishman and his son upon a railway journey which they took together. While the little fellow was gazing out of the open window, his father slipped the hat off the boy's head in such a way as to make his son believe that it had fallen out the window. The boy was very much upset by his supposed loss, when his father consoled him by saying that he would "whistle it back." A little later he whistled, and the hat reappeared. Not long after the little lad seized upon his father's hat, and, flinging it out of the window, shouted:

"Now papa, whistle your hat back again."

NATIVE GARRETT COUNTAIN GETS A $7.000 OFFICE.

Otto H. Droege Appointed a Magistrate of the City of New York.

Mayor McClellan of New York before going away on his vacation appointed the two additional city magistrates provided for in the Night Court Bill, which was signed by Governor Hughes recently. The new magistrates are Joseph E. E. Corrigan, a nephew of the late Archbishop Corrigan, and Otto H. Droege. They are appointed for full terms of 10 years each. The salary is $7,000 a year.

Mr. Droege was born at Deer Park, in 1867; was graduated from the University of Maryland in 1890, and admitted to the bar the same year. He practiced law in the office of John P. Poe, of Baltimore and moved to New York 1896, where he has been engaged in the practice of law. He is a resident of the Eighteenth assembly district, of which John V. Coggey correction commissioner, is the Democratic leader; a member of the Wyandotte Club and of the general committee of the district.

Mr. Deoege is also a member of the Arion, the New York Maennerchor, the Liederkranz and the Plattdentsche Societies. Among his indorsers were ex Senator Henery Gassaway Davis, of West Virginia; Herman Ridder, France L. Weilman; Prof. Henry Wood, of Johns Hopkins University; Hugo Sohmer, Senator Rayner, Edgar Allen Poe and S. Johnson Poe.

Real Co-operation.

A Buffalo physicians tells of two young friends in that city who entered simultaneously upon their respectives careers of physician and lawyer.

Late one afternoon the newly made medico dashed into the room of his legal friend, exclaiming:

"Great luck, old man congratulate me! Got a patient at last! On my way to see him now!"

Whereupon the legal light-to-be clapped his friend on the back, saying. "Delighted, old chap!" Then, after a slight pause, he added, with a sly grin:

"Say, let me go with you. Perhaps he hasn't made his will!"

NOT ALL SUNSHINE IN THE LARGE CITIES

An Old Citizen of Garrett Speaks Advisedly On A Timely Theme.

FEW TEMPTATIONS ON THE FARM

A Life of Purity More Desirable Than a Life of "Good Times" With Its Jadedness—Living Expenses Very High—Salaries Must also be High.

There is a large number of young people leaving the farms and small towns and going to large cities. From these metropolises there come voices of warning against the flood of country youths which is pouring into large cities. The young people of the farms complain that the work of their fathers is too much like drugery, to much like slavery, and entirely too taxing upon the flesh and body.

An old citizen of Garrett county, who has seen all sides of life, and who has watched young men rise and fall, said recently, in speaking of the great desire of the country lads and lasses to live somewhere in the great centers of civilization:

"It is true that work on the farm is monotonous, but isn't that true everywhere? What work is there in the universe which is not trying upon the flesh? What work is there which after years of repitition does not become irksome to the body and cause weariness? None under the sun.

"People who live in the cities are more tired at night than are those who work on the farms. And indeed, they are far more jaded. What canses this jaded feeling of which the countryman knows but little? It is taxation of the soul and mind which creates jadedness and city citizen has that sort of taxation to great excess. City people ordinarily can't eat a meal, without at a great rush. Time in the city passes always for money, and money is always needed by the city boy and girl. The gorged meal destroys the stomach so that it never more is of value and bad health follows. It is the eternal, never-ending rush of the city which is killing the city man and woman. The farmer boy experiences just such rushes as the city man endures ninety per cent of his life, only when he tries to get the hay up and put away before the rain pours which is now seen coming across the meadow. Then there is a rush on the farm. That sort of rush prevails all the time in cities, in order to get money enough to pay expenses, to keep body and soul together. Without assurance of a very large salary, the country boy or girl should stay away from these large centers, where thousands ar e battling for a livelihood.

"Bnt, finally, the young of the cities are compelled to carry extra burdens because of the thousands of temptations to wickedness of which the boy in the country knows nothing. Liquor is sold on every corner, and other places of greater injury are run wide open all the while. The result is that but a small per cent. of the boys and girls in the cities are able to grow up and say of these doorways to hell, like the boy or girl in the rural districts, 'I never knew them.'

"It is my opinion that it is better to pass a life free of vice, if the body is tired at nights, than to live the life of the cities and have both the body and mind weary and jaded and the soul blackened by sin."

His Turn to Speak.

One of our citizens who occasionally wipes the dishes for his wife became tired of the job and refused, saying that "it is not a man's work." Not feeling disposed to loose help, she brought the Bible out to convince him of his error, and read as follows from II Kings, 21:13: "And will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish, wiping it and turning it upside down." It is needless to say that he is still doing his occasional stunt.—Confluence News.

A GRUOP OF CITIZENS HAVE A STREET MEETING

All Have Something to Say upon the Weather We are Having.

THE THREE COULD NEVER AGREE

Had the Weather Been Left to the Three, their Selfishness would have Caused a Mixup—The Pastor Philosophizes.

Mr. Dryweather met Mr. Wetweather the other day in front of the National Bank Building, in Oakland. No sooner had they met than Mr. Dryweather began to cuss the weatherman.

"Hasn't it been powerfully wet," said Mr. Dryweather, the proprietor of a hotel at the Park. "I don't know when I ever saw the gods of rain so much in power as they are during the summer of 1907. My guests have about all left my hotel because it is too rainy up here for them."

"Truly, its strange," replied Mr. Wetweather, the proprietor of a large wheat farm, of buckwheat fields, and of fish ponds. "My stocks have been living well off the excellent hay that the wet weather has produced; my fish are swimming joyfully in their wellfed waters. And none of my family nor none of my neighbor's, have been sick this summer on account of the hot weather."

The conversation was broken by the appearance of Mr. Nothingmuchtodo, who said that the weather had been such this year that he had found it impossible to get work anywhere.

"I'll give you a job driving a team for me here to town to bring in products every day," broke in Mr. Wetweather.

"I can't work outside, my friend, for sunshine, if it were to come, always makes me sick and weak."

"Do any of you men know where I can get a man to help me in my tin shop?" The question was asked by Mr. Alwaysbusy. "I never had so many roofs to repair in all my life."

Mr. Nothingmuchtodo quietly withdrew, saying he had a date for which he was already late.

The trio was joined by Rev. Takeitasitcomes. After he gave the usual pastoral handshake, he began the never-ending subject of the weather, and philosophized in this wise:

"Providence gives the weather, and decides what kind. It is grand that it is so. I once dreamed of a land where men had been given charge of the weather and the power of saying what kind. And the turmoil that ensued, it is impossible for me to describe. No one was pleased with the kind of weather that the other one would bring about. What suited the farmer killed the business of the summer resort man; and what was clover for hotel keeper, burned to a crisp the products of the farm. And one individual, apparently with nothing much to do, was always trying to get that sort of weather which would knock out the work on a job upon which he had just been hired. And he had the largest following of all the ringsters in the bunch who were trying to get control and to manipulate the wires which governed the weather. There was a constant revolution, a perfect melee, and nothing suited one of them a second. I was glad when I woke and found it a dream and learned that the weather is beyond the power of man, one of whom would get control and make the other millions suffer."

TYPICAL DEMOCRATS HAVE A MEETING

Miniature Convention of Baltimore Gathering to be Found on a Train.

FEASTS CREATE LITTLE PEACE

Three Delegates Meet and Set Forth Their Nominees—Fear of Republicans Make Them Unite to Nominate a Man of Inspirin Courage.

Their destination is Baltimore to attend the Democratic Convention which is to be held there within a few daos. There are but three of them and each is from a seperate county in our state of Maryland.

The man with the long beard and with his hair cut after the style of the lion is from Queen Anne, and he remarked, in a squakey voice:

"I'm for Jackson. He'll make the best governor for this here grand commonwealth of Maryland of ourn. I'm for him most of all, 'cause he bears the same name as one of the greatest presidents which this country ever knowed. I'm a jackson tar through and through, and I'm going to stick to the Democratic ship until she sinks or elects Jackson."

"You may be right," said the gray haired patriarch from Carrol, as he shoved the load of Democracy from one shoulder to the other and sat upright in the car seat. "But I feel equally as certain that I'm plowing the furrows to peace for our party when I propose the name of Warfield. He's the man for my money and my vote. He's done more good for our Democratic party during his term of office than did ever any other man in or out of the party. By his honesty and straightforwardness, he has driven out of the party all rascals and rogues who can not endure such manliness. I'm from Carrol county, and I'll fight and vote for Warfield until my right arm has worn itself to a shread."

The fat, chubby man from Garrett held up his hand for peace. He threw one leg over the other, straightened his collar and tie, and then placed his ideas before the other delegates.

"I admire your stand for Warfield, as well as your determination to make war. But for or against Warfield, or for or against Jackson, let the war be against the Republicans. They are our strongest enemies this fall. Their party is stronger today than ever before in its history. Most of the young men of the country today who possess ability are joining that party because it offers better opportunities for advancement. Between you and me, our old party is about on its last legs, especially in Maryland. In national affairs, it cuts no figure at all. Under the leadership of half a dozen different men, who have tried to get patronage everywhere from every party, we have been sold out of about all the principles we possess.

"Let us quit having these conferences of peace. Each one only goes to show the presence of war. Let each of us be first for peace, and then later for our favorite governor. After that my choice is Baker, a man of the people. He is the nearest to Garrett we can get. But I'm also for him, because I feel sure if the Democratic party is to be victorious this fall in the State it must be under his leadership. As it is, I fear very much if the Democratic party will have its usual majorities this fall. The Republicans, our old rivals, were never so united, so harmonious, and so set upon the accomplishment of any one thing as they are upon securing the election of a Republican governor this fall. And with the strong prestige and universal admiration of the national administration, backed by Roosevelt, helping out Maryland Republicans, I fear for my party when I think of these things, and the wisdom of the American citizens."

None of the three would be of the same mind. Neither would give into the other, with the result that all three of them when the train pulled into Baltimore, felt like members of different parties, and all wished themselved members of the Fraternal order of Republicans, and fear of them made the delegates huddle to together and nominate the man who will inspire the greatest amount of courage for the coming struggle of this fall to keep Maryland from being flooded and captured by Republicanism.

NEW IDEA IN STOCKS.

A Method to Keep the Lambs from Being Sheared So Often.

There is a custom by capitalists to run the stock of large companies far above what there really is in the value of the property itself. The process has been called "watering stock." The name is derived from the olden-time way of giving cattle a great amount of salt the day before the cattle buyer came to the farm, a few hours before he arrived to drive the cattle to the river and there let them fill themselves to the utmost; then when the dealer arrived, the cattle were driven upon the scales and weighed, with the result that the seller was paid a great amount for the weight of the water which the cattle had just drunk. This method today is condemned by every honest buyer and seller.

However, the principal involved has been carried over in the world of finance. Stock in a company is sold far beyond in value the intrinsic worth of the concern. The stock of the business is "watered." It has been difficult to reach the evils by law. The result has been that when a company goes to the wall there are hundreds of people who lose their investments, for there is not enough in the holdings of the company to make good their stock holdings. They are found like the boy on the dark night, away out in the woods, simply holding an empty sack and waiting forever.

In order to prevent watering stocks, a financier suggests that a law be passed that will compel companies to sell their stock on the basis of fractions derived from the entire holdings of the company. Then a person would not buy for instance ten $100 shares, but on the contrary, would buy e-10th or 1-4th of the entire holding of the concern. In this way it would be impossible to sell any more than a whole number. All of the cetificates of stocks must always add a whole number.

SUCCESS OFTEN AT HOME.

An Old Man Spent Many Years from Home to Get Poor, and Later to Find Wealth at Home.

The story is told of an old citizen out near Marietta, Ohio, who after years of searching for success, at last after his strength was all gone, found it at home.

There had come upon this old man in his youth a craze to become rich like many another through oil. He sold several of his farms and took the earnings and bought leases upon prospective oil fields, until all his wealth was gone except a stony farm on the hill side, too poor even to be sold. When all was lost, when all his friends had left him, and when he had nothing left but this survey of rocks, he went there to live and to die in peace.

But two years had passed when oil was discovered upon his neighbor's farm. Leasers rushed to him, and desired to get a bargain with him for the products of his farm. He refused saying, "I lost everything in leases, except this old stony farm. I guess it was the firmest of all my possessions. I shall hold fast to it."

Within one week he was made one of a company of oil dealers and drillers with the result that today he is a millionaire. He at last found that at home for which he had been spending his life seeking in other parts of the world.

By Philip Kean.

Copyrighted, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.

Miss Carstairs was not so old or so sophisticated that she was dead to the delights of having three bunches of violets, two boxes of candy and a bundle of magazines piled up on the seat next to her. Seemingly unconscious of the glances that had followed her as she came in, she nevertheless seated herself in her chair with the feeling that she was a person of importance and one whose popularity was evidenced by the number and value of her going away gifts.

As if the gods had not been good enough, however, just as the train pulled out and Richard Marston held her hand in a last farewell, the porter staggered in bearing a huge hamper, fruit filled and flower decorated, such a hamper as one sees only in the tropical paradise of millionaires.

Marston eyed it jealously.

"Such a display of money," he criticised.

"It's beautiful," Miss Carstairs assured him.

"Oh, well, my violets won't have a chance now," but it was a question rather than an assertion, and Miss Carstairs said, "How do you know?" And that was encouragement, or would have been from anybody but Miss Carstairs.

"I've half a mind to go on with you to Daytona," Marston hesitated, and Miss Carstairs said "Oh, do!" and that settled it. Marston went to find the conductor and get a chair, and as there wasn't any but the one next to Helen the porter lifted the bunches of violets and the two boxes of candy and the hamper of fruit and the bundle of magazines and carried them to the end of the car and piled them where the passengers eyed them and then screwed their necks to get a better view of Miss Carstairs, all of which that young lady enjoyed as much as she enjoyed the distinction of having Richard Marston for a traveling companion.

"DON'T JOKE," HE SAID HOARSELY. "I AM PUNISHED ENOUGH."

"Think of my hobnobbing with a celebrity," she said.

"'Of the making of books there is no end.'" Marston quoted sententiously. "Think rather of my traveling with a beauty."

"And both of us as poor as poor," Helen sighed.

Marston looked at her. "I wonder why you say that?" he asked. "What difference does it make"—

Helen stared at him. "I thought"—she gasped.

"That I wanted to marry you," he finished for her. "But I don't!" and he settled back in his chair and looked out toward the line of the tropical shore, where a few cocoanut palms were silhouetted against a purple sea.

"Oh!" Helen's sense of importance had departed. Suddenly she felt immeasurably insignificant, but this feeling was succeeded by one of intense indignation.

"Of all things!" she ejaculated.

"Well, I know it's unusual for a man to withdraw a proposition of that kind in ten minutes, and I know I said some pretty insistent things just before the train left, but I've changed my mind. It's usually a woman's prerogative," was his easy way of getting out of it, "but this time it's a man's, and I've changed my mind."

For the first time in her life Miss Carstairs could not meet the situation. She simply sat there with her cheeks burning and hated him.

Curiosity getting the better of her, however, she asked:

"But why?"

"That thing," Marston said succinctly and nodded toward the hamper. "To think you could take a thing like that from—Deering!"

Miss Carstairs felt better. She could meet jealousy.

"But I couldn't help it, could I?" was her innocent query. "I couldn't tell the porter to drop the basket on the platform."

"But I was so sure you had turned him down," Marston complained, "positively, you know—over at the Breakers last night, after the dance."

"I tried to—"

"And couldn't?"

She nodded.

"Too many inducements? Country house, town house, trips to Europe, diamonds—O Lord?" Marston groaned as he finished the catalogue.

"No." She turned from him to a contemplation of the scenery, and for a time they rode in silence, passing beyond the long line of palms to the orange groves—brilliant stretches of yellow and green that filled the car with the fragrance of wedding bouquets.

Suddenly Marston flung out, "What was it that kept you from turning him down positively, Helen?"

She leaned forward and spoke with conviction.

"I might do worse than marry Deering."

"A pork packer."

"It's better to marry a pork packer than to have nothing to pack," she informed him.

Marston fixed her with a stern eye. "I tell you right now, Helen," he said, "that I won't run this race in competition with Deering. I don't trot in the same class. You can give him up or give me up."

Helen reached over and touched the electric bell. "Will you bring me some telegraph blanks?" she said to the porter when he came.

"And now will you lend me a pencil?" she asked Marston as she fluttered the leaves of the yellow pad.

"What are you going to do?" Marston questioned as he handed it to her.

"I am going to telegraph to Deering," she said. "I told him that I would say 'yes' or 'no' by telegraph."

Marston went white.

"Don't do anything rash, Helen," he warned.

"I shall do as I please," said Miss Carstairs, and he leaned back and snapped out, "Oh, of course."

She sat with the pencil poised. "I wish you'd toss a penny for me," she said at last. "Heads I do it—tails I don't."

"I will do nothing of the kind."

"Oh, well, don't!" She scribbled a hasty word and reached for the bell. But Marston stopped her. "What have you written?" he demanded sternly.

The other passengers were growing speculative as to the actions of the handsome young couple. Helen, suddenly conscious of their observation, commanded:

"Go up there and get me one of my boxes of candy and some fruit. People will think you are proposing to me."

"I am. Will you marry me, Helen?"

"Not until you get my candy."

He came back, staggering under Deering's hamper, and passed the porter going out, with a telegraph blank in his hand.

Marston dropped the hamper on the seat in front of Miss Carstairs and hurried after the porter.

And then Helen waited. A half hour passed—three-quarters. She grew worried. Did he care enough to hurt himself in any way? It wasn't like Richard to kill himself for disappointed love.

She rose and went through the train. The eyes of the other passengers followed her. She walked with ease and lightness, and from the topmost wave of her brown hair to the tip of her tan boots she was absolutely correct, modish, beautiful.

She found Marston on the observation platform, with his moody eyes fixed on the shining rails that seemed to slip from beneath the train to end in the sunset.

As she came up behind him she saw something in his face that touched her with tenderness. She dropped her hands on his shoulders. "Oh, little bad boy," she said, "you read the telegram!"

"Don't joke," he said hoarsely. "I am punished enough."

"If you had not been so—so impertinent," Miss Carstairs informed him, "I should have told you before that I promised Deering to wire whether I had decided to—to marry you, not whether I was going to marry him."

Marston gazed at her in a dazed way. "Then your 'yes' meant"—

"That I am going to marry you, little bad boy," said Miss Carstairs coolly.

A Horological Curiosity.

Japan possesses a remarkable timepiece. It is contained in a frame three feet wide and five feet long, representing a noonday landscape of great beauty. In the foreground plum and cherry trees and rich plants appear in full bloom. In the rear is seen a hill, gradual in ascent, from which apparently flows a cascade, admirably imitated in crystal. From this point a threadlike stream meanders, encircling rocks and islands in its windings, and finally losing itself in a faroff stretch of woodland. In a miniature sky a golden sun turns on a silver wire, striking the hours on silver gongs as it passes. Each hour is marked on the frame by a creeping tortoise, which serves the place of a hand. A bird of exquisite plumage warbles at the close of each hour, and as the song ceases a mouse sallies forth from a neighboring grotto and, scampering over the hill to the garden, is soon lost to view.

Missed the Point.

"Professor," said an acquaintance, "you understand Latin, do you not?"

"Well," replied the professor, "I may be said to have a fair knowledge of Latin, yes."

"I know everybody says you have. I wish you would tell me what 'volix' means. Nobody that I have asked seems to have heard the word."

"If there is any such word as volix, madam, of which I have serious doubts, I certainly do not know what it means."

"You surprise me, professor. A man of your attainments ought to know that volix means Vol IX."

The professor devoted a moment to calling up his reserves and bringing his light artillery into action.

"It is no wonder, madam," he said, "that I did not see the point of your joke. You left the point out of it."—London Tit-Bits.

WHY TAMPER WITH IT?

Changes in Tariff Law Can Be of No Benefit.

The present agitation for tariff revision all comes from Democratic sources. Many uninformed Republicans have been caught by the cry, and a few leaders, mistaking the howl for the Democratic coyotes for the voice of the people, have joined the opposition in demanding a change.

No one, of course, will question the fact that many of the schedules have become more or less obsolete in the ten years in which they have been in operation, but the justice or injustice of duties on certain articles is not by any means the sole consideration in the question of Tariff revision.

The effect on business conditions the country over and the impossibility of securing any schedule that will be just to everybody are matters that must never be lost sight of. As to the first of these, it is a well-known fact to all who have followed the economic history of our country that the opening up of the tariff question inevitably gives business a serious set-back, regardles of whether the revision be good or bad.

The other consideration is one of equal importance. There are so many interests at stake and pressure of such a nature is brought to bear on the members of both houses, that it is impossible to secure a law which does not involve many injustices.

The country is to-day prosperous and happy. The protective tariff is furnishing employment to the American workingman instead of giving the job to the foreigner. Then why tamper with a law that is bringing about good results and take chances of upsetting the business of the country and securing in the end a law no better, if not actually worse, than the one we now have?—Topeka Herald.

UNCLE SAM DISCOVERS THAT HE HAS BEEN BUNCOED.

Wages and Tariff Revision.

A Pennsylvania newspaper, the Scranton Tribune, in commenting on the statement made by the American Economist regarding the increase of wages of the silk and dye houses of Paterson, affecting about 5,000 men with weekly wages ranging from $10 to $20, makes some pertinent remarks upon the question of the effect tariff tinkering would have on wages. The Tribune says:

"Would these advances in wages occur if the tariff were now in course of revision, or even if a definite date for taking up revision had been agreed upon? Certainly not.

"Would the wage increases be granted if reciprocity treaties had been concluded, or were in course of negotiation by which a tariff reduction on silk goods was conceded in favor of imports from France and Germany? No; there would be no increases but decreases of wages. Just as surely as the tariff is revised downward by direct reduction or by reciprocity concessions, so surely will wages be revised downward in every branch of industry. It is well to keep this fact in mind."

This argument is exactly in line with what the Journal has always repeatedly asserted. The people of New Jersey encouraged the tariff tinkers in 1892 and paid dearly for their folly. We do not believe that they desire to have the bitter and nauseating dose repeated, no matter how smoothly the free-traders masquerading under the cloak of "tariff reform" may plead.—Elizabeth Journal.

Easy to See.

Evidently the Buffalo Express has not read the German agreement:

"To all appearances the tariff concessions made to Germany followed strictly the provisions of the Dingley law, and the great difficulty in reaching a reciprocal agreement was that the Dingley law restricted concessions within such narrow limits. It is hard to see how the American Protective Tariff league expects to show any violation of the law."

Upon reading the agreement the Express will discover that its most important provisions are utterly outside of the Dingley law, and a comparison of paragraph A of the diplomatic note accompanying and forming a part of the agreement with section 19 of the customs administrative act will show how completely a law of congress has been nullified. Then it will not be so hard to see why the tariff league should dispute the legality of the provision giving to German exporters permission to appraise their own merchandise.

WHAT REPUBLICAN WILL IT BE?

There is very little being said throughout the State of Maryland as to who must be the candidate this fall for the Governorship of the Republican ticket. There seems to be a "feelin' good and sayin' nothin' " throughout the party. The Convention is to be held within a few days, on August 14th, and if there is anyone in the State trying to secure the nomination, he must be working rather quietly, too quietly even to be felt. There are only a few names mentioned for the nomination and these are not pushed before the people.

The Democrats, however, are discussing for the gubernatorial chair the merits of many men. When the proper time comes, however, the Republicans will be on hand and will be in good time to place before the people of Maryland for their suffrage a man whose character is impeachable and who is known throughout the State for his integrity. Those whom the people send to select a nominee will do the work when they get there and the selecting of a candidate will not all have been done beforehand at the so-called "love feasts," which now are so much in fashion in the family circles of some parties of the State.

The Baltimore News attempts to come to the relief of the Republicans in solving the enigma by suggesting the name of George R. Gaither, of Baltimore, to be the standard-bearer of that party which Lincoln has made immortal. The article referred to reads in part as follows:

A remarkable attitude of "awaiting developments" seems to characterize the Republican situation in Maryland. Nobody is being "boomed" for the Governorship, and no candidate seems to be making any special effort to be boomed. A great deal of anxiety is manifested from time to time, however, in quarters outside the Republican party, to get one particular possibility eliminated. It is periodically announced, in one form or another, that Mr. Geo. R. Gaither will not accept the nomination for Governor.

The intense anxiety exhibited in some quarters to talk away this possibility is one of the most interesting features of the Maryland political situation. Nothing could demonstrate more strikingly the strength which Mr. Gaither's candidacy would give to the Republican party. His standing in Baltimore is of a unique character, and he is held in the highest esteem throughout the State. He is a man who combines the shrewdness and geniality of the successful practical politician with the highest standards of upright, energetic and efficient public service. He commands an extraordinary following among independents, whether of Republican or Democratic affiliation, and at the same time is thoroughly liked by the regulars in his own party. Against not only an objectionable Democratic candidate, but against auy candidate, who would be classified as a colorless man or a weak man or a Bourbon, Mr. Gaither would make a campaign that would simply sweep the State. Among his other qualifications, it may be noted, he is a rattling good campaign speaker. If he went in for the Governorship, it would be with a view to taking hold of the office with vigor and achieving big and substantial results for the State during his four years at Annapolis; and, what is more, everybody in the State would have a very good chance to understand this long before the campaign was over. If the Democratic party wants to elect its candidate for Governor with George Gaither to contend against, it will have to put up a man who, in point of ability, character and force, is a match for his opponent.

ALL ON THE BAND WAGON.

After the smoke of battle has cleared away in Allegany county, it is seen that Lloyd Lowndes stands forth as the victor of the battlo. The great landslide in his favor was unlooked for even by the most hopeful friends of the late governor's son.

But yesterday, and none were so poor as to do Lowndes reverence. But today, his advice is sought and he is looked upon as one of most prominent and able political generals in Allegany county. But yesterday, and many trembled to whisper his praises; today, hundreds are rushing pell mell to get upon the Lowndes band wagon to get a prominent seat and trumpet the praises of their chief to every passerby.

Such is life. One is ahead today and another tomorrow. It has ever been thus since the world began and thus it ever will be. Stagnation would come if there were not this rotation in prominent places.

The Republican party as a whole, however, in Allegany, is firmly united in the declaration that it is the best organized for the management of State and national affiairs. When the election takes place this fall, Allegany county will be found high up in the column and will help mightily in the fight to win Maryland to Republicanism.

A SPOT ON MARYLAND'S HISTORY.

In the lynching of the negro, James Reed, for shooting Policeman Daugherty at Crisfield, this State, there is another blackened page in Maryland history. The white population there became frenzied with anger and kicked the negro to death and the next day burned his body to ashes.

While there seems to be some justice in punishing a man in this way for shooting a policeman in the back, yet the lynching must be condemned by all peaceful and law-abiding citizens of our State, because it took the law in its own hands, and because it overrode all law and government. The law should take its course. Law is supreme or not supreme. If it is not supreme, and mob rule is higher, then everyone must be on the lookout for his own life. No man's life is safe, if mob rule is to reign, its judgments and executions being too hasty to be just and wise.

Furthermore, judgment and execution by a frantic crowd is a direct violation of republican government principles. The majority of the people in this republic are the true rulers, and through their representatives are the laws made and equitably executed. And when a mob of a few hundreds get together and inspired by the ruler of the lower regions concoct some horrifying methoe to torture and put to death some other citizen, there is a direct violation of the principles upon which this government is founded, the principles that the majority should rule, and that the law should take its course. And if the fundamental truths are wholly disregarded, whereunto shall we dragged?

Maryland's Wheat Crop.

The wheat crop of Maryland is expected to aggregate 15,000,000 bushels this years, which will be the largest yield since 1900, when the crop was 15,188,000 bushels Incidentally, it is probable that it will exceed the total yield of Texas, Indiana Territory and Oklahoma. Should present prices keep up, as they are likely to do the farmers of the state will receive in cold cash $12,000,000.

Most of the production will be marketed in Baltimore.

Bad For the Groundhogs.

Messrs Martin Friend, Ode Fries, and Earl Friend, all living near Hoyes Run, last Saturday caught eleven groundhogs. They claim the championship belt for this sport.

Isn't This Town A Pretty Good Town? If Not, Why Not?

How do you like the town you live in?

Pretty fair sort of place, isn't it? Otherwise you'd move to some other town, wouldn't you?

But you don't think much of this town, you say? Well, what's the matter with this town? If there's anything wrong, let's all get together and right it.

All of us live here, and we ought to pull together. Nobody living in New York or Chicago or St. Louis or San Francisco is going to do any pulling FOR us.

On the contrary, some of those cities are doing a lot of pulling FROM us. They not only pull away some of our best young men as the boys grow up, but they pull away many of our good American dollars, which ought to be spent right here, where they would do the most good.

What is your favorite book? The Mail Order Catalogue? Ah, so we thought!

Now suppose, just for a change, you read your local paper carefully, watch the advertisements, and if you don't see what you want ask the home merchant for it. Suppose all of us trade at home a little more regularly. That ought to help make this a better town.

And maybe if we'd keep more of our money at home to build up the town we'd keep more of our boys at home.

MISS CAROLINE D'FABRITIIS.

Story of an Italian Girl Who Seized Many Opportunities for Progress.

This talented young professional of Italian birth and American tutelage, renews this summer her visit to former pupils and friends in the Miller family at Swanton.

Miss DeFabritiis in early girlhood severed relations with the ancestral home for future abode in the United States where, after a preliminary education wisely supervised, she matriculated in the New England Conservatory, Bos- Here the dawn of her natural and brilliant gifts opened into their fuller day and won for her a diploma of graduation in that famous seat of musical learning.

Subsequently, she filled a position in St. Mary's Seminary, St. Mary's county, Marylane, which position was relinquished to eccept one of added importance and weightier responsibilities as director of the vocal department in the Halifax, Nova Scotia, Conservatory. Not content with the graces and acquirements so well achieved, last summer she re-crossed the seas to her native home in Italy, and further pursued her studies with such Italian masters as Sig. Panzaui, of the Royal Conservatory of Florence.

Having acquired distinction in the fields of her choice in two hemispheres before the age at which most students approach the threshold of their careers, this accomplished young lady is entitled to the high merit awarded her by a popular estimate in the domain of song.

Resolutions of Respect.

At a session of St. Paul's M. E. Sunday school, held July 21st, 1907, the following resolutions were read and adopted:

WHEREAS, By the decree of our Allwise, and Divine Heavenly Father, Miss Nellie Kildow, a pupil in the Saint Paul's Methodist Episcopal Sunday school of Oakland has been called to the reward of the finally faithful, and

WHEREAS, For a number of years a faithful and regular attendant of this Sunday school, and through the ministration of the Gospel of this church was converted, entered upon the enjoyment of a Christian life, continuing in the faith, as shown by her walk and conversation, constantly extending a Christian influence among her associates and companions and always manifested a deep personal interest in the study of God's Holy word; therefore be it

Resolved, By Saint Paul's Methodist Episcopal Sunday school of Oakland, that in the death of Miss Nellie Kildow, we recognize the visitation of Providence, to which we bow with a submissive spirit, knowing that our loss is her eternal gain, and believing that she has joined that Surday school above, where a countless throng surrounds the Throne singing songs of praise; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of this school and more especially the class of of which she was a member, that her life, her acts of kindness, her Christian submissive spirit, was of inestimable value, and its effects far reaching beyond our power to discern, but which will be rightly credited to her in Heaven; and be it further

Resolved, That we commend her family and those near by ties of adoption to the care and love of God, who doeth all all things well, and who supplies grace sufficidnt for all life's burdens, looking forward to the reunion of our class and Sunday school beyond the grave; that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to her family, spread upon the minutes of the school and furnished the county papers for publication.

New Chef at The Oakland.

The management of The Oakland Hotel prides itself this season upon having a chef who has served some of the most-widely known citizens of the world. For six years, she was in charge of the kitchen of the late James G. Blaine, and for two years was head chef of the White House during the administration of President Harrison. During the winters, she is in the charge of the culinary department of the Y. M. C. A., at Washington, D. C. Manager Eckols is to be congratulated upon being able to secure the services of a chef so widely and favorably known.

I will mail you free, to prove merit, samples of my Dr. Shoop's Restorative and my Book on either Dyspepsia, The Heart or The Kidneys. Troubles of the Stomach, Heart or Kidneys, are merely Symptoms of a deeper aliment. Don't make the commen error of treating the symptoms only. Symptom treatment is treating the result of your ailment, and not the cause. Weak Stomach nerves—the inside nerves—mean Stomach weakness, always. And the Heart, and Kidneys as well, have their controlling or inside nervs. Weaken these nerves, and you inevitably have weak vital organs. Here is where Dr. Shoop's Restorative has its fame. No other remedy even claims to treat the "inside" nerves." Also for bloating, biliousness, bad breath or complexion, use Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Write me to-day for sample and free Book. Dr. Shoop, Racine, Wis. The Restorative is sold by all dealers.

PENCILINGS BY THE WAY.

Mr. U. G. Palmer Contributes Another Lively Letter of Travels in West.

To the Editor of The Republican:

What a vast expanse of waste territory lies between Los Angeles and Kansas City through which the Santa Fe passes. The distance is 1,806 miles or three times the distance from Oakland to Chicago and equal to the distance across the Atlantic Ocean from New Foundland to Ireland and it takes the Atlantic Express from 8 o'clock Sunday evening until 4.30 p. m. Wednesday to cover it—almost three full days of solid travel. After passing Barstow, 141 miles out, the only towns worthy of the name across that vast expanse of desert are The Needles, California, population 1,000; Flagstall, Arizona, 2,000; Albuquesque and Los Vegos, New Mexico, each about 10,000; La Junba, Colorado, 2,500, and Trinidad, Colorado, 8,000, until the fertile valley of the Arkansas in Kansas is reached.

The railroad is about the only evidence of civilization along this pathway. The two most noticeable things are the heat and the dust. I did not learn the temperature the day we crossed Arizona but the papers reported it was 135 degrees the day before. And yet in the shade this did not seem at all oppressive, due of course to the lack of moisture in the air. Beyond the Rockies it always seems to be cool in the shades and at night, no matter how hot it is in the sun.

Many things of interest are to be seen even here. For several hours the track skirts the mighty Colorado whose source is 1,500 miles away amid the snow-capped Rockies in far off Colorado and Wyoming and whose banks here seemingly to the very river brink are hopelessly desert-bound.

Farther south, the Government and the Southern Pacific Railroad have spent a mint of money under the world's greatest engineers in their endeavors to get it back into its natural channel out of which it broke in an irrigation project and thousands of farms, miles and miles of railroad and whole towns and villages in the neighborhood of the Salton Sink are still under water to a depth in places of as much as fifty feet.

A few miles northward between The Needles and Flagstaff is the Grand Canon of the Colorado. A visit to this necessitates a twenty-four hour side trip from Williams and I did not stop off.

In the vicinity of the Colorado many Mojave Indians are to be seen—grimy, barefooted and repulsive. The Pueblos, along the Rio Grande in the vicinity of Albuquesque, are one round higher up the ladder of civilization. Here and there we encounter an army fort or government barracks and a few companies of United States regulars whose presence is made necessary by the Indians.

The labor for a thousand miles seems to be the dark, swarthy Mexican only and for hundreds of miles not a building of any kind is to be seen except those belonging to the railroad company only those of adobe, although we passed many villages containing several score of houses.

Adobe houses are flat-roofed and built of sundried bricks made of mud.

The Albubuesque depot has a fine museum of Indian relics connected with it and both are adobe and are expensive as well as artistic.

The principal stock in the adobe section of our country seems to be great herds of goats. Goats mean poverty, poverty of soil and yet the soil is rich enough and would produce abundantly if it had only moisture.

Where the Southern Pacific climbs the Sierras, we are told they are so precipitous that workmen were let down with ropes from the top in order to get a foot-hold for the cuts in the sides of the mountains for the tracks. But this does not seem a more difficult engineering problem than pushing a track out on the desert for hundreds of miles where there isn't a mouthful of food of any kind, nor a drop of water, nor a human habitation. From Raton Pass, altitude 7,608 feet, the highest point on the Santa Fe between the Pacific and the Mississippi, we unconsciously glide down from Colorado into Kansas.

In the years gone by how our hearts have gone out in sympathy to "bleeding Kansas." We knew her only as the land of "drouths," and "grasshoppers," and "Populists," and "sockless Jerry Simpson," and "Carrie Nations," &c. Today she is a magnificent empire. Last year she produced one-sixth of all the wheat grown in the United States. She is preeminently the land of wheat and corn and cattle which have no superior. And the farmer is the czar of her domain. He owns his own land and has a good bank account. They offered as their exhibition at the World's Fair a carload of cancelled farm mortgages. Her schools are the best that money can make. She has rural free delivery, the long distance telephone and her people travel in the automobile.

Max O'Rell, the French traveler says, "the American people are the best housed, best clothed and best fed people on the face of the earth" and the Kansas farmer is the peer of any I have met in 2,000 miles of travel. And yet he hasn't worked as hard as the Garrett county farmer. Nature has done most to place him in his portion of independence and affluence. And he no longer lives on the frontier but in the very path of civilization. Kansas City, both sides of the river, claims a population of 400,000, and cities and towns of all sizes are scattered thickly over entire area embracing as it does seven times as many square miles as there are in the entire State of Maryland.

In conclusion, I might say if a man wants to raise corn he should go to the corn belt, wheat, go to the wheat belt, and sheep, go to the sheep belt. If he wants to produce oil, go to the oil belt (Los Angeles for instance which last years produced 10,000 tramloads of twenty-five cars each, and where hundreds of oil derrick are built out into the Pacific ocean). If he wants to dig gold, go to the mineral belt, if he wants to produce lumber go to the timber belt.

There seems to be no part of this great country which does not have its specialty.

U. G. PALMER.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's really better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your Cold. If there is feverishness, nightor day, Preventics probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Remember 25c boxes for the pocket, also in 10c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggist giving you

Order of Publication.

No. 1179 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland.

Emma Fike vs. Ezra B. Fike.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree divorcing the plaintiff from the defendant a vinculo matrimonii.

The Bill states that the plaintiff was married to the defendant on the 6th day of November, 1898; that no children were born to them as the result of said marriage; that during all of the time that the plaintiff lived with the defendant, the defendant treated her with great cruelty, harshness and brutality, and that about two years ago he deserted her and has provided nothing for her support or maintenance since said time.

The Bill further charges that after the defendant deserted the plaintiff, that he consorted, cohabited and lived with one Mira Lowery; that the said defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, for an order of publication and for general relief.

It is thereupon, this 17th day of July, 1907, ordered by the Circuit Court of Garrett county, in Equity, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 16th day of August, 1907, give notice to the said defendant of the object and substance of this Bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 2nd day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to pass as prayed.

MORTON'S HOMECOMING.

By Lester Comstock.

Copyrighted, 1907, by C. H. Sutcliffe.

The cabman regarded Morton with amazement as he gave his direction.

"That hotel was torn down five years ago," he said. "There's a twelve story office building there now."

Morton named another hotel, only to be met with fresh disappointment, and with an impatient gesture he sank back in the cab.

"I want to go to a good hotel," he said. "You know better than I where I want to go."

The burly figure climbed on the box, and presently the cab was rattling up Broadway. Listlessly Morton looked out of the cab window and marked the changes. It was like a new land, with only here and there a familiar landmark. Six years had wrought changes as great as those that had been effected within his heart.

THE VISION SEEMED SO REAL.

Six years before the world had seemed bright and pleasant. Lucy Desmond had loved him, and his prospects had begun to materialize. Then had come the crash. Howard Desmond had sacrificed his daughter to save his fortune. Half a million was needed to support his tottering ventures. Metcalf would lend the money, but not until Lucy had become Mrs. Metcalf had the loan been made. Ten days later the vein had been struck in the mine which Morton owned, and he was a millionaire almost overnight. For weeks he had railed against the fate that brought him fortune too late to give him the only thing worth while, the companionship of the woman he loved.

He had tried to meet her in their social encounters with the indifference that convention demanded, but there had come a night when the intoxication of the music, the heavy scent of flowers, had been upon them. It had been in the conservatory at the Clivers' dance, and for one mad moment he had held her in his arms, begging her to elope with him.

But even as he pleaded there had come the sense of right. He had gently released her and had fled the place. The dawn had found him still in his evening clothes pacing the floor of his apartment, and as the fresh morning air fanned his flushed face he made his resolution.

Before the end of the week he had disposed of all his American interests and had gone abroad. He left no kin behind, and none knew where he had gone. For six years he had roamed three continents, but always off the path of the tourist. Then had come the fierce longing for home, and he had come back.

Now that he was here he was not certain that he did not regret his decision. All had changed. Everything reminded him that he had lost his place in the life of the city. The stopping of the carriage roused him, and he paid his driver and followed the bellboy into the hotel.

He found the stillness of his room intolerable, and after vainly trying to interest himself in the papers he threw them aside and went for a walk. Perhaps in the busy throng he could shake off his memories.

Unconsciously he turned his steps in the direction of the park and was well into the shady recesses before he realized where he was. Then he roused himself with a start. It had been Lucy's favorite walk. It led to a little summer house just around the curve in the path, the little summer house where they had spent such happy afternoons before Cupid had fled in utter rout before the onslaughts of Mammon.

It seemed perfectly natural that when he had turned the curve he should see her sitting there in the same place where she had sat that afternoon when she told him of Metcalf's ultimatum. He smiled at himself for his belief, but the vision seemed so real that he kept on and presently sank into the seat beside her.

The girl raised her head and smiled.

"Lucy," he said wonderingly as he took the firm soft hand she offered. "Is it really you, dear? Of course I know it isn't, but you seem so real. You have come to me hundreds of times before, both waking and dreaming, but never so plainly, dear."

"But suppose that I am not a vision, Jim?" she asked with smiling lips. "Suppose that it really should be I?"

"Then I should have to go," he said firmly. "I cannot trust myself with you."

"Then let us pretend that I am a vision," she urged. "I really ought to scold you for keeping yourself hidden all these years."

"It was a coward's retreat," he admitted, "but I could not see you the wife of that man."

"And so you left me alone in my misery," she said reproachfully.

Morton shook his head. "It was not that," he said soberly. "It was that I cared too much for your fair name to stay on."

"I know," she said tenderly; "but, Jim, you might have left some word whereby we could have found you."

"To bring me back to misery?"

"To happiness," she said. "You seem to have found misery where you went."

She looked at the face of the man. Every line was touched by the hand of sorrow. Six years before he had been a laughing faced boy. She could remember his every expression. Now his face had gained a seriousness that became it well. He had not sought forgetfulness in dissipation, and the girl was glad.

"I suppose that I do show it," he said, noting her glance. "But you, being only a vision, have not changed. Your eyes have gained a sweet seriousness, but otherwise it is the face that has been before me all these years. You have come to me in many lands, Lucy, but there seems a reality to the vision here that I have never known before. I wish that I might always hold you so, dear."

"Wedded to a vision?" she asked mockingly. "Would that content you?"

"It had to content me all these years," he said simply. "It is better so than that I should seek the reality to rob her of her fair name."

"And yet that night," she whispered, "I was almost ready to say 'yes,' Jim. Had you persevered I should have yielded."

"I knew it," he agreed, "and for that reason I went away so far that no word might reach me and tempt me back to your side. Since I left New York I have spoken to no one whom I used to know. I did see Teddy Farrington in London once, but he did not see me, and I escaped him, but lately something seemed to call me back. I have been fighting it off for two years, but I grew hungry for the sight of home, to hear the sound of your voice and to look upon your dear face again. I never dreamed that I should find you here; that we should have our brief hour alone."

"And are you content with the hour?"

"It is better so. Should I stay on it would all come back. I think I shall return on the steamer Saturday. I—I am not as strong as I thought."

"May I go with you?" she asked softly as her hand slipped into his.

"Lucy!" The agony of his tones thrilled her.

"You silly boy," she whispered as the regal head bent toward him. "Don't you know that it was I who called you home? I could not find you save with my spirit and my love, and I have not called you in vain."

"But your husband," he stammered.

"He died two years ago," she said simply. "That was why I called you, dear. You answered to the voice of love."

Funny Toothache Cures.

Before the days of dentists and when people generally believed in the value of charms there were ever so many mysterious ways of preventing toothache. One of these was to dress the right side of the body first—right stocking, right shoe, right sleeve, right glove. A favorite plan in Scotland was to draw a tooth, salt it well and burn it in full view on glowing coals. In Cornwall many save their teeth by biting the first young ferns that appear.

The custom of catching a common ground mole, cutting off the paws while the little creature still lives and wearing them is traced to Staffordshire, England. Some people who are fond of exercise believe that walking twelve miles—no more, no less—to get a splinter of the toothache tree will drive away the worst ache and pain that ever tortured a poor tooth. The belief that toothache is caused by a worm at the roots is prevalent in many parts of the world; hence this cure: Reduce several different kinds of herbs—the greater variety the better—to a powder. Put a glowing cinder into this powder and inhale the incense. Afterward breathe into a cup of water and the worm will be gone forever.

Not His Province.

The New England ministers of early days were expected to preserve an aspect grave to the verge of solemnity on all occasions, not only on Sundays, but week days as well. If they possessed a sense of humor it sometimes made itself evident even in the midst of devotional exercises.

One New Hampshire parish was guarded and guided by a quaint speaking elderly man who had a slight lisp. He was fond of outdoor work of almost every sort and was an able farmer as well as preacher, but all domestic matters he relegated to his wife.

One day the old traveling baker, seeing the minister at work in the field, drew rein, and when the jingling of his horse's bells had subsided he called out, "Any crackers wanted today, parson?"

The minister raised his head and surveyed the baker from under his shaggy eyebrows. No smile of greeting crossed his solemn face.

"Abraham in the field," he responded gravely. "Tharah (Sarah) in the tent," and without another word he resumed his hoeing and left the baker to digest his Biblical reproof and drive on to the house to find out if "Sarah" would buy any of his wares.

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A WORK OF FAITH.

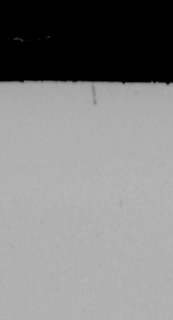
Story of the Remarkable Founding of a Bible Institute.

That faith in God will accomplish things which to man may seem impossible has received remarkable demonstration in the history of the Bible Institute of Pittsburg, Pa. It is an organization whose Christian activities are sustained entirely through prayer, one of the very few cases of the kind in the United States at the present time.



THE BIBLE INSTITUTE.

The history of this singular work, now in its sixth year, is a most interesting one, says the Christian Herald. With absolutely no endowment or permanent fund; with neither collections nor salaries, and without even telling of the needs of the work either in public or private, this institute, with its 40 students, has been acquired and equipped throughout, until now it represents $250,000 worth of property held in trust. To make the matter seemingly still more inexplicable, it may be stated that no charge for tuition is made. How then has all this been accomplished? Simply by earnest prayer and simple trust in God.

The story of the work is best told, perhaps, in the words of the pastor and founder, Rev. Charles H. Pridgeon, formerly of the First Presbyterian church, Canonsburg, Pa. He says: "For eight years before the work was started there had been prayer and waiting on God for a work of faith and the way to be opened. On July 24, 1901, my wife and I spent the night in special prayer. We asked the Lord to guide us as to beginning a Bible institute. Next morning, a telegram came which led to a conference and the offering of a building, to be used as church and institute. We resigned from the church where we had spent almost 12 years of delightful service, in obedience to this call."

On the eighth day of December, 1901, the Pittsburg Bible institute, undenominational, sustained by faith and free to all, was founded and opened.

After 100,000 Men.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement is now working to enlist the cooperation of 100,000 men of all churches. The executive committee of the movement has just adopted the following declaration: "Believing it to be the duty of the church of Christ to preach the Gospel to every creature, it is our purpose to pray, to give, to study and to work, as God may give us opportunity, that the church of this generation may obey this command." Men by the hundreds are signing this declaration and sending their names to the New York headquarters of the movement, where the names are forwarded to the foreign mission organizations of the various denominations.

Veteran of New Hebrides.

After 33 years of service in the New Hebrides, Rev. Dr. Annand has returned to this continent. In the Hebrides he says women are bought and sold like cattle. A five-year-old girl is worth two hogs, and the price increases with age—up to a certain limit. There is no excuse for a man being a bachelor, provided he can raise the price of a hog. After 50 years of mission work, all the islands are nominally Christian. In the interior of some of the islands, however, cannibalism is still a popular institution. Only a short time before he left several instances of cannibalism were reported from the interior.

"Watch and Ward" Society.

The New England "Watch and Ward" society of Boston, Mass., is winning golden opinions from the citizens of uprightness and integrity throughout the commonwealth of Massachusetts by the aggressive campaign it has instituted against bucket-shop gambling and the swindlers who congregate in its wake. The passage of the anti-bucket shop bill in both houses of the legislature will constitute a notable victory for Massachusetts in the annals of clean legislation.

Forward Move of Pittsburg Mission.

Superintendent Maurice Ruben, of the New Covenant Mission, Pittsburg, Pa., writes: "God's blessing has been resting upon our work. Quite a number of conversions have taken place among our brethren during the past season. Recently the board of directors purchased a property on the corner of Reed and Crawford streets, Pittsburg. It is a three-story modern flat building, and on the vacant lot adjoining it is purposed to erect another building for the full equipment of the mission. Several departments are to be developed.

Mission School Prospers.

Mrs. W. S. Horne, of the China inland mission station at Kanchow, writes that her mission school now has 32 scholars. The station now has a chapel, two dwellings, a school and five out-stations. Eighteen years ago the people of that district had never heard the gospel.

BOWSER HAS SCHEME

Finds Man Who Has Invented Way to Reduce Coal Bills.

MAKES A TEST IN FURNACE.

Formula Fails to Bring About the Desired Result, and Experiment Ends In a Fight—Mrs. B. Tries to Console Disheartened Husband.

[Copyright, 1907, by Homer Sprague.]

At 2 o'clock the other afternoon a strange man called at the Bowser house and asked if he was home yet and when answered in the negative said that he had an appointment with him for that hour and would wait. While he sat down on the front steps Mrs. Bowser cudgeled her brains as to what he might want. He was a long, lean, lank and solemn looking man. He seemed a man who had been disappointed in the world and had lost all hope. She couldn't think he was a man who had a cow or a balloon to sell.

The mystery had lasted only a quarter of an hour, when Mr. Bowser came home. He was walking fast and had a business air about him. After saying a few words to the man on the steps he entered the house, and of course Mrs. Bowser asked him what was going to happen.

"The man out on the steps is a Mr. Rasher," he replied. "I have been talking with him all the forenoon. He is the man who invented the 'catch anything' trap. It will catch anything from a bug to an elephant, and the man who beat him out of his patent has made a million dollars out of it."

"Is that why he looks so down in the mouth?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

He Was an Inventor.

"That and other things. He is the inventor of the double ended nursing bottle for twins. He brought out the machine to throw cats off the fence.

A SORT OF EXPLOSION BLEW THE FURNACE DOOR OPEN.

He invented pasteboard soles for shoes, and all in all he has brought out a dozen good things. He has trusted men, and they have robbed him of the fruits of his labor."

"And has he now invented an India rubber barrel or something else he wants you to take up with him?"

"Don't try to be sarcastic at this early stage of the game. Mr. Rasher dropped into the office this morning to see me on business. From the first instant he set eyes on me he felt that he could trust me. As he told me later, I have a frank and innocent countenance that is an index of my soul. After we had talked for an hour he told me that he was the inventor of a patent fuel that is going to make millions of dollars for some one."

"But there are half a dozen men making the same claim," protested Mrs. Bowser, "and as far as we know nothing great has come of it."

"Never you mind about the half dozen men and their claims. Their names are not Rasher. This man knows what he is about. When he says that he has a fuel that is going to revolutionize the world and drive 10,000 coal dealers to suicide you can get ready for something to happen. What he wants is money enough to get this patent. He wants me to advance the amount and will give me half his rights. I am not to advance a cent until after I have satisfied myself that the fuel is all right. Have you any fault to find with that arrangement?"

"Why, no, but I hope you will be thoroughly satisfied before you go into such a thing."

Considered Him Honest.

"Certainly I shall. Mrs. Bowser, I am no ten-year-old boy. I think the man is honest and sincere, but I shall still have an eye on him. If he's shamming he'll find a man as smart as he is."

"But how are you going to find out about the fuel?"

"We are going to burn some in the furnace. It's pretty hot weather, but I guess we can stand it for an hour or so. I shall insist on the severest tests."

Mrs. Bowser thought there might be something in it and raised no further objections. She had read that others were experimenting and why not Mr. Bowser? While he was getting into an old suit of clothes Mr. Rasher disappeared for a few minutes. Then a horse and wagon drove up with three or four bags full of something that were carried down cellar. Then there was a mixture. As near as Mr. Bowser could determine, for Mr. Rasher wasn't giving things away yet, the bags contained ashes, sand and lime. When they had been mixed together a powder was sprinkled over the heap, and it was dampened with water. Three or four old boxes were knocked to pieces and a fire started in the furnace, and when there was a good blaze going the inventor said:

"We will now shovel the mixture in and you will see something wonderful."

The wonderful thing occurred two minutes later. A sort of explosion blew the furnace door open, and a great puff of acrid smoke went floating all through the house. At the same moment all the fire in the furnace went out, and Mrs. Bowser called from the head of the cellar stairs:

"Mr. Bowser, what on earth is happening down there?"

"Nothing. It was just a back draft from the furnace, probably by a rat's nest in the chimney. There is no call for you to get excited."

"It may be that I didn't get in the right powder," explained Mr. Rasher as he peered into the furnace. "No; I think I didn't. If you will hand me $2 I will go and get the other thing."

"But, man, don't you know the proper ingredients?" asked Mr. Bowser. "Haven't you got them written down?"

"No. I might lose the memoranda, you see. I want to be careful this time. Being a little excited, I may have asked for the wrong powder."

He took the money and was gone ten minutes and then came back with a five cent packet of Rochelle salts in his hand and let Mr. Bowser see the label on it to show that he trusted him. He didn't return the change from the bill. The fire was rekindled, the salts sprinkled on the heap, and after ten minutes a shovelful of the mixture was dumped in, with the observation:

Must Close All Drafts.

"We now have sufficient fuel in the furnace to last for a week. As soon as things get redhot we must close all the drafts."

But things did not get redhot. There was a sputtering and a stewing inside the furnace for two or three minutes, and then there seemed to be nothing further doing. Mr. Bowser and Mr. Rasher sat on their boxes in silence and expectation, and the gas meter uttered a sort of wail and registered another 500 feet. Finally the inventor arose, tiptoed over to the furnace and opened the door.

All inside was blackness and darkness. There was no redhotness—not by a jugful.

"The thing don't seem to pan out," said Mr. Bowser in hard tones.

"No, but I see the reason. I should have burned a certain powder to clear the flues of dust first. In my haste and anxiety I forgot that. If you will give me $3 I will run over to the drug store."

"What's the name of the powder?"

"Excuse me, but I will tell you later on. Once the dust is out of the flues all will be well. You might be shaking the stuff out while I am gone."

Mr. Bowser gave up grudgingly. He was losing faith in Mr. Rasher and dreading Mrs. Bowser's words and looks. The inventor departed, visited the drug store and a saloon and returned after awhile with a lump of something in his hand.

"I thought you went for powder?" queried Mr. Bowser.

Meant a Lump.

"Did I say powder? I often say that when I mean lump. We will be all right now."

"Isn't there some change coming to me?"

"I believe so, but I can't stop just now. In with your paper and kindlings."

When a fire had been lighted once more the powder was thrown in, and the men stood back. They needn't have done so. That lump of something was only chalk and had no idea of exploding. After two minutes some more of the patent fuel was shoveled in, and Mr. Rasher smiled and said:

"There won't be any more disappointments. Hear the furnace roar?"

But there was no roar. There came a sound like a lean woman frying lean bacon over a corncob fire, and then there was a flicker, and all was as still as the grave. Mr. Bowser looked into the furnace to find the same old blackness. As he turned to ask Mr. Rasher what in ! ! ! ! he meant by ! ! ! ! the inventor made for the stairs. There was a yell, and Mr. Bowser made after him. The fleeing man ran through the kitchen hall and out of the area gate, but before he could leap the front gate Mr. Bowser caught him. Fifteen minutes later as Mrs. Bowser was putting salve on a skinned nose and washing a bitten ear she quietly observed:

"Never mind, dear. You have got a shovelful of sand and lime left down cellar, and we will try and get along some way until you can invest in a new burglar alarm and make $1,000,000."

Ketching Gofers.

say, did yew ever Snare Gofers fer fun?
Stubbie and Me did won day in the Run!
Fattie and Bill ketched a dozen fer play—
they wuz a kamping down Nashua way.

then they wuz sorry—it's Sinful 2 kill!
"Maybe we oughtent t' done it," sed Bill.
"killing fer meat is awl rite," argued Fat.
"let's take 'em back 2 thee Fellers fer that!"

so they gist skined off thee hair in thee Brush.
then they Skipped back in a teribul rush:
"Look at thee Squirrels!" sez Fat very neat—
"now we will kook them and have them 2 eat!"

awl of thee boys cepting Fattie and Bill
Et up the Gofers—gist gobbled their fill!
"how dew yew fellers like young Gofer stew?"
Busted out Fat when thee dinner wuz through.

mi, but them boys wuz a tuf looking site!
Henry wuz sick to his stummick—and White!
That wuz a purty tite plase 2 B in—killing fer Fun is a teribul thing!

Well, Stub and me we gist waited around watching fer gofers 2 cum frum thee ground.
when we had Watched almost awl of thee Day,
there wuz a Feller cum walking that way.

"What are you doing?" sed he and he bowed.
then when we toald him, he laffed oful loud!
"Whee!" sez he, trying 2 swaller his laf,
"those is thee post-holes for staking a calf!"

"we wuz gist snaring fer pleasure," sez I.
"Oh," sez thee Feller, a winking his eye.
What dew yew think of us waiting awl day, trying 2 snare over post-holes that way?

Fancies.

Some women seem to think that the lobe of the ear was made as a receptacle for powder—a sort of rouge back-stop, so to speak.

The idea that women should have small feet, seems to be waning. We seldom hear the poet praising her tiny feet as of yore.

A young fellow in our town went to see his lady love the other night and must have had an interesting time, because when he had said good-by, he discovered that her father had borrowed his bicycle to ride down to the butcher shop to get some meat for breakfast. Deciding to make the best of it, he accepted an invitation to break bread with the family, and promised, upon going, to come again when he could stay awhile.

With the advent of hot weather comes a more kindly consideration of the poor country relatives. Maybe if you fish real lively, you can get an invitation to spend August with them, I know.

The trouble with a woman is that she always wants everything you do not want her to have.

Some men enjoy poor health continually. They are like the little girl who thought she had chicken-pox because she found a feather in her bed. Their imagination works over time and they take especial delight in telling everybody they meet how bad their health is. If you are sick, don't help disease along by harping about it. Get well if you can, but if you can or can't, quit whimpering.

We are sorry to hear, as usual, that the Michigan peach crop has been ruined by the frost. We should feel somewhat repaid, however, by the large crop of milk-weed which assures us of right prices on lacteal fluid.

An Iowa cornfield got real excited a few days ago when the hot wave struck it, grew four feet in one night, spread over the field and onto the railroad, where it stopped the midnight express and choked the engineer to death. The passengers fled for their lives and barely (it was a night train) escaped with their lives. Iowa raises great corn, all right.

The wise young man will neither ogle a young woman nor make her believe that he hasn't noticed how pretty she is. She might forgive the former indiscretion, but never the latter.

A Nebraska man says he has a pair of boots that he has worn as Sunday best for 47 years. S. E. Kiser, of the Chicago Record-Herald, tells me confidentially that he knew a man in York state who wore his 52 years and the last time Sam saw them they were as good as new. The old-time shoemaker was honest, if he was bow-legged.

The foreman of a Michigan printing office who had just fifteen cents, inadvertently asked a "doll" to take lunch with him. He was praying she would be satisfied with a dish of ice-cream and some cake, as she said she wasn't feeling very well. Instead, she edged up to the bill of fare, ordered a lobster, some pate de foies gras, three side dishes of vegetables, Boston salad, tutti-frutti ice-cream and seven other things with which he was not on speaking terms. While she was in the midst of it, he had to excuse himself and go out to find a friend. Moral: Beware of a woman when she is hungry and only wants a bite.

Bad Proofreading.

A country newspaper in the west is being sued, it seems, because it published a statement that a certain bride-to-be was "having her trousers made." The editor had written it "trousseau," but the compositor misread his pothooks.—Langdon (S. D.) Pathfinder.

War With Japan Would Be a Crime.

By Admiral BARON YAMAMOTO of Japan.

IT is now over fifty years since America first opened intercourse with Japan and introduced us to the nations of the west. We all know what we owe to the United States for the development of our industries and commerce and also for the education of a number of our countrymen. WE ALSO ESPECIALLY APPRECIATE THE SYMPATHY SHOWN US BY THE AMERICANS DURING THE LATE WAR.

Our interests, commercial and otherwise, are so INTIMATELY INTERWOVEN and the cordial relations between us of fifty years' standing are of so firm a nature that I can confidently affirm that THEY WILL NEVER BE DESTROYED by mere trifling incidents.

By General STEWART L. WOODFORD, Former Minister to Spain.

In the seventy years of my life I have seen two wars brought on by the thoughtless and ill considered action of the newspapers. THOSE WARS MIGHT HAVE BEEN AVOIDED.

TODAY ALL THE INTERESTS WHICH CENTER AROUND THIS NATION—THE THOUGHTFUL BUSINESS MEN—ARE OPPOSED TO BEING AGAIN DRAGGED INTO A USELESS AND AN UNNECESSARY WAR.

War between the United States and Japan would be a crime against history. War between us and Japan would be a crime against religion, for in no place in the world is more toleration shown to religions of all kinds, and we have established our religion in the land of the mikado.

War between us and Japan would be a crime against commerce. Between us let there be rivalry, let each do his best, and may that SPIRIT OF FAIR PLAY exist which says let the best man win.

War between Japan and the United States would be against the spirit of the age.

By Viscount AOKI, Japanese Ambassador to the United States.

I have said time and again that THERE IS NO JAPANESE-AMERICAN SITUATION. There exist between the two governments no differences or ill feeling of whatever sort. All this talk of possible trouble between the two nations, so devoted to each other, is a MERE PHANTOM CREATION OF WILD IMAGINATION that ever seems to haunt the minds of irresponsible story makers and trouble hunters.

There is not the slightest cause for anxiety in the American-Japanese relations, and if there is any it is not because of the actual existence of any difficulty between the two countries, but because of the dogmatic influence of some UNWARRANTED PRESS TALK that often tends to drive even the calmest temper of the public into a whirl of tempestuous rage.

By Rear Admiral JOSEPH B. COGHLAN, U. S. N., Retired.

We of this country are jealous of the friendship of Japan. We discovered it. The friendship which was framed between us even at that time, when hereditary feelings made each of us look upon the other as barbarians, has grown greater as we learned the STERLING WORTH of the other.

Japan has even since then been ready to accept and adopt the BEST OF OUR IDEAS, and we have been and are adopting what we think are some of the best of hers. One bad one she has taken from "yellow journal" talk and "faked" interviews.

THAT THIS FRIENDSHIP, FORMED WITHOUT BLOODSHED AND SO BENEFICIAL TO BOTH COUNTRIES, MAY EVER REMAIN FAST AND FIRM IS, I AM SURE, THE FERVENT WISH OF ALL CLEAR HEADED PEOPLE OF BOTH COUNTRIES.

Government May Own And Operate Railroads.

By Judge E. H. FARRAR of New Orleans

JUST as the government in the exercise of its power to borrow money and collect taxes created the whole national banking system and gave the banks thereunder organized the right to establish themselves in every locality in the nation and to deal WITH CORPORATIONS AND INDIVIDUALS within the whole sphere of the business of banking and all of its incidents, just so under its power to establish post roads it may organize corporations for the purpose of BUILDING AND OPERATING such roads to carry the mails of the United States, the troops of the United States, the supplies of the United States, the officers of the United States, in their passage from one part of the country to another in the performance of their official duties and incidentally to TRANSPORT INDIVIDUALS AND THE FREIGHT OF INDIVIDUALS under the regulations fixed by the congress.

I believe that the authors of the constitution, in contemplation of the vast distances separating the parts of this republic from one another, granted this exclusive power to the federal government in the expectation and belief that the whole country would be knit together by highways constructed and operated BY THE CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.

THIS WAS DONE, TOO, WITH THE FULL KNOWLEDGE THAT SUCH HIGHWAYS, WHILE HAVING FOR THEIR PRIMARY OBJECT THE TRANSPORTATION OF THE MAILS, WOULD NECESSARILY BE USED, SECONDARILY AND INCIDENTALLY, FOR THE TRANSPORTATION OF FREIGHT AND PASSENGERS, JUST AS FROM TIME IMMEMORIAL THE STAGECOACH WHICH CARRIED THE MAIL ALSO CARRIED PASSENGERS AND FREIGHT.

Every Ton of Rubber Costs a Human Life—Dairy Business a Coming Source of Wealth—Story of Lawyer-Coal Mine Superintandent.

Rubber is exceedingly high when one goes to buy any quantity of it. It grows in countries where the climate is injurious and where civilization is in its primary stages. It is calculated that every ton of rubber costs one human life. The difficulties of securing it are so great that hundreds of human lives are sacrificed annually in order to get rubber from the jungles to markets in civilized countries.

Rubber was of little value to man for many centuries. While the process of securing the material was known, yet it was Mr. Goodyear who made it of value to human kind. He discovered the process of giving rubber its elasticity. He showed that by treating crude india rubber with sulphur at a high temperature, it could be make very elastic or very inelastic, according to the amount of heat and sulphur used.

The farmers or Garrett county are learning rapidly the value of this section of Maryland for producing certain crops. It has been known for many years that potatoes grow very productively here; that oats can always be relied upon; that grass and hay can always be reaped with great profit, depending very little upon the weather; and buckwheat is always used synonymously with Garrett county. Yet every years hundreds of car loads of oats and even hay are shipped here to be sold to the farmers. The money goes away to pay for them, when this county is well-able to produce enough to supply itself, if these two products were properly cultivated and enough sowed. This section will never be as prosperous as it can be until it cultivates those things which it can raise, producing enough to supply its own needs, and leaves alone those products which do not do well here, and are always a losing investment.

In view of the fact that hay does well in this section of Maryland, there are many farmers in this county who are beginning to see the great stores of wealth which lie in the dairy business. Many farmers are stocking their farms with an excellent breed of cows and they find them a source of wealth. But money cannot be made from cattle if the farmer has to buy the hay from the west, or from other states; he must raise that himself. There cannot be found on the farm any products which has a readier sale than the products of the cow. Butter is always in demand; cream is easily sold; and in these days of rapid transportation, milk can be sold in a few hours in the large cities and at prices which give a nice profit. Milk which is gotten from the cow in Garrett county in the morning can be in Washington by 12:30 and the milk which is six hours old is practically fresh, judged by the milk that is usually sold in the city as fresh. As the days go by, the time of delivery will be lessened. Surely, there will be a great advance in the dairy business of Garrett county as the years come and go.

The head of a coal company in Fairmont sat in his office one day and looking out of his window, saw a young man lounging around his law office, apparently never busy, never receiving any opportunities for the practice before the courts of his profession. The young man had thought that law was his life's work. But the head of the coal company interpreted his abilities differently, and offered the young, starving lawyer a position as superintendent of a coal mine of his which was doing well near Fairmont.

"I never dug any coal, and how do you suppose I could be the superintendent of a mine?"

"I feel that you will do the work all right, and I'm willing to take a share of the risk as employer."

"Well I'll try. But I'll tell you now, I've some radical ideas on the way that coal should be taken from that mine you speak of. I feel as though the output should be greatly increased with small additional capital."

"That's the way I like to hear you talk, and anything I can do to help along your ideas, let me know."

Thus the young man had decided to change his life's work. He entered heartily into the coal business and was soon carrying out ideas for increasing the products of the mine.

When the new superintendent took charge, the output was 700 tons a day. Within a month, by introducing new methods, the tonnage per day went up to 1,600. And when he went to the owner of the mine and said, "If I could get machinery to put more air into shaft D, I feel that we may still increase the amount of coal taken from this mine."

"Go ahead," was the reply of his employer, "and do whatever you want to. When in need of money call on me. Put your ideas into force."

Today that same mine is placing upon the coal market 1,700 tons every ten hours, and that superintendent has been at work only a few months at the business and new ideas increasing the output are still evolving in his mind, and each of them is carried out with little additional cost of labor to the coal company.

NEIGHBORLY NOTES.

Items of Interest of Our Neighbors in West Virginia and Maryland.

L. W. Brown & Co., large grocery dealers in Grafton, W. Va., have made an assignment.

One American and two Slaves lost their lives in a mine explosion near Clarksburg Wednesday morning.

Mrs. Susan R. Smith, of Clarksburg, and prominently connected with some of the leading families in Harrison county died Wednesday.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company has been having trouble recently by having the trunks of its passengers robbed. A circular has been sent to all agents advising them to keep a closer lookout on baggage.

"Corn is in tessel." That is a head line taken from a Baltimore county paper of last week.

The engagement of Miss Sadie Dorothy, at Frostburg, to Mr. Edward N. Fonkelhor, of Pittsburg, has been announced.

The large engine at the Parsons pulp mill ran away last week and flew to pieces.

A scandle has developed in the teachers' examination in W. Va. At Ripley, the county superintendent discovered that the questions had been gotten from the printer long before the day of examination.

Walter Stanley shot and killed Preston Flinn, his best friend, at Williams, W. Va., on the Western Maryland Railroad, near Thomas, Wednesday night. Flinn was sneaking into his home to surprise his wife, when Stanley mistook him for a burglar and filled him with shot, causing immediate death.

Dr. R. A. Armstrong, of the University, has refused to accept the superintendency of the Parkersburg school paying $2,500 per year.

Clarksburg is booming the Chautauqua which is a new thing there and which runs this year from Augest 1st to 12th.

Judge Mason, of Fairmont, has refused to allow his name to be used as a candidate for the governorship of W. Va.

State Auditor ArnoldScheerr is being pushed by his friends as a candidate for governorship of West Virginia.

Work has begun on a bridge at Grafton, connecting the west and south sides.

The Inter-Mountain at Elkins, W. Va., will be published daily after August 15th.

Elkins, W. Va., is to have a new Luthern Church.

Jas. Reed, a North Carolina negro, on Saturday, shot and killed Policeman John H. Daugherty, at Crisfield, Md. A mob pursued the negro, brought him back to Crisfield, kicked him to death, and then riddled his body with bullets. The next day the citizens dug up the remains and burned them to ashes.

Terra Alta has been entertaining the shooters of the state of West Virginia this week. The shooting will end tomorrow.

Broaddus Institute will move from Clarksburg to Bridgeport.

Ariel-Navigator Roy Knabenshue has been engaged for the star attraction at the Clarksburg fair, to be held the first week in September.

Allegany County Superintendent Willison is spending a summer term at Harvard University, taking a course in management of county schools.

Joliff Brothers, leading merchants of Morgantown and Fairmont, have been compelled to make a compromise with their creditors, paying only 35 cents on the dollar. The largest losers are four banks, whose claims aggregate $13,000.

Congressman George C. Sturgiss, of West Virginia, will deliver an address at the Odd Fellows Reunion, held at Harper's Ferry, August 6th.

FIKE.

When the sun is far sunk in the west,
The farmers will then go to rest;
Their dreams are few but cheery,
Even if their limbs are very weary.

The harvest of wheat has commenced in this vicinity and we wish all a bountiful yield.

For a couple of the past Sunday evenings, we have had church at this place and we hope it may continue.

Miss Alice Vansickle, is working for Mr. George Fike, Miss Ida. Savage is working at Guard Md., and Miss Flo. Jenkins is employed at Somerfield, Pa.

Mrs. Mary Ellen Dutton and sister Florence, of Uniontown, Pa., are visiting friends and relatives in this vicinity.

Miss Ellis Maust and others, of Uniontown, Pa., are visiting in this section.

Mrs. Blanch Laudermilk and Laura E. Chrise, were calling on Mr. John S. Fike and wife last week.

Mrs. Amanda Frazee and daughter, and Mrs. Maust and others, made a little trip one day last week terminating at the corner stone of the states Maryland, Pennsylvania and West Virginia. They were caught in the rain on their return for home and were completely soaked.

Mrs. Wm. Umble and Mrs. Joseph Thomas were also visitors at Mr. John S. Fike last week.

On July, 22nd, we had a very severe electrical storm. It lasted for some time and did considerable damage. In one case it tore Mr. Isaiah Umble's telephone wire in two, and splintered one of the 'phone poles at his house. His wife was paring potatoes and the lighting got on her knife and paralized her arm for some time.

Mr P. F Fike has secured a position at the oil station as fireman.

Mr. Wm. R. Barnthouse has gone to Uniontown to visit his relatives at that place

The weather has been very inclement in this section. It rains nearly every day, and it makes the farmers watch in order to get their wheat cut.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The Chautauqua opens tomorrow and from present indications the crowds will be here.

As many cottages are occupied as at any season heretofore in the history of the Park.

The address of Colonel Pearre Wednesday evening was a masterly effort and deserved a larger audience.

Mrs. McQuay has been critically ill for a week or ten days. This morning a slight improvement is noted. Mr. McQuay arrived, in answer to a telegram, last night.

The evening of readings and songs at the M. E. church Monday evening was not as well attended as the cause and the talent deserved. The readings by Miss Mazie Schmidt, of Frederick, Md., a graduate of the Boston School of Oratory, and Miss Ethel Clark, of Amsterday, N. Y., a student of the same school, were of the highest order, and the songs by Miss Virgie Richardson, of Piedmont, W. Va., and Miss Louise Sperry, of the Park, both highly cultivated in music, delighted an appreciative audience. Miss Sada Laughlin, as accompanist, sustained her reputation as an accomplished musician.

There will be Sunday School every Sunday afternoon during the season at 2.30 o'clock, followed by class meeting, and preaching every Sunday evening at 8 o'clock.

A portion of the Armstrong family, of Baltimore, arrived at the Park today and are occupying the Armstrong cottage.

Prof. S. C. Smith and family, of Morgantown, W. Va., are in a cottage on Cozy Row for the season.

Mrs. James O. Smith and three little daughters, of Washington, D. C., have rooms in the Pierce cottage.

Miss Jennie Smith, the noted railroad evangelist, is visiting friends here.

The Heroine.

From Gen. Chas. King:

"Mr. Parrish knows well how to make a story go, and with such a heroine and two such manly fellows as Hampton and young Brant, he has a strong one here. I envy him his power, I rejoice in his descriptions, and I thank him for the spirited picture he draws of the young officer checking that mad lynching bee just in the nick of time. With all my heart I hope the story may be widely read.

"CHARLES KING."

Bob Hampton of Placer

Hero of Custer's Famous Fighting Seventh.

By RANDALL PARRISH,

Author of "A Sword of the Old Frontier," "My Lady of the North," etc.

¶ From the incidents leading up to and culminating in the battle of the Little Big Horn, in which General Custer and his command were massacred by the Sioux under Sitting Bull, Mr. Parrish has developed a story of dramatic power and action that will stir the blood of every lover of a keen, exciting story.

¶ The reader who delights in the ring of the horse's hoofs on the rocky trail of the wilderness, and who would see a dramatic picture of the West in that period of large and spectacular situations, will find in "Bob Hampton of Placer," a story that will hold the attention, fixedly, to the very end.

¶ The charming romance skilfully woven into the narrative will appeal to every reader who enjoys a well-told love story, with a brisk movement and a lively human interest.

ALTAMONT.

Farmers are getting busy with their harvest. Grass is good, far beyond expectations since the recent warm weather and rain showers.

The singing school is progressing nicely with Prof. Groves as instructor. With a little more practice, it will be second to none. There was a very large crowd present on Thursday night, among them being two excellent singers, Miss Lizzie Mohr and niece, Miss Edna Wells, of Baltimore. They assisted very much with the good music.

Mrs. Edward Wells and daughter, Miss Edna, and sister, Miss Mohr, are summer guests at Mr. Hiram Tasker's.

Mr. Richard Roy was at Oakland over Sunday.

Mrs. John Comp is very ill.

Mrs. Agnes Cassidy, of Cumberland, returned home, Saturday of last week, after a week's visit, the guest of Mrs. Gertrude Jefferys.

Mr. John Rexrode, employed at Beckman mines, spent Sunday at home.

Mrs. Walter Friend, of Piedmont, was visiting her mother, Mrs. Hannah Rexrode, over Sunday.

Mrs. Mollie Spiker and Miss Mattie Jackson were dining with friends in Guinea Hollow one day last week.

Mrs. Thomas Nine and son Ray, of Swanton, were visiting at A. M. Jefferys on Sunday.

Mrs. Acy Day, who has been very ill for some time and thought to be improving, has taken a relapse and is very poorly at this writing.

Dr. Fazenbaker, of Swanton, was in our town on Friday morning.

Mr. H. A. Schmidt was at Oakland and Piedmont on business Saturday.

Mrs. Ed. Browning, formerly resident of Oakland, but now located near Pittsburg, has been spending a couple of weeks with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Hershberger.

Barney Friend and Nathan Spiker, were guests of friends in Guinea Hollow Sunday.

Mrs. Jane Wright and daughter, Miss Della, were visitors at Mr. J. W. Comps and Mrs. A. H. Friend's Sunday evening.

Mr. Lake Wright was calling at Mr. Herman Beckman's Sunday evening.

Mr. Isaac Wright, who was given the foremanship of an extra gang at Frankville, seems was not blessed with the patience of Job in getting on to the Italian brogue and returned to take up his abode elsewhere.

Mr. and Mrs. Jas. P. Wright spent last week in Preston county, W. Va., near Terra Alta, it being Mr. Wright's home in his younger day. He reports business brisk in that section of the country.

Mr. Wm. Sisk, boss carpenter at Beckman mine, was home over Sunday.

Mr. Jacob Carter lost a valuable cow last week, it being struck by a helper in front of his house.

Mrs. Francis McRobie was called to Hutton on Thursday last, on account of the illness of her daughter, Mrs. Mike Felty.

Mr. John Rexrode, Miss Manda Rexrode and Miss Jennie Sweitzer were guests at Mrs. A. H. Friend's Sunday.

Miss Grace Barker, of Swanton, is visiting her sister, Mrs. J. W. Comp, at this writing.

Aunt Biddy Curran was at Deer Park on Friday last, the guest of Mrs. Griffin.

Mr. Ed McRobie, who was indisposed for several days last week, we are glad to note, is out again.

Mr. Wm. Bown, of Bloomington, was visiting his mother-in-law, Mrs. Jane Wright, on Sunday.

Mrs. Alice Friend made a business trip to Swanton Monday evening.

Mrs. F. L. Warnick was a guest of Mrs. Gertrude Jefferys one day last week.

ACCIDENT.

Miss Katie Haenftling, the "hello girl" at Friendsville, spent Sunday with her parents at Accident.

Misses Bessie and Norine Ault, of Oakland, who have been spending several days with friends and relatives at this place, returned home Wednesday.

Judge Henderson and Mr. Humbird, of Cumberland, were pleasant visitors in our town one day last week.

Miss Christina Fratz spent Sunday with Miss Emma Goehringer.

August Long, of Washington, D. C., is spending some time with J. L. Richter, at this place.

Miss Nellie Shartzer, who has been spending a few weeks at Mountain Lake Park, returned home last week.

Many of our Accident folks attended the picnic at Cove Saturday. They report it a success.

Mr. and Mrs. John Hoffman spent Sunday with Asa Friend, of near Hoyes.

Oscar Halboth, of Pittsburg, who had spent some time at Accident, left for his home Monday.

Mrs. Sarah Durst and daughters, Bertha and Edith, of McHenry, spent Sunday with Geoage Ault and family, near Accident.

Mrs. Augustine, of Grantsville, is spending a week with her daughter, Mrs. J. L. Englehart.

IT DOES NOT PAY.

Why the Man Who Works for a Living Should Not Drink Beer.

1. The man that drinks beer can not earn as much money as he can if he drinks water instead. He cannot do as much work nor as good work if he drinks beer because beer weakens both the body and the mind. He is more likely to be sick and lose time if he drinks beer than if he does not.

The fat, heavy beer-drinker may look healthy but he cannot stand the strain of a long or heavy lift. Strength is in muscle, not in fat. Beer makes fat but does not make muscle.

Railroad managers will not allow men who run their trains to drink beer, because they have found by experience that beer drinking has caused the loss of many lives and much valuable property. One superintendent says: "If it takes ten glasses of beer to make a man drunk, when he has taken one glass he is one-tenth drunk." No man in that condition is fit to be entrusted with great responsibility.

Men who do not drink beer are not only able to do more work per day, but their powers of endurance are far greater than those of beer-drinking men. In intensely hot weather you can almost count on the beer-drinking men being compelled to lose at least half a day every two weeks.

2. Beer-drinking often injures a man's health much sooner than he realizes.

"The injury which beer does to health," says Dr. Rudolph Wlassak, of Vienna, "is not as easily seen as in the injury done by whisky or brandy. The whisky-drinker's appearance easily betrays him. But think of the round contented face of the true beer-drinker. Does he not look as if he were in good health? How deceitful this appearance is, is only learned little by little as the alcohol in the beer combined with the large amount of fluid, accomplishes its destructive work on stomach, heart, blood vessels, liver and kidneys."

3. The man who drinks beer is likely to drink more than he intends to.

4. If the beer-drinker takes enough to make him drunk he is likely to get into a fight or other trouble and be arrested, lose his money, etc.

5. A beer-drinker's children will be likely to follow his example. If they do they will not learn as well in school; for beer makes school children stupid; and they will not prosper so well in business for beer dulls the brain; they will not be able to do as much nor as good work for beer reduces strength and power of resistance.

6. A man who brings his children up to drink beer cannot count on having prosperous sons and daughters to be proud of and to support him in his old age.—Committee of Temperance of Presbyterian church.

A FULL HATCH.

Suggested as suitable device for the saloon sign board.

Put the Saloon Far Away.

The Chicago Tribune says: "The greater the distance to travel, the less the likelihood of temptation. * * * At a distance of three full miles a saloon is not so demoralizing as when near at hand, and the average young man is likely to give the subject serious consideration before he traverses that territory to gratify the cravings of an unwise and unwholesome thirst." Many times we hear it said that the proximity of the saloon has little to do with the amount of liquor consumed. This is specious, but a little thought will convince us that such an argument is fallacious.

Two Bits of Crepe.

A merchant of Owensboro, Ky., who was one of the most active workers in the recent local option contest arose at a meeting, held just after the announcement of the defeat, and said: "This morning when I went to my store, I found it decorated with streamers of crepe, and an insulting note was pinned with it. Just 30 years ago to-day there was crepe on my father's door, and he had gone to a drunkard's grave. Can you blame me for advocating prohibition?"

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, AUGUST 8, 1907. NUMBER 23

Democrats of Garrett County Met Here In Convention Tuesday.

DELEGATION FOR HENRY WILLIAMS

G. S. Hamill, Sr., Makes a Speech in which He Scaths Republican Officeholders of the County—Fight to Oust Hamill from Chairmanship

The Democrats of the county met in the Court House in Oakland in convention Tuesday afternoon to elect delegates to the Democratic convention of the State being held there today to nominate a state ticket. The delegates elected were G. Semmes Hamill, R. T. Browning, William Miller, Thomas Little, Peter J. Chisholm, C. V. Guard, F. C. Reis and E. A. Browning. They left for Baltimore the same night. The same central committee was elected which has been serving during the past two years.

The delegates were instructed to work and vote for the nomination of Frank Brown governor. But it was learned before the delegation left Oakland that he would decline the nomination, the delegation then said that it was for Henry Williams for governor. Williams is a member of the Baltimore bar and is a brother of Ferdinand Williams, of Cumberland.

Mr. G. S. Hamill, Sr., addressed the convention in a speech filled with invectives against the Republican officeholders of Garrett county. He pled for Democratic influence to be exerted against the use of money at elections. The speaker also contended that Frank Brown should be the choice of Garrett county Democrats for the governorship. Mr. Hamill particularized the commissioners of Garrett county when he said the roads and bridges of this county are worse today than he had ever seen them.

In the resolutions there was made but a short reference to the administration of Governor Warfield. They said in substance that while Warfield may have been led in many of his official acts by the proper motives, yet he had done them against the judgment of the chief Democrats of Garrett county. The convention, therefore, favored the nomination of Frank Brown.

There was a strong fight made over the county chairmanship of the state central committee. It seems that an effort was made by chicanery to oust Hamill and put in R. T. Browning. At one time affairs became rather warm. In the midst of the turmoil, one wheelhorse of Democracy rose, and stretching forth his hand said, "Gentlemen, all this folderol looks like child's play." Thus shame was thrown upon the multitude and they elected the same committee which has been serving for the past two years. Had the present chairman been ousted there would have been war in the Democratic camp.

Govenor Warfield Compliments Miss Sperry.

At the Govenor's reception at Chautauqua Hotel at Mt. Lake Park Thursday afternoon, Miss Louise Sperry, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Sperry of that place, and a young lady well known among a host of friends, attracted the particular attention of Governor Warfield, of Maryland, by her fine singing, and at the governor's special request Miss Sperry sang that evening at the time of the Govenor's lecture. The songs she sang to the special choice of Governor Warfield viz: "Suwanee River," and "Old Kentucky Home." Miss Sperry has in excellent voice and had the close attention of her vast audience of not less than 2000 people. Miss Sperry is a graduate of the Westernport high school.

Recital for Church Benefit.

A recital will be given in aid of the P. E. mission chapel at Swanton, Thursday, August 15th, at 8 P. M., at the Opera House, Oakland.

The assisting artists are Miss Carolina De Fabritis, a mezzo-soprano, who has won much distinction by her singing in Boston and in the larger Canadian cities, St. John, N. B., and Halifax, N. S., and has been for several years the head of the vocal department in the Halifax Conservatory. Her program will be one of interest to music lovers, her songs being taken from French, Italian and English composers and Rossini's "Una Voce Poco fa."

Miss Mary Miller needs no introduction to an Oakland audience as she has frequently been heard in recitals and amateur theatricals. Her readings will be varied in character and all the people who ever had the pleasure of hearing Miss Miller will want to seize this opportunity of hearing her again.

Miss Daisy Grant, who will be at the piano, is also too well known to need much said. The accompaniments will receive their full value at her hands and her piano numbers will add much to the pleasure of the evening.

Photographing The Breath.

Photography of the breath is the latest science. This was explained recently at the annual meeting of the Roentgen Ray Conference, at which cinematograpic pictures of the breathing of sick and healthy persons were thrown upon a screen.

The inventor of the method is Dr. Koehler, of Wiesbaden. His system shows accurately the sympathetic action of the lungs and heart in connection with inspiration and expiration.

It is expected that the discovery will play an important role in the diagnoses of tuberculosis and similar respiratory diseases.—Berlin Dispatch.

THE STATE'S GOVERNOR FORGETS TROUBLES

Talks Highly Entertainingly for Hour and Half at the Park Jubilee.

BRILLIANT BURSTS OF HUMOR

The Governor Pointed Out that People Today Have Erronious Ideas of Slavery—Told Many Good Stories of the Old Southern Plantations.

Governor's Day at the Mountain Lake Park Silver Jubilee held Thursday, was a grand success, and of the estimated two thousand people present no one left the auditorium without being highly pleased with the addresses of Governor Warfield and without a higher opinion of his oratorical ability. For an hour and a half Thursday evening, he laid aside all affairs of state and spoke in a manner both serious and humorous.

Preceding the address of the governor, County Superintendent of Schools, Mr. E. A. Browning said a few words in which he showed very ably the relation of the public schools of Garrett county to the Mountain Chautauqua, which is held annually at the Park. In the few minutes allotted to him, Mr. Browning showed up plainly that the work of the Chautauqua and of the schools of the county are one in purpose and in attainments, in the upbuilding of the minds and character of the young and old people of this grand commonweath of Maryland of ours.

After Superintendent Davis had introduced the governor, a large number of children who were sitting upon the stage, rushed towards the executive and threw bouquets of flowers at him, creating a veritable flower shower.

"This rain of flowers," began the governor, "reminds me of the story of the old Methodist minister. The good pastor had been sent a large donation of peaches floating in brandy. The minister in his thanks, said, 'I didn't care much for the peaches, my dear sister but I did enjoy and appreciate the spirit in which they were sent.' So it is tonight, I appreciate most heartily the kindly regard shown me by these young people in showering me with these flowers. Furthermore, I'm thankful that they were flowers and not cabbages."

The idea of throwing the flowers had sprung from a remark made during the day by the governor that if any of his friends had any flowers for him, he wanted them to come while he was yet alive, and not after he was dead when they could not be enjoyed by him and very little by anyone else.

"I'm glad I've been honored by the term 'educational' governor," continued the governor in part. "It is true that the record of my number of visits to our schools exceeds that of any other governor. Many of the helps to me in my work in administering the affairs of this State, I attribute to visits to the schools. All of the people are interested in our schools. They are the most expensive department of our state government and accordingly should receive a large amount of attention from the State's chief executive. And I claim that by taking an active part in school affairs, I thus get in touch with the people, get near their hearts, and so one is made a better executive. I feel close to the public schools of Maryland because it was in them that I secured all the education that I have."

The governor had chosen as the subject of his address, "Slavery As I Knew It." He stated the young people of today, through reading exaggerated accounts like "Uncle Tom's Cabin," histories written by Northerners, and other prejudiced accounts, that the young of America have come to have wholly distorted views of the slavery days. There is a humane side to that institution and every negro slave was not treated as cruelly as was the exceptional, ficticious character, "Uncle Tom." But it must be added that the governor stated emphatically that he was bitterly opposed to slavery, that he was glad the North triumphed and he added that his ancestors while holding slaves, yet they were against the institution. The argumentative part the governor's address had brilliant flashes of humorous stories of old plantation days both when slavery was in full bloom and when it was in its decay. Some of the governor's stories are here reproduced.

"Once there was an old ancestor of mine who was noted in all the country around the plantation as being the loudest praying person in the world," continued the governor with his pictures of the old slavery days. "He would pray sometimes so loud that he could be heard for miles. A Baptist minister-friend came to him one day, and asked permission to advise him upon a matter wholly personal to himself, yet the minister hoped that he would not be offended if he were to say something to him about it in a brotherly advising spirit. My ancestor told him to go on and tell him what it was for he always sought self-improvement. The minister replied, 'Indeed, my dear brother Warfield, you pray entirely too loud. God is not so far away that you have to yell to him so. Pray more quietly.' My ancestor wheeled around, and exclaimed, 'Sir, this is my own plantation and my own house and I intend to pray as I d—— please!"

The governor referred but once to the present political affairs of the State and then only long enough to state why he is not a candidate for reelection this fall. He said that he considered it wiser to stop today while has the goodwil of the people of the State than to continue as governor until every man's hand was against him and thus become finally kicked out.

"An old-time negro once strayed as far north as Boston," was the beginning of another one of the speaker's stories. "He went from house to house, begging for something to eat and to wear. Finally, he came to a home where a Southern gentleman was visiting. The negro rapped at the front door, and the Southern gentleman answered the summons. As soon as he saw the negro, he exclaimed in a stentorian voice, and in accents neither biblical nor musical, 'Why didn't you go to the back door? Go now!' The negro immediately fell upon his knees and raised his hands in prayer and said, 'Oh, I'se so thankful, Lord, that I'se cum agin unto mine own people!' "

These stories were all told with purpose of making clear thoughts the speaker wished to convey. The following one shows how each of them had an excellent application.

"Piety, my friends, was one of the characteristics of the older Warfields. But since I've become governor, I feel often as though I've strayed from the narrow path of their teachings By it, I'm reminded of the story of an old negro slave, who, when about to die, made a confession of all the wicked things he had done, so as to secure better chances in the hereafter.

"'I'se dun ebberything, brudder parsun. I'se robbed hen houses, stole pigs und wotermelyons. I'se dun eb berything, parsun, cept lost my religin.'

"So, like this old darkey," continued the governor, "I've done most everything my opponents can think a wicked man man can do, yet throughout it all, I've not lost my 'religin.' "

The governor pointed out that the negro of today is not like the negro of the olden times. He used to be filled with song, was honest, and was one of the happiest creatures on the face of the earth. But today, he is morose, melancholy, irritable and always meets you in the attitute of one who had just suffered a great disappointment.

"In conclusion, I want to say that while the race problem is one of the greatest in this country, yet I believe it like all of the others which have arisen in this country will finally be solved. In all of our crises, men have been found equal to the hour. As I said recently in Ohio, in speaking of great Americans who have answered the call of the hour, Washington was the founder of our country, Lincoln the preserver, and McKinley was the cementer."

The morning exercies were opened with prayer by Dr. Butler of Washington, D. C.

Rev. Dr. C. W. Baldwin, president of the association, welcomed the visitors on behalf of the Chautauqua and explained how in 1881 a party of clergmen and laymen from Wheeling came to Oakland in search of a suitable place to establish a summer resort founded upon Christain principles and one that would afford opportunities for religious and literary instructions with healthful recreation. Hoyes' big pasture, situated on a big plateau of the Alleghenies, known as the Glades, and which is more than 2,800 feet above sea level, was decided upon as affording the ideal sport for such a purpose, and Mountain Lake Park was established.

Dr. W. L. Davidson, director of the Chautauqua Association, followed Dr. Baldwin, and said that thousands of people are expected here during August by reason of the program that has been arranged.

Mr. J. M. Davis, of Oakland, one of the founders of Mountain Lake Park, followed Dr. Davidson. He recalled meeting President John W. Garrett, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, at the time Mountain Lake Park was established and praised the generous co-operation extended by the movement by the railroad company. Governor Warfield followed Mr. Davis, and made a brief speech. President Oscar G. Murray, of the Baltimore and Ohio, was on the program, but a letter from him explained that, much to his regret, his engagements were such as would not permit him to accept the invitation. Mr. Murray sent this greeting:

"Am sure the occasion will be a memorable one, and trust the season will be successful."

Major J. G. Pangborn, special representative of the Baltimore and Ohio, then gave a short talk and assured the association of Mr. Murray's willingness th co-operate with them in the future as in the past, and spoke of his deep interest in the welfare of the Baltimore and Ohio employes.

Governor Warfield held an informal reception in the afternoon, after which he was shown over the grounds by officers of the association.

A Large Number of Capitalists Took Supper There Saturday.

VISITED FAIRMONT COAL REGIONS

A Thorough Inspection Was Made of the Coal Developments of Fairmont—Its Possibilities, Wonderful—Great "Ad" for Fairmont.

An inspection of the Fairmont coal regions was made last week by Governor Warfield, and a large number of other capitalists of Baltimore city. The result from the visit is a great boom for that section of West Virginia. All of the newspapers of this section had representatives with the party and the trip was given an extensive writeup in all of the leading periodicals of this neighborhood.

From Clarksburg the party went to Deer Park in the special, where the members were quartered in the hotel. At night a sumptuous dinner was served. The best efforts of the chef had been centered upon it, and it was but another evidence of the royal manner in which Messrs. Watson and Wheelwright had been entertaining their guests.

The guests were: Fred G. Boyce, Townsend, Scott & Co.; William H. Blackford, Maryland Life Insurance Co.; George A. Colston, Wilson, Colston & Co.; Fred M. Davies, New York; Fred W. Feldner, Fidelity Trust; E. Stanley Gary, James S. Gary & Son; Theo. B. Harrison, Jr., Harrison & House; John D. Howard, J. Harmanus Fisher & Co.; O. Howard Harvey, Archer Harvey & Co.; Grier Hersh, Maryland Trust Co.; Hillen J. Jenkins; T. J. Jeannerett, Owen Daily & Co.; E. W. Levering, Jr., Baker, Watts & Co.; William J. Middendorf, Middendorf, Williams & Co.; Acosta Nicholas, Spencer Trask & Co.; Gustavus Ober, Gustavus Ober; M. W. O'Connell, Citizens' National Bank; A. Hamilton S. Post, Mercantile Trust Company; Gordon P. Paine, Gordon P. Paine & Co.; J. C. B. Pendleton; Lawrence Perin, Lawrence Perin Company; Samuel E. Reinhard, Mexer & Co.; Simon H. Stein, Stein Bros.; Samuel M. Shoemaker; Eben Sutton, Sutton, Strother & Co.; James M. Thompson, Jr.; Douglas H. Thomas, Merchants' National Bank: Robert Taylor, Marshal, Spader & Co.; Hon. Edwin Warfield, Fidelity Trust Company; Lancaster Williams, Middendorf, Williams & Co.; J. S. Wilson, Jr., J. S. Wilson, Jr., & Co.; Horatio L. Whitridge, Whitridge, White & Co.; William Winchester, National Union; A. E. Waters, Townsend, Scott & Co.; David S. Warfield, Continental Trust Co.; Charles T. Daly, Baltimore Sun; J. G. Nelson, Baltimore American; Harry F. Nepler, Baltimore News; C. W. Watson. J. H. Wheelwright, Van Lear Black, Clem G. Goodrich, H. A. Kuhn, T. H. Bennett, J. R. Buckingham, H. A. Kuhn, Pittsburg.

Any mention of the inspection trip is incomplete without noting the splendid service given by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The dining service was of the very highest order. It was under the supervision of Superintendent E. V. Baugh, represented by T. T. Heckrotte, inspector of service, who did the honors most creditably. The organization of the trip was perfect. Much credit is due J. R. Buckingham, who carried out the details of it.

The trip was very interesting and instructive. It gave the capitalists a keener insight into the oparations of the Fairmont Coal Company, and amazed them with the possibilities of property which is directed from Baltimore and contributes to her commercial importance. It furthermore revealed to them a community of exceptional enterprise and push, and undoubtedly has aroused ideas which will be to the advantage of the city.

On the trip Governor Warfield located a number of Marylanders who promised to remember to Home-coming Week at Baltimore this fall.

Married Here.

Mr. Dave Ramsey, a well known employee of the B. & O., and Miss Anna Bert Mallonee both of Grafton, were married in Oakland recently. It has been generally known about the city that this couple were to be married soon, but it was not known that they would go to Oakland. After the marriage they went at once to Atlantic City where they will spend their honeymoon. The cause of their going to Oakland was on account of Miss Mallonee being under age and her parents would not give their consent. Mr. nnd Mrs. Ramsey expect to spend about two weeks in Atlantic City and then they will be at home to their friends on Maple avenue. This match has been looked forward to with much interest on the part of many Graftonians.—Grafton Sentinel.

PASSING OF AN INDIAN FIGHTER

Old Bill Chance, a Noted Enemy of Indians, Now in Sunset of Life.

INDIANS ALWAYS BLOODTHIRSTY

This Old Citizen of 77, Has Fought in Many Indian Wars — Describes Graphically the Red Man and His Cruel Ways.

One of the most picturesque characters in the Northwest is Bill Chance, who is spending the evening of his days in Seaside, content to let the strenuous life he has lived be only a pleasant memory.

Bill Chance is a man of striking appearance, six feet two inches tall, and although seventy-seven years old, straight as an arrow. He is probably more familiar with the Indians and the Indian wars of the coast than any man living, having been an active participant in almost every war with them since he crossed the plains in 1852. He speaks several Indian dialects, and is as familiar with the Chinook jargon as he is with English.

During the Rogue River Indian war he served as a volunteer and participated in the battle of Hungry Hill, one of the most sanguinary fights of all that cruel campaign. His discription of the atrocities he witnessed is so vivid that listening to them almost makes the auditor feel he was present. "I have seen," said he, "children wearing swaddling clothes whom the murderous brutes had taken by the legs and beaten their brains out against a rock. And yet many people in the East, actuated by a feeling of sentiment and ignorance, have lifted up their hands in horror at the thought of white men thirsting for the blood of those fiends. As a matter of fact the men who know the cruelty and bloodthirstyness of the red men have no more hesitancy in killing an Indian than they would a rattler. Of the two the rattlers are the less dangerous and more honorable; they always warn before they strike; an Indian, never."

Another thing you must observe. An Indian is always an Indian. No difference how much of the veneering of civilization he may have acquired; no difference if he was taken when a pappoose, raised to manhood by a white family, without ever seeing one of his kind, latent lies the Indian traits, ready to burst forth in deeds of cruelty and hate without a moment's warning. I may make an exception to this in favor of a squaw, but never with the bucks.

"I belonged," said Bill, "to the Ben Wright expedition and was one of the thirty men engaged in the so-called Ben Wright massacre. Wright was severely censured for this by the United States officials and stigmatized as a murderer. A howl was raised throughout the Eastern press, many insisting that he be court-martialed and shot.

"The whole secret of the killing of those thirty Indians lay in the Indians' treachery. We had these Moloquas (since known as Modoes) penned on a peninsula that ran into a lake, near Lost River, about two miles this side of the California line. Escape was impossible, so they sent a messenger, under a flag of truce, asking for a peace conference, to be held at 12 o'clock the following day, which Wright immediately granted. The significance of the hour did not occur to him. At the noon hour the men would be engaged in eating dinner or attending to their horses, thus being entirely off their guard.

"During the night the squaw came into camp and informed Wright that the Indians would all attend the council; that they would wear their blankets, under which their firearms would be concealed, and at a given signal from the chief all the whites were to be murdered in cold blood. This, you observed, after promising to come unarmed.

"The next day everything in camp went on as usual. The most wary Indian eye could detect nothing in the white man's camp to indicate any knowledge of the premeditated treachery.

"At the appointed hour, while the whites were apparently engaged about their camp duties, the Indians marched solemnly into camp, and fell into such positions as enabled them to observe every man in camp, with the chief facing Capt. Wright.

When the crucial moment arrived Wright raised his hand to his hat, when instantly thirty rifles, in the hands of as dreadly, marksmen as ever pulled a trigger, poured a storm of lead into that surprised body of Indians, who had come to kill, and instead were killed. Not one of them escaped, and so sudden and unexpected was the attack and so fatal in its results, that not one of them had time to remove his blanket or to raise his gun, and they all had their guns concealed under their blankets.

"This," continued Mr. Chance "is the true story of the so-called 'Ben Wright massacre.' It was simply a question of killing or be killed, and Wright took the only sensible course, and killed. Who I ask, under the circumstances would have done otherwise? And echo questions 'Who?'

"The most daring act of bravery I ever saw," continued Mr. Chance "occured at the battle of Hungry Hill. A man by the name of Miller had his leg broken by a bullet, and when the troops retreated under the galling fire of the Indians Miller was left lying on the field. David Inman went back to Miller, picked him up, and, amid a raging storm of bullets, carried him to a place of safty. Marvelous as it may appear, neither of them was touched by a bullet."

Bill Chance is serenely passing over the last part of the road leading to the "great unknown." He has helped to make the history of the West, and although nearing the last milestone, his wit is rapier like in its keenness and his soul is as full of music as mocking birds at mating time. He will leave this world better for having lived in it.—From the Portland Oregondan.

Facts About Book of Job.

The creation of the tribal epic was to some extent regarded as a tribal work, like the building of the tribal temple. Believe, then, if you will, that the prologue of Job and the epilogue and the speech of Elihu are things inserted after the original work was composed. But do not suppose that such insertions have that obvious and spurious character which would belong to any insertions in a modern individualistic book. Do not regard the insertions as you would regard a chapter in George Meredith, which you afterward found had not been written by George Meredith, or half a scene in Ibsen which you found had been cunningly sneaked in by William Archer. Remember that this old world which made these old poems like the Iliad and Job, always kept the tradition of what it was making A man could almost leave a poem to his son to finished as he would have finished it, just as a man could leave a field to his son to be reaped as he would have reaped it. What is called Homeric unity may be a fact or not. The Iliad may have been written by a hundred men. But let us remember that there was more than unity in those times in a hundred men than there is unity now in one man. Then a city was like one man. Now one man is like a city in civil war.—G. K. Chesterton Putnam's.

OUR NEIGHBOR MARS

Has Two Little Moons That Whirl Around It At Great Speed.

In picturing the inhabitants of Mars, says the London Chronicle, it has been supposed that we should regard them as two and a half times as large as ourselves, on account of the smaller attraction of gravity on their planet, which would reduce the weight of a 10-stone terrestrial to four stone and make a man 15 feet high as agile as a six-footer here.

But this is a trifle compared with the inhabitants of Mars' two little moons, Deimos and Phobos (Fear and Terror), if we may estimate the Phobians' size on the same basis of reckoning. They work out as men a mile and three-quarters high, occupying a world 20 miles round. A dozen of them, lying head to foot, would girdle their equator.

The most daring of all literary phophecies which science has later justified is recalled by the fiery glow with which Mars now burns in the evening sky. In "Gulliver's Travels," Swift represented the Lilliputian astronomers as having so keen a vision and such excellent telescopes that they discovered that Mars was attended by two moons, one of which revolved around the planet in 10 hours. In 1874 it was discovered by Prof. Asaph Hall that Mars actually has two satellites, and, moreover, that one of them circle around Mars once in every 7 hours and 37 minutes.

As the day on Mars is only a few minutes longer than our own earthly day of 24 hours, this state of things has some curious results, especially as the other moon of Mars revolves round it in 30 hours. It means that if you live on Mars you get a full moon four times a day, and that while 28 terrestial days make one lunar month, there are between four and five months in a Martian day. It seems quite "lunatic" and fitting that these moons of Mars, should be called Phobos and Deimos—

Mars spake and called Dismay and Rout
To yoke his steed.

Lawson's Coveted Miles of Roses.

It sounds as if all the rambler rose bushes in New England had been captured by a capitalist when one hears that Thomas Lawson has 14 miles of crimson ramblers rose bushes in blossom at Dreamwold, his country place. The white fences the barns the farm houses and the dwellings are covered with ths gorgeous blooms, which are said to form the finest display ever seen on a private estate. There are about 40 roses to each cluster of blossoms and the number of clusters on one bush can hardly be counted. The bushes have been in bloom for more than a week, and several women's clubs in the surrounding towns have made excursions to Dreamwold to enjoy their beauty.—New York Press.

Women Patent Old Inventions.

The sage who keeps the records in the Patent Office of the United States says 3,500 devices have been patented by women and that many of them have made fortunes. Several experts say two-thirds of these "new" things are simply adaptations of ancient inventions. Safety pins have been found in Egypt. Now an inquistive savant has been poking around the ruins of Pompeii and discoved that the woman who patented that celluloid device to keep straggling locks off women's necks infringed on the rights of a genius who lived in the first century of Christian era. Such pins in silver and ivory have been found near a baker's house in Pompeii, and the supposition is that the baker compelled all his help to confine their tresses most rigidly before assisting in the breadmaking. Such articles as tweezers and others which could only have been found in Etrurian cities wrought in gold and silver. The wise one who wants to make a fortune on patenting inventions should take a course in archæology for hints.—N. Y. Press.

THE EDITOR'S SONG.

How dear to my heart is the steady subscriber,
Who pays in advance, without skipping a year;
Who lays down his money, and offers it gladly,
And casts 'round the office a halo of cheer.

Who never says, "Stop it, I cannot afford it!"
Or, "Getting more papers each day than I read;"
But always says, "Send it, the whole outfit likes it—
In fact, we regard it a business need."

How welcome is he when he steps in the sanctum,
How he makes our heart throb how he makes "our eye" dance!
We outwardly thank him—we inwardly bless him—
The steady subscriber who pays in advance!

Cat On Operating Table.

Tom, a pet cat, with its home at 97 Gold street, occupied by the wholesale leather firm of the Abe Stein Company, was a patient yesterday in St. Gregory's Hospital, where its right foreleg was mended. Tom allowed Dr. Arnold to put the leg in a plaster-of-paris cast without a murmur. The operation was witnessed by the entire hospital staff.

Tom has the reputation of being the best mouse and rat catcher in Gold street. While he was chasing a large rat yesterday on the fourth floor of the building he fell down the hatch into the cellar, breaking his leg.

Tom's cries bought several employes to the cellar. The cat was quickly taken to the hospital, and Dr. Arnold, who is a lover of animals, administered a stimulant, which relieved its sufferings. When Tom was put on the operating table he didn't make any fuss about it and kept perfectly still, and seemed to realize what was going on. He was later put to bed, where he will have to stay for two weeks.

Tom's case was diagnosed as a compound fracture of the tibia of the right foot. Dr. Arnold said that Tom was the best behaved patient he had had for a long time. —N. Y. Tribune.

The Dish Washers.

There's a new thing come to town. A pathfinder is established a desideratum. That is, a long felt want. Here is his personal card:

"Ladies and Gentlemen—I have the honor to announce that I have imported from Paris 300 expert washers of dishes. It is a rare personal pleasure to meet a requirement so long misunderstood in your grand America. At your own command I send every night a dish washer, who will render in perfect order and cleanliness the dishes which have been used during the day. My charge is 5 cents a dozen for plates, 10 cents a dozen for cups and saucer, and 1 cent each for glasses. Awaiting your order I remain," etc.

It is all right for a woman to say she hates to rub; but where is the angel who willingly washes the dishes? Here's a million for her. Cooking? Easy as falling off a log. But the cleanup. Ook!—New York Press.

New Roosevelt Lily A Quick Grower.

Have you seen the new cala lily known as the Mrs. Roosevelt? It seems to have attained unsual bloom, as if by magic unknown to the average raiser of flowers. The petals are like luminous velvet of a delicate yellow. There are several beds of them in Central Park, and even when the flowers are not blooming the foliage is highly ornamental. One patriotic woman, just back from Paris, which is a paradise of flowers in these days, was so delighted when she saw the park lilies yesterday that she asserted positively she would have several beds of the blooms in her Long Island home just as soon as she could get her gardener to work.—New York Press.

QUEEN OF QUAGMOND.

By pes W. Sargent.

Copyrighted, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.

Far out on the blue expanse of water two black specks turned smaller and smaller in the distance. Now and then the early morning sun caught the broad blades of the oars with a glint like the flash of a diamond, but presently the boats rounded the point of Indian island, and Nan turned to her aunt.

"Well," she announced briskly, "we are all alone for the day. Just think of that, auntie. We can imagine that we are original settlers and alone in the trackless waste."

Mrs. Edmond shivered at the suggestion.

"Don't, child!" she cried. "Is it not enough that we should be left alone?"

"It's the most delicious thing that has happened this summer," declared Nan. "Just think of having the whole of this beautiful lake all to ourselves! I'm queen of Quagmond lake, and you are the dowager queen, I guess. Let's clear away the remains of our royal banquet."

Suiting the action to the word, Nan briskly attacked the breakfast things, washing them in the tiny brook that went singing over the pebbles to the waters of the lake. It did not take long to dispose of the soiled things, and presently the girl turned to her aunt, her nut brown face glowing from the exercise.

"What do you want to do, dear?" she demanded.

"Whatever you wish." Mrs. Edmond smiled into the radiant face softly framed in the masses of soft hair. "I suppose that we had better wait until Mr. Leland comes over."

"Wint Leland is not coming over," said Nan decidedly. "I want to go somewhere now. Let's take a lunch and climb the mountain. It's such a tiny mountain it won't tire you. We can stop every little while. I hate to have to climb and climb and climb the way Wint Leland wants to."

"I'M HEAPING COALS OF FIRE ON YOUR HEAD, NAN.

"We will do it your way," said Mrs. Edmond gently. "Shall we start at once?"

"You're the dearest auntie that ever was," declared Nan as she planted an enthusiastic kiss upon the lady's withered cheek and danced off to prepare the lunch. Mrs. Edmond noticed that the girl kept scanning the lake and guessed the cause. Nan was afraid that in spite of the prohibition Winthrop Leland might come paddling around the corner, as he had done every morning since the Rankin camp had been opened.

The rest of the party would never have gone across the lake had they not supposed that Leland would be there to do squire duty. It was so like Nan not to let them know. There must have been a quarrel last night. She let her troubled glance wander out along the shore, but there was no sign of the canoe, and presently they tied the tent flaps and plunged into the soft green of the woods.

But even Squaw hill was something of a climb for Mrs. Edmond, and, as stops were frequent, it was well past noon when they at last halted for lunch, establishing themselves upon a grassy plateau divided by a tiny stream that later cut past the camp.

Both were hungry, and the sandwiches quickly vanished, but neither made a move to go. Below, the lake glittered like a sheet of burnished silver in the glare of the sun, a giant salver framed in the changing green of the tree clad banks. Mrs. Edmond leaned back against the huge rock and sighed contentedly. Nan dropped down beside her and rested her head against her aunt's knee.

"It's lovely up here," she said softly. "I wish that we didn't have to go back ever."

"You would tire of it," said the elder woman, with a smile. "You are too young and too active to turn recluse, Nan. Besides," with an allusion to the girl's speech that morning, "the queen should not seclude herself from her subjects."

"Not even when the subjects are unruly?" Nan asked, with a sigh.

"Then least of all," counseled Mrs. Edmond. "She should restore harmony to her subjects and show herself truly a ruler. What was the matter last night, Nan?"

The girl started and colored at the directness of the question. She had not meant such a literal application of her remark.

"Wint was horrid last night," she said slowly, her glance directed toward the tiny Indian island out in the lake. "He was so certain that we could not do without him that I told him not to come."

"And then?" A soft hand fell lovingly upon the girl's soft hair.

"And then he said he would come anyway, because he knew I never could run the camp alone, and I told him I was perfectly able to run the camp and care for you and that I didn't care if I never saw him again, and he said I probably never should, and then he went away and never even said good night."

"Did you expect him to come after your rudeness?" Mrs. Edmond's voice gave no hint of the smile that was playing about her lips and in the corner of her eyes. Nan, looking straight out across the lake, did not see.

"He might have been polite," she said aggrievedly.

"After you had been so discourteous?"

"Well," she persisted, "he's so important. Just as though I could not build a fire or cook bacon and things!"

"It was very good of him to want to help. I think you should apologize to him," she counseled softly.

"I won't," said Nan mutinously "Maybe," relenting a little, "I shall speak to him again, if he's very nice and humble, but I shan't apologize."

"Then let us hope that he will not expect it," suggested Mrs. Edmond. "Shall we go on?" And they resumed their climb.

Nan was glad enough to rest before they reached the summit. "It's different," she explained as she threw herself on the soft moss, "when there is some one to help you up the rocks."

"Even men have their uses," laughed Mrs. Edmond. "What a beautiful view we have from here!"

"When you look out," said Nan grimly, "when you look down and realize how far we have to go, I'm afraid it will be too much for you, auntie."

"Not at all," said Mrs. Edmond bravely, but she shuddered as she glanced at the trees far below them. "It will be going down hill, you know."

"I'm always making trouble for people," cried Nan penitently.

"It's a peculiarity of queens," reminded Mrs. Edmond, "but it will be easy going down, dear."

It was not an easy matter, however, for presently the sun sank below the line of hills, and the trail through the woods was dark and lonesome. Nan had insisted that Mrs. Edmond take her arm where the trail made it possible, and, though the elder woman tried not to lean heavily upon the girl, Nan's shoulders ached.

Suddenly Nan stopped and clapped her hands.

"They're back!" she cried. "I'm so glad. I never could have cooked supper. I've been so worried about it and so hungry!"

She pointed ahead. Through the trees the firelight glinted upon the white walls of the tents, and already the grateful odor of coffee filled their nostrils.

The thought gave them fresh strength, and they pushed ahead to the clearing, and Nan stopped short as Winthrop Leland sprang up from the shadows.

"Piggy," he called cheerfully, "not to let me in on the trip. I'm heaping coals of fire on your head, Nan. The coffee and biscuit are ready, and some of the finest trout you ever saw are waiting to be broiled. Supper will be ready by the time you've changed to moccasins and washed up."

"Wint," said Nan fervently, "you are an angel, and I'm sorry I was cross last night."

Mrs. Edmond slipped into the tent. The queen of Quagmond was about to abdicate in favor of a king, and she did not want to be present at the ceremony.

The Roman Candle Maker.

"The most solitary person in the world during working hours," says Rene Bache in the Technical World Magazine, "is the maker of roman candles. He occupies an isolated cell somewhat like that of an old time hermit, save that its precincts are more contracted, and nobody comes near him while he is engaged in his patient toil. The wages he gets are high, but not by reason of the loneliness to which he is condemned. He is paid for the risks he is obliged to take. The quarters occupied by this eremite artisan are a tiny house, which might almost be called a hut, with a floor space not more than six square feet. Standing by itself, at least sixty yards from any other structure, the little building is of wood, of the simplest imaginable architecture. If it were to be blown up, the financial loss would be almost nil, a point of some importance, inasmuch as its diurnal tenant is obliged to use considerable quantities of explosives in the business which engages his attention, for a roman candle is a sort of magazine or repeating gun, with a paper tube for a barrel and balls of fire for projectiles."

She Knew Him.

Mrs. K. had engaged a robust, middle aged colored woman to do some housecleaning. During the progr of the work Mrs. K. said:

"A colored man came along here one day last week and wanted work, and I let him wash some windows, but he did not do the work at all well."

"What fo' lookin' man was he?" asked the helper.

"Well, he was a big, strong fellow, and he had but one eye. He said that his name was White. He did very poor work."

"I specs he did, lady. He's de wus' no 'count in dis town."

"Oh, then you know him?"

"Know 'im? Why, lady, I's mah'ied to 'im!"—Exchange.

THE CHURCH AT WORK

WORLD'S OLDEST MINISTER.

He Is Rev. Thomas Lord, of England, Aged 100.

Rev. Thomas Lord, of England, has just entered upon his one hundredth year, and he is probably the oldest minister in the world who is still in active service. This veteran of the pulpit retired from the ministry nearly 30 years ago; but frequently preaches in chapels in the district where he resides, besides taking part in temperance meetings, in which work he has been an enthusiast nearly all his life.

REV. THOMAS LORD.

When asked to explain the secret of his long life, Mr. Lord instantly replied that there was no secret in it:

"It is the duty of every Christian," he said, "to use his own common sense and to be moderate in all things. By doing that, I have lived to be over 99."

While abstaining from intoxicating liquors, Mr. Lord has also abstained from using tobacco. On one occasion, an old lady advised him to take to smoking, saying that a minister could think better with a pipe in his mouth. The reply was characteristic of the man:

"No," he answered, "if that is where thought comes from, I would rather not think at all."

The venerable minister, says Christian Herald, takes his turn with other pastors in conducting services at the Horncastle workhouse on every Wednesday, and not long ago he was engaged in preparing a new lecture on temperance. He is a living example of how a man, by hard work and careful living, can be preserved to a ripe old age.

REVIVAL IN KOREA.

Remarkable Religious Awakening at Pyeng-Yang.

One of the most remarkable evidences of divine power has swept over the city of Pyeng-Yang. This is the result of the united prayers of the missionary forces in that city.

After a short sermon one Sunday morning, in which the appeal was made to people to confess their sins and surrender themselves unreservedly to God, the people were asked to make confession. Immediately a young man prominent in church work, with tears and groans, made confessions of a sinful life. When he had finished speaking, he flung himself on the floor in great agony, and sought for mercy. The scene that followed was indescribable. Men were stricken to the floor as if hurled there by a thunderbolt. They writhed upon the floor and cried for mercy in great remorse. So remarkable has been this revival wave, that during the last year one of the churches has increased its membership by 10,000; and a revival equal to the notable revival in Wales seems to be progressing in most parts of the country.

After a Century.

As the result of 100 years of missionary work in China, there are about a hundred and fifty thousand native Protestant Christians in the empire. The anniversary of the beginning of the work was celebrated recently in Shanghai, when Europeans and Americans interested in Protestant missions attended in large numbers. It was in 1807 that Robert Morrison, appointed by a British missionary society, and carried to China by an American firm engaged in the eastern trade, began his labors. After 35 years there were six converts and 20 missionaries. There are now nearly 4,000 missionaries, and the number of native Christians is doubling every seven years, says Youth's Companion. The Roman Catholics have had missions in the empire several hundred years, and count a million adherents and 25 bishoprics.

Revival at Aberdeen.

Five hundred and thirty-one persons declared themselves for Christ in the revival services at the Auditorium at Aberdeen, S. D., after continuing four weeks. All-day services were held, also a day of fasting and prayer, and many business houses were closed for the meetings, which were conducted by Evangelist R. E. Johnson, of the Moody Institute, Chicago.

Pleads Cause of Boer Women.

Countess d'Asinelli writes from Geneva, Switzerland: "Miss Hobhouse sailed from South Africa for England at the same time as Gen. Botha, to plead the cause of the Boer women. Gen. Botha, now premier of the Transvaal, writes gratefully thanking all who have aided the Hobhouse home industries."

Finest Methodist Church.

The new Fowler church in Minneapolis, Minn., will be one of the finest churches architecturally in Methodism, and nothing will be spared to make its decorations and finish on a par with its architecture.

GIVE THE MITE YOU OWE.

The primaries of the Republican party to elect delegates to meet in convention at Oakland next Monday to select delegates the State Convention at Baltimore will be held Saturday.

It is the duty of every citizen to attend primaries In them is done the real work of nominating and in them is felt the power of the wishes of the people. Every citizen owes this voting to his country in return for the many benefits which he derives from American citizenship. Give this mite to your country and vote at the primaries Saturday. There is yet no man selected for the Republican gubernatorial nomination and the selection will be made largely through the sentiment which is expressed day after to-morrow. Let the candidate eminate from the people.

If there are few votes cast, then there will be less sentiment, less power, exerted by the people. Then so-called "bosses" will come to the rescue and nominate a man of their own hearts, one who will be under obligation to them for the election and nomination, and not to the people where the obligation of right belongs. With such a candidate elected, the people will be disregarded and the aim of the governor elected by a few "bosses" will be to please his masters and not the people. Neither can the people fail to blame anyone else but themselves if such a predicament is thrust upon the good people of Maryland if they fail Saturday to the exercise the power of choice.

IS IT JUST?

The constitution of the United States that ark which contains the covenant between the people and our government says that "excessive fines shall not be imposed." There is a determination in the heart of every American that the constitution shall be held inviolate, and that any one who tampers with it, like the Israelites of old with their Ark, should suffer some loss. So far, the instrument has keep intact. But many people of the United States, friends of the large corporations, are saying that today it is being broken.

When Judge Landis, at Chicago, last week fined the Standard Oil Company to the extent of a little less than thirty millions of dollars, there were many who exclaimed, "The fine is excessive and that the constitution of the United States does not sanction such fines." They added such a fine is uncontitutional, and therefore, not valid nor collectable. Is thirty million dollars' fine excessive? The Supreme Court of the United States will have to answer that question for the case has been appealed by the Standard Oil Company.

Furthermore, it is contended by many that a fine of such magnitude is confiscation of property and cannot therefore be imposed. The case is being watched closely with great interest by all students of constitutional law.

The enemies of the oil trust reply that to large corporations reaping millions in profits every month, thirty millions is not excessive. They miss that sum no more than a poor man does a dollar that he gives his wife for a hat or a dress, or a pair of shoes.

THE PASSING OF DOLLY.

There is being enacted a great tragedy in this fair land of ours and but few see it. The doll baby is being rooted out from its place in the hearts of our children by the Teddy Bear, and no one seems to come to the rescue of the idol of our childhood days. Dolly is sleeping out in the cold on the floor, while Teddy Bear is snug and warm, nestled up to the heart of the little one in his crib.

Children of 1907 take up more readily with the ferocious bear than they do with the quiet, sleeping dolly. Teddy Roosevelt is invading even the affections of the children before they are capable of leaving their mother's apron string. Dolly remains dusty upon the shelves of the wholesale houses while Teddy Bear cannot be keep long enough to be completely manufactured, so great is the demand for them throughout the land.

The mothers were once able to improvise a doll out of rags with a string around the neck, but how in the universe will they make a TeddyBear with its four legs and a head and a squeal? Who is to be blamed for this slaying of dolly and for the usurpation by Teddy Bear of the affection of the children? Who is to help the mothers in their inability to fool the children with false teddy bear, with all of its fuzziness?

Its good-by, Dolly, with all your saw dust and rags and broken heads. Teddy bears are now anchored in the hearts of our American youths. They can stand all kinds of banging and hammering and pulling, yet they will always be in excellent shape to hand unto the younger brother or sister. But you, Dolly, are always indisposed by a broken head, by baldness, or lack of clothing.

THOSE SAINTS ON PEDESTALS.

It is howled on all sides by the saints in our civilization that politics are corrupt. If so, the blame falls upon the shoulders of none others than those who stand off to one side and point the finger of scorn at the those who are doing something even though it is not the best. The good book says that to the pure all things are pure. So it may be inferred that to the corrupt all things are corrupt. Let there be a change of sentiment and of feeling on this question, and let the change be felt at the primaries to be held this fall throughout the county. Let the best element of society put a shoulder to the wheel and help govern this county in the most honorable way possible.

One of the leading thinkers of this country says that so-called corruption in politics is not blamable on the bad men who are in politics but on the good people of the country who stand upon the pedestals of self conceit and purity and will not take a hand in the government of this country. It must be governed, and the work will be done by either good or bad people. And if the bad gain the ascendancy and the good will not take part, then the corruption must be charged to the account of the righteous who could with their stronger sense of right and greater power to resist temptation, keep the affairs of state, county, and nation from being dragged through the mire of deviltry. Let all take part in the primaries Saturday. None are too good. The more righteous the participants, the better will be the result.

FIKE.

The farmers in our section have commenced making hay, the wheat harvest having ended.

Our school has no teacher and any good teacher not having a school will find an excellent opening here.

Mr. Mathias Frazee has the largest crop of wheat of any one in our vicinity He has 500 dozen sheeves this year.

Mr. W. H. Thomas raised 117 dozen sheeves of wheat this year.

Mr. John R. Fike and Joseph Bowser were making ties on the Henry Lee property last week.

Mr. L. K. Fike was taken suddenly ill Thursday, the doctor was called and he pronounced his ailment gastrities, his tempeture being 101. We hope his speedy recovery.

Story of a Man in Marietta Who Won Fame by Finding "Dead Corpse."

OAKLAND'S NOTED NATIVE JOKE

A Citizen at Deer Park Adapted Himself Admirably to the Strenuous Ways of Hon. Henry G. Davis—A Pennsylvania Judge's Reasoning.

It is impossible for one who never has lived in a river valley which is flooded about every year to appreciate the great damage which comes with each overflow of the river. Millions of dollars worth of property are lost in the twinkling of an eye, and hundreds of lives are lost often in a similar length of time. People are made homeless for weeks, living anywhere until their homes can be repaired, cleaned and dried out. There is seldom very little humor in such a disaster.

However, sometimes there are outbursts of the ridiculous which cause these homeless creatures to laugh even though their homes have been carried away, and bodies are lost which never will be found to comfort the bereaved ones. In the flood that swept over the valley of the Ohio river in June, an event occurred which shall never be forgotten by the residents of Marietta. The waters had left the principal streets, and everybody was on the lookout for bodies of drowned people. One man found a corpse in his back yard. Part of the body could be seen projecting from a pile of rubbish. He went immediately and notified the coroner who secured a jury and doctor to recover the body and make an examination thereof. When the austere and dignified legal body had assembled and the corpse was dragged out from its last resting place and the doctor was brought forward to make examination, lo! and behold, his instruments would not enter the corpse at all. It was not a body, but a clothes dummy, upon whith clothing of men had been exhibited to show customers in stores. The days of that man who made the discovery have never been without some remark to him of his wonderful discovery of a corpse.

Oakland never has sent out men or women who have worked wonders in the world. There are no meccas here which are visited annually by thousands who wish to honor some dead person who once traveled these streets of ours. However, Oakland will be remembered by many as being the birthplace of a joke which has gone out into the world and has made thousands laugh. Wherever one goes today, he will find this joke told in one form or another.

The son during the morning had disobeyed his mother, and she got down the strap to punish the child. She had struck but a blow or two, when the child took to his heels, and made his escape. The mother pursued him, but she soon was unable to keep up the pace, for the boy climbed away up under the house, amid the dirt, darkness, and cobwebs, where he knew his mother could not reach him. There he rested in peace. The father came home at dinner and the mother poured her tale of woe into his ear, and told him to go up under the house and bring out Tommy. The father did as he was bidden. When he came near where the boy was, the child inquired, "What, Pap, is she after you too?"

In a town near Oakland, a telegraph operator married a school teacher and of course bride-like she wanted to help her husband. A train was fifteen minutes late, and true to her school ways, wrote on the station blackboard: "No. 55—15 Minutes Tardy."

It is said that Hon. Henry Gassoway Davis when he lived at Deer Park, and was actively engaged in business there, used to work his men very hard. Nothing was omitted which would go to make the returns from the workmen as great as possible. One of the workmen now living near Deer Park, when visited by a friend, was found to have no bed in his room. "What's the matter, don't you ever sleep?" "No," was the reply, "I've been compelled to sell my bed to buy a lantern. I have no time for the former and great need of the lantern."

The story is told of a judge in Pennsylvania who a few years ago made a citizen see himself as others saw him. In that state the judge has practically absolute power in the granting of liquor licenses. A schoolmate friend of his made application to the judge for a license to conduct a liquor saloon.

"You can't refuse me, your honor, for you know well that my character is up to the standard of saloon keepers, and far beyond many of them."

"Yes, that's true," replied the judge, "and it is in view of your excellent character as I well know it to be that I refuse to grant you a license. For I know if you go into the liquor business your character can't be as pure as it is today."

NEIGHBORLY NOTES.

Items of Interest of Our Neighbors in West Virginia and Maryland.

Adam S. Garris, a member of the Washington county bar, was disbarred Thursday at Hagerstown by Judges Boyd and Henderson. The reasons for so doing were given by the judges that "Garris does not now possess the qualifications of character and fitness required of an attorney of this court, and that his remaining longer an enrolled attorney of this bar cannot but reflect discredit upon the administrations of justice."

Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Woodyard, of Grafton, left their suit cases sit on the depot platform for a minute the other evening, and when they reached for them they were gone, having been stolen.

The postoffice department is watching more closely packages which are mailed, said to have no writing within. Several have been found to contain writing, and the parties were fined and in some cases imprisoned.

Mr. H. H. Mansbach, for fifty years actively engaged in business at Piedmont, will retire after the 15th of this month.

Dr. Orlando S. Reynolds died at Keyser, July 26th, from typhoid fever.

Keyser is lighted with gas.

The anti-saloon league with headquarters in Baltimore, is making arrangements to enter the campaign this fall. This league has done much to drive liquor from the several sections of this country.

Three tracks are being laid by the Baltimore & Ohio between Cumberland and Martinsburg.

The Grafton Grocery & Produce Company made an assignment Friday morning at Grafton.

Frank Stephenson pleaded guilty to first degree murder in the criminal court at Bluefield, W. Va., Friday. It is probably the first plea of that kind ever made in West Virginia. He was sentenced to be hanged October 25. Stephenson built an ambush and lay in wait for Mose Blagman, a miner, on Crane Creek, and shot him to death. The motive was to get Blagman's wife with whom Stephenson was in love.

C. W. Swisher, the alert politician of West Virginia, and at present secretary of that state, is hot upon the trail for the gubernatorial nomination.

The Jamestown Exposition has failed to make its first payment of $100,000 due the government to repay the loan of $1,000,000.

Attorney Dick, of Allegany county, has been disbarred from the bar of that county by Judges Boyd and Henderson.

John F. Clayton died at Lynchburg, Harrison county, W. Va., Monday. He was buried at Grafton Tuesday.

Benjamin H. Walker, aged 19 years, was drowned Sunday while canoeing near Cumberland. Walker leaned over to shake the ashes from his cigar and this unbalanced the boat.

Fights are beginning to be made in West Virginia for legislation to keep gas from being taken from that state into other sections of the country. West Virginians want it all to be consumed within its own borders.

J. R. Adams, secretary of the defunct Eureka Building and Loan Association, at Clarksburg, which went to the wall about a year ago, has been found in South Pine, North Carolina. He wrote back to Clarksburg to learn of a suit of his in the courts there. The stockholders lost about $100,000 by the failure.

Mr. George E. Rogers and Miss Martha L. Connell, both of Rowlesburg, were married Sunday at Clarksburg by Rev. S. K. Arbuthnot.

Mrs. Lloyd Shackleford, of Maple avenue, Grafton, died Sunday. She was buried yesterday.

Fairmont is raising a howl against the way Grafton disposes of its garbage by throwing it into the river, thus contaminating Fairmont's water supply.

The Allegany Grove Chautauqua at Cumberland makes an urgent appeal for public patronage. Hobson, of Merrimac fame, was there Tuesday. It appears that the Chautauqua is being run at a financial loss.

Alleghany county sends 140 delegates to the Republican state convention which meets at Baltimore next week, all of them traveling in special cars, with Lloyd Lowndes at the head.

Joseph Andrews, of Barton, and a pioneer citizen of that town died Tuesday. He is survived by a large number of children.

Write a postal to Mr. U. G. Palmer, Hutton, Md., for prospectus of "Maryland Mining Company," now ready.

THE DEATH RECORD.

GEORGE T. CECIL.

At his home at Allegany Grove, near Cumberland, George T. Cecil died Saturday. He was buried Tuesday in Baltimore. The deceased was well-known here, having summered many years at the Park, and having visited Oakland many times as a shoe drummer.

GROVER BECKMAN.

Grover Beckman died at the home of his parents, near Swanton, Sunday. He had come Friday from the C. & I. Railroad, up in West Virginia, where he had been in a hospital for some time. He was buried Tuesday in the Beckman burying ground, near Swanton. The deceased was 21 years of age, and was the son of Mr. and Mrs. John C. Beckman.

MISS DAISY GRIMM.

At her home in Deer Park, Miss Daisy Grimm died Saturday and was buried in the cemetery there Monday. The services were conducted by Rev. Manges, of the Lutheran church, of Oakland. Miss Grimm was twenty-two years of age and was the daughter of Mr. Van Grimm, who is well-known to many people of the county.

MRS. MARTHA J. UPPERMAN.

The wife of Mr. Lewis Upperman died at her home on Water street in Oakland last Sunday. Deceased was fifty-eight years of age and is survived by a husband and five children. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. B. Workman of the Methodist church, at the home of the deceased, they being held Tuesday. The remains were buried in the Oakland cemetery.

JOHN LEWIS.

John Lewis, age 97, living near Cranesville, died Friday at his home and was buried Sunday, on the home burying ground, at Cane. The funeral ceremonies were conducted by Rev. Henry Friend, of the Methodist Episcopal Church of which the deceased was a member. Mr. Lewis is survived by eight children, five being girls, and three boys, Mr. Hanson Lewis, the liveryman at the Park, being one of the sons.

MRS. ELLEN RILEY.

At her home near the White Church, between Mt. Lake Park and Gorman, Mrs. Ellen Riley died Sunday evening. She was sixty-six years of age and was the wife of John Riley, who was buried one week before the death of his wife, he having died on July 26, 1907. She was unable to attend the obsequies of her husband, being at the time too sick of the complications of diseases of which she died Sunday. She was buried Tuesday morning at 10:30 in the White Church buring ground, after services conducted in the White Church, by Rev. E. P. Idleman, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Chuch of which the deceased was a member. Mrs Riley is survived by three sons and five daughters, among whom are Dallis, William, and Luther Riley, Mrs. J. D. Harvey, Mrs. N. Shellingburg, Mrs. Laura Lantz, Mrs. E. Bowers, and Miss Grace Riley.

MRS. MARGARET WHITE.

The subject of this death notice died at her home in Oakland, Sunday, August 3rd, after a prolonged illness. On the day preceding her death, she had a stroke of paralysis which rapidly brought her suffering to an end. She was buried in the Oakland cemetery Tuesday afternoon, after services conducted at the Methodist Church by Rev. J. B. Workman. A large number of friends were present and followed the corpse to its last resting place. Mrs. White was eighty years of age the day before her death. She was the wife of Rowan White, who died in April, 1904. They were married at the Red House, this county, in 1835, and the union was blessed by ten children only one whom, Thomas R. White, is dead, dying at Piedmont last June. The other children are John A., James W., Charles, Missess Sarah and Bertha, Mrs Delia Slabach, all of Oakland, Perry, of Davis, W. Va., and Mrs. Jennie White, of Kingwood. The deceased was the grandmother of thirty children Mrs. White was well and favorable known in and about Oakland, having been born at Red House, but a few miles from here.

CHARLES DURST

Charles Durst, born March 6, 1841, died July 26, 1907, age 66 years, 4 months and 20 days. On the evening of the 26th, the soul of Charles Durst took its flight from this land of sorrow into the realm of eternal day. He succumbed after a short illness of about six hours. He died as he lived, happily triumphant, proving thereby that such a death is better than life. His last happy words were: "Lord, take me home." His death will be mourned by two brothers, two sisters and ten children. The deceased was a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal church, uniting with it in early life. He was always a pious and much respected man and a model citizen. The interment was made Sunday morning at 10.50, the remains being laid to rest beside his wife who preceded him to eternity. The services were conducted by Rev. T. McCoy. In consecrating the remains to its mother earth, we can only say with the poet:

Unveil thy bosom faithful tomb;
Take this new treasure to thy trust;
And give these sacred relics room
To slumber in the silent dust.

CHILD'S NARROW ESCAPE.

Six Year Old Tot at Mt. Lake Park Comes Near Losing His Life.

Charles Frederick, the six year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Chamberlain, who are spending the summer at the Park, came near falling into the lake on Sunday evening. He was standing upon the top stone of the steps leading down to the water at the lower side of the spill, when the child lost his balance and dashed forward down towards the water, stopping at its edge. The father seized the child only in time to prevent futher injury. The mother was present, and the sight of her child's narrow escape caused intense grief to her. Other than a few bruises, the child seems not to have suffered any injury. Drs. McComas and Hinebaugh were summoned and rendered medical advice. Mr. and Mrs. Chamberlain live in Baltimore, and Mrs. Chamberlain is the neice of Dr. C. W. Baldwin, president of the Mountain Lake Park Association.

Family Re-Union.

Sunday, August 4th, at the home of Mr. Jonas Glotfelty, there was a family re-union where were welcomed all of his seven children and fifteen grand-children, and many others. Among those present of his children were Mr. and Mrs. John A. Delawder and four children, of Washington, D. C., Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Weimer and children, of Oakland, Md., Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Brenneman and two children, Mr. and Mrs. Bryson Glotfelty and children and Mr. and Mrs. George Glotfelty and children, all of McHenry, Miss Sadie Glotfelty, of Uniontown, Pa., Miss Orpha Glotfelty, of Oakland, and many others besides the family were present and enjoyed the day. All enjoyed themselves to the fullest extent. After all had arrived they were treated to a dinner such as one always gets in the country where everything is of the best. This occasion was the first time the family have all met together in five years and the day was enjoyed by all.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure. Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Treasurer of Garrett county, Md.

Order of Publication.

No. 1179 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland.

Emma Fike vs. Ezra B. Fike.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree divorcing the plaintiff from the defendant a vinculo matrimonii.

The Bill states that the plaintiff was married to the defendant on the 6th day of November, 1898; that no children were born to them as the result of said marriage; that during all of the time that the plaintiff lived with the defendant, the defendant treated her with great cruelty, harshness and brutality, and that about two years ago he deserted her and has provided nothing for her support or maintenance since said time.

The Bill further charges that after the defendant deserted the plaintiff, that he consorted, cohabited and lived with one Mira Lowery; that the said defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, for an order of publication and for general relief.

It is thereupon, this 17th day of July, 1907, ordered by the Circuit Court of Garrett county, in Equity, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 16th day of August, 1907, give notice to the said defendant of the object and substance of this Bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 2nd day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to pass as prayed.

E. Z. TOWER, Clerk.

True copy—Test: E. Z. TOWER, Clerk.

A Comparison.

"Some years ago, I used

Davis' 100 per cent Pure Paint

on my home, at the same time, several other houses near me were painted with other paints. There is a big contrast today between the appearance of my house and others." J. H. PRUITT, Chincoteague, Va.

If you compare adulterated paint with Davis 100 per cent Pure, you will readily know why my house painted with Davis looks well and wears well.

THE DEATH RECORD.

GEORGE T. CECIL.

At his home at Allegany Grove, near Cumberland, George T. Cecil died Saturday. He was buried Tuesday in Baltimore. The deceased was well-known here, having summered many years at the Park, and having visited Oakland many times as a shoe drummer.

GROVER BECKMAN.

Grover Beckman died at the home of his parents, near Swanton, Sunday. He had come Friday from the C. & I. Railroad, up in West Virginla, where he had been in a hospital for some time. He was buried Tuesday in the Beckman burying ground, near Swanton. The deceased was 21 years of age, and was the son of Mr. and Mrs. John C. Beckman.

MISS DAISY GRIMM.

At her home in Deer Park, Miss Daisy Grimm died Saturday and was buried in the cemetery there Monday. The services were conducted by Rev. Manges, of the Lutheran church, of Oakland. Miss Grimm was twenty-two years of age and was the daughter of Mr. Van Grimm, who is well-known to many people of the county.

MRS. MARTHA J. UPPERMAN.

The wife of Mr. Lewis Upperman died at her home on Water street in Oakland last Sunday. Deceased was fifty-eight years of age and is survived by a husband and five children. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. B. Workman of the Methodist church, at the home of the deceased, they being held Tuesday. The remains were buried in the Oakland cemetery.

JOHN LEWIS.

John Lewis, age 97, living near Cranesville, died Friday at his home and was buried Sunday, on the home burying ground, at Cane. The funeral ceremonies were conducted by Rev. Henry Friend, of the Methodist Episcopal Church of which the deceased was a member. Mr. Lewis is survived by eight children, five being girls, and three boys, Mr. Hanson Lewis, the liveryman at the Park, being one of the sons.

MRS. ELLEN RILEY.

At her home near the White Church, between Mt. Lake Park and Gorman, Mrs. Ellen Riley died Sunday evening. She was sixty-six years of age and was the wife of John Riley, who was buried one week before the death of his wife, he having died on July 26, 1907. She was unable to attend the obsequies of her husband, being at the time too sick of the complications of diseases of which she died Sunday. She was buried Tuesday morning at 10:30 in the White Church buring ground, after services conducted in the White Church, by Rev. E. P. Idleman, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Chuch of which the deceased was a member. Mrs Riley is survived by three sons and five daughters, among whom are Dallis, William, and Luther Riley, Mrs. J. D. Harvey, Mrs. N. Shellingburg, Mrs. Laura Lantz, Mrs. E. Bowers, and Miss Grace Riley.

MRS. MARGARET WHITE.

The subject of this death notice died at her home in Oakland, Sunday, August 3rd, after a prolonged illness. On the day preceding her death, she had a stroke of paralysis which rapidly brought her suffering to an end. She was buried in the Oakland cemetery Tuesday afternoon, after services conducted at the Methodist Church by Rev. J. B. Workman. A large number of friends were present and followed the corpse to its last resting place. Mrs. White was eighty years of age the day before her death. She was the wife of Rowan White, who died in April, 1904. They were married at the Red House, this county, in 1835, and the union was blessed by ten children only one whom, Thomas R. White, is dead, dying at Piedmont last June. The other children are John A., James W., Charles, Missess Sarah and Bertha, Mrs Delia Slabach, all of Oakland, Perry, of Davis, W. Va., and Mrs. Jennie White, of Kingwood. The deceased was the grandmother of thirty children Mrs. White was well and favorable known in and about Oakland, having been born at Red House, but a few miles from here.

CHARLES DURST

Charles Durst, born March 6, 1841, died July 26, 1907, age 66 years, 4 months and 20 days. On the evening of the 26th, the soul of Charles Durst took its flight from this land of sorrow into the realm of eternal day. He succumbed after a short illness of about six hours. He died as he lived, happily triumphant, proving thereby that such a death is better than life. His last happy words were: "Lord, take me home." His death will be mourned by two brothers, two sisters and ten children. The deceased was a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal church, uniting with it in early life. He was always a pious and much respected man and a model citizen. The interment was made Sunday morning at 10.50, the remains being laid to rest beside his wife who preceded him to eternity. The services were conducted by Rev. T. McCoy. In consecrating the remains to its mother earth, we can only say with the poet:

Unveil thy bosom faithful tomb;
Take this new treasure to thy trust;
And give these sacred relics room
To slumber in the silent dust.

CHILD'S NARROW ESCAPE.

Six Year Old Tot at Mt. Lake Park Comes Near Losing His Life.

Charles Frederick, the six year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Chamberlain, who are spending the summer at the Park, came near falling into the lake on Sunday evening. He was standing upon the top stone of the steps leading down to the water at the lower side of the spill, when the child lost his balance and dashed forward down towards the water, stopping at its edge. The father seized the child only in time to prevent futher injury. The mother was present, and the sight of her child's narrow escape caused intense grief to her. Other than a few bruises, the child seems not to have suffered any injury. Drs. McComas and Hinebaugh were summoned and rendered medical advice. Mr. and Mrs. Chamberlain live in Baltimore, and Mrs. Chamberlain is the neice of Dr. C. W. Baldwin, president of the Mountain Lake Park Association.

Family Re-Union.

Sunday, August 4th, at the home of Mr. Jonas Glotfelty, there was a family re-union where were welcomed all of his seven children and fifteen grand-children, and many others. Among those present of his children were Mr. and Mrs. John A. Delawder and four children, of Washington, D. C., Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Weimer and children, of Oakland, Md., Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Brenneman and two children, Mr. and Mrs. Bryson Glotfelty and children and Mr. and Mrs. George Glotfelty and children, all of McHenry, Miss Sadie Glotfelty, of Uniontown, Pa., Miss Orpha Glotfelty, of Oakland, and many others besides the family were present and enjoyed the day. All enjoyed themselves to the fullest extent. After all had arrived they were treated to a dinner such as one always gets in the country where everything is of the best. This occasion was the first time the family have all met together in five years and the day was enjoyed by all.

ONE WHO WAS THERE.

Local Music Composer.

This office is in receipt of a copy of music, presented by the author, Mrs. B. C. Feather, of Oakland. "By the Quaint Old Way-Side Mill," is its title, and the publishers are The Geo. Jaberg Music Company, of Cincinnuti, Ohio. The composition of both words and music are excellent and reflect great credit upon the authoress.

Took An Appeal.

Henry Knepp, of the Red House, was arrained Saturday before 'Squire Teats, charged with disturbing the peace at Mason School House, this county. The decision of the 'squire was adverse to him and he took an appeal to the court. Renninger & Offutt were Knepp's attorneys.

Wedding at Friendsville.

A pretty wedding was solemnized at the Lutheran parsonage at Friendsville, August 4th. The contracting parties were Mr. Dorsey Elmer Fike and Miss Pearl Humberson, both of Fearer, Md. The ceremony was performed by Rev. H. C. Salem, who used the beautiful and impressive marriage service of the Lutheran church. The happy couple will reside at Fearer. They have the best wishes of their many friends.

Meeting of the Town Council.

The town couucil was in session Monday evening. Nothing of unusual importance was transacted, save the payment of the usual monthly bills.

Call for Your Letters.

Badly Broken News.

The office boy had pied the first page by dropping the form down two flights of stairs. "I wish," murmured the gentle editor, "that you had broken the news more gently."—Office Topics.

Oakland's New Agent.

The many friends of Harry Rasche are glad to see him back at the depot again in Oakland. He has been stationed at Deer Park during the summer months. He has received the Oakland depot work as a regular work, being appointed in the place of Mr. V. V. Washburn who resigned. Mr. Rasche is being assisted by Mr. C. J. Bunce, of the Park.

Friendsville M. E. Church Elections.

The elections of this charge for the purpose of electing one Delegate and one reserve to the Lay Electoral Conference in Huntington, W. Va., Oct. 11, resulted in electing Hon. Nathan R. Selby as delegate, and C. V. Guard, S. S. Superintendent at Friendsville, as reserve. Certificates have been issued to these gentlemen in compliance with our book of discipline, and the secretary of the last Lay Electorial Conference has been duly notified.

CONSTABLE IN JAIL.

George Stahl, of Grantsville, Captured and Brought to Oakland Monday.

George Stahl of Grantsville, who was indicted at the last session of the grand jury in June, but who later made his escape from the county, was captured Satuday in his home town of Grantsville, and was brought to the county jail here Monday at noon. He is held to await the action of the December court. He is charged with abusing his wife. Mr. Stahl was at one time constable in the Grantsville district.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.
Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child. If there is feverishness, night or day, Heeds probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Order of Publication.

No. 1479 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland.

Emma Fike vs. Ezra B. Fike.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree divorcing the plaintiff from the defendant a vinculo matrimonii.

The Bill states that the plaintiff was married to the defendant on the 6th day of November, 1898; that no children were born to them as the result of said marriage; that during all of the time that the plaintiff lived with the defendant, the defendant treated her with great cruelty, harshness and brutality, and that about two years ago he deserted her and has provided nothing for her support or maintenance since said time.

The Bill further charges that after the defendant deserted the plaintiff, that he consorted, cohabited and lived with one Mira Lowery; that the said defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, for an order of publication and for general relief.

It is thereupon, this 17th day of July, 1907, ordered by the Circuit Court of Garrett county, in Equity, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 16th day of August, 1907, give notice to the said defendant of the object and substance of this Bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 2nd day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to pass as prayed.

Chief's Ruse

By HOWARD FIELDING.

Copyright, 1907, by C. W. Hooke.

WHEN I was chief of police of the city of Bradbury I had a somewhat remarkable case that began with a very peculiar incident. A lawyer named Eugene Pollard called me up by telephone at headquarters about 11 o'clock one evening and told me rather excitedly that he had just been in communication with Frederic Clinton and that in the midst of the conversation he had heard a sound as of a blow and another as of a heavy fall. Failing to get further speech with Mr. Clinton, he had appealed to "central," who had tried in vain to help him and had said that the receiver of Mr. Clinton's telephone must be off the hook so that the bell would not ring.

I told Mr. Pollard that I would meet him in five minutes at the Clinton residence. My light wagon was at the door of the station house, and I immediately jumped aboard, accompanied by a special officer named Devlin. As we came alongside the Clinton house, which is on the corner of our best residence street and is surrounded by lawns and gardens which take up the full depth of the block, I thought I saw a moving figure amid the shrubbery. I sent Devlin to investigate.

I was about to ring the bell when the front door was suddenly but softly opened and Robert Clinton, nephew of Frederic, emerged in haste, mingled with caution. He was greatly startled at the sight of me, but my explanation was interrupted by the appearance of Pollard, who came panting up the walk. Robert, however, had made out that I thought something was wrong with his uncle, and he turned and ran into the house. We followed to the only lighted room that I had observed in any part of the structure.

There was a roll top desk open, with an end against the farther wall. Close against the front of the desk stood a chair, behind which lay the body of Frederic Clinton, face downward. There was a dreadful wound on the back of the head, but the man's soul still lingered, and when I turned him over and looked into his face there was a gleam of intelligence in his eyes.

"Robert!" he uttered in a tone of much affection, and the next instant he was gone.

During this scene I had been considerably impressed by the bearing of Robert Clinton, I can hardly say why.

"You and I must begin to look into this affair," said I. "Of course the method of the crime is clear enough. That golf club is the weapon, and I suppose there is no doubt that the murderer stepped out from behind that curtain across the doorway into the passage. Where does that passage lead?"

Instead of answering my question Clinton pressed his hand to his forehead and exhaled a shuddering groan.

"I could have prevented this," he said.

"What do you mean?" I demanded.

"I saw somebody there," he answered. "I came home a few minutes before 11. Just as I was at the gate I saw the lights turned up in this room, but the curtains were drawn. I came slowly up the walk and paused on the veranda, debating whether I should go in and speak to my uncle. Finally I decided to do so. I knocked at his door. After a very brief interval he said, 'Come in.' I entered, and the draft caused that curtain to swing into the passage there at the back of the room. I thought I saw it press against the figure of some one standing behind it."

BEHIND THE CHAIR LAY THE BODY OF FREDERIC CLINTON

"And you didn't tell your uncle?"

"No; I thought he knew. Practically the same thing had happened before. I'll tell you all about it. I thought it was Mr. Pollard behind the curtain. My uncle had some dealings with him and didn't wish me to know, so one evening when Pollard was here and I knocked my uncle asked him to step into the passage."

"How did you find out about it?"

"I asked Pollard, and he told me."

"Did he tell you what his business was with your uncle?"

"No, but I found out."

"What was it?"

"I can't tell you."

"Do you realize," said I, "that your evidence is not very nice for Mr. Pollard?"

"But—but Pollard wasn't here!" he gasped. "We know where he was."

"We know where he says he was."

"But surely the girl—central—will remember what happened."

"Perhaps she will, and yet"—

I was interrupted by the sudden entrance of the officer whom I had sent to search the grounds. A small corner of my mind had been wondering for some time what had become of my man, but I had not dreamed that he would appear with a prisoner, far less that that prisoner would be a woman.

"Robert!" she cried. "How dreadful!"

He put his arm around her.

"Where did you get her?" I asked Devlin in a guarded tone.

"She was outside there. I chased her clear to Willow street. Pretty near home she was when I caught her."

"You know who she is, then?"

"Sure. She's Celia Burton, the girl that's made the trouble between Bob Clinton and his uncle."

I asked him what Miss Burton had said in explanation of her presence, and Devlin answered that she told him that she had come to see Clinton.

"He was to have met her this evening, an' he didn't," said Devlin, "an' along about 11 o'clock she got to wonderin' why, so she come over an' whistled under his window, an' he looked out an' said he'd be with her in a minute."

This extremely unconventional behavior was quite characteristic of Miss Burton. She was a clerk in a candy store and had been "written up" in the local papers as the prettiest girl in town. Such fame as that must necessarily have prejudiced her in the eyes of a rigid aristocrat like Frederic Clinton. Indeed, it was for a love affair with a girl of very similar antecedents and condition that Clinton had disinherited and banished his only son.

Miss Burton repeated to me the story she had told Devlin, and she made no excuses.

"I wanted to see him," she said, as if that were quite sufficient.

On his part, Robert said that he had spent the evening in Greensford, about twenty miles from Bradbury, and had returned by the last train, but he refused to tell me what errand had called him there. Pollard would not disclose the nature of his business with Mr. Clinton, pleading professional privilege.

On the morrow, however, there came a startling revelation. The cashier of the First National bank told me that Pollard had obtained during the last few days over $80,000 in cash from Mr. Clinton's account and had also visited the safe deposit vaults with Mr. Clinton, presumably to get securities.

This disclosure seemed to justify me in questioning Pollard more sharply. To my surprise, he threw aside his reticence completely.

"My business with Mr. Clinton," he said, "has related to a settlement with his son."

"I thought he was dead," said I.

"He is not dead," replied the lawyer. "His father has seen him several times of late. Mr. Clinton desired to keep this matter from the knowledge of the nephew, Robert, and therefore the son, Edward Clinton, has been living in Greensford."

"Greensford?" said I. "Did Robert go to see him last evening?"

"He did. They were together up to the time that Robert took the last train home."

"Then Edward, the son, has an alibi in Robert's testimony."

"He has," replied the lawyer. "I have talked with Robert today about it."

"Did Robert fear that the son would be restored to favor and he himself cast adrift?"

"I think so."

"I have always understood that Mr. Clinton had made Robert his sole heir by will."

"That was true, but it is not true now," answered Pollard. "There is no will. Mr. Clinton destroyed it three days ago, intending to draw another. The son is the natural heir. Robert gets nothing, but," he added significantly, "Robert does not yet know of this. Neither does Celia Burton."

"Do you mean to intimate that one of them killed him?"

"Who else could it have been?" said he. "Who had a motive?"

"But Edward's safety depends on Robert's evidence"—

"Which I have induced him to put in the form of an affidavit," said the lawyer grimly.

"You don't believe that Robert killed him," said I, "yet this is not a woman's crime."

"It is not an ordinary woman's crime," he rejoined.

When I left Pollard the case looked extremely bad from the point of view of a chief of police, for there seemed to be no chance of convicting anybody.

I went over to Greensford and looked up Edward Clinton's alibi. Even without the evidence of his cousin Robert it was ironclad. This man could have no fear of being accused of this murder, and, assured of this, I summoned him to Bradbury, and he came. We had a conversation in my private room, and the reader must understand that everything I said to that man was a lie.

"Mr. Clinton," I said, "I have just sent some of my men to arrest the murderer of your father. He will be here soon, and I shall question him. In order that I may be prepared to do so I want to talk with you first. Do you know anything about Miss Celia Burton, your cousin's sweetheart?"

"Yes," said he. "I guess she's a pretty bad egg."

"Miss Burton," I resumed, "was a special providence in this case. Without her I don't know what we should have done. You see, the point is right here: Your father undoubtedly called up Lawyer Pollard by telephone. The girl in the central office settles that, and she says that she rang Pollard's telephone fully five minutes, if not ten, before she got any answer. Now, your father's telephone was beside his desk, so that he could use it sitting down, but he was standing—bending over—when he was struck. The position of the chair, pushed well under the desk, and the nature of the wound show these things. Do you think a man of his age would have stood in that position five or ten minutes with a chair right handy? Do you think the murderer would have waited so long?"

"Well—but—I don't quite see"—

"I tell you, sir, your father was struck down as soon as he called Pollard's number. The girl in the central office did not hear his voice again. She heard only Pollard's. Very well. Pollard lives in a lodging house. The lodger in the room over him was awake at 11 o'clock that night and did not hear Pollard's telephone bell. Why not? That lodger often had heard it, but not that night, though the house was still. Why not? I ask you again. Because the bell was muffled. Pollard muffled it before he went to your father's house that night. He knew that Mr. Clinton was going to call him up. It had been arranged that he should do so. But Pollard went over there first, before Mr. Clinton got home. He got in by a back window and secreted himself in that curtained passage, holding one of your cousin Robert's golf clubs in his hand. Your father entered and turned up the lights and went straight to the telephone. Pollard crept out of the passage, crouching behind the desk. He waited till the number had been called, and then he struck and struck again. A moment later he had fled through that passage and out of the house and through the garden and so home. The muffled bell was ringing. He answered the call. A beautiful alibi established, and, to make it neater, he called me up and told his excellent story of overhearing the tragedy in your father's home."

"But this is conjecture," said Clinton. "You can't know"—

"That's where my pretty little special providence comes in," said I. "The fair lady of our story was in your father's garden, and she saw the red handed murderer flee through the shadows.

"And now," I continued, "I've had Pollard from the first, through the motive was a little obscure. You must furnish that. How much money has Pollard paid you on your father's order?"

He named the sum, and it was right, so far as I knew, but I couldn't afford to say so.

"Just about half," said I. "He's stuck you $100,000. I know that, but I can't prove it, your father being dead. However, Pollard will undoubtedly confess."

And at this I touched an electric button and one of my men entered.

"Beg pardon, sir," said he. "We've got him, and he's all broken down. He'll tell you everything he knows."

"Wait for me here," said I and left the room.

Edward Clinton waited about half a minute, and then he climbed out of a window that I had left conspicuously open. This, of course, was good proof that my theory was right. We let him get away a mile or more and then brought him back. I had him put into the worst cell we've got, and I read to him through the bars a bogus confession of Pollard's wherein it was related that the plot to kill Frederic Clinton had been devised by his son, who had promised to share the fortune which he would inherit with Pollard as payment for the murder and the destruction of the will.

Edward's nerves couldn't stand that. He confessed that he had agreed to share the fortune with Pollard, but he declared that from first to last every step of the plot had been devised by the lawyer, in whose hands he had been as so much putty.

Having secured a signed statement from Edward Clinton, I arrested Pollard on the strength of it, and, though he made a hard fight, I secured his conviction. Edward Clinton, as an accomplice, lost his inheritance, and the fortune passed to Robert as the next of kin. He married Celia, and at last accounts they were very happy.

TROUBLE OVER AN ARTICLE.

How the Colonel Was Given a Much Needed Lesson—The Bad Man From Panhandle Meets His Waterloo at Last and Is Placed at Rest.

[Copyright, 1907, by Mary McKeon.]

One of the biggest cranks among our subscribers and one of the most notorious in the territory is Colonel Singleton of the Three Bar ranch. The colonel has subscribed for the Kicker and dropped it again about four times a year for the last five years. There is never any telling what will please or displease him, and the first thing we know he refuses his paper and sends us word that we are a fool and a villain.

On such occasions, as soon as we can make it convenient, we buckle on our guns and ride over to the ranch. The colonel expects us. He begins shooting at us as soon as we come within range. We shoot back. After we have wasted fifty cartridges he gets scared and surrenders and then begs our pardon and resubscribes.

Last Tuesday Colonel Singleton played his usual game. We had an article in the Kicker stating that Christopher Columbus was a bowlegged man. We dug that fact out of an old Spanish manuscript secured by us in New Mexico and believed we had made a valuable contribution to history. The colonel took exception to the article, although he can't tell within a hundred years of when America was discovered, and sent us the usual word.

Wild Report Flying Around.

On Wednesday we rode out to give him the usual scare. He fortified himself in a stable with two guns and a hundred cartridges and announced that he would die game. We had no intention whatever of even wounding him, but in some unaccountable way we raked him across the skull with a bullet, and it will be a long four weeks before he is able to gather bouquets again on the smiling lea. He knows that we are sorry, and he has forgiven us. Whether he will hug the moral lesson to his soul and benefit by it we can't say. Just now he is suffering from a brain storm and is hugging his head, and we don't care to bother him with abstract questions. For two or three days there were wild reports flying around to the effect that we had shot the colonel from ambush and cut up his body for wolf bait, but the above is a true and faithful account of the affair.

The extra issued from this office Thursday afternoon contained the following:

"MORE SHOOTING.

"JIM HELLSO PLUNKS A STRANGER.

"The Said Stranger Draws and Fires the First Shot—He Had Sworn to Kill the Editor.

"This morning at 9 o'clock the stage brought into Giveadam Gulch a passenger who may prove to be Bill Taylor of Texas, though he is not fully identified yet. He was a middle aged man of fierce visage, and his fellow passengers sized him up as a bad man. He was several times heard to mutter to himself and was seen handling a revolver. Of Mr. James Snyder, a passenger, the bad man inquired if Jim Hellso was still editor of the Kicker and if we were in the habit of carrying a gun.

"After descending from the stage at the Royal hotel the stranger took two large drinks of whisky.

"Then he sat down to breakfast and ordered eggs, bear steaks and coffee.

"While waiting for his order he leaned his head on his hands and seemed to be thinking of something sad and far away.

"Then he looked at the holes in the tablecloth and swore under his breath.

"Then he called the waiter a son of a gun for saying that it was a fine day.

Taken For an Evangelist.

"Several persons took him for an evangelist. Several others didn't.

"He ate with a fairly good appetite, and the way he chewed his steak led people to believe that he was from the Panhandle.

"The genial host of the Royal tried to be genial with the stranger, but he would have none of it. He said that if he was obliged to run such a ranch as that he would blow his own head off.

"The genial host went to get a shotgun and kill him for the remark, but a bill for flour coming in just then caused him to forget his errand.

"When the stranger left the table he went into the barroom and took two more big drinks, and then, leaning on the bar, he said to Jimmie Sweetzer that he had come a great many miles to make a hero of himself. He wouldn't say just exactly how he was going to do it, but said that the district attorney of the county couldn't call him insane in one breath and then prosecute him for a sane man in another.

"He also displayed a revolver and boasted that he had killed seven men with it. Only three of them had had time to utter a prayer, and they were mighty brief prayers at that.

"When the stranger left the hotel he inquired of Joe Harkness the way to the Kicker office. Joe is a stutterer, as we all know, and he replied:

"'You—you g-go right d-down this s-street two b-blocks and then turn—turn—turn'—

"He was going to tell the rest of it if it took all the forenoon, but the stranger said he'd be hanged if he would wait. He further observed that if he had such a tongue on him he'd go and play with the coyotes.

"Ten minutes later the shadow of death crossed the threshold of the Kicker office, holding a gun ready to shoot.

"We sat in our sanctum writing a yellow journal editorial as to why mice loved cheese. It is really a scientific question and one that the magazines should pay more attention to, and we had become deeply interested when the shadow entered our room and a hoarse voice exclaimed:

A Fusillade of Bullets.

"'Prepare to meet the devil!'

"The words were followed by a fusillade. Bullets zipped past and all around us, and for a few seconds we were dazed. Only half an hour before that our horse editor had asked us to raise his salary to $8 a week, and we had refused because he couldn't tell us why a mule always raised his tail before he started to bray. We thought the young man had come back for revenge.

"Then we got a line on the stranger and reached for our gun, and two shots dropped him. We had to fire through a cloud of smoke, but both bullets went home. The stranger had emptied his gun, but we were not even grazed.

"The remains were removed to the town hall at once, and a coroner's jury was impaneled. A verdict of 'justifiable homicide' was reached in about ten minutes. From a letter found in one of the pockets it would appear that the man's name was Bill Taylor and that he was a resident of the Oily State, but there is nothing certain about it. Why he came here to kill us will probably always remain a mystery. We had never heard of him in our life and certainly had never referred to him in our paper. It may be that he thought we had had enough of this cold world and needed a rest.

"The man, whoever he was, was buried yesterday. As usual, we personally bore the expense of the funeral and rode at the head of the procession. He was buried in our private graveyard, and within a month the roses will be climbing over his grave, and on his tombstone people will be reading that he was a just and upright man, a little eccentric perhaps, but preferring the narrow paths of virtue to the broader highways of vice. He will be labeled 'No. 13,' and he will sleep well. If he is not better off it is not our fault." M. QUAD.

Jones told the story of a fish,
The size of it was model.
His hearers sniffed in scornful wise
And murmured, "Mollycoddle!"

He told the story once again,
But only roused their ire.
His friends, perceiving how it grew,
Ejaculated, "Liar!"

He added next a dozen pounds;
The story found no taker.
Instead his auditors uprose
And dubbed him "nature fakir."

Until he reached the first told size
He caused the weight to vary.
And then his friends contemptuous
Remarked, "Reactionary!"

NOTES FROM MEADOWBROOK FARM

By William Pitt

Brains are better than luck on the farm.

Be accurate if you would be successful.

Cull out the unprofitable hens from your flock.

The rye-heads should be cut out of the wheat.

Garden work is good for man and garden, too.

Be honest yourself and expect your neighbors to be honest, too.

The fence corners should be cleaned out in the hay and grain fields.

The successful poultryman has an every-day joy with no vacations.

Neglect in the poutry yard means smaller profits on market day.

The milk pails should be scalded as soon as possible after being emptied.

It pays to thin the fruit. Not so much to handle and better quality and higher prices for the marketed crop.

Confine the berry bushes to rows, cutting off every sprout which comes up in the wrong place.

Black flea beetles can be kept from potato vines with Bordeaux mixture and tobacco tea.

Sunlight should be one of the welcome visitors to the farm stables where the stock is kept.

Old hens that have contracted the over-fat habit are good only to kill and eat.

Feed sow light after farrowing. Milk and bran make a good first feed. The milk should be sweet.

Milk, shorts and bran make an excellent feed for the sow that is nursing her pigs.

Drafts, dust and moisture should be kept out of the hog's sleeping quarters.

In a test in Alabama, oats drilled in in the fall gave better results than the same varieties sown broadcast.

In buying a horse look for a broad forehead. Such animal is more apt to be intelligent and gentle.

Don't go too fast in the training of the colt. Teach him one thing at a time and do it thoroughly.

As a rule the farmer will find the egg producing business more profitable than that of raising broilers.

Give the poison ivy no quarter. Wage warfare upon it to its most secret haunts.

My, how prices do keep up. Fortunate is the man who now days has things to sell.

Tell the wife that the sponge cake that has become dry can be toasted and makes a fine accompaniment to your evening cup of tea.

Every shade tree properly placed on the farm adds to the value of the farm and to the comfort and happiness of the dwellers thereon.

Remember either the standard quality of your flock is improving or lowering. Keep breeding up instead of down.

Rape makes a fine green feed for the chickens in summer. It is easily grown and should be cut fresh daily and put in the poultry yards.

The high-headed tree is not one less accessible at fruit-picking time but is more subject to the violence of storms.

Don't lay plans for fall raising of pigs unless your housing arrangements are such as to give room and shelter for sows and pigs.

Again we repeat, never feed a brood sow corn except a little in winter time. Shorts and oats provide about the right kind of feed.

See that the hogs have plenty of chance for exercise. Only those being finished for market should be restricted as to exercise.

Potatoes require a great deal of water in their growth; oats, it is said, come next, then wheat, then corn, then sugar beets, and old alfalfa, clover, timothy and English blue grass follow in the order named.

Put Trust Offenders In Jail.

By WOODROW WILSON, President of Princeton University.

ONE really RESPONSIBLE man in jail, one real originator of the schemes and transactions which are contrary to the public interest legally lodged in the penitentiary, would be worth more than A THOUSAND CORPORATIONS mulcted in fines if the reform is to be genuine and permanent.

WHAT THIS COUNTRY NEEDS IS NOT GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS, BUT LAWS THAT WILL ATTACK AND PUNISH PRESIDENTS AND GENERAL MANAGERS OF RAILROADS FOR EVASIONS AND VIOLATIONS OF THE STATUTES. STOCK MANIPULATIONS ARE SHEER THEFTS AND SHOULD BE PUNISHED AS SUCH. FAILURE TO DO SO IS LIKE OVERLOOKING HIGHWAY ROBBERIES.

Every corporation is PERSONALLY directed either by some one dominant person or by some group of persons. SOMEBODY in particular is responsible for ordering or sanctioning every illegal act committed by its agents or officers, but neither our law of personal damage nor our criminal law has sought to seek the responsible persons out and hold them individually accountable for the acts complained of. We have never attempted such statutes.

WE INDICT CORPORATIONS THEMSELVES, FIND THEM GUILTY OF ILLEGAL PRACTICES, FINE THEM AND LEAVE THE INDIVIDUALS WHO DEVISE AND EXECUTE THE ILLEGAL ACTS FREE TO DISCOVER NEW EVASIONS.

It is only in this way that we can escape socialism. Unless we can single out the individual again and make him once more the subject and object of law we shall have to travel STILL FURTHER upon the road of government regulation which we have already traveled so far, and that road leads to state ownership.

Homemaking Is Woman's Normal State.

By President CHARLES W. ELIOT of Harvard University.

THE satisfactions which women most need to earn, which they most hope to earn, are THE SATISFACTIONS THAT COME FROM DOMESTIC LIFE—from the joys, hopes, anxieties, fears and blessings of the home. Homemaking is the intellectual life of a woman in her NORMAL STATE, and many a woman who has never married secures the greater part of these most durable satisfactions. The race depends upon these durable satisfactions for women, and, although we see in recent times a very great development of other occupations for women—a fortunate development, too—in almost all cases such things prove to be temporary or, if pursued in older life, have become only a path to the sources of higher satisfactions.

With a man the profession in which he perseveres from day to day contributes greatly to the DURABLE satisfaction of his life. Among other things, it procures for him his home. It enables him to support "her." It gratifies also his desires for labor, competition and success.

THE GREAT SOURCE OF DURABLE SATISFACTION IN LIFE IS THE HOME WHICH THE WOMAN CREATES, WHICH SHE ILLUMINES AND BLESSES.

It is the joy of children and grandchildren, the joy of that intimate and tender relation of "one to one," which is Emerson's definition of happy marriage. These are for educated as for uneducated women the source of THE CHIEF DURABLE SATISFACTIONS OF LIFE.

Railroad Heads Responsible For Agitation.

By United States Senator RAYNER of Maryland.

SOME of the leading railroad presidents and officers in the country are to blame for all this trouble. They are agitators, and THEY ARE THE MEN WHO ARE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE PRESENT CONDITION OF AFFAIRS. Neither the president of the United States nor congress deserves the slightest degree of censure.

The leading officers of these railroads have made hundreds of millions of dollars by TRICKS OF FINANCIAL JUGGLERY with the railroads they represent, treating them as their own property to aggrandize their fabulous wealth, and they are responsible to their bondholders and their stockholders for the disasters that are now upon us. It is a frenzy of the frenzied financiers that has caused the trouble.

THESE RAILROAD MANIPULATORS MUST BE BROUGHT TO BAY, AND WHEN THEY ARE MADE TO REALIZE THAT THEY ARE THE SERVANTS AND NOT THE MASTERS OF THE PEOPLE, AND THAT THEY ARE THE TRUSTEES OF THEIR BONDHOLDERS AND STOCKHOLDERS, THEN, AND NOT UNTIL THEN, WILL THE INVESTMENT OF THE WIDOW AND THE ORPHAN BE SAFE AND POPULAR AGITATION CEASE.

Flying the World's Finest Sport.

By WILBUR WRIGHT, Airship Inventor.

FLYING or soaring is the finest sport, I believe, in the world. With a proper soaring machine—and I believe it could be made for less than $500—and with perfect control I believe A MAN COULD HOVER OVER A SHIP LIKE A GULL ALL DAY without fatigue, provided the wind was right.

It is not easy. All birds, moreover, cannot soar, but only those like the gull, buzzard or eagle. Soaring is done by catching upward air currents and riding down on them. If the upward currents are faster than one rides down, the general direction is upward. It is a TRICK like riding in to the seashore on the crest of a breaker at high speed. Birds know the upward currents and instinctivly how to find them.

WHILE YOU CANNOT LEARN TO FLY FROM THE BIRD, ONE MAY SEE HOW THEY DO IT AFTER LEARNING. I HAVE SEEN BIRDS FLYING TAIL BACKWARD. THERE IS NO TELLING WHAT MAN MAY BE ABLE TO DO WHEN HE HAS THE PRACTICE.

A COMMUNICATION.

View of a Republican as to the Duty of State Convention.

To the Editor of The Republican:

The Republican party presents to the voters and citizens of the state the unusual view of being all a happy and contented family with no apparent struggle on the part of any person for a place on the State ticket. Every Republican you meet holds the same view that their chance for success is very good to elect not only the entire Republican state ticket, but also the Legislature as well. There is no use denying the fact that neither party can elect their State ticket without the aid of fifteen thousand independent Democrats of Baltimore city, who hold the key to the situation. And while it is a little annoying at times to the party managers, it is nevertheless a well-known fact that the independent Democrats are a great source of good to the entire State. They compel party managers to nominate the best men, thereby keeping the State government in safe hands, while other states are full of scandal from too much party.

Maryland contains no trace of officials who do not make good. In order to still encourage such a condition of affairs, it is to be hoped that the party convention when its meets in Baltimore on the Fourteenth will present to the voters and citizens a ticket made up of clean, aggressive men, who enjoy the reputation of good people and who will give to their State a good, clean and able administration.

The names of five men have been mentioned from time to time as being in every way qualified to fill the position of Governor. The first man is Mr. George Haither, of Baltimore city, a clean, able and aggressive fellow, well-liked by all Republicans and a great favorite among men of independent proclivities. Mr. Gaither was attorney-general of the State at one time, a position he filled with credit to himself and to the citizens who elected him to the office. It is conceded by Republicans and by a great number of Democrats that he would be a very strong candidate for the party to nominate.

The second man is Mr. Philips Lee Goldsborough, of Dorchester county, a man who is highly esteemed by his neighbors on the Eastern Shore and well-known to many men in Baltimore city and in the counties, holding at the present time the collectorship of Internal Revenue. At one time he was Comptroller of the Treasury, where his abilities soon manifested themselves to his many friends. He is trained in all affairs that would make him a strong candidate.

The third man is William Baker, of Hartford county, and a farmer, banker and canner, employing numbers of men. He was a representative in Congress for several terms, and is well-liked and highly respected by all who know him. This is manifested when he is a candidate. For he always carries a strong Democratic county, and it changes to a Republican majority. He, too, is well qualified to fill the gubernatorial chair.

The fourth man is General Felix Agnus, publisher of the Baltimore American; a Marylander, noted for his foresight and aggressiveness, always doing something to advance the cause of the old commonwealth of which he is such a grand citizen.

None of the gentlemen mentioned would be more highly qualified to fill the position than General Agnus, who is noted for all that is noble and good in men.

The fifth man is former mayor, E. Clay Timanus, one of the best known men of Baltimore city. He possesses the necessary qualifications to fill the Governor's chair. He gave to the city of Baltimore one of the cleanest and best administrations. Truly, is he a strong man among Republican and highly thought of by independent Democrats of Baltimore city.

For the offices or Comptroller of the Treasury, Attorney-General, and Clerk of the Court of Appeals, no candidates have been mentioned. But that there will be good men nominated goes without saying. In selecting a ticket, let the convention select one man from the Eastern Shore, one from Baltimore city, one from Southern Maryland and one from Western Maryland, and with good, clean, aggressive Republicans nominated, party success is sure to follow.

Then with Hon. William H. Jackson, of Eastern Shore, Hon. Sidney E. Mudd, of Southern Maryland, Hon. William Stone, Hon. James E. Garry, Hon. Charles J. Bonaparte, of Baltimore city, Hon. G. A. Pearre, of Western Maryland, Hon. S. A. Williams, of Harford county as candidate for United States Senatorship, and with no one being endorsed by the State Convention, every man will be pulling off his coat to elect the state ticket and the Legislature who will elect two United States senators. It will be indeed a prize worth hustling for. Place men in the upper house of Congress who will uphold and help the president in his wise policies laid down for the welfare of all his people. Garrett county has several representatives men who, if nominated, could fill the position with honor and and credit; and while I do not know if the parties whom I mention would care to be candidates, they are qualified to do so should the county convention decide to present their names to the state convention for consideration. I refer to Mr. Scott T. Jones and Col. A. G. Sturgiss as will qualified to fill the position of Comptroller of the Treasury; Messrs. E. H. Sincell, T. J. Peddicord, and F. A. Thayer, for Attorney-General, and E. Z. Tower, for Clerk of Court of Appeals.

DATE CHANGED.

Methodist Will Hold Annual Conference at Huntington in October.

The date of the West Virginia conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, which was to have convened in Huntington on September 25th, has been changed and the conference will not convene until October 9th.

The charge has been made necessary by reason of the fact Bishop Bashford, who was to have presided over the conference, will be detained in China, and cannot come to this country in time for the conference, and Bishop Spillmeyer has been named to preside in his place.

News concerning the change in the date has just been received by the members of the church in Oakland and they will make the charges necessary in their arrangements.

BITTINGER.

When you hear a fellow kicking,
And with others' faults a-picking,
Cut him out;
He's but mud that spoiled in mixing.
And his "think box" needs some fixing.
Never doubt.

Sheriff Lee, of Oakland passed through here Monday morning with George F. Stahl in custody.

M. K. Malone, of Elizabeth, Pa., is in this section for his usual summer outing and while in this village Saturday morning presented the Lutheran congregation with a number of artistic fans to be distributed in the pews for the comfort of the audience.

Miss Blanche Miller, who has been employed at Mountain Lake Park for some time was called home by the illness of her mother, and rested in this village for a short time Monday evening as she was going to her home near Grantsville.

Messrs. Taylor and Morris, two gentlemen interested in coal land, spent Saturday and Sunday here and visited the abandoned Mogart mine just east of this place.

G. W. Engle, of the Custom House service of Baltimore, came up Saturday evening and will spend a few days with his family who are summering here.

Rev. J. B. Shoup spent all of last week with his people at Meadow Mountain and he and his son Howard assisted in repairing and repainting the church house at that place.

Miss Laura Fazenbaker went up to Mountain Lake Park Saturday, where she will be employed during the remainder of the season.

Most of the wheat in this section was cut last week and a good yield is expected.

The discontinuing of free exchange between the Garrett and Mutual telegraph companies has occasioned much comment here and as a result the Mutual company will probably build considerable extensions to their lines.

ACCIDENT.

Hay making is the order of the day.

Miss Lena Englehart, of Lonaconing, and little niece, Ula Friend, of Pittsburg are spending a few weeks with relatives at this place.

Mr. and Mrs. Nupp and family, of Iowa, spent a few days at Accident last week.

Miss Rose Miller took a trip to Mt. Lake Park last week.

Mrs. John Miller, of Westernport, who has been visiting friends and relatives at this place for several weeks, has returned home.

Mrs. Wm. Englehart is reported quite ill at her home near Accident.

Mr. and Mrs. Will Beeghly and child, of Connelsville, are visiting friends and relatives at Accident.

Adam Richter and John Hoffman took a trip to Sang Run, Sunday last.

Miss Nettie Weidenhammer, of Baltimore is spending some time at Accident visiting friends and relatives.

John Geis tore his old hat to pieces. It's a boy.

Mr. and Mrs. Herbert and little son, of Pittsburg, are spending a few weeks at Accident.

F. C. Ries and Wm. Goehinger took a business trip to Oakland one day last week.

Miss Sophie Schantz and Mrs. Katherine Hagele, of Lonaconing, are spending a few weeks with friends and relatives at this place.

Ed. Diehl and Emma Durst attended church at Flatwood on Saturday evening.

Miss Tillie Englehart, who has been spending some time with friends and relatives at Lonaconing returned home last week.

Rev. Blievernicht. preached an interesting sermon in English on Sunday and on next Sunday he will preach his farewell sermon. He anticipates leaving Accident about the 14th of this month.

MASS MEETING OIL COMPANY.

Large Number of Shareholders of Oil Company Vote Stock Increase.

A meeting of the stockholders of the Yough River Oil and Gas Company was held Saturday in Oakland. It was voted that the capital stock of the company should be increased from $10,000 to $20,000. The spirit of those present showed that since everything is favorable to futher drilling of the well, nothing should be left undone to keep it from being made a thorough one. This increase of the capital will make possible the sale of more stock. The action of the stockholders will be ratified officially by the stockholders in September.

The Heroine.

From Gen. Chas. King:

"Mr. Parrish knows well how to make a story go, and with such a heroine and two such manly fellows as Hampton and young Brant, he has a strong one here. I envy him his power, I rejoice in his descriptions, and I thank him for the spirited picture he draws of the young officer checking that mad lynching bee just in the nick of time. With all my heart I hope the story may be widely read.

"CHARLES KING."

You will want to read this, our next and best serial, the story of

Bob Hampton of Placer

Hero of Custer's Famous Fighting Seventh.

By RANDALL PARRISH,

Author of "A Sword of the Old Frontier," "My Lady of the North," etc.

¶ From the incidents leading up to and culminating in the battle of the Little Big Horn, in which General Custer and his command were massacred by the Sioux under Sitting Bull, Mr. Parrish has developed a story of dramatic power and action that will stir the blood of every lover of a keen, exciting story.

¶ The reader who delights in the ring of the horse's hoofs on the rocky trail of the wilderness, and who would see a dramatic picture of the West in that period of large and spectacular situations, will find in "Bob Hampton of Placer," a story that will hold the attention, fixedly, to the very end.

¶ The charming romance skilfully woven into the narrative will appeal to every reader who enjoys a well-told love story, with a brisk movement and a lively human interest.

SOME SCHOOL FIGURES.

Reports for 1906-7 are About Completed and Show Many Changes.

The annual report of the county school board and its superintendent is about completed and will be sent to State Superintendent Stevens within a few days for general publication.

In 1906, the teachers in the county received $34,843.60 in salary; during the school year just closed they were paid $37,060.96, making an increase of $2,217.36. The fuel bill for the two years remained about the same. In 1906 it was $1,521.00; in 1907, $1,533.00. The running expenses of the schools for 1906 were $60,731.14; in 1907, $63,101.27, there being a difference there of $2,370.13. These figures showing increases show how the school system of Garrett county is gradually becoming more extensive and at the same time more costly.

MINUTES ST. MATTHEW'S PARISH.

Words of Commendation and Good Will Written Upon Rev. Shaw's Resignation.

The Vestry of St. Matthew's Parish, Garrett county, Maryland, this 3rd day of July, 1907, in special meeting assembled, hears with painful regret the announcement by their Rector, his resignation to become operative September 1st, 1907. We but poorly voice the dominant sentiment of this vestry and Parish in the declaration that this action on his part is no less a surprise than a sorrow to us all, and equally short must we fall in any attempt at portrayal of the high estimate placed by this vestry upon the faithful diligence of Mr. Shaw, his clear and earnest sermons in sound accord with the best teachings and usuages of our mother church; for his ready and conservative counsel and his unremitting admiration as a friend and a shepherd in sacred things.

In a reluctant acceptance of the tendered resignation, we convey to Mr. Shaw the amplest assurance of our affection and esteem with the humblest trust that He who rules lovingly over the laborers of His harvest may multiply His blessings in the future work and happiness of our retiring Rector.

SEE THE COMET.

Get Up Early and See it at from Three to Four-Thirty in the Morning.

The comet discovered by Pror. Daniel of the Princeton University in June has been getting nearer to the sun and earth and is now visible to the naked eye. It has a very bright stellar nucleus, much coma and a short tail. Is now about the third magnitude, and can be located by the persons who desire to see it by following these directions: At 3 a. m. to 3:30 a. m., looking due east, at 45 degrees or more above the horizon, will be seen the Pleiades, a well known star cluster in Taurus, the Bull, and in a line straight underneath as one looks is the bright star Aldebaran and the Hyades, another cluster.

The comet is entering right among the Hyades and on August 10, will peep almost over the star Aldebaran, a little south. It can be very well seen with an opera glass. As the dawn begins at 4 o'clock, observation must be near 3 o'clock, the comet raising between 1 and 2 o'clock.

The comet will be nearest the sun on September 3, at a distance of 46,000,000 miles and from the earth 110,000,000 miles. It is now 85,000,000 miles from the sun and 70,000,000 miles from the earth—the nearest it will come to us. It must grow much brighter, but is getting close to the sun's rays raising only a short time before dawn appears—that we may not be able to see it as its best.

A LITERARY CURIOSITY.

The following remarkable composition evinces and ingenuity arrangement peculiarly its own. Explanation: The initial capitals spell "My boast is in the glorious cross of Christ." The words in italics, when read from top to bottom and bottom to top, form the Lord's Prayer complete:

Make known the Gospel Truth, our Father king.
Yield up Thy grace, dear Father from above.
Bless us with hearts which feelingly can sing,
"Our life Thou art for-ever God of love."
Assuage our grief in love for Christ we pray,
Since the bright Prince of Heaven and glory died.
Took all our sins and hallowed the display,
Infant be-ing, first a man, and then was crucified.
Stupendous God! Thy grace and power make knd wn;
In Jesus' name let all the world rejoice.
Now labor in Thy Heavenly kingdom own—
That blessed kingdom for Thy saints the choice.
How vile to come to Thee is all our cry.
Enemies of Thy-self and all that's Thine;
Graceless our will we live for vanity.
Loathing Thy be-ing, evil in design,
O God, Thy will be done, from earth to Heaven;
Reclining on the Gospel let us live.
In earth from sin deliver-ed and forgiven,
Oh! as Thyself but teach us to forgive.
Unless it's power temptation doth destroy,
Sure is our fall into the depths of woe.
Carnal in mind, we've not a glimpse of joy;
Raised against Heaven, in us no hope can flow.
Oh, give us grace and lead us in Thy way;
Shine on us with Thy love and give us peace
Self and this sin that rise against us slay.
Oh, grant each day our trespass-es may cease;
Forgive our evil deeds that oft we do,
Convince us daily of them to our shame;
Help us with Heavenly bread, forgive us, too,
Recurrent lusts and we'll adore Thy name,
In thy forgive-ness we as saints can die,
Since for us and our trespasses so high,
Thy Son, our Savior, bled on Calvary.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

It rains occasionally even at Mountain Lake Park.

The Chautauqua is nearing the end of the first week with the sale of tickets fully up to the same time last year.

The hotels and cottages are filling up close to their capacity, while many of the most popular boarding houses have been compelled to turn many away.

The ever present croaker has to admit that there are as many cottages occupied as ever before in the history of the Park.

Mr. Martin, the ticket seller at the office, became suddenly ill Tuesday evening. Drs. Hinebaugh and Laughlin left him much improved at midnight.

Don't forget the Sunday School at 2.30 in the M. E. church, followed by class meeting at 3.30 and then Epworth League at 6.30 to 7.30.

Mrs. McQuay, whose serious illness has been noted, is rapidly convalescing.

REWARD.

I am authorized by the County Commissioners of Garrett cuunty to offer $300. reward for information that will lead to the arrest and conviction of the party or parties who murdered Joseph Harris at Bloomington, Garrett county, Maryland, on or about July 4th, last. Address all communications in reference to the matter to the undersigned.

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

BASSETT WAS ELECTED TO VICE PRINCIPALSHIP

Hails From the Eastern Shore and Is Graduate of M. A. C.

WAS HERE MONDAY AND TUESDAY

Also Graduate of Dorchester County High School—Taught One Year, That Being in Pennsylvania—Salary, $75 Per Month.

Mr. L. E. Bassett, of Cambridge, Md., is the new vice principal of the Oakland public schools. He was in Oakland Monday and Tuesday, and the contract by the County School Board was closed then with him to teach here during the coming year. Mr. Bassett is about twenty-five years of age, unmarried, and is a graduate of the Dorchester county high school as well as of the Maryland Agricultural College, at College Park, near Washington City.

Mr. Bassett met several citizens of Oakland during his short stay here and made a very favorable impression upon all whom he met. He has taught one year, it being last winter in the high school in Meyersdale, Pa. He will arrive in Oakland a day or two preceeding the opening of the county institute. The new vice principal will receive a salary of $75 per month, this being $10 more than was paid the former vice principal.

OLD HOME COMING WEEK IN MARYLAND.

Whole State Asked to Make the Event in Baltimore Memorable.

All citizens of Maryland will want to help in making "Home Coming Week" in Baltimore one of the greatest events in the history of the state. To this end the following circular has been sent to the press of the state by those having the matter in charge in Baltimore, which The Republican gladly gives publicity:

It is doubtful who experiences the more pleasure—the home comer after a long absence, or the home folks who welcome the wanderer. It is certain that both participate largely in the joy of the reunion.

Marylanders will reap a large measure of the pleasure in Old Home Week that is to be held in October for they will find much satisfaction in meeting the old timers who have strayed to other fields of activity and who will on that occasion come back for a brief stay, to talk over the days of the past and to see how greatly changed is everything in the community.

Governor Warfield is going to send out an official invitation to every former Marylander whose address is procurable, and he wants every one in this section of the state to aid in completing the list of those who are to be invited. The readers of this paper may help this cause and insure the receipt of an invitation by their absent friends and former neighbors by sending at once to the secretary of the Maryland Home Coming Association all names and addresses they are able to furnish. The headquarters of the Association is at 602 Fidelity Building, Baltimore, to which all mail should be addressed.

In Memorian.

In sad and loving remembrance of our dear child who died at Friendsville, Md., Aug. 12th, six years ago today. He is gone but not forgotten.

It was just six years ago today,
Since his dear spirit fled,
How sudden was the summons,
When word came he was dead.

Time was to short to say farewell,
To those he loved so well,
His heart was true, his life was young,
Yet not our will, but God's be done.

Oh, smile upon me from on high,
Ask God to lead me when I die,
That I may meet you up above
Some sweet day by and by.

BY HIS MOTHER AND FATHER.

OLD RAILROAD STORY BOBS UP AGAIN.

Hails This Time from Cumberland and About the Same As Before.

SURVEYORS ARE NOW AT WORK.

Thought the Plan is to Bring the Railroad Up Through Garrett County—Short Cut to Main Line of Baltimore & Ohio.

The following article is clipped from Wednesday's Cumberland Times:

"The presence of Baltimore & Ohio agents in the vicinity of Grantsville and Friendsville, Md., just across the Pennsylvania line near Oakland, and the fact that surveyors have been working in that section during the past few months, has started the report that the Baltimore & Ohio is seeking a short cut to its main line from the Pittsburg division. The Baltimore & Ohio now has its own track from Salisbury Junction, where it leaves the main line, to West Salisbury, a spur of six miles, which is kept in good condition to care for the heavy coal traffic of the region.

"The line from West Salisbury to Jennings, Md., follows the Casselman river. It is thought to be the intention of the company to extend the line to Oakland, Md., at the top of the grade of the main line of the Baltimore & Ohio, thus giving two lines from Connellsville and the Pittsburg coal region to Cumberland, Md., in case it is necessary to ever use both. The Salisbury route will be a few miles longer than the Sand Patch route, but the gradient will probably be less, except on return of empty loads up the 17-mile grade from Piedmont to Altamont at the top of the hill near Oakland. It will require, however, the building of the line from Grantsville to Oakland to give the road this line across the mountains. Another thing apout the road is that it will be the only trunk line to have found a route across the Appalachian system without a big tunnel through the mountains.

MCHENRY.

We are again bound to say a few words for McHenry, to let the public know that this place is still in existence. The looks of the meadows here shows that the people are hustlers. So far they are ahead of any other community in harvest.

Harvesting and barn building is the order of the day.

Miss Jennie Thomas, of Somerfield, is spending a few days with her aunt, Mrs. Jonas Glotfelty.

Mr. Brison Welch is very ill at this writing.

Mr. Sam Wright, wife and little son, spent Sunday with Jonas Glotfelty.

Mr. Blain Wilborn is helping Dugen McLane harvest.

The corn crop of this place is very slim. But each stalk looks as though it will bear four or five ears. At this rate we will all have barrels of corn.

During the electrical storm last Friday, the house of Jonas Glotfelty was struck by lightning, considerable damage was done to the house. No one was hurt.

On Tuesday evening, during a fierce electric storm, the house of Nelson Brenneman was struck by lightning which resulted from the telephone wire. Considerable damage was done to the house. Their little daughter, who was standing close to the 'phone, was struck and burned very severely. Dr. Boyer was immediately called. We hope she will soon recover. She is the pride of that family.

Mr. Wm. Frazee and family, and Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Beeghley were the pleasant guests of Jonas Glotfelty last Sunday. They returned home in the evening and report a pleasant trip, for visitors are always welcome at that place.

G. T. Smith and J. J. Feik, who are busy harvesting at this place, made a trip to Accident Saturday night.

Miss Emma Durst and Ed Diehl made a business trip to the former's parents at this place last Sunday.

Mr. Alex. Whamond, of Washington, D. C., is spending his vacation on the farm of Jonas Glotfelty. He is a splendid little hand, but he will have to spend a few more of his vacations on the farm before he understands farming thoroughly.

REPUBLICANS NAMED A WINNING TICKET

Ticket Named Yesterday Hailed With Rejoicing By All Republicans.

GAITHER HEADS THE NOMINEES.

Republicans of Maryland Feel More Confident of Victory This Fall than for 30 Years—Baltimore Independents Prefer a Home Man.

The Republicans of Maryland are solidly united; there is not a discord of harmony through out the entire party; every Republican rejoices that George R. Gaither, of Baltimore, accepted the nomination for governor; the independent voters of Baltimore are going to vote for the man of Baltimore and not for Crothers, the Democratic man of Cecil county; and the Democrats of the State are trembling when they think of the wisdom of the people of Maryland who will decide in November which party shall rule Maryland.

These are a few of the inferences which can be drawn today after the great session of the leaders of the Republican party who met yesterday in Baltimore and named the following ticket to be submitted to the Republicans of Maryland within a few weeks:

For Governor, George R. Gaither, of Baltimore; for Attorney-General, Hammond Urner, of Frederick county; for Comptroller, James H. Baker, of Kent county; for Clerk of Court of Appeals, Thomas Parran, of Calvert county.

NEIGHBORLY NOTES.

Items of Interest of Our Neighbors in West Virginia and Maryland.

Work on the new suspension bridge over the Monongahela at Fairmont, began Monday.

Rev. John Weir, formerly president of the Seminary at Buckhannon, has been elected to the presidency of New Orleans University.

The Grafton Tailoring Company has come under the control of the constable and the equipment will be sold for indebtedness.

Dr. Winfield S. Stone, a native of Kingwood, and well-known about Grafton, died recently at Caledonia, Ohio.

The members of Grafton's Y. M. C. A. will begin an outing September 5th at the mouth of the Buckhannon river.

Two large locomotives built by the Baldwin Company for the Southern Pacific Railroad, and made to burn oil as a fuel, passed through Oakland last week.

Alexander Allerdice, Sr., died near Lonaconing last week.

Dr. C. J. C. Bennett, the new principal of the Fairmont Normal, arrived in Fairmont last week from Mountain Lake Park where he spent a vacation.

Morris F. Van Gosen, for six years operator at Hancock Station, W. Va., opposite Hancock, Md., was murdered near the telegraph tower Sunday morning about 2.30. William Jones, a Baltimore & Ohio brakeman, is in the jail, charged with the crime.

The Pennsylvania railroad will open September 1st, a school of telegraphy for instructing young men in practical railroad telegraphy. It will be located at Bedford, Pa. Positions will be guaranteed to qualified graduates of the school. A small tuition fee will be charged.

Joseph E. Myers, a citizen of Grafton and employed as a breakeman on the B. & O., was killed Sunday evening at ten o'clock at Fairmont by being ground to pieces beneath the car wheels.

J. R. Toll, aged thirty, and a native of Alleghany county, was killed by train near Fairmont and died in that city Monday.

FIKE.

The farmers are all busy making hay whenever the weather permits, but during the last week it has been raining almost incessantly.

J. A. Fike and Wm. M. Fike have received payment for their coal land.

Mr. L. K. Fike was on business beyond Fearer one day last week.

Mr. Owen Evans was seen passing through here going to Friendsville last week.

Mr. James Frantz bought a two year old horse of Mr. U. S. Savage.

Among the many good colts in this vicinity Mr. Mathias Frazee has one of the best of all, it being a Percheon colt.

Some of the farmers have their ground plowed for winter wheat.

PROHIBITIONISTS AT THE PARK.

Delegates Being Elected to Attend State Convention to be Held There This Month.

The Convention of the Prohibition party of the State of Maryland will convene at the Park on August 31st, for the purpose of nominating a governor and other state officials. Delegates for the Convention are being elected in all parts of the State.

It appears that the Prohibitionists are going to make strenuous fight for victory in old Maryland this fall. The recent victory of the party in Georgia has given the Prohibitionists new life and inspiratiou and they intend to wage a more vigorous warfare than ever before.

Garrett county chairman, Mr. Harvey N. Cuppett, of Mt. Lake Park, says that he has received a large number of circulars from the State Committee of the Prohibition party and from the chairman of the Anti-Saloon League, and he adds that from them all he learns that there will be efforts put forth this fall by the temperance party to exert a great influence in the election of pure men, of men who are favorably disposed to temperance, and of men who will see that laws already enacted against the liquor traffic are rigidly enforced.

Chairman Cuppett also states that there will be placed in the field a county Prohibition ticket and that strenuous efforts will be made to poll a large vote for the candidates.

Some School Teachers Change.

A large number of teachers have been apointed throughout the county to the various schools. However, there are several desirable positions yet unfilled. Neither Selbyspert nor Grantsville has engaged a teacher for the coming year. Mr. P. E. King, who taught last year at Grantsville, has not yet spoken definitely for the same position this year and some think he will not return although it is not definitely known Mr. L. F. Green the coming year will have the Compton school near Grantsville; Edward Brenneman, the New Germany; Miss Julia Kerns, the McKinzie school; George Whitesell, the Mountain Lake Park school; Burns Lowermilk, the Loch Lynn Heights school; Norris K. Welch, the Deer Park school; Miss Myrtle Custer, the Avilton school; Miss Zourie Bowman, Dorsey school; and Miss Jean Ralston, the Merril school.

Practical Training.

"Deduction is the thing," declared the law student. "For instance, yonder in our yard is a pile of ashes. That is evidence that we have had a fire this winter."

"And, by the way, John," broke in his father, "you might go out and sift the evidence."

CORNERSTONE TO BE LAID ABOUT SEPTEMBER FIRST

Masons Will Conduct Exercises and Prominent Speakers Will Be Present.

GEO. L. WELLINGTON INVITED

Court House Foundation Completed to Grade Line and Work is Progressing Nicely—Grand Lodge of Maryland Invited.

The date for the laying of the cornerstone of the new court house has not yet been definitely settled, but it will be some where near the first of September. Neither has the program of the exercises been fully decided upon. But among the many numbers to be given upon the occasion, there will be speeches given by several prominent men and Masons. Hon. George L. Wellington has been invited to deliver the principal address. Judge Henderson will give a history of the judiciary of Garrett county and Dr. E. H. Bartlett will give the history of the county. Worshipful Master, J. M. Jarboe of the Oakland lodge will also take part in the exercises. The grand lodge of the State will be invited to participate and it is hoped that the cornerstone may be laid by the Grand Worshipful Master of the State of Maryland.

The foundation of the court house is now completed up to the grade line and the work is moving along very satisfactorily, being pushed as much as possible by the contractor W. A. Liller.

A Grange Picnic.

The Garrett Pomona Grange will meet with the Swanton Grange at the Painter School House, Sept 3rd, lecturer Grant, of New Jersey, and worthy state master Patterson as the principal speakers.

The largest crowd ever gathered in Western Maryland is anticipated.

This meeting is for Mineral county West Virginia Granges as well as Alleghany, Washington and Garrett county farmers, and all should plan their work so as to be present. All are cordially invited. Come and bring your baskets.

Sure Thing.

An old lady met a neighbor in the street one day, and was telling her about a recent bereavement. "Yes," she said, "our Bill died last week. That's five out of seven gone, and now there's only me and old Joe left." Then she added pathetically: "Only two left. I suppose I shall be the next to go."

"Ah," said the neighbor, "I suppose you will. At any rate, cheer up, if you ain't, you'll be the next but one."

THE AUTHOR OF A FAMOUS SONG

Daniel D. Emmett Whose Love of Music Made Him a Minstrel.

WROTE THE THRILLING "DIXIE."

Account of a Darkey Who Wrote a Song That is National—Wrote Several Other Famous Melodies—He Died in 1904.

A dispatch from Louisville announcing the death of Will S. Hays, an old newspaper man, says:

"Col. Hays has always claimed authorship of the original words of 'Dixie,' and that he was responsible for the arrangement of the music. His version of 'Dixie' was written at the outbreak of the civil war, but the words were considered so seditious that the writer was arrested and compelled to change them."

Col. Hays was a bright reporter, and wrote some clever verses and songs, but he did not write "Dixie." He may have written some verses to that tune, but the original song, both verses and music, famous as the war song of the south, was written by Daniel D. Emmett, of Mt. Vernon, Ohio, a once noted negro minstrel and song writter. He was also the author of "Old Dan Tucker," "Jordan is a Hard Road to Travel," "Go Way, Boys," and other popular minstrel songs.

Born of a good old Ohio family, Emmett learned the printer's trade, but his love of music led him to become a minstrel at the very beginning of that amusement. He organized the "Virginia Minstrels," one of the earliest traveling shows of that kind in the early '40's. He had also played with Bryant's minstrels, another early organization, and composed negro melodies and plantation "walk arounds" for them.

"Dixie" was written, words and music, in 1859. The author, who played the violin, composed the tune first on that instrument and then wrote the words. The latter, like all negro minstrel songs, are nonsensical and the repetition of the words Dixie and dixieland in the chorus gave the name to the song. It was first sung in a public performance in New York in September, 1859, the evening after it was composed. Emmett altogether wrote as many as twenty stanzas, each followed by the chorus:

Den I wish I was in Dixie! Hooray! Hooray!
In Dixie's land we'll take our stand to live and die in Dixie.
Away, away, away down south in Dixie!
Away, away, away down south in Dixie.

Emmett was essentially a Northern man and had no idea that Dixie would ever be adopted by the South or become a war song. The melody caught the popular ear, and from the music halls the song reached the people.

Abraham Lincoln first heard it at a minstrel show in Chicago during the political campaign of 1860 and was much amused by it. The song was first published in New York in 1860, under the title, "I Wish I Was in Dixie's Land." The title page of a copy of the song in the Libraay of Congress reads:

"'I Wish I Was in Dixie's Land.' Written and composed expressly for Bryant's Minstrels by Dan D. Emmett. Entered according to Act of Congress A. D. 1860, by Firth, Bond & Co., New York."

The song had become popular all over the North before the war begun and was whistled and sung and played on the piano. Its popularity in the South dates from its rendition at a theatrical performance in New Orleans in the spring of 1861. It was a variety performance, with a zouave march in the last act. As an attraction Miss Susan Denin, a popular actress of the day, led the zouaves on the stage singing Dixie. It took the house by storm, was adopted by the people, arranged for a military quickstep, and at once became the war song of the South.

Emmett died June 28, 1904, and was buried at Mt. Vernon.

Many parodies of "Dixie" were written, and several persons have claimed to be the author of the original song, but Emmett's authorship of the original is settled beyond any doubt whatever. After his retirement from the stage he received weekly benefits in cash from the Actor's Fund, of New York, and he also had some income from the sale of autograph copies of "Dixie."

NEW OFFICIAL TIMEKEEPER.

Winds And Repairs 700 Clocks For $65 Monthly.

The Treasury Department has a new official clock winder. J. C. Rumsey now has the job of repairing and keeping in good running order the 700 clocks in the Treasury Department and its annexes. He gets $65 a month and is kept busy going the rounds winding up the various timepieces.

Charley Fleming was the official clock winder of the Treasury until his death a few weeks ago. He had held the position as long as any one around the big building remembers. He did the work under a contract, and before opposition set in he was paid $75 a month. One year during the Carlisle administration a rival clockmaker submitted a bit of $60 a month and got the contract. Fleming underbid this by $15 the next year and from then on the time of his death monopolized the business Later he raised the charge to $65 a month. It is worth all of this amount, because many of the clocks are old and constantly need repairing.

In other departments the messengers of the different bureaus look after the clocks, except the large ones that are connected by wire with the Naval Observatory and actually mark the sun time.

The clocks of the White House are looked after by one of the local jewelers, who sends a man every week to wind them and see that they are in order. It is a curious fact that only one of the 25 or 30 clocks in the White House proper is of American manufacture, and that is a big gilt affair which stands on the mantle in the Green Room and was purchased while James Monroe was president.

The most interesting clock in the White House is in the Blue Parlor. It was made of alabaster and French gilt bronze for Napoleon Bonaparte, and was presented to George Washington by Marquis de Lafayette. It still keeps excellent time and runs for a month without winding.—Brooklyn Eagle.

ANGLER GOT A SHARK.

A fisherman aboard the steamboat Angler got a vigorous bite yesterday afternoon off the Cholera Banks and hauled in. The creature at the end of the line made as much fuss as a motorboat when it got alongside the Angler. A triangular fin struck out the ferment later and the fisherman yelled "Shark!" That's what it was. A deckhand with a gaff hooked it and with the help of a lasso hauled it aboard. It was about six feet long and couldn't eat a man unless he were served in hambuger steak style.

When the shark was landed at the Battery Park pier it was dead. The captian of the Angler presented the carcass to Niei Lafferty who runs the Manhattan terminal of the Statue of Liberty ferry, and he turned it over to Capt. John P. Roberts, of the boat that runs to Bedloe's island.

Halt an hour later Captain Roberts appeared in the ship news office with a package the contents of which, he said, had been found in the stomach of the shark with sundry wedding rings, Standard Oil stock certificates and other things which he intends to hold until the owners prove property.

The ship news men opened the package and found six bottles of beer. Most of them said they could not be bribed by mere beer, but were willing to consider Standard Oil. The shark will be exhibited at Bedloe's Island two days—on ice—to all who take the sound tirp from the Battery.—New York Sun.

SMALL IN BODY YET NORMAL IN ABILITIES

One Chap Measured Only Thirteen Inches in Height.

TWO PYGMIES CAME OUT OF PIES

Alexander and Napoleon Were Both Small Men—One Dwarf Resembled a Partridge—A Logician and Philosopher Was 17 Inches High.

Don't be ashamed of being small stature. The finest brains are often found in the heads of little men. Alexander, Napoleon, Uladislaus Cubitalis, the pygmy king of Poland; Charac is the wisest counselor that was about Saladin, the great conqueror of the East; Marius Marcus Tulius, and, to drop down to this day generation, Alexander H. Stephens, Stephen A. Douglas, Jay Gould, Samuel Spencer, Senator Knox, Abe Gruber, Phil Sheridan, and a host of others—all were small men; yet, as they say in the Bowery, they got there.

Alypius of Alexandria, a most excellent logician and philosopher was one foot and five inches in height. Augustus Caesar exhibited in his plays one Lucius, a young man born of honest parents who was only twenty-three inches high and weighed seventeen pounds; yet he had a strong tenor voice and could sing like a nightingale. In the time of Theodosius there was a pygmy in Egypt so small of body that he resembled a partridge; yet he exercised all the functions of a man and could sing merrily. He lived to be twenty-two. Julia, niece of Emperor Augustus, had a dwarfish fellow of the name of Cauopas, to whom she was much devoted. He was twenty-eight inches high. Andromeda, a freed maid of Julia, was the same height.

Just about a hundred years ago, in Wurttemberg, at the nuptials of the Duke of Bavaria, a great pie was set upon the table. On being opened, out stepped dwarf, armed cap-a-pie, girt with a sword and a spear in his hand. He walked around the table in a swashbuskler style, sword drawn, and caused the greatest amusement and interest.

There was a little fellow in Italy who was carried around in a parrot's cage and exhibited for money. He was only thirteen inches high. A Frenchman of Limosin, with a formal beard, was also shown in a cage for money. He was about fifteen inches high. At the end of the cage was a liitle hutch into which he retired. When the house was full he stepped fourth and played a tune on an instrument.

Going away back—without sitting down—Jeffrey Hudson was the wonder of his age. His father was a butcher, stout and of good height, and his mother was a large woman. At the age of eight he was sixteen inches in height. The Dutchess of Buckingham adopted him. She clothed him always in satin. At the royal feast he served in cold pie, walking forth in complete armor. Being presented to Queen Henrietta Maria, it afforded her much amusement. The King had a gigantic porter. William Evans. In a masked ball at court Evans hauled out of one pocket a long loaf of bread and out of the other little Jeffrey. This dwarf was employed on a delicate mission to Francas Ambassador. He was captured by a Flemish pirate. His capitivity is the subject of a poem by Sir William Davenant, entitled "Jeffredos." He lived to be sixty years of age.

Cumberland at its highest point is 776 feet and 609 feet at its lowest. Frederick is 280 feet up, and Baltimore is 154 feet above on Gay street and 20 feet at City Hall.

SIGNERS' AUTOGRAPHS

How the Signatures Have Increased In Value Since 1878.

In the last 30 years "signers" [Declaration of Independence] autographs have accrued in value from three to five fold, and there is no chance that the prices are to fall; it is rather to be expected that they will gradually but surely rise yet more. In 1878 there were sold at auction in Philadelphia 29 items, representing that number of the signatures of the Declaration's sponsors, in almost every case appended to a letter in the same hand. The total realized for the lot was $680.50—and the selfsame pieces sold today would be worth from $2,000 to $3,000! A complete collection of documents bearing the signatures of all "the signers" would bring, even under the most unfavorable circumstances, not less than $10,000, while if the letters should contain references to the famous paper which sprang into immorality that summer forenoon in 1776, or to other events of greater or less importance to it or to the Revolutionary period, the price in the aggregate might easily run up to $25,000.

The detailed lists of the 29 autographs sold at the auction in 1878, with the prices they brought 27 years ago, compared with the prices set upon similar "pieces" by one of the largest and best known autograph dealers of today, shows tellingly the steady advance in value that has attached to them. At the sale in question Button Gwinnett's signature, one of the rarest of the "set," was attached to a draft, or brief, or letter and not the letter itself, while the signature of Thomas Lynch, Jr., had been cut from the flyleaf of a book. In every other case, however, the letter bearing the signature had been written by the hand of the signer. The dates attached are those borne by the letters:

| George Wythe, December 29, 1778 | 16.00 | 35 |

It is perhaps, not without interest to add that 26 of the 56 signers were professional men, 22 being attorneys, 3 physicians, and one a clergyman. Of the others, 10 were merchants, 3 were farmers, 1 (Benjamin Franklin, of course) was a printer, and 16 may best be described as retired men of fortune.—New York Times.

Duncan, P. C.

By EMILE GIRARD.

Copyrighted, 1905, by Homer Sprague.

Marion looked up hopefully as the card was brought her. Even the announcement of Duncan's name was comforting. But the little oblong of cardboard bore, in addition to the name, the initials P. C. Perhaps it meant "penitent culprit." Duncan was always doing odd things. The magic letters might be his expression of regret.

But when he came briskly into the room there was no penitential sorrow in his countenance—only the same merry twinkle of the eyes, the old lifting of the corners of the mouth.

"They tell me that Tad is no better," he said as he took Marion's hand. "As you will perceive from my card, I am a physician to children."

Marion's face darkened. This, then, was the meaning of the card. He was worried about her brother. For a moment she was minded to renew the old quarrel, but she needed help and sympathy, and so she laid her head on his shoulder and sobbed out her troubles.

Her father had been obliged to go to Europe on business and had taken his wife with him. Marion had been left in charge of her nine-year-old brother, and almost before the ship had passed Sandy Hook Tad had come down with typhoid.

His robust constitution had thrown off the disease, but the battle had left him weak and listless, and even the gray bearded physician was worried.

"There is no actual danger," he explained to Marion, "but he must be roused from this lethargy or he will go into a decline."

He had confided the same fear to Henry Duncan when he met the latter on the street and the younger man had asked after his little chum. Then, despite the misunderstanding between Marion and himself, he could hold out no longer, and his call was the result.

"If he should die before mother comes back, what should I do?" wailed Marion.

"Send a cable," advised Duncan promptly, "but there is not going to be any more worry now that the physician to children has stepped in. May I see my patient?"

Marion led him to the boy's room. Tad's face lighted as he saw Duncan.

TAD FED THE ELEPHANTS.

and his fingers twined confidingly about the man's firm hand. Duncan was shocked at the thinness of the fingers, but he gave no sign.

"What's the matter, old chap?" he demanded, with a voice now wonderfully gentle. "They tell me you don't find the world any good any more."

"I'm tired," said Tad plaintively.

"I'll bet you'd not be too tired to go to a circus," said Duncan.

Tad shook his head.

"There ain't any," he said. "I was asking Dr. Stanton. He says it's too early for them."

"Circuses are no good if they are picked before they are ripe," admitted Henry, "but if you don't want too big a circus I think I can get one for you."

"I don't want a play circus," explained the boy. "I've got some play circuses. One's in a book, and the other's in the cupboard."

"We got him a toy circus and a circus book," whispered Marion. "He has somehow set his mind on a circus. It will be a long time before one comes."

"There are no more circuses," reiterated Tad sadly. "They've all gone away."

"Rats!" laughed Duncan. "That shows all you know about circuses. Will a little circus do—a real circus, only with one ring?"

"Real horses, real everything?" demanded the boy.

"Everything except the tent and the red lemonade. You see, in winter they keep circuses in houses, so the elephant won't get his ears frostbitten. I bet if you had ears as big as an elephant's you wouldn't like to get your ears frostbitten."

The boy laughed in delight at the fancy and beat the counterpane with his fragile hand.

"Then there's the giraffe," went on Duncan. "Why, when he starts to cough it's a full minute before it wriggles up his throat. So they keep circuses in hothouses, just like plants."

"And there really is circuses?"

"You get rested up and we're going to one tomorrow," assured Henry.

"Really and truly?"

"Man's word," declared Henry as he put out his hand. "Now, you get better quick, so Dr. Stanton won't say that you can't come. I'll be here at 11."

With a pat on the curly head, he rose and left the room. Marion followed him down the hall.

"He will be awfully disappointed tomorrow," she said doubtfully.

"Don't believe it," laughed Duncan. "You leave it to me, and that boy will be champion scrapper of the block in another month. I have Stanton's permission to assume the case. He admits his inability to meet the situation. My fee is very large, though," he warned. "It is nothing less than a wife by the name of Marion."

"I don't think you will be kept waiting for the fee," she replied, blushing. "I'm sorry I was so mean."

"So am I," he agreed absently. "That is," quickly, "I mean I am sorry I was mean. I'll be around in the morning."

She watched him stride up the street with his springy step and turned back into the house greatly comforted. Somehow Henry Duncan always brought comfort where he came. She had been so foolish to allow a petty misunderstanding to come between them!

Tad was sitting up, ready dressed, when Henry drove up to the door the next morning. Already the queer medicine had commenced to act, for he was far more like his old self, and a slight flush of excitement tinged the cheek that had threatened to fade into the waxen pallor of death.

Duncan wrapped the boy up warmly, and, with a flourish of the whip, they were off. Away out past the town they went into the country, not yet freed from the thraldom of Jack Frost, though there was a promise of spring in the soft air.

It was to a place very unlike a circus that Duncan drove, a collection of long, low barns and one large, square building, but when they entered the latter, behold, there was a real circus ring, with a band in one corner, laboriously going over unfamiliar music.

A stout man nodded to Henry and stooped to greet Tad.

"You're going to have a circus all to yourself," he promised. "Want to feed the elephant?"

"I haven't any peanuts." Tad's lip began to quiver, but Henry drew a bag from his pocket.

He led the way to one of the barns, where Tad fed the elephants and was permitted to go much closer to the lion's cage than he could at the big circus. A man standing by even plucked a hair from the lion's tail and presented it to Tad with due ceremony. Then they went back to the big building and sat through a long, delightful dress rehearsal of the Boston Brothers' Unparalleled Railroad Circus and Menagerie. He was even permitted to see the cars shining in their new paint and was permitted personally to talk with the clown while Duncan talked with Manager Boston of the chances of an early season in the south.

"Good luck to you," Henry said as they shook hands in parting. "You've saved one youngster's life, and the season is not yet open."

"He'll be a mascot," said Boston as he waved a farewell. "Glad you brought him out."

It was past supper time when Duncan turned a very sleepy little boy over to his sister. Tad looked up drowsily as Marion put him to bed.

"There is circuses," he announced, "really and truly ones like Henry said. And I got a lion's tail," he added as his sleep heavy eyelids closed.

Marion came into the parlor, where Duncan paced the floor.

"Are you a magician?" she asked smilingly. Duncan shook his head.

"I knew Boston was going to take his show south early this year and got permission to bring Tad to the dress rehearsal. Have I earned my fee?"

"How can you earn what was already yours?" demanded Marion as he drew her to him.

Saved From Disgrace.

In one of the old families of Charleston, S. C., writes Mrs. Ravenel, there was an important personage, Jack, the butler. Jack disputed with another old man, Harry, the butler of Mrs. Henry Izard, the reputation of being the best and most thoroughly trained servant in town. From the judging of the wines to the arrangement of a saltspoon there was nothing which these withered brown potentates did not decide and maintain. Nothing would have astonished either more than that master or mistress should dissent from his verdict.

Jack was intolerant of anything which he considered a breach of the etiquette of the table. Nothing could have induced him to serve a gentleman before a lady, or a younger before an elder brother. To place fruit and wine on a tablecloth instead of on the mahogany was to him a falling from grace. On one occasion he was much annoyed when a senator from the up country twice asked for rice with his fish. To the first request he simply remained deaf; at the second he bent down and whispered into the senatorial ear. The genial gentleman nodded and suppressed a laugh; but when the servants had left the room he burst into a roar and cried: "Judge, you have a treasure! Jack has saved me from disgrace, from exposing my ignorance. He whispered, 'That wouldn't do, sir; we never eats rice with fish.'"

A Scriptural Bull.

Even the Bible is not free from bulls. In chapter thirty-seven of the book of Isaiah appears the following confusion of ideas: "Then the angel of the Lord went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and four score and five thousand; and when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses."

THE CHURCH AT WORK

NEGLECTED MISSION FIELD.

The African Sudan and Its Unchristianized Millions.

Everybody knows about the Kongo. Stanley has made it famous. To most, the Kongo is the "New Africa." Yet the Sudan is greater than the Kongo region in extent and population. It is a newer world in Central Africa, and an older. It is less known, less explored than the Kongo regions, and was peopled earlier. It is far more civilized than the Kongo. It is not wholly heathen. Half its people worship in their way the one living God. They are monotheists, Mohammedans; the other half, the lower, subject, conquered half, are heathen. Arab monotheism and negro fetishism are mingled in the Sudan. The people are of mixed blood and mixed religions.

A SUDAN NATIVE.

The name Sudan is a witness to this mixture. It is an Arabic name, and means "Land of the Blacks." It witnesses that the land of the negro has become Arab. The Semite and the Hamite dwell together in its sunny plains.

The Sudan lies between the great desert of Sahara and the vast Kongo basin. It is bounded on the east by Abyssinia, and on the west by the Atlantic. America is 3,000 miles broad, from New York to San Francisco. The Sudan is 500 miles broader—3,500 miles. It is as large as Europe, minus Russia.

The men of the world are the heroes of the Sudan. Travelers have been heroic. Distance has been no bar to them. Disease and death have proved unable to affright them. Neither love of friends nor fear of foes has been able to dissuade them from their fixed resolve to open it to the knowledge of the world and bring its people into contact with the civilization of surrounding lands. But the heralds of salvation have almost wholly forgotten this mighty heritage of a host of heathen nations. They have left them all these ages to the reign of unmixed darkness and unmitigated depravity.

How much longer shall this state of things continue? asks Dr. Kusnan, honorable secretary of the Sudan United Missions, in Home Herald. How much longer shall a population of Central Africa, almost equal to that of England and of the German empire combined, be allowed to remain in ignorance of the Way of Life? How much longer shall the command of Him whom we call "Our Lord Jesus Christ," to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature, be, as far as the millions of the Central Sudan are concerned, neglected, disregarded and ignored?

Society for Bible Study.

A "Society for Bible Study," whose aim is to provide ministers and missionaries in active work with systematic and scientific courses of study in Bible knowledge under the guidance of eminent scholars has been organized in England. Less advanced courses of study will also be arranged for Christian workers, young students and young men and women in business life. The first council has been elected, and such names as those of Bishop Herbert Ryle, Canon Sanday and Prof. Sayce, form an excellent guarantee of the kind of work that the society will set itself to do.

Discussion of Sermons.

What is to be thought of the discussion of sermons? asks the London correspondent of the Record of Christian Work. I do not mean the discussion of sermons by the congregation when they are on their way home from church, or around the Sunday dinner or supper table. But the discussion of sermons in the church itself, after their delivery, and before the people go home. Though no doubt not the first to make the experiment, it has recently been tried by Rev. J. E. Roberts, the successor at Union chapel, Manchester, of the eminent Dr. Alexander Maclaren.

One Fearless State.

There is at least one state in the union which does not seem afraid to teach the Bible in the public schools. In North Dakota a two years' course in Bible study has been made a part of the State Normal school. Recently 30 pupils attended these classes, which were given by officers of the Sunday school association.

Y. M. C. A. Building for Seattle.

Over 300 of the Seattle Y. M. C. A. men canvassed that city, and in ten days secured over $13,000 a day, which rounded out the fund for the association building to $285,000.

Return to England.

After a period of 300 years' absence, the gray friars, or minor conventional fathers, have returned to England and taken charge of the church of St. Joseph, Potishead, near Bristol.

For Attorney General:
HAMMOND URNER, of Frederick.

For Comptroller:
JAMES H. BAKER, of Kent County.

For Clerk of Court of Appeals.
THOMAS PARRAN of Calvert County

THE WRATH OF MAN.

Primaries and conventions are being held daily throughout the State of Maryland. Men are excited over the coming election and each voter is determined to fight as much as in him lies for the success of his favorite candidate. Parades and triumphs will be the order of the day until after the election. All of the voters will be keyed up to the highest pitch until the result is known.

Since the dawn of history, man has always shown a detefmination to fight, if not in the cave or at the river bank before his hut, then out on the battle field with bow and arrow or with the more deadly gun and bullet. Today, however, there is less love of war. There is not such a great desire to fight on the battle field as there once was. The elections which come every year supply the demand of man for a fight and he has it at the polls every November, and thus he becomes satisfied for a contest. Henceh becomes a more quiet citizen until the next election and at the same time is a better head of the home for he is not so much inclined to fight with his wife. He has given vent to his wrath during the preceding election campaign.

THE DEATH RECORD.

GEORGE YOMMER.

George Yommer, Sr. of Jennings, this county, died on Thursday evening, Aug. 8th. For twenty weeks he was an extreme sufferer, during all that time being unable to rest upon his bed, but confined to his chair. Asthma and dropsy caused his suffering, and finally carried him off. He died at the age of sixty-eight years. The wife, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Witzgal, with nine children and fifteen grandchildren, survive to mourn the loss of a kind husband and indulgent parent. Father Yommer was a good man. Kind, gentle and neighborly always, he had many to cheer and comfort him in his days of suffering; and a great host gathered to pay last respects at his funeral. God rest his soul!—even as the grave rests his worn and weary body. He came as a lad of nineteen years, from Hessen Marburg, Germany. During all these years he has been a member of the Lutheran church at Grantsville, and in the beautiful "Gottes Acter" of that venerable village, "he rests from his labors". The body having been carefully embalmed by Messrs. Durst of Frostburg, and Miller, of Grantsville, the funeral services were deferred until Sunday morning, the 11th. Rev. Young, of Salisbury, Pa., pastor of the church, and Rev. Shoup, of Bittinger, a former pastor of the family and long-time friend, conducted the services.

J. B. S.

JACOB HENRY GOWER.

The deceased was well-known to the people of and near Oakland, being born and raised near here, and having at one time conducted a mercantile business in this town. Mr. Gower was a little over thirty-seven years of age. He was the father of five children, having been married to Julia Lower, whom he leaves a widow. Mr. Gower was working in a coal mine at Century, W. Va. He went to work Friday morning at which time he was covered over by a slip of coal. He died next day, being brought to Oakland Sunday. He was buried from the home of his brother, Truman, in Oakland, the remains being laid to rest in the Wonderly graveyard near Loch Lynn Heights, the funeral services being conducted by Rev. Johnson, of the United Brethern Church.

Reopenngs.

The Lutheran congregations of Bittinger and Meadow Mountain, having made extensive repairs on their houses of worship, will hold reopening services on Augnst 25th, Bittinger, at 10 a. m., and at Meadow Mountain, 3 p. m.

Rev. Dr. J. J. Young, of New York City, and Rev. H. H. Flick, of Manchester, former pastors, will do the preaching. The public is cordially invided.

J. B. SHOUP, Acting Pastor.

GARRETT REPUBLICANS ADVOCATED GAITHER

Every Republican in Convention Here Monday Stood Out for Him.

NOT A NOTE OF DISCORD EVIDENT

Great Interest Manifested—Platform Advocates $40 for School Teachers—All Were Thrilled with Determination to Carry Maryland.

The Republican delegates of the county met at the Court House Monday and elected twenty-five delegates to attend the Baltimore State Convention; at the same time elected a State Central Committee.

The convention was called to order by J. S. Myers, a member of the county committee. C. J. Otto was elected temporary chairman and A. F. George was elected secretary. The committee on credentials was composed as follows: district No. 1, H. Steiding; No. 2, G. O. Browning; No. 3, Lawerence Green; No. 4, Jacob Stuer; No. 5, H. M. Speicher; No. 6, H. R. DeWitt; No. 7, E. E. Friend; No. 8, M. Wolf; No. 9, not represented; No. 10 F. L. Warnick; No. 11, George B. McMillan; No. 12, Jonas Bittinger; No. 13, not represented; No. 14, not represented.

The Committee on Resolutions consisted of the following: district No. 1, J. L. Fitzwater; No. 2, J. S. Meyers; No. 3, Ralph Engle; No. 4, R. A. C. Howard; No. 5, R. A. Ravenscroft; No. 6, W. A. Smith; No. 7, A. G. Ross; No. 8, Senator Brown; No. 9, not represented; No. 10, F. L. Warnick; No. 11, George B. McMillan; No. 12, George W. Engle; No. 13, not represented; No. 14. Austin Brown.

The committee on Credentials recommended that all of the delegates properly certified should be seated in the convention and the recommendation carried.

The temporary organization was made permanent.

Resolutions were introduced which read as follows and the were unanimously adopted:

We, the Republicans of Garrett County in County Convention assembled view with pride and pleasure the general prosperity of the country and the employment at remunerative wages all those who desire employment, and we look upon this fact as proof of the wisdom and soundness of Republican principles and policies, as carried out by those of our party who have been entrusted with this duty, and therefore; be it

Resolved, That this convention heartily endorsers the administration of President Thereodore Roosevelt, our patriotic, Courageous and wise servant, and we also endorse the course pursued by the Honorable George A. Pearre, our representative in Congress, as well as all other loyal Republican representatives, who stood by the administration and assisted in making it possible to carry out the policies aforesaid; be it

Resolved, That we congratulate our party in County and State for the harmony that exists among us, and the unity of purpose in still further pushing Republican principles to the front, and thereby advancing the interest of our country and State, and bringing the greatest good to the greatest number, and we futher congratulate the members of our party and the people of the State of Maryland, for the bright prospect of Republican success at the coming State election, and the election of a Republican Governor and a Republican Legislature, and by said result, insure, to the people of this State a free and honest ballot and a fair count, and forever relegate to the rear fraud and trick ballots, corrupt practices and dishonest elections; be it

Resolved, That we as Republicans favor an increase in the salaries of the public school Teachers of our State, to a minimum of Forty Dollars per month; and pledge ourselves to use all honorable means to have the above incorprated in the platform to be adopted at the State Convention; be it

Resolved, That we commend the recent State legislation for the protection of our Forests; and acknowledge the generosity of the Messers Garrett, in their liberal donation of a State Forest Reserve in our County; and be it further

Resolved, That the temporary orgination be made permanent and that a mass delagation of 25 be sent to the State Convention.

W. MCCULLAH BROWN, Chairman.
A. G. ROSS, Sect'y.

Delegates to the State Convention to assemble at Baltimore to nominate a state ticket were selected as follows: R. A. Ravenscroft, C. J. Rathbun, Benj. H. Sincell, G. W. Engle, Jacob Stump, N. R. Selby, H. R. DeWitt, W. McCulloh Brown, H. Steiding, Austin Brown, Charles Younkin, H. M. Speicher, F. G. Fox, C. J. Otto, George D. Browning, F. L. Warnick, P. H. Rodeheaver, J. S. Myers, J. L. Fitzwater, W. A. Smith, George B. McMillan, A. F. George, A. G. Ross, T. B. Layman, N. U. Bond.

Following the election of delegates, the County Central Committee was selected as follows: H. M. Speicher, Col. A. G. Sturgiss and A. F. George. The three members will elect their own chairman.

Delegates from the various districts were present as follows:

No. 1.—A. F. George, Jacob R. Harshberger, John L. Fitzwater, Charles Lee and Herman Steiding.

No. 2.—N. R. Selby, J. S. Myers, F. G. Fox, W. E. Hollinger, George D. Browning, W. W. Savage, George F. Frazee.

No. 3.—L. F. Green, C. J. Otto, R. Engle, C. C. Durst, C. H. Younkin.

No. 4.—J. Stump, Grant Harshbarger R. C. C. Howard, Charles Bundlin, Howard Kline.

No. 5.—W. A. Dewitt, John Kolb, H. M. Speicher, Peter Brown, R. A. Ravenscroft.

No. 6.—W. A. Smith, Douglas McLane, J. Alvin Friend, H. R. DeWitt.

No. 7.—E. E. Friend, C. J. Rathbun, Albert G. Ross, Andrew Shartzer, George D. White.

No. 8.—W. McCulloh Brown, Chas. E. Hillery, James Chisholm, E. C. Harvey, Jonas Yutzy.

No. 9.—Not Represented.

No. 10.—F. L. Warnick, C. A. Ashby E. A. Bosley, M. V. Flanigan, F. B. Casteel.

No. 11.—E. Merrill, George B. McMillan, J. A. Strichland, H. McMillan W. S. Jackson.

No. 12.—George B. Engle, Jonas Bittinger, Joel Orendorf, C. J. Brenneman, J. B. Emory.

No. 13.—Not Represented.

No 14.—William Newman, Austin Brown, Patrick H. Rodaheaver, Benj. H. Sincell, James W. White.

The entire meeting was marked by a spirit of harmony and of determination to make strong efforts to win in the state campaign this fall. The convention did not instruct the delegates to vote for any one particular candidate for the governorship, but all of the delegates seemed to favor the nomination of George R. Gaither, of Baltimore, if he can be prevailed upon to accept the nomination.

Items from Friendsville M. E. Circuit.

A very interesting quarterly conference was held at Friendsville Monday, August 12th, 1907, with Presiding Elder R. B. Ward. D. D., in the chair, when among other things the following committees were appointed and the following officers of the church were elected:

COMMITTEES.

Parsonage Furniture.—The Ladies' Aid Society at Friendsville.

Estimating Committee.—Leslie E. Friend, B. F. Friend, Henry Frazee, George Lowdermilk, George E. Bishoff, Samuel Bowling.

Conference Claimants.—Freeman Dewitt, G. E. Bishoff, Wm. Callis.

CHURCH OFFICIALS.

Friendsville, Stewards.—Leslie E. Friend, C. V. Guard, Thomas Garey.

Johnstown, Stewards.—Thos. Bishoff, Wm. Callis, Nimrod Glotfelty.

Selbysport, Stewards.—G. F. Lowdermilk, Henry Frazee, N. R. Selby.

Blooming Rose, Stewards.—Samuel Bowling, C. W. Friend.

Trustees, Friendsville.—L. E. Friend, B. F. Friend, C. V. Guard, Thos. Fike, S. S. Savage.

Trustees, Hoyes.—Rev. H. E. Friend, G. E. Bishoff, Arthur Custer, W. A. Smith, Freeman DeWitt, C. B. Callis.

Trustees, Selbysport.—G. E. Lowdermilk, Henry Frazee, N. R. Selby, W. S. Friend, Asa Riley, C. M. Camp, Ulysses Frazee.

Trustees, Blooming Rose.—C. W. Friend, J. S. Meyers, Garrett Dixon, Samuel Bowling, D. H. Friend.

As it is no longer the function of the quarterly conference to elect delegate and reserve to the lay electoral conference, the matter stands as previously reported, Hon. Nathan R. Selby being the delegate and C. V. Guard the reserve.

During the present pastorate of nearly three years the records show the following results: Thirty-one infants and thirty-two adults have been baptized and six immersed; fourteen have died, eight have withdrawn and nine have been given church letters. These members deducted from the occassions leave us a net gain of thirty-four members.

About $1,000 have been added to the value of the church property, and by the end of the year $455 will have been reported, in cash, for the conference collections.

With profound love and charity towards all and malice towards none, we hereby announce that we will not return for another year, and earnestly pray that "he who cometh after us" will find the same hearty and royal welcome that we received.

W. M. LISTER, Paster.

A Correction.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I notice in your valuable paper of August 8th 1907, that you give the names of Mr. N. R. Selby and Mr. C. V. Guard as delegate and reserve delegate from the Friendsville charge to the Lay Electoral Conference to be held in Huntington, W. Va. This is a mistake as the certificates have been issued by the return judges to Mr. Geo. E. Bishoff as a delegate and Mr. N. R. Selby as a reserve delegate.

B. F. FRIEND,
President of the Board of Election.

Man's Precious Rib.

A young lady having asked a surgeon why woman was made from the rib of man in preference to another bone, he gave her the following gallant answer: "She was not taken from the head lest she should rule over him, nor from his feet lest he should tramble upon her; but that she was taken from his side, that she might be his equal; from under his arm, that he might protect her; from near his heart,, that he might cherish and love her."

A PRETTY WEDDING.

Mr. Albert W. Miller and Miss Catherine E. Richter Married at Cove.

On Saturday evening the German Lutheran church in Cove, Garrett county was the scene of a very pretty wedding. Mr. Albert W. Miller, son of Philip Miller, of Cove, was united in the holy bonds of matrimony to Miss Catherine E. Richter, daughter of Mrs. John Oester, of Cove.

A large number of friends and relatives was gathered at the church before the bridal party arrived and was entertained with music on organ and violin by Miss Iva A. McCullough and Mr. R. M. Holman, of Friendsville. As soon as the nuptial parties arrived, they marched into the church to the sweetest strains of music, and were conducted to the altar by the waiters, Miss Margaret Richter, sister of the bride, the two Misses Hast, of Cumberland, and Messrs. William Bishoff, of Hoyes, Adam Richter, of Accident, and Louis Zehner, of Grantsville. These were preceded by the ushers, Messrs. F. P. Miller, of Accident, and Weller Collier, of Cove. This party formed a semicircle and the wedding couple came under a beautiful arch just over the altar, which was decorated with the prettiest flowers and the purest green that nature could afford. These, blendwith the fading lights of the slowly waning day, united with the gorgeous gown and the charming face of the bride and the pleasant countenance of the groom, gave the scene a magnificent appearance. Here at the altar the ceremony was performed by Rev. Geo. Blievenicht, of Accident.

The party then marched out and was accompanied to the home of Mrs. Oester, mother of the bride, where refreshments were served and where they were again treated with several of the finest musical selections of Miss McCullough and Mr. Holman. Here, also, many hearty and sincere congratulations were received by the bridal couple. On the return to the home, all nature seemed most gay and cheerful, the western sky being lined with the gorgeous colors of a golden sunset, and the air, after the gentle showers, being as pure and sweet as was ever breathed by mountain tourists.

About nine o'clock, the happy couple, amid cheers and best wishes of the friends, started to drive to Confluence, Pa., where they boarded the train for Chicago. From there, they will visit several points on the western prairies.

The groom is engaged in the lumber business at Sykesville, Md., and the bride has been a stenographer in Washington, D. C., for some time.

May their lifelong journey be a pleasant one, and may their duties and obligations be intermingled with the soothing pleasantries of a happy life.

A recital will be given this evening at the opera house by Misses Carolina DeFabritiis, Mary Miller and Daisy Grant. The proceeds are for the benefit of the P. E. Church, of Swanton. An excellent program has been arranged and a large crowd is expected.

It has been frequently suggested and the suggestion is a good one, for every farmer to place his name and the name of his farm on his road-gate. Not only would persons driving to a place more easily find it, but it would add more pleasure and interest to people driving from place to place. This last result would have special effect with regard to well kept and pretty houses. An observing person will seldom pass a beautiful farm without desiring to know who is its enterprising owner.

It is not generally known, but nevertheless a fact, that there are people still living who can remember the time when tomatoes were raised merely for their beauty as we now raise roses. While its beauty was admired it was considered like the poisonous oak, dangerous to even handle except by "dark complected" persons. Years of acquaintanceship, however, wore off its supersitition and a few "fool-hardy" actually owned up to having tasted the fruit. From this small beginning has gradually grown a use that makes today an industry with a combined capital of over thirty millions of dollars, which disburses millions of dollars to its employes each year and aggregates an output of two hundred and forty million cans.

The Convention at Baltimore Thursday Sprung Many Surprises.

The Democrats of Maryland met in Baltimore Thursday and nominated the following ticket to be voted upon at the November election :

For Governor—Austin L. Crothers, of Cecil county.

For Comptroller of the Treasury—Joshua W. Herring, of Carroll county.

For Attorney General—Isaac Lobe Straus, of Baltimore city.

For Clerk Court of Appeals—Caleb C. Magruder, of Prince George's county.

The Garrett county delegation cast its vote for Judge Crothers, Williams, of Baltimore city, not being a nominee.

Youghiogheny Light and Power Co.

Articles of incorporation of the Youghiogheny Light and Power Co., of Garrett county, Md., were filed in the clerk's office on August 3rd last. The incorporators are : Alfred G. Sturgiss, Truman West, James D. Hamill, Peter A. Chisholm and Hiram P. Tasker. The object of the company is to utilize the waters of the Yough River, Muddy Creek and Deep Creek for generating electricity for light, power and manufacturing purposes.

The Minister's Text.

A little girl came home from church the other day and was asked what the minister's text was. "Don't be afraid, and I will get you a bedquilt," was the astonishing answer.

Investigation proved that the central thought of the sermon had been, "Fear not, and I will send you a comforter."

Supper and Festival.

Will a merchant who is wise ever cease to advertise? Yes—when the trees grow upside down; when the beggar wears a crown; when ice forms on the snn; when the sparrows weighs a ton; when gold dollars get too cheap; when women, secrets keep; when a fish forgets to swim; when Satan sings a hymn; when girls go back on gum; when the small boy hates a drum; when no politician schemes; when mince pie makes pleasant dreams; when its fun to break a tooth; when all lawyers tell the truth; when you love to smell a skunk; when cold water makes you drunk; when the drummer has no brass—when these things all come to pass; then man that's wise will neglect to advertise.

I will mail you free, to prove merit, samples of my Dr. Shoop's Restorative and my Book on either Dyspepsia, The Heart or The Kidneys, Troubles of the Stomach, Heart or Kidneys, are merely Simptoms of a deeper aliment. Don't make the commen error of treating the symptoms only. Symptom treatment is treating the result of your ailment, and not the cause. Weak Stomach nerves the inside nerves—mean Stomach weakness, always. And the Heart, and Kidneys as well, have their controlling or inside nervs. Weaken these nerves, and you inevitably have weak vital organs. Here is where Dr. Shoop's Restorative has its fame. No other remedy even claims to treat the "inside nerves." Also for bloating, biliousness, bad breath or complexion, use Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Write me to-day for sample and free Book. Dr. Shoop, Racine, Wis. The Restorative is sold by all dealers.

One hour a day withdrawn from frivolous pursuits, and profitably employed, would enable any man of ordinary capacity to master a complete science. One hour a day would make an ignorant man a well informed man in ten years. One hour a day would earn enough to pay for two daily and two weekly papers, two leading magazines and a dozen good books. In an hour a day a boy or girl could read twenty pages thoughtfully—over seven thousand pages or eighteen large volumes in a year. An hour a day might make all the difference between bare existence and useful, happy living. An hour a day might make—nay has made an unknown man a famous one, a useless one a benefactor to his race. Consider, then, the mighty possibilities of two, four, yes six hours a day that are, on the average, thrown away by some of our young men and women in their desire for fun and diversion.

Found a Way Out.

One of the oldest blacksmiths of Garrett county tells the story of how a duck one day wandered into a blacksmith shop. A red hot chip of iron had fallen upon the ground of the shop just before the duck entered. Somehow, the duck picked up the chip and swallow it. In a second, the iron fell upon the floor, having burned its way out through the duck. It immediately picked it up again and then fell over dead.

A LITTLE WAIF DRIFTS TO TOWN OF OAKLAND

Anna R. Maust Tells a Pitiful Story Before 'Squire A. S. Teats.

MISTREATED. SHE COMES HERE

Anna Was Given a Hearing Tuesday —Directed to Consult the Doctor —Even Though But Fourteen, She Was Left to Shift For Herself.

"On the testimony of Anna R. Maust Mary A. Rhoages, and Florence Rhoages who on their oath testify that Anna R. Maust was 14 years old on August 7, 1907; that her mother is dead, that her father Charles Maust is a drinking man, and does very little for her support, makes her walk for miles in the country to saw mill camps and the like and as a result she has no one to look after her temporal, spiritual and educational needs, except the mercy and charity of strangers."

The above is the copy of a paper on file in the office of Squire Teats, in Oakland. Little Anna wandered into Oakland, on July 7th, without a penny or a friend, and made her way to Rhoages restaurant on Railroad street where she was taken in and has since made her home. She was taken before 'Squire Teats Tuesday, and there in the presence of a large number of people, she told the story of a life that has been made miserable through faults and wrongs of others. Many of the hearts of the listeners melted as the little one told of her suffering and of her utter helplessness. The 'Squire issued the necessary papers upon the proper parties and will make efforts to get a home for the little one as well as to bring the guilty ones to justice.

The child is too sick in both heart and body to work, and so she was directed to consult Health Officer, Dr. J. E. Legge, and from him secure medicine and advice to restore her frail body to its former health and vigor.

Little Anna drifted into Oakland from Hutton, where she said she was left. She told of the cruel treatment she had received there from a relative and how she made up her mind to go somewhere anywhere, out in the big, wide, cruel world.

I. O. O. F. Notice.

The members of Oak Lodge No. 8, I. O. O. F. are requested to be present at their hall Thursday evening, August 22, at eight o'clock. The grand officers will be present and an interesting program will be rendered. All Odd Fellows are cordially invited.

Local Delegates to Conference.

At a congregational meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Oakland held Tuesday evening for the purpose of electing delegates to the Lay Electorial Conference to be held in Huntington, W. Va., October the 11th Mr. E. H. Sincell was elected delegate and Mr. A. D. Naylor reserve delegate.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The rainy weather has given place to sunshine and the Chautauqua management hopes for increased gate receipts.

Athletics has come to the fore and base ball and bowling have taken full possession of most of our goung folks and even extends to many of our older ladies and gentlemen.

We had quite an exciting half hour Wednesday morning occasioned by a fire in Virginia Homes, a boarding house of Mr. P. T. Garthright and managed by Mrs. S. A. Laughlin. The fire was subdued before much damage was done but for a time there was a lively movement of trunks, suitcases, etc. The damage will not in the least interfere with the business of this popular house.

Mr. E. E. Friend has been elected delegate and Capt. J. A. Hayden alternate to represent the Mountain Lake Park and Deer Park charge in the M. E. lay conference, which meets in Huntingdon, W. Va., October 3rd.

Our people were pained to learn of the death of Jacob H. Gauer. He was born and spent most of his life in this immediate neighborhood and conducted business on the grounds for same years. At his funeral the music was rendered by a quartet under the direction of Prof. Groves.

Mrs. J. A. Hayden was stung by an insect about a week ago which resulted in blood poison. She suffered intensely until her arm was lanced Tuesday by Dr. H. W. McComas. She is now in less pain and her speedy recovery is hoped for.

BITTINGER.

Shun the girl that's always gadding,
With her peek-a-boos and padding
She's a fake;
She has scores of frills and flounces,
But of brain scant two ounces,
You can stake.

Wagener Bro's., of Salisburg Pa., are repainting the Luthern church at this place.

William Ralston, of Frotburg, spent Saturday night and part of Sunday with his mother at this place.

Mahlen Brenneman and Miss Glotfelty, of McHenry, were entertained at the home of Samuel J. Brenneman Sunday afternoon.

G. W. Engle and Jonas Bittinger went up to Oakland Monday to represent this district in the county convention.

Dennis Ringer and family, of Grassy Run, Pa., were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Jonas Bittering Sunday.

Two pleasure parties passed through this village last week in automobles.

We learn that our neighbor, Samuel J. Brenneman will make sale of his personal property on the last Friday in August, and for the present will make his home with his daughter, Mrs. A. J. Oester.

Miss. Fannie Wiley, of Waterloo, Iowa, is visiting her home folks here.

The Lutheran people will hold an all day picnic in Ellithorp's grove in this village on Saturday., August, 24th. Music and addresses by very prominent people and a full spread of all sorts of refreshments will make the day a pleasant occassion to which the public will be heartily welcomed.

SHERIFF'S SALE OF VALUABLE Coal Interests.

I, Albert L. Lee, Sheriff of Garrett county, hereby give notice, that under and by virtue of five writs of fieri facias, issued out of the Circuit Court for Garrett county, and to me directed, said writs being numbered 14, 17, 18, 19 and 20 Judicials, to September Term, 1907, at the suit of John Felty against Joel Bender, I have seized and taken in execution all the right, title and interest, at law and in equity, of the said Joel Bender, in and to the coal under those two tracts of land situate, lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, the first of which was conveyed by Elias Gnagey to Joel Bender, by deed dated July 15th, 1885, and recorded in Liber W. H. T., No. 10, folio 614, etc., one of the Land Records of Garrett county. The other tract is known and described as military Lot No. 946, and was conveyed to the said Joel Bender by Camille E. Stephens, by deed dated August 25th, A. D. 1891, and recorded in Liber E. Z. T., No. 19, folio 125, etc., one of the Land Records of Garrett county.

I hereby give notice, that on the

5th day of September, A. D. 1907,

at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon, at the front door of the Court House, in the town of Oakland, Maryland, I will offer for sale to the highest bidder, for cash, the said coal to satisfy said executions.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure. Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child. If there is feverishness, night or day, Heath probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Order of Publication.

No. 1479 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland.

Emma Fike vs. Ezra B. Fike.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree divorcing the plaintiff from the defendant a vinculo matrimonii.

The Bill states that the plaintiff was married to the defendant on the 8th day of November, 1898; that no children were born to them as the result of said marriage; that during all of the time that the plaintiff lived with the defendant, the defendant treated her with great cruelty, harshness and brutality, and that about two years ago he deserted her and has provided nothing for her support or malntenance since said time.

The Bill further charges that after the defendant deserted the plaintiff, that he consorted, cohabited and lived with one Mira Lowery, that the said defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, for an order of publication and for general relief

It is thereupon, this 17th day of July, 1907, ordered by the Circuit Court of Garrett county, in Equity, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 16th day of August, 1907, give notice to the said defendant of the object and substance of this Bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 2nd day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to pass as prayed.

ON Elizabeth street girls can run a peanut roaster, sell tape and needles and such things from a basket or a bundle upon their shoulders, cry flowers, canvass for anything, and even sell oranges and nuts from a basket, but when they step behind a push cart the complaisance of the street vanishes.

It is not that the girls are desired to abstain from work, for a father will sit in his doorway and smoke while his daughter trudges past him bent nearly double under the burden of merchandise strapped to her shoulders, and a husband will be equally moderate toward his wife. No; Elizabeth street is indulgent toward its women folk as regards work, and it is an accepted condition for a man to lead his monkey and leave his wife to drag the heavy wheel organ and to show the way with empty hands during their frequent tenement flittings, while the wife and children follow with furniture.

So that morning, when a slip of a girl came from an alley pushing a cart before her that was well stocked with fruit and looked timidly along the curbs for a good place to stop, the other push cart venders scowled and nodded meaningly among themselves. It was not the competition, for she was only one and of the backward kind that did not grasp much trade, but it was an infringement on custom, so they moved their carts a little faster or a little slower, according to her progress, keeping between her and the curbs and the crossings and other desirable places, until at last she stopped, confused, at a point where it would be impossible to obtain customers.

Few of them had seen the girl before, but they recognized the cart. It had been among them several weeks, pushed by a frail little man with white hair. Perhaps he had sold out to this girl, or perhaps she was his daughter and was trying the cart for a few days to see if she would like the business. Well, the first day would tell. If that discouraged her, she would leave. A girl should be in the sweatshops sewing or selling tapes and needles. Push carts were for the men. So whenever any one looked toward them as though with an idea of buying their gesticulations and clamor precluded any possibility of the customer noticing the wistful, anxious face in the background.

But instead of being discouraged, although the day had not brought her a single sale, the girl was there again the next morning, so early that when the first competitor arrived he found her cart in the best place on the corner, with her standing beside it, weary but hopeful.

They crowded as near as they could and by their clamor tried to divert trade, but with only indifferent success. This day she sold enough to make her eyes bright and to drive away some of the despair which had been stealing into them.

The next morning they came earlier, but she was already there on the corner, as before, with dark circles under her eyes, but hopeful. Evidently she had come almost before it grew light.

Again they tried to divert her sales with their clamor, but ineffectually. Her position was too good and her fruit too clean and nicely arranged and the very appeal of her silence too irresistible. But before night when not making sales she spent most of her time leaning against the cart for support.

The fourth day this exhaustion became more apparent, so that even the most callous of the push cart men noticed it. The animosity in the eyes of some of them softened a little, but it was a precedent at stake, so even these vied with the most brutal in their efforts to drive the girl away. And as the hours wore on it became evident that the desire would be accomplished. The girl was very near the point of breaking down.

Just opposite the corner was the shop of a candy maker, much of whose time was spent in the back part of his store working great masses of candy dough, at first with his hands, then by throwing the mass over a strong iron hook in the ceiling and drawing it out into diminishing yellow white strings. When it was of the proper consistency he placed it upon a long marble slab, where he drew it out and rolled it into sticks, which were cut or broken into right lengths by the slight touch of shear points. Sometimes he would add tiny balls of colored candy dough to the mass, and when drawn out these would make the stripes in stick candy and candy balls and shaped objects.

All this was plainly visible through the windows of the shop, and from her position at the cart the girl watched the candy maker much of the time when not engaged with customers, at first idly and then with increasing interest. Apparently the operation was a novelty to her. And on his part, after the first day, the old candy maker got in the habit of smiling and nodding an acknowledgment of her interest.

He was a good customer for fruit, partly to be used in his trade and partly for his own consumption. So on the second day when he picked up a basket and came out on the sidewalk bareheaded and in his shirt sleeves several of the push cart men stepped forward with eager anticipation. But he waved them back brusquely. He had seen a good deal through the window in spite of his seeming absorption in his work.

"No, no," he said irascibly, "your hands are not clean enough to handle fruit. I will buy from the girl."

The third day he began to watch the girl anxiously. He, too, had noticed her exhaustion. During the day he was out twice and bought fruit from her.

The fourth morning a long line of girls went into the shop one after another, remaining a few moments and then came out. For the most part they were ill clad, unattractive girls, and not one of them bought anything. It was evident they were seeking work, and just as evident, after the first twenty or more had gone in and come out, that the candy maker was becoming irritated. Toward the end he only gave an applicant a single glance, and more than once his "No!" was plainly heard by the girl at her push cart on the corner.

At length late in the afternoon he came out bareheaded and in his shirt sleeves, as usual, but without his basket. He went straight to the girl.

"Are you going to run this push cart all the time?" he asked.

The girl looked surprised.

"I don't know," she answered doubtfully.

"Because if you're not," he went on, "I want to hire you to work in my shop. You saw all those girls straggling in with soiled dresses and untidy hair and sour faces and pert manners. Bah! They'd make pretty shopgirls, wouldn't they? I want a lady, a nice looking, neat, capable girl who can look pleasant and at the same time be ladylike. They all came in answer to an advertisement, and not one in the whole lot suited me."

The girl swayed slightly, but steadied herself quickly by leaning against the cart, holding to it by both hands.

"Perhaps I wouldn't suit either," she hazarded, forcing a smile to her face.

"Yes, you would," he answered. But his tone was not quite so positive. "I've been watching you through the window for three days. You're neat and particular about yourself. That shows. And you're neat about other things from the way you look after your cart and fruit. And you're attractive to customers and make yourself look pleasant even when you feel the other way. That's what you're doing now. You're not sickly, are you?" his new found anxiety at last finding expression in words.

"No; I've always been very strong and healthy," she answered. "Only just now I am a little weak."

"I thought you must be strong," with some relief in his voice, "from the way you handled the cart the first day you came. I was watching. But yesterday and today you've seemed a little sickly. My work will be lots easier than having a cart like this and nicer and I think will pay you better. But of course I'll need a girl who's spry and can keep up. She'll have to help me make chocolates and fancy candies and put them in boxes and look after customers. I'm too busy to wash my hands every time a customer comes in, and it hurts trade. I could do twice the business if I had good help. I'm turning away trade every day." He waited a moment, as though debating something, then added cordially: "Anyway, I'm willing to try you a few weeks even if you should be sickly. You're just the appearing girl I want, and I know you're spunky."

"Well, I don't know yet," the girl began tremulously. Then her face suddenly changed. She was looking beyond him. "Father!" she cried reproachfully.

A frail little man with white hair was approaching them, walking slowly with the aid of a cane. He looked anxious.

"Giuseppina," he cried, "I could not wait any longer! I have been worrying all day, and at last I had to get up and dress and come and see. You looked so bad last night, and you did not want me to notice. I pretended to be asleep, but I watched, and I watched the night before. The two first days I was too sick to think, but since then you have not eaten a thing. You spent your money for wines and medicines for me, and"—

The girl had been trying to interrupt him with warning glances, with expressive motions of her hands. Now she cried "Father!" again with such shamed distress in her voice that for the first time the old man noticed and understood. He drew himself up with sudden unconscious dignity.

"It was only that my daughter insists on buying me costly wines and medicines like the very rich people have," he said, addressing the candy maker and the two or three push car owners within hearing. "We are in very comfortable circumstances, indeed, and have everything necessary. But such things cost a fortune, and when I am ill Giuseppina gets headstrong and does not know where to stop, and then she thinks she must be economical. She is a very good girl, though, a very good girl, and I assure you we are in perfectly independent circumstances."

The candy maker's eyes were twinkling, but with a mistiness behind them.

"The very use of the costly wines prove that, sir," he said courteously. "I do not have them even when I am ill. But, if you'll excuse me, you interrupted a conversation between your daughter and myself. I was trying to induce her to help me in my business. But suppose we go into the shop. We can talk better there."

Without waiting for their consent he crossed the sidewalk to his store, and after a little hesitation they followed. At the door he turned.

"Say, you cutthroat men," he called warningly to the push cart owners, "don't you touch a thing in this young lady's cart! If you do I'll—I'll run you in."

"You 'sposa we thiefs!" called back one of the men indignantly. "We not want to harm the signorina, only she no right with push cart. And we never s'posa she be hungry."

"IT IS THE SIGNORINA'S," HE SAID.

As the three disappeared in the shop this man turned to his companions with a few eager words and gesticulations, and they repeated the words and gesticulations to other cart owners farther along who had not heard the conversation. In a few minutes a dozen men had left their own carts and were crowding about that of the girl.

Once inside, the candy maker motioned the old man to a chair, but wisely ignored the girl's weariness.

"Do you know how to make coffee, Giuseppina?" he asked briskly.

"Yes, sir," she answered wonderingly.

"Well, it's just this way," he went on. "I hate cooking and don't know anything about it, and yet I do my own housekeeping. I've got a nice little kitchen behind the shop and three or four rooms beyond, and supper's all ready except just the finishing. Suppose you make the coffee while I finish rolling this candy dough. Then we'll do the talking while we eat supper. Ah, well, it doesn't matter," as the girl colored and looked at him suspiciously. "I can do it after I finish this. Only I thought you wouldn't mind. You could do in five minutes what my clumsy fingers would take half an hour, and it would be a rare treat to have friends sit at table with me. I get very lonesome sometimes. That's right," as the girl started suddenly toward the kitchen. "You'll find everything nearly ready, with most of the victuals on the table. I leave them that way to save time. Your father and I will talk till I finish this. Then I'll wash the candy off my hands and we'll eat."

It was a much longer meal than usual with the candy maker, and he forced himself to eat twice his usual allowance in order to keep his guests at the table. When at last they rose he was smiling genially.

"So that's all settled," he exclaimed with much evident satisfaction, addressing the old man. "Giuseppina will start in as shopkeeper in the morning, and you will help me with the mixing and cutting. You can make all the lozenges. And, as I said, it will be better for you to move right in here with me. There is plenty of room and it will give me Giuseppina within call all the time. Often I have to keep open as late as 10 o'clock. Hello, who's that?" at a heavy tramping into the shop.

It was the push cart men in a body, with one of them extending a handful of coins. "It is the signorina's," he said as he advanced and jingled the coins into the girl's hand. "We have solda out all the fruit. We hard man mebba, but all hard man have good spot some time, somewhere."

As they tramped out again noisily the girl's lips quivered in an ill repressed sob.

"The world is so good, so good," she murmured.

An Apprehension.

"Charley," said young Mrs. Torkins, "aren't favorite sons remarkably numerous in politics just now?"

"Yes. What of it?"

"Nothing. Only I do hope it won't wind up in a family quarrel."—Washington Star.

The Big Chief's Resolution.

By ALEXANDER BUNN.

Copyright, 1907, by Mary McKeon.

The big chief cut the porterhouse steak with an air of pleasant anticipation. It was broiled just right, and the onions were not the least bit greasy. There flitted through his mind a hazy realization of the fact that even a man with a terrible cold in his head might be able to get some joy out of life while porterhouse steaks and fried onions existed.

"Put that screen between me and the door, Jack," he said to the waiter who was showing off all his curves to earn the tip that so well groomed a man generally proved good for. "I have an abominable cold and feel chilly every time the air strikes me."

The negro's mind was stimulated by the friendliness of the tone, and he quickly multiplied his first vision of a tip by two. He surrounded the big chief by so large a Japanese screen that the latter had a private dining room to himself, and the other people in the room soon forgot he was there.

A few minutes later a man and a girl stood in the door of the cafe and scanned the room eagerly for a vacant table.

There was only one, a small table wedged up close to a Japanese screen. They sat down, the girl talking rapidly while she removed her gloves and veil.

"It's nice to be up here in a corner, Karl," she said joyously; "it's so cozy, and we have it all to ourselves."

She sighed with pleasure when the bill of fare was finally laid aside and the waiter departed with his order.

"It's shockingly extravagant for us to come here to dine, but as tomorrow is New Year's day you will of course have to make good resolutions about economizing, so we will enjoy a little fling tonight."

"I SHOULD FOLLOW THE DOCTRINE OF THE EGOTIST."

The man raised his glass of water and touched hers.

"Here's to the hope that we will be dining in our own home next New Year's eve," he said.

"Here's to all the good things possible," she said, her young eyes sparkling with enthusiasm, "and here's to the big chief. He spoke to me in the hall today and was really quite nice and almost like a human being. One forgets sometimes that he can possibly have a bit of humanity about him. He is as hard as nails, and his opinions are absolute. He doesn't know it, but he passes sentence always before he hears our side of the case."

The man on the other side of the screen, almost choking with indignant surprise and the piece of steak he had just put into his mouth, sat suddenly alert.

"Some one else in the office been getting into trouble?" Karl hazarded.

"Nothing decided. It's the same girl telling tales that causes it all. She will come across the simplest kind of error some other clerk has made, and she never rests until she has managed to call the big chief's attention to it in some way."

"Wants to shine by comparison, does she? Well, the life of a government clerk has got to be something strenuous lately."

The girl threw up her head audaciously.

"I wish I could be the big chief one day," she said, bringing her teeth together with a determined little click. "I don't know how your chief is, but the trouble with ours and with all the rest of them, I suppose, is that they have never been a clerk, and they can't see from the clerk's standpoint."

Karl helped her to the piece of broiled chicken he knew she liked best and laughed indulgently.

"What would be your first step if you were given full power of management for one day?"

She put two lumps of sugar in his coffee and pondered seriously a moment as to whether she should have one or two lumps in her own.

"You know there is a $1,400 vacancy just now?" she asked meditatively; "poor old Mr. Timberlake died last week. I know his desk perfectly. I did his work all the time he was sick; well—I'm afraid I should follow the doctrine of the egoist and give yours truly, Margaret Clayton, $1,200 clerk, a jump to $1,400. Of course, it's an impossibility, for I have not been in office very long," she sighed, "but it's lovely to dream about. I could marry you by next New Year's day then, Karl," she finished with a delightful little blush.

He leaned toward her persuasively.

"Can't you make up your mind to let me pay that debt for you after we are married, Marjorie?" he urged.

"No—I can't," she shook her head decidedly; "you don't make any too much yourself, and I never could feel right if I hampered you with paying my college bills. I would have had them paid before now if the little mother had not been sick so long—and my salary wouldn't cover everything."

She stopped suddenly and shook off the seriousness of the conversation.

"Do you know what I would do next by way of managing the big chief's office for him?" she quizzed gayly. "I would have a big locked box put in an inconspicuous place in the hall marked 'Suggestions and Complaints.' I would give every clerk the privilege of dropping an unsigned suggestion, typewritten if they chose, into that box to bring to my attention things that they would like me to know."

The big chief on the other side of the screen allowed his mouth to drop wide open for an instant.

Karl, on his side, chuckled.

"Little lady, I can see that the chief would need more private secretaries and first, second and third assistants than any man in the service of Uncle Sam ever had before."

She stuck to her idea stoutly.

"The government clerks are getting so they are afraid to express an opinion," she argued. "They are intelligent, educated men and women. Some of them must have ideas that are worth taking into consideration. My 'suggestion box' should certainly be installed the very first day I held the position."

When they went out, the big chief sat for a long time with his elbows resting on the table, thinking.

"She's a clever little girl," he murmured finally. "So I showed a touch of humanity, did I? Seemed almost like a human being to her. I'll start in after the holidays and see how things work if I treat them as man to man! Almost—like—a human being! Humph!"

On the 2d of January the clerks in a certain large government building in Washington congregated in groups during the luncheon hour.

"I wonder how he ever came to think of such a thing," commented one of the older clerks. "It is so unlike him to listen to a suggestion. But he will certainly get an insight into conditions that he never could have got in any other way."

"Did you know that pretty little Miss Clayton was promoted to $1,400?" asked the other. "I never in my life saw any one so excited as she has been today. When the circular was passed around telling us there was to be a suggestion box, she giggled over it until she was almost hysterical. When she found she had been promoted, she couldn't sit still another minute, but asked to be excused for the afternoon."

Two radiant young people walked down F street, looking as if life were more than satisfactory.

"Karl, dearest," she said, clutching his arm with the nearest approach to a hug the publicity would allow, "I wonder how such a miracle happened!"

The Age of Deer.

Romance has played a prominent part with regard to the longevity of deer, says a writer in Chambers' Journal. What says the highland adage:

Thrice the age of a dog is that of a horse.
Thrice the age of a horse is that of a man.
Thrice the age of a man is that of a deer.
Thrice the age of a deer is that of an eagle.
Thrice the age of an eagle is that of an oak tree.

This is to assign the deer a period of more than 200 years, and the estimate is supported by many highly circumstantial stories. Thus Captain Macdonald of Tulloch, who died in 1776, aged eighty-six years, is said to have known the white hind of Loch Treig for fifty years, his father for a like period before him and his grandfather for sixty years before him. So in 1826 Macdonald of Glengarry is reported to have killed a stag which bore a mark on the left ear identical with that made on all the calves he could catch by Ewen-MacIan-Og, who had been dead 150 years. Analogous stories, it may be noted, are told in countries on the continent of Europe where deer are to be found in any number. But, alas, the general opinion among experts would seem to be that thirty years or thereabouts is the limit of a deer's life.

The Tea Bug and Tea Mite.

Every animal and plant has its parasite, and from this general law, it seems, the tea plant is not exempt. Two insects are described as spending their lives in tea drinking. They are the plague of the Assam tea gardens and are known as the "tea bug" and "tea mite." The mites spend their entire lives on the tea plant and are never known to attack any other leaf. They live in families and societies on the upper side of the full grown leaf and spin a delicate web for a shelter. They then puncture the leaves and pump out the liquid in the plant veins. They seem to become dainty in their tastes, for a sprinkling of muddy water over their floor and tea table is the only remedy known to check their ravages. Even this is not always effectual. The tea bug is still more destructive and is evidently possessed of an appreciation of the best kinds of tea, since it always attacks those of a mild and delicate flavor.

The Truth.

Truth is quite beyond the reach of satire. There is so brave a simplicity in her that she can no more be made ridiculous than an oak or a pine.—James Russell Lowell.

A Message.

From afar, over hills and by quaint rural ways,
Wafts a message to me of the memory days,
Comes the scent of the rose and the rustle of grass
That grows like a ribbon and nods as you pass.

Comes the incense of phlox and the peony sweet,
Comes the breath of the pink on its courier fleet—
And the breeze that they ride sings a melody low
Of a memory spot, of a garden I know!

Ah! the old tansy bed! How it brings to my mind
All the days of my youth, free from worry and grind!
Yes, the old-fashioned flowers speak of days that are done,
Of the days when the world was but made to be won!

Sniff the whorled purple-flag and the jessamine scent!
With the breath of the zephyr their fragrance is blent—
And the odor of poppies, aroma of peas
And the heliotrope! Ah, these old ecstacies!

From the garden I know, with its circles and squares,
Steals the fragrance of Home, wafting in unawares;
Comes the thought of the one who was queen of the plot
Where the lilies and rosemary bordered the spot!

Now, she stands in the door with the woodbine above
And she smiles at me here with the old mother love—
Yes, she smiles and I know that from somewhere on-high
She is sending a message of love from the sky.

She is sending a message of memory days
From afar, over hills and by quaint rural ways,
For she knows that the need of a heart, sore with care,
Is the scent of the old-fashioned flowers "back there!"

Thrills.

Gee, but they do build houses fast in Chicago. In the morning, when you go to work they are just breaking the ground. When you return at night the agent is firing household good onto the sidewalk because the owners haven't paid their rent.

If you can't take a month off this summer, tear one off the calendar and be as happy as you can under the circumstances.

The best way to catch a woman is to stand still and grab her when she comes around.

A horse ran away with a pretty Wisconsin girl. A stalwart young citizen fellow who was spending his vacation in that part of the woods, caught the horse and saved the young woman's life. In her confusion she began apologizing for the horse's action, whereat he advised her that he didn't blame the horse for running away with her—he would have done the same thing himself. I guess "he's on," too, judging by the regularity with which he goes Wisconsinward every Saturday night.

No, dear, Joan of Arc was not Noah's wife. She was only a distant relative on the side of the Ark.

Some men know a blamed sight more about the rules of baseball than the rules of business and the Bible.

The man who is on the level finds smooth walking through this vale of tears.

When you give your wife enough money to last her two months at the sea shore and tell her to come home when that is gone, you may expect her back in about five weeks.

When a man marries for revenge the other male person to the arrangement is quite liable to get the revenge.

Even an Iowa man will occasionally break a cork with his corkscrew. And it always happens when the sun is at the zenith.

Too Much War Is Taught In Schools.

By NATHAN C. SCHAEFFER, Superintendent of Public Instruction of Pennsylvania.

IT SEEMS TO ME THAT OUR TEXT BOOKS, OUR EXAMINATIONS AND OUR INSTRUCTION SHOULD GLORIFY THE ARTS OF PEACE ABOVE THE ART OF WAR.

While it would be wrong to rob the soldier of a just share of glory, while it would be a mistake to minimize the sacrifice and services of the army and the navy, it will nevertheless be wise to emphasize THE VICTORIES OF PEACE above the victories of war and to teach history in such a way that the pupil will write the name of the poet, the orator, the artist, the inventor, the educator, the jurist, the statesman, the philantropist, in a place as conspicuous in THE TEMPLE OF FAME as that occupied by the name of the victorious general or the successful admiral.

In the first place, let us instill PROPER IDEALS of life and of heroism. The pupil can be led to see that Pasteur, the scientist, has done more for humanity than Napoleon, the destroyer of thousands; that Carnegie, the philanthropist, has done more for civilization than the admiral who sinks a hostile fleet; that the men who, by experiments upon their own bodies, showed how yellow fever is transmitted and can be prevented were as great heroes as any soldiers that ever faced a cannon's mouth; that the woman who serves in the hospital as a nurse displays as much heroism as the officer who serves his country in time of war, and that in the sight of God the drying of a tear is more than shedding seas of gore.

Why Reform Movements Fail.

By IRA REMSEN, President of Johns Hopkins University.

OTHER THINGS BEING EQUAL, ONE WHO UNDERSTANDS MANKIND BEST WILL BE THE MOST LIKELY TO SUCCEED AS A REFORMER.

One reason why so many reform movements fail so ignominiously is that they are not undertaken in a scientific spirit. FACTS THAT ARE WELL ESTABLISHED ARE IGNORED. The laws of human nature are lost sight of, and in a most unscientific spirit plans are laid that must come to naught.

Knowledge does not take away sympathy and the feeling of brotherhood, but it helps to prevent the sacrifice of those who are the victims of PLANS BASED UPON IGNORANCE.

I have had a dream. I dreamed of the time when by continued scientific investigation man will more clearly recognize the truth, whatever it may be, when he will more clearly see the relation of things, when he will have learned how to conduct himself under a given set of conditions so that the happiness of his fellow men may be increased by his action, when HE WILL INSTINCTIVELY OBEY SANITARY AND MORAL LAWS, when he will recognize the essential truths underlying religions and will be guided by them.

Problems of the Republic

By Governor JOHN A. JOHNSON of Minnesota.

NEVER was the battlefield of government for the people more deeply IN NEED OF LOYAL SOLDIERS than today, and never brighter were the opportunities for glorious achievement.

Do you ask for a catalogue of patriotic opportunities? Do you ask to have the problems of the republic, THE ENEMIES OF THE PEOPLE, labeled and marshaled for your inspection? You will find them on every hand among THE HOSTS OF SPECIAL PRIVILEGE, wherever a public law, a public right, a public trust, the public treasury, the public property, powers and privileges are devoted to a private end, or whenever the public interest is subordinated to that of a class.

YOU WILL FIND THEM IN THE GREAT QUESTION OF TRUST DOMINATION, GIANT BORN AND FLOURISHING UNDER A CONFLICT OF LAW WHICH AT ONE AND THE SAME TIME PROHIBITS ITS EXISTENCE AND YET PROTECTS AND FOSTERS ITS DEVELOPMENT.

Or in the great problem of transportation with railroad corporations enthroned upon EIGHTEEN BILLIONS OF DOLLARS OF CAPITAL SECURITIES, endowed by the government with the SOVEREIGN POWER of eminent domain, collecting tolls now aggregating two billions of dollars per annum or over THREE TIMES THE AGGREGATE REVENUES OF THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT and the nation only feebly and imperfectly able to control its means of transportation.

Or again in the problem of THE STATUS AND CONDITION OF THE COLORED MAN, still, after nearly a century of argument and conflict, one of the most profound and vexatious problems since the days when the children of Israel contended with Pharaoh. Its solution is being deferred because the master mind has not worked out the science of its law of gravitation, and America still awaits him.

Demanding the best and most careful national thought is the question of OUR COLONIAL POSSESSIONS. This nation was born under the doctrine of the inalienable right of self government, a protest against the theory of foreign possession and colonial rule, while today we are a mother country, denying to our colonial SUBJECTS even the rights and privileges guaranteed in our constitution, from which our government derives its powers, and denying that this constitution controls our scepter or follows our flag.

Recently there has been promulgated the doctrine of GREATER CENTRALIZATION OF POWER in the federal government for the curbing of some of the evils which threaten the public interest.

TO SO HARMONIZE NATIONAL LEGISLATION AND STATE LEGISLATION THAT THE FORMER SHALL INCLUDE EVERYTHING STRICTLY NATIONAL AND INTERSTATE AND THE LATTER COVER ALL CONDITIONS WHICH BEGIN AND END WITHIN THE STATE IS ONE OF THE NICEST PROBLEMS OF THE FUTURE AMERICAN STATESMAN.

THE BUSINESS SIDE OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. Percy Procter Sets Forth Industrial Side of Western Coast.

INTERESTING FIGURES GIVEN

Irrigation is the Salvation of Western Lands—Orange Groves Sell for $750 Per Acre—Idea of Senator Brown Found There.

Del Monte, Cal., August 1, 1907.
To the Editor of The Republican:

Between November 1, 1906 and August 1, 1907, a period of ten months, there were shipped from Southern California about 28,000 car loads of oranges, lemons and grape-fruit. This means, in round numbers, ten million boxes, which were sold in the East for about $20,000,000, of which amount packing houses, railroads and dealers got $20,000,000 and growers $10,000,000. The freight rate on fruit from Los Angeles to New York, about 3,300 miles, is $1.15 per hundred pounds, but a portion of the car is filled with ice, at the expense of the shipper. This icing of cars is done so systematically and well that there need not be a change of more than two degrees of temperature in ten days. From the whole State of California, though mostly from the lower half, during the same ten months, there were shipped East 7,000 car loads of other fruits than oranges and lemons, 3,000 car loads of vegetables. Owing to the increased acreage and promise of abundant crop, it is expected that 35,000 car loads of oranges and lemons will be shipped East next season, beginning with November.

There is something doing on orange and lemon trees all the year 'round. While ripe fruit is being gathered, the blossoms of another crop whiten the trees, and before the last orange or lemon is picked off, the small beginnings of the next crop are so well defined that the grower can tell whether on not to expect a large or small one. The indications now are for a large crop. Trees usually are planted twenty feet apart, or one hundred to the acre. They are trimmed so that the limbs will extend out and down, rather than up in the air, in order to get more sun and to have the topmost branches in reach of a man standing on a step ladder. The lowest branches touch the ground almost and the general effect of an up-to-date orange or lemon tree is that of a bush about twelve feet high by ten feet in diameter. Old-fashioned fruit trees in California are like old fruit trees, in Maryland—thick trunks and branches, with plenty of the latter and room for a man to walk under them. Fruit, not wood, is what the modern orchardist is after.

The average rain fall of Southern California, where oranges and lemons grow best, is less than one-half—nearer one-third—of what it is in Maryland, and it all comes in six months of the years, November to May, as a rule. Water, during the other six months of the year, May to November, is supplied by irrigation. The mountains of Southern California are very high—some as high as 7,000 and 8,000 feet—even up to sharp peaks, and, having been burnt over often, are practically treeless. The ranges are full of gorges and valleys, known as canyons. The winter rains rush down these steep mountain sides, through the canyons and into the valleys losing themselves in rivers or "washes." The latter is the more appropriate name, as the banks are not well defined, the runs in different streams, varying in depth and the channels changes constantly. Across some of the gorges or canyons, dams have been built and the water from rains and melting snow is stored for daily use in nearby towns and for irrigation purposes during the dry season. Thus water is owned either by companies who sell it to individuals or by proprietor of lands who have joined together to build a dam to secure water for their own premises. Most land under cultivations in Southern California has what are known as "water rights," and these pass, with the acreage, from seller to buyer. Without water for irrigation purposes, land is practically valueless, and many people in the East have been badly swindled by sellers of so-called orange groves, truck farms and dairy ranches, whose only crops are cacti and sage brush, because no water rights went with the land.

The most common irrigation ditch is about ten inches wide and six inches high, inside measurement, and is made of stones or rocks, the inside being finished with smooth cement. Cheaper ditches are made by nailing together two six-inch boards in the form of the letter V, and joining them end to end.

The most expensive ditches are made of cement entirely or glazed pipe. These ditches are run at right angles to the slope of the land to be irrigated so that the water, which is let out from the sides of the ditches, can run down hill. About two feet apart, on the sides toward the down slope of the lands, are one-inch holes, which can be closed by little sliding tin covers working in grooves. There is a ditch like these every fifteen rows of orange or lemon trees, varying in length from a hundred feet to half a mile, and about three hundred feet apart. These ditches cost money, and are one reason why the average price of orange groves is $750 per acre. When groves are to be irrigated, five furrows between each two rows of trees are run be an implement like a harrow with scoop or trowel teeth, the furrows being three inches wide by four inches deep, and extending from one ditch to the next. Water is let into the ditches until they are nearly full and then the tin slides over the side holes are raised, allowing the water to run into the furrow, care being taken to have the flow as even as possible. The water is allowed to run for forty-eight hours about every thirty days in dry season and less frequently in the rainy season, the amount of water used depending upon the experience and judgment of the grower, who irrigates when he thinks his trees need moisture. If he owns water rights in common with others or if he buys water from a company, he cannot irrigate when he pleases, but must arrange a date, as water, of course, can be diverted into one particular channel only when all other channels are closed. As the Garrett county farmer arranges for the visit of the threshing machine, so the Southern California farmer gives notice when to send him water. The supply seems to be inexhaustible, as there are numberless gorges not yet dammed and rivers of water run to the ocean. The supply also is fairly regular, as following the winter rains comes the melting snow. On the mountains above the reservior which holds Redlands' supply of water the snow was sixteen feet on the level last winter. Down in the valleys, in sight of snow, orange trees were in fruit, flowers were blooming, and the thermometer was up to 80 degrees.

Orange and lemon trees require a great deal of care. They are trimmed once, and sprayed several times a year. Insects and other pests seem to have a great liking for these trees. The soil is turned in at least once a year, expensively fertilized with commercial manures, and in some seasons irrigation furrows are made and water turned on every day. As is the case now, if more fruit seems to be forming than the limbs will bear or the trees properly nourish, the surplus is picked off. Some varieties in some sections of Southern California are ready for market in November and others upon the ensuing months up to July, so that orchardists are busy pretty much of the whole year. When ready for market, the ripe fruit on each tree is picked and sent in boxes holding about a bushel each to the nearest packing house. Here they are weighed and the grower is credited with the weight. Then they are washed, sorted as to size and variety, wrapped in soft paper, and packed in boxes for shipment, a credit memorandum being sent to the grower. When the oranges are sold, the money is given him, less the commission of the packing house people for services. These packing houses are maintained by either a number of growers jointly or by companies and they do the work better and cheaper than it could be done by each grower separately.

Orange growing is an attractive occupation. The groves, as a rule are small, being five, ten, twenty, fifty acres—rarely one hundred acres, though there is one adjoining Redlands containing seven hundred acres. As the places are small, the homes are not far apart and neighbors are near. Electric lights and telephones are the rule instead of the exception, and trolley cars lines gridiron the orange growing district. California houses generally are one story in height, five to ten rooms on the single floor, and they usually are attractive in appearance. The out buildings are few and small, as feed and stock require little room. The trees have leaves on them all the year 'round, and with the leaves either buds, blossoms and fruit, so that they always present a clean and attractive appearance, making an orange ranch seem like a business man's home in the prosperous suburb of a large city, especially when flowers border the roads and paths. The fruit on each tree does not all ripen at once, but a few oranges can be picked daily after they begin to ripen, and if a grower has certain varieties on his ranch he can begin picking in November and keep it up until July. On a five acre ranch near Redlands the owner has made a net profit of $500 an acre the last two seasons. He grows Valencias, which matures late and sell for the highest prices. Cultivation, fertilizers, water, labor and other expenses amounted to $125 an acre, so that his oranges brought $650 gross, or $6.25 from each tree, per acre. The last two seasons were unusually good one this is pointed out as a successful man, but some years he has not done so well and many of his neighbors have to be content with $300, $200 or even $100 net profit, per acre. Orchards planted to one or two late varieties of apples in Garrett county, Maryland, if given one-half the care that is taken with cultivation, selection, packing and shipping of oranges in Soutern California, would be just as profitable.

In Redlands is a store-room in a prominent place, in charge of a man and open every day, in which, in windows and on shelves, are shown samples of grains, fruits, nuts and vegetables grown in the vicinity, with the names of the growers on cards. These exhibits are constantly changed or renewed. There are also sample packages of fruits vegetables, olive oil, preserves, etc., in cans or glass, for the grocery trade. This room has come to be a veritable museum, as the town and people send there for exhibit, old pictures, furniture etc., bearing upon the early history of California and Redlands. There are a number of mementoes of the visits of President McKinley and President Roosevelt. This store room is maintained by the Board of Trade. Mr. W. McCulloh Brown had in mind a similar institution for Oakland, though not on quite so pretentious a scale. Redlands finds that it pays to maintain this permanent exhibit of the products of the county.

Make Hague Court Permanent Judicial Peace Tribunal

By DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER,
President of Columbia University.

While we Americans have not always been careful to conserve the sources of our best influence upon our European contemporaries, nevertheless it remains true that American public opinion, because of its detachment from older animosities, struggles, and ambitions, and because of its essentially democratic basis, is harkened to by monarchs, by parliaments, and by unofficial citizens who speak other tongues than ours. American public opinion will gain in influence abroad if its positive which two litigants may choose those to whom they will submit their recommendations in regard to the attainment of international justice are both sagacious and reasonable. We must avoid incumbering our programme with nonessentials and we must not fail to observe a due sense of proportion in what we recommend.

First of all the permanent Hague court should be transformed from a semi-diplomatic into a truly judicial tribunal. We should ask that judges be substituted for arbitrators. We wish to see a permanent international court which, like our United States supreme court, will have a status, a procedure, traditions, and precedents of its own. We wish to see international law declared as well as individual differences composed.

The present Hague court in reality is only an eligible list from which two litigants may choose those to whom the ywill submit their cause. In its stead I should like to see a permanent body of judges chosen for long terms or for life, paid suitable salaries, and as independent of the nations from which they are chosen as members of the United States supreme court are of the president who appoints or the senate which confirms them.

Some concern is expressed as to how the findings of this court would be enforced. Are we not justified in believing that the moral sense of the civilized world would enforce them in 99 cases out of 100? For the extreme hundredth case of disobedience an international police would be needed. That, however, many of us regard as a remote possibility.

The Hague conference should also be made to assemble automatically hereafter at regular intervals, say once in four or five years. So important an assembling of the nations should be independent of the will of any ruler, executive or parliament. The third Pan-American conference made provision for the periodic assembling hereafter of representatives appointed by all the American governments. The Hague conference should take similar action in its sphere.

In The Hague conference lies the germ of the international parliament which will one day come into being.

Lightening Burdens of Labor

By MARY R. CRANSTON,
American Institute of Social Service.

Wage-earners are better off to-day than they have ever been since the world began, for in spite of many evils the factory has brought in its train it is far and away ahead of the old-time system of home work.

It is true that factory workers have suffered in the past, and some do still, for it takes a long time for humankind to see that unselfishness pays and that selfishness never does. The most successful men now realize this truth, and every day new names are added to the long list of those who not only profess but practice social service in business.

Industrial betterment made slow progress, however, until the American Institute of Social Service was organized in New York city in 1898, with a department for the exchange of ideas and experiences between the pioneers and those desiring to make a beginning in factory improvement. By collecting information upon labor conditions all over the world, and thus being in a position to know the comparative value of social undertakings, the institute has done and is doing a useful work by suggesting to manufacturers practical ideas for factory and workshop betterment.

Legal Status of Hypnotism

By DR. JOSEPH LAPPONI,
Late Chief Physician to Pope Leo XIII and Pius X.

It is certain that hypnotism could never be introduced into the courts of law to extort involuntary statements and confessions, for that would be offending individual liberty and will, and would be running the risk of obtaining false confessions.

Neither may it be admitted to discover things occult, or mysterious crimes unknown to the subject, or to obtain lost or stolen objects.

Interest and hallucination might easily enter in, and there would be nothing easier than to frustrate justice.

With regard then to the advisability of admitting hypnotism in courts of law, each case must be judged on its own merits, according to the varying nature of the circumstances.

Turning to spiritism, we find that without any exception it has all the dangers and all the harm of hypnotism, in many cases augmented a thousand times; neither does it offer compensation in the shape of any advantage, unless it be the poor one of indirectly proving the existence of the supernatural, which is apparent in so many other ways.

Venus an Inhabited Planet

By PROF. FOREST RAY MOULTON,
University of Chicago.

Venus may possess a population of human beings and a civilization just as well as the earth. In fact, it is likely that Venus, more than Mars or any other planet besides the earth, has an atmosphere in which human beings may thrive and develop a life.

The atmosphere around Venus, as near as we can tell, is much like that of the earth. It is more similar to that of the earth than probably that of any other planet.

It is impossible for me to say anything about Mars in respect to life on this planet. If there are inhabitants on Mars they probably are more developed, more advanced intellectually and physically, than the people of the earth are.

REWARD.

THE NEW SCHEME OF FISH HATCHERIES

One In Garrett County Visited And Pronounced a Grand Success.

R. T. BROWNING GAVE A DINNER

State Fish Commissioner Brook Accompanied the Party and Gave Excellent New ideas—Plan Now is to Keep Fish Until They Are Large.

By kind invitation of R. T. Browning, fish commissioner, we spent a day with several gentlemen who had met to accompany Mr. Brooke, state fish commissioner, in an inspection of the fish nurseries established at Lake Brown.

The day was an ideal one and the drive from Oakland to Lake Brown over a good road gave an opportunity to enjoy the beautiful scenery. A hearty welcome awaited us at the hospitable home of Mr. Browning, and nature seemed to vie in making the day an enjoyable one.

After a short and pleasant chat, the party started for the nurseries, about a quarter of a mile from the house. Mr. Brooke explained the object of these nurseries, now in the third year of trial. The hatching process is conducted at Druid Hill Park, Baltimore, and the young frye are transported in cans to be placed in these nurseries and fed daily for several months until the young trout reach a size of two or three inches when they are transferred to the streams in this section of our state.

Placing the young and recently hatched fish in our streams, before they were large enough to secure their proper food or escape the attacks of their numerous enemies, was found very unprofitable, and it might be said useless. Mr. Brooke adopted the plan of protection these nurseries afford, and thus be able to put into our streams young trout large enough to reasonably guarantee they would reach maturity. Thus far the experiment has worked very satisfactorily and the encouragement thus far justifies the conclusion, that a continuation of this admirable plan will result in stocking our mountain streams with that speckled beauty, the brook trout, the joy of the angler and the dream of the epicurean. This new department in fish culture, will certainly entitle our fish commissioners to the gratitude of all disciples of Sir Isaac Walton.

After some time spent inspecting the nurseries and listening attentively to Mr. Brooke's very interesting explanations of his plans and expectations, the party returned to the cottage home of Mr. Browning, where a dinner awaited them, which needed no assistance from the bracing, invigorating mountain air, to sharpen the appetite, and cause each and every one to do full justice to the bountiful repast, In the evening a trio of the celebrated mountain violinists, the Browning brothers, enlivened the passing hours, and the party reluctently took their carriages for the return trip to Oakland, unanimously voicing the sentiment, that a more pleasant day had seldem if ever been passed.

ONE WHO WAS THERE.

Resolutions Upon Grover C. Beckman.

At a special meeting of Swanton Grange No. 104, the following tribute of respect was unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased our Heavenly Father in his infinite wisdom to remove from amongst us our esteemed brother and fellow member, Brother Grover C. Beckman, who died on Sunday, August 4th, 1907, and

WHEREAS, The life that made our association with him pleasant is at an end the gates of death are closed upon our future intercourse, and realizing our great loss, we submissively bow to the decree of Him "who is too wise to err and too good to be unkind." Therefore, be it

Resolved, That in the death of Brother Grover C. Beckman, who was a member of Swanton Grange No. 104, we sincerely deplored the loss of a brother to whom we had become affectionately attached by association and relations which were never marred by the occurrence of an unfriendly act. And be it further

Resolved, That to the bereaved family we extend our sympathy and commend them to the care and love of Him who has said, "Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee," and also that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the bereaved family, spread upon the minutes of the Grange and furnished to the Business Farmer and the County Papers for publication.

Franklin's Famous Toast.

Franklin was dining with a small party of distinguished gentlemen, when one of them said: "Here are three nationalities represented—I am French, and my friend here is English, and Mr. Franklin is an American. Let each one propose a toast."

It was agreed to, and the Englishman's turn came first. He arose, and, in the tone of a Briton bold, said:

"Here's to Great Britian, the sun that gives light to all nations of the earth."

The Frenchman was rather taken back at this, but he proposed: "Here's to France, the moon whose magic rays moves the world."

Franklin then arose, with an air of quaint modesty, and said; "Here's to George Washington, the Joshua of America, who commanded the sun and moon to stand still—and they obeyed."

SOME GOSSIP ABOUT OAKLAND'S NEIGHBORS

Tried In Ohio To Weigh the Soul of A Dying Elephant.

BURNING OF CUMBERLAND PLANT

State Superintendent Miller's Mother Died—Warfare Waged Against the Railroad Bum—Star Spangled Banner Scene to be Reproduced.

Prof. James E. Winter, principal of the Hill street public school, Frostburg, and Miss Sadie McMahon, of Ocean, were married Thursday, in St. Joseph's Catholic church, Midlad.

R. P. Murry, of New York, traveling representative of the Pittsburg Plate Glass Glass Co., while attempting to board a moving passenger train Tuesday at Hancock, had his foot mashed.

Councilman Hood Phillips has been made general manager of the traction lines of Grafton.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company is establishing an emergency hospital at Clarksburg.

The Pennsylvania Railroad system, that leader of ideas in railroading, is waging a vicious warfare upon the tramp nuisance, driving the hobo practically off its holdings.

Mr. Harvey H. Bird for twelve years train dispatcher of the B. & O. at Cumberland, has resigned to enter the offices of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, at Harrisburg. He holds the enviable record of never having been the cause of an accident upon the railroad.

Announcement was made recently at Keyser of the marriage of Mr. George R. Davis and Miss Nellie Lowry, the ceremony having been performed at Cumberland May 16, 1907.

Mr. David Davis, one of the oldest and best known citizens of Keyser, died August 13th.

The big elephant Gladstone, with a circus, died at Bellefontaine, Ohio, Tuesday night after grieving for a year over the death of its mate at Greensburg, Ind. The elephant had been kept alive since then by hypodermically injecting food, which it refused to take otherwise, so when it became apparent the big animal was about to die surgeons decided upon a practical test to determine whether the elephant had a soul. A scale was improvised, but when the breath passed from the big beast the scales did not move and the decision was reached that elephants have no soul. Dr. Waddell wired the Smithsonian Institution at Washington to ask if it wants the carcass. The elephant was once the favorite of William E. Gladstone in the herd at the London Zoo. A camel with the same circus sank its huge teeth into the jaw of a horse last night and a crowbar had to be used to pry the enraged camel loose.

The mother of State Superintendent of Schools of West Virginia, Mr. Thomas C. Miller, died at her home in Fairmont Monday morning, and was buried Tuesday afternoon in the Woodlawn cemetery, near Fairmont.

Robinson's big circus will exhibit at Fairmont August 27th.

Governor Dawson, of W. Va., is on a ten-days' outing trip in Colorado.

A wheel on the engine of No. 3 left the track east of Grafton Monday morning. As the train was running slowly there was no damage.

Ex-Senator David E. Dick made up his mind Saturday evening just in time to get his name on the list of those who want their names to appear on the ballots that go before the voters at the primaries. The Senator wants to go to the House of Delegates.

Baltimore City is planning to have a reproduction of the storming of old Fort McHenry during the home coming week soon to be held in Maryland's metropolis. There will be re-enacted the same scenes as were present when the "Star Spangled Banner" was written.

In June last the large cast safe in the Third National Bank, of Cumberland became locked and all the ingenuity of the bank officials and local locksmiths failed to unlock it. The safe was made by the Mosler Safe Co., of Hamilton, Ohio, and after every effort on the part of the local people failed to open the safe, the bank officials sent to the safe company for one of their experts to come here and open the safe. The company sent one of their best men there but after making an examination, he stated that the quickest and best way to open the safe would be to return it to the home office, and have it unlocked there. On the 27th of June last the safe was shipped to Hamilton, Ohio, by fast freight and after being gone seven weeks the same was returted to the bank Saturday. Even after the safe was returned to the makers of it to be unlocked, they were unable to do so and had to take the safe apart. The fact the safe had to be sent to manufactures for opening is believed to be the first time such a thing has ever happened, and goes to show that the safe is what it is claimed for it, burglar proof.

One quarter a million dollars went up in smoke at Cumberland Sunday evening. The plant of the Cumberland Steel Company caught fire and was destroyed. Insurance amounted to about one-fourth the value of the propety. Merwin McKaig was the president of the company and it is given out that the plant will be rebuilt as quickly as possible.

Prof. H. E. Flesher, well-know educator of Kingwood, was selected Monday evening to succeed Dr. D. S Hammond in the superintendancy of the West Virginia Reform School at Pruntytown.

Friday morning, Judge Mason, at Morgantown, imposed a fine of $50.00 upon the Elks lodge of that town for violating the internal liquor license laws.

COMMUNICATED.

Correction From Selbysport in Which There are more Church Affairs.

To the Editor of The Republican:

The best correction we can give a so-called "Correction" occuring in an issue of your paper as published above the signature of B.F. Friend, of here, who styles himself as "President of the Board of Election" is, to quote to you the law upon the question which says: "In every charge which consists of more than one Church or Society, the Judges of Election shall constitute a Returning Board for the Charge, and shall meet as soon as convenient after the elections shall have been held, shall canvass the returns, declare the results, and issue the certificates of election as Delegate and Reserve delegate to the persons receiving the highest number of votes." The elections resulted in 55 votes for Nathan R. Selby, 53 votes for Clarence V. Guard, and 36 votes for Geo. Bishoff. The certificate issued, was done in private session by two of the judges, and given to the one receiving the smallest number of votes, making it a false issue. We hereby correct the so called "Correction," by stating that we have issued certificates to the two "receiving the highest number of votes," who alone have a lawful right to the same. The Delegate named in the "Correction," was chosen by 36 votes and the consent of the two Judges (himself being one) and one teller. By the vote of 55 members of the church (53 at Selbysport and 2 at Friendsville, none of whom voted but once) Nathan R. Selby is chosen as Delegate, which is in harmony with the law, as copied from the Discipline, as quoted above. The main reason we give for this reply is, we believe that it is time for the affairs of the Charge to be attended to by the majority and not by two or three. Our judge was present to meet with the Returning Board, but upon the refusal of the other two to accept his returns, he took it as an insult and left before any business was transacted. It would be but an easy thing for us to send you a protest against the illegal proceedings of the "Correction," with the signature of all the members of the Selbysport, and many from the other points of the charge. We will have more to say upon the matter, if necessary.

W. H. FRAZEE, Judge,
G. F. LOUDERMILK, Teller,
CHARLES M. CAMP, Teller.

Between Home And Business.

There is a great army of New York business men who think, as commuters, they travel, are doing pretty well when they travel, some of them as high as 100 miles between their places of business and their homes each night and morning. But the longest road to business is probably that traversed by Mr. John H. Watkins, president of the National Bank of Commerce, of Memphis, Tenn. He has a country home at Mount Kisco, in Westchester county, New York. He travels between his business in Memphis and his home in Mount Kisco in a large automobile, which is a specially equipped and built machine. The machine is 60-horse-power, and contains a writing desk, a typewriter, many facilities for business, and a library of about 100 volumes. Mr. Watkins travels with a stenographer all the time, and he attends to most of his correspondence and a lot of other business while traveling. It takes about six days to make the run from his country home to his business. —Washington Herald.

THE PROHIBITIONISTS TO CONVENE AUGUST 26TH

County Chairman Cuppett Issues a Call to Assemble at the Park.

ELECT DELEGATES TO CONVENTION

Extra Efforts Are Being Put Forth to Make State Convention Grand Success—Many Prominent Speakers to be Present.

County Chairman Harvey N. Cuppett, of the County Prohibition Central Committee, has issued a call to the prohibitionists of Garrett county to assemble at the Old Auditorium at Mountain Lake Park next Monday, August 26th, for the purpose of electing delegates to the State Convention of Prohibitionists to be held at the same place on August 31. A call for a convention to nomination a county ticket will be issued later.

This State convention will be held during the Inter-State Prohibition Conference which meets at the Park from August 30th to September 1st. It will be under the general direction of Edward W. Mills, State Chairman of West Virginia, Hon. Oliver W. Stewart, of Chicago, Rev. George H. Vibbert, of Boston, will speak Saturday, Aug. 31 and Sunday September 1, Luther F. Mezick and Miss Ella Mezick, of Maryland, will sing at all the sessions of the Conference. Clarence E. Pitts, Esq., Chairman, New York Prohibition State Committee, Finley C. Henderson, Esq., Chairman Maryland Prohibition State Committee, David B. McCalumet, Esq., Chairman Pennsylvania State Committee, and other prominent Probition workers will be present and take part in the Conference.

The Prohibitionists of Garrett county will have an excellent opportunity during this assemblage of state delegates to show their party spirit as well as to advertise the genuine hospitality of the good people of Garrett county to these delegates who will be at the Park from all sections of Maryland.

Mr. Elwood Offutt and Miss Nannine Thomasson To Wed Septembr Ninth.

Invitations have been issued to the marriage of Mr. Elwood Offutt, of Oakland, to Miss Nannine Thomasson, of Chicago, the ceremony to occur September the 9th at the summer home of the bride-to-be, Beuna Vista, near Oakland. Invitaaions have been issued to a large number of friends of both the bride and groom to be present. Mr. Offutt is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel E. Offutt, of Oakland. Miss Thomasson is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomasson, of Chicago, Oakland being the summer home of her family for a number of years past. In Chicago Mr. Thomasson is a well known real estate dealer.

FIKE.

The people of this vicinity are nearly through with hay harvest fand some have already cut their oats.

Mr. Hiram Fike sold one of his horses, and it is said he received $150 for the animal.

Mr. S. K. Fike, of Pittsburg, Pa., was with his relatives here a few days last week.

Eld. Jasper Barnthouse, of Uniontown, was in this section a few days last week visiting relatives and friends. He preached two very able sermons in Fike, subject for one discourse was "Faith," anc Eld. Barnthouse gave a very beautiful description of what "faith" consists.

Mr. James B. Frazee, wife and Mrs. Lee S. Cuppett, were visitors at Wm. H. Thomas on Sunday.

Mr. P. F. Fike was working for Mr. Isaiah Umbel one day last week.

Mrs. Mary Anne Evans was at Wm. H. Thomas on business one day last week.

Our farmer horse trader, E. S. Evans, is doing an extra business.

There is to be a basket picnic at Markleysburg, Pa., on August 31st. The picnic is held by the Sunday school of that place and all the adjoining schools are invited to attend.

Eld. Jasper Barnthouse and daughter Orpha, were with Wm. H. Thomas for supper one day last week.

PRINCIPLES OF THE STATE REPUBLICANS

Platform Adopted at Baltimore Convention Held August 14th.

FAVORS PRIMARY ELECTION LAW

Advocates More Liberal Appropriations For Schools—Demands Repeal of Wilson Ballot Law—Disapproves Disfranchising Clause.

The Republicans of Maryland, in convention assembled, submit herewith a statement of the principles and policies upon which they ask the support of the people at the coming election.

We declare that the supreme issue in this campaign is the maintenance, unimpaired, of the right of the citizens to vote and the free and unfettered opportunity for the exercise of that right.

We demand the repeal of recent Democratic legislation, and, in particular, the so-called Wilson Ballot Law, by which the excellent election law of 1896 has been mutilated and shorn of its best features, and through which elections in some portions of the state have come to be determined, not so much by the will of the people as by the manifold and familiar devices of the "trick ballot," through which the fraud or mistakes of election officers can overturn, as they have overturned, the clearly and honestly expressed will of the people by their ballots as deposited at the polls.

We favor the enactment of a Primary Election Law applicable to the whole state, and adequate provision, through law, for the right of bona fide state candidates and candidates for the United States Senate, to submit their claims to the people at such primary elections, but, we denounce as a false pretense and a fraud, any so-callad primary for United States Senators of the kind provided for in the recent Democratic convention in this state, which is nothing more, in substance, than an ineffectual mandate to members of the legislature from one or more counties or legislative districts to give their votes "for the candidate for United States Senator who shall have received the greatest number of votes cast at such primary election in such county or district," and make no semblance of a provision for the nomination of Senators through the majority of the voters of any political party of this state.

We favor the adoption of a Corrupt Practice Act in accordance with our declaration of several past conventions of the part.

We are in favor of any effective provision of legislation to prevent bribery at election primaries; but we are not prepared to admit that the work of purification of the ballot can safely be expected through legislation directed only against bribery, at the hands of any political party whose candidates are often selected by agencies that represents the domination of influences whose chief and primary stock in trade in politics has been, and will be, the open and nortorious use of money to affect the action of corrupt and venal voters, directly and indirectly, at the primaries and at the polls on the day of election.

We believe the proposed call for a Constitutional Convention to be unwise, inexpedient and fraught with dangers and possibilities of evil, and we appeal to the people of the state to vote against said proposed call.

We disapprove and condemn the re-expressed determination of the Democratic party to submit, "at the earliest possible time," another proposition in the form of a disfranchising constitutional amendment to the people of this state.

We do not believe that the people of this state can be deceived by the fulsome promise to frame the said amendment as to guard the objections to the last measure, known as the Poe amendment with not less apparent earnestness, contended and promised that the said measure, if adopted, could amply protect the right and provide the opportunity for all white persons, native and naturalized, to exercise the right of suffrage under its provisions and then framed and submitted.

We favor a system of oyster culture by the state, so framed and administered as effertually to preserve the right, which we hold to be inalienable, the citizens of the state to the use of the natural beds and bars of our rivers and bay.

We faxor such modification of the act of 1906 as shall more clearly construe and safeguard the provisions of that law as to taking oysters from natural beds and bars, to the end that it may be impossible for any Shell Fish Commission to so use the power and discretion committed to them as to convert what may be properly considered as natural beds and bars into depleted or barren rock, and then subject them to lease to private parties to the subversion of the long and well-recognized right of the citizens of this state to the use of such natural beds or bars.

We are in favor of a nonpartison commission to execute this or any other law to be passed upon the subject matter. We do not feel satisfied as yet the present commission is free from partisanship in its administration of the law, and cannot upprove the halting, hesitating, shiftless and unprogressive work of the said commission thus far, with an excessive force of partisan employes and supernumeraries, already entailing, and likely further to entail, a deficit in the Treasury, with little hope that abundant revenue for good roads, the promise of which, held out to the farmers of the state, gave to the measure much of the support that it received, and the realization of which, at this day, seems at least far distant.

We favor legislation for replenishing the depleted beds and bars, the return of the shells to the bottom of our rivers and bay at public expense, under such supervision as to aid the processes of nature in the increase of the oyster supply, add to the earnings of those dependent upon this industry for their livelihood, and bring more substantial revenues to the Treasury of the state.

We believe that there ought to be a higher and better grade of men appointed as justices throughout counties and in the city, and particularly, does this apply to the office of police magistrate in Baltimore city, to the end that here may be a most thorough and rigid enforcement of law and order in all portions of our state.

We believe that these positions should be filled upon qualifications based upon merit alone, without regard to political affiliation; and we promise the people of this state that if the selection of the men shall be entrusted to a Republican governor supported, if need be, by legislation to better carry out this policy, that the character of these officers in the future will be based upon their fitness, rather than their ability to control a ward or precinct in the city, or an election district or precinct in the counties at a primary, or effect advantageously oftentimes fraudulently the result of the vote in any such political subdivision at the election.

We favor more liberal appropriations for our public school system, to the end that the salaries of the teachers of the state may be increased; that the poorest child in the state may have the opportunity, by a lengthened school year, alike in the cities and counties, and by more capable and better renumerated teachers, to obtain such a liberal elementary education as it is the purpose and the proper function of our public school system to impart.

We favor liberal appropriations from the State Treasury for the construction and improvement of the public roads of our state, under state regulation, but local control, subject to such regulations.

We favor such amendment to the law relating to taxation as will made adequate provision, by clear and certain methods, for the taxation of all property, whether of individual or corporates, including easements and incorporeal, as well as corporeal property, to the end that all the property of the state may be fairly and adequately assessed, and the opportunities to escape taxation or to embarrass the state, county or city, as the case may be, in the collection thereof may, as far as possible, be eliminated.

The Republicans of Maryland heartily congratulate their fellow-Americans on the peace and respect abroad, prosperity and happiness at home, which have been the lot of our common country, during the wise, just, firm and patriotic administration of Theodore Roosevelt. They indorse without reserve, the statesmanlike policies of our esteemed President, and they record their firm belief that the American people demand and will choose as his successor one who can be trusted without misgivings to persevere in his policies and harvest their fruits in the nation's welfare.

PRICE OF STAGE SUCCESS.

Many Stars Pay for Popularity with Their Health.

Richard Mansfield, the great star of the American stage, will not be able, because of the inperfect condition of his health, to resum acting for another year at least. Annie Russell has gone to a country place in Maine, where with her husband, Oswald Yorke, she will kill time till next December. Her health has given way. Fritiz Scheff has returned to the stage after an absence of longer duration than would have been the case had her health kept up. Olga Nethersole has gone to Switzerland, there to recuperate from an illness that almost laid her low. Ethel Barrymore, whose last tour has been interrupted several times by illness, now announces that if her health premits she hopes to become a prima donna in opera instead of going on as an actress, and she is told that she must take the best possible care of her health.

True it is that the price that is paid for success on the stage is a high price.

The first places in the profession are gained at the expense of great physical and mental fatigue, to say nothing of the sacrifice of comforts and conveniences.

Mental collapse has been the price that some of the brightest ornaments of the stage have had to pay. Maurice Barrymore, whose wit was as keen and flashing as a rapier, yielded to death in a madhouse. Joseph Murphy's old compeer, Scanlon, whose acting in Irish plays brought him a fortune, went insane. The strain insanity that ran through the great theatrical family of Booth caused the tragedy of the murder of President Lincoln, and it embittered the entire life of Edwin Booth.

But while the percentage of the actors who have gone mad has been so large as has been the percentage of those who have thrown away the greatest chances that have come to them to become great.

Edmund Kean, who by many students of acting is called the greatest actor that ever lived, was followed all his life by the devil of intemperance. It was his intemperance that wrought such evils in the Kean household that it become necessary for Charles Kean, the youngest, to leave school and become an actor that he might support his mother.

Many actors since the days of Kean have loved their bottle, and many of these actors have fallen by the wayside in consequence. Now some of these players never drank until they went upon the stage. It is likely that they drank afterward because of the exciting and stimulating influences of the playhouse, influences which always are accompanied by and placed in direct contrast with periods of depression and loss of hope.

Must Possess Merit.

Display will attract attention, but merit must sell the goods.

BOUNDARY CASE A DICKEN'S RIVAL.

Boundary Dispute Between Maryland and West Virginia Nearing End.

The boundary line dispute between Maryland and West Virginia may soon be settled. The matter has been in litigation many years and it may be settled at Washington, D. C., next month. The work of taking depositions at Kingwood and Oakland, Md., has just been completed.

For more than 16 years this case has been pending in the courts, but the real dispute dates back to the time when the Virginians were divided, July 20, 1863. The State of Maryland claims a certain strip of land from Preston county, east to Garrett county. Maryland, embracing a strip 36 miles in length and a mile in width.

The surveys of this land after several postponements, were not made until May of this year and even at this time it is not fully completed.

Mr. E. H. Sincell of Oakland who is assisting William Sheppard Bryan, Maryland's Attorney General, has been ill for some time, and the final hearing of witnesses, whose depositions were wanted, was not taken until the last two weeks.

The taking of depositions is now concluded, but both counsel reserved the right take documentary evidence between this date and the 17th of September next, at which time the respective counsel will meet in Washington, when the evidence of maps and documents will be filled, and then arrangements will be entered into for printing the records.

This is one of the most import ant land suits ever tried in West Virginia, and although the case resembles the famous chancery suit described by Dickens, of Jaundice vs. Jaundice there is a possibility that it will be finally settled before many months have passed. Maryland's Attorney General, William Sneppard Bryan, is the son of one ot Maryland's greatest lawyers. He was named after his father, who for more than 45 years was a leader at the Baltimore bar and was afterwards made one of the judges of the court of appeals.

West Virginia is always ably represented by counsel in the person of Geo. E. Price and Clark W. May, both well known constitutional lawyers. The outcome of their dispute will be watched by thousands in many States.

That Standard Oil Fine.

They haven't yet determined how many trains it will take to carry the $29,240,000 from the Standard Oil's Wall street vaults to the Government's Treasury unless paid in silver. In such event there would be required 177 flat cars, with a capacity of 33,000 pounds.

It would build five first-class battleships or a new subway for New York.

It would yield a perpetual income of $4,027 a day.

It would make 914 tons of silver dollars, requiring 304 teams to transport it.

It would build 2,924 homes at $10,000 each.

It is the income for one year at 4 per cent. on $731,000,000.

It is about 2 per cent. of the national debt of 1906.

It is 35 cents for every man, woman and child in the whole country.

It would take 48,730 street laborers one year to work out the amount.

It is the annual revenue of Mexico.

It is nearly one-half the capital of the Bank of England.

It is nearly one-half the number of silver dollars in circulation.

It is nearly 29 times the capital stock of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, the corporation fined.

It is 4,783 times the annual salary of Judge Landis, who imposed the fine.—Memphis News Scimeter.

WANTED—AN APOLOGY.

By Henry Abbott.

Copyright, 1907, by May McKeon.

Gadsby Jones was a peppery man of about fifty years who lived in the village of Hornsdale. It was well known to all the inhabitants that he was peppery and carried a chip on his shoulder, and they took good care not to stir him up. In the village of Winston, four miles away, there lived another peppery man about the same age. His name was Talbot, and he was so touchy that he had to be handled with gloves. These two peppery old men had known each other by name for ten years before they were introduced. Mr. Jones happened to be over at Winston one day, and while at the hotel Mr. Talbot came in. They were rather chary of each other for awhile, instinctively scenting danger, but when that feeling had finally worn off a bit the peppery Mr. Jones remarked:

"It's my opinion, from what I have seen so far this season, that we are going to have a plague of tater bugs. I shouldn't wonder if we lost the whole crop."

"Well, I dunno," replied the peppery Mr. Talbot. "In my opinion all the indications point to a return of the grasshoppers."

"I differ with you, sir."

"And I differ with you."

"There isn't the slightest indication of grasshoppers."

"Nor the slightest indication of tater bugs."

"You seem, sir, to be a conceited man."

"And I wouldn't guarantee that you had an ounce of brains."

"I demand an apology at once!"

"And I demand the same!"

As neither would apologize, they separated in a spirit of bitterness. As they lived four miles from each other and as they had managed to get along fairly well for years without knowing each other, their feelings would have made no difference but for one thing. Gadsby Jones had a son twenty years old, and Mr. Talbot had a daughter nineteen. The young people had met and admired each other before the meeting of their fathers, and the fact was dimly known to their respective parents. When Mr. Talbot went home from the hotel it was to say to his daughter:

"I HAVEN'T SEEN ANYTHING OF THEM GRASSHOPPERS YET."

"Ruth, are you acquainted with young Jones of Hornsdale?"

"Why, yes, I have met him," admitted Ruth, with a blush.

"Then don't meet him any more. He's a horse thief."

"Why, father, how you talk!"

"That is to say, his father is the biggest old fool in the state, and I'm sorry now that I didn't call him a liar. If I catch the son hanging around here I shall kick him out in short order."

And Gadsby Jones returned to Hornsdale, getting madder every rod of the way, to say to his son:

"Homer, do you know a girl over at Winston named Talbot?"

"Talbot? Talbot?" mused the young man as he tried to appear indifferent.

"Yes, sir, Talbot. Seems to me I heard you say you took her to the circus."

"Oh, yes, Ruth Talbot."

"Well, you drop her like a hot tater. I met her father over there today, and of all the cantankerous old cusses I ever ran up against he takes the cake. He owes me an apology, and until he makes it no son of mine can enter his house."

The son and daughter could not look upon the matter as the two fathers did, and neither of them felt obliged to obey the parental injunction. While they did not openly defy it, they continued to meet at intervals, and admiration and friendship finally ripened into love. In this they were secretly supported by Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Talbot. The two peppery old men, who had lived for fifty years without knowing each other's existence, seemed fated to meet at intervals after the disagreement. Within a month both found themselves at the same blacksmith shop to have repairs made to their buggies, and, after glaring and snorting at each other for a time, Mr. Jones sarcastically said:

"I haven't seen anything of them grasshoppers yet."

"They are probably waiting to come along with your tater bugs."

"Um! Mr. Talbot, if that is your name, I pity the folks in this village who have to put up with your ways."

"Um! Mr. Jones, and that is undoubtedly your name, for I never saw a Jones who didn't look like a mean man. If I was you, I'd go hang myself and let my town take a rest."

"Apologize, sir! Apologize at once!"

"Not until you apologize first."

They met again on the highway and again at a funeral and a town meeting, and each meeting made them long to kill each other. The son and the daughter were forbidden under all sorts of pains and penalties even to bow to each other, but their lovemaking could not be stopped by such edicts. There was no question of love, but that of marriage was held in abeyance in hopes that their respective fathers might undergo a change of opinion. A mutual friend undertook to bring this about. He called upon the peppery Mr. Jones first. He started out with a lot of sweet oil, but he hadn't talked over half a minute when Mr. Jones interrupted with:

"That will do, sir. A year ago I told that old fool of a Talbot that it looked like a good year for tater bugs, and he up and insulted me."

"But there were no tater bugs last year."

"Makes no difference. I have met him two or three times since, and I tell you he is a cantankerous old reprobate. If he's going to continue living in the state, I'll get out of it."

Nothing could be done with the peppery Mr. Jones, and so the mutual friend tried the peppery Mr. Talbot. He had only stated his errand when the latter shouted out:

"Stop, sir! I do not want that man's name mentioned in my presence! If ever there was an obstinate old fool who needed to be kicked from here to Hornsdale, he is the one. He owes me an apology, and I shall insist that he get down on his knees to make it. Be friends with Jones—J-o-n-e-s! You don't know me, sir!"

But yet things were working. Providence or something else always seeks to bring things out right in case of true love. One day a party of people living in Winston went out to a huckleberry swamp to gather berries, and the peppery Mr. Talbot went with them. On the same day a party from Hornsdale visited the same swamp, and the peppery Mr. Jones was among them. The two parties kept separate for some hours, and they had only drifted together when a thunderstorm came up. At the same time a messenger arrived from Winston with the news that the young couple had gone off and been married. The people had to seek the shelter of the trees, and it so happened that the two peppery old men found themselves side by side.

"I will never recognize the marriage!" exclaimed Mr. Jones as he found himself face to face with his enemy.

"Nor I either!"

"Your daughter plotted to trap my son."

"'Tis false, sir! It was right the other way."

They would probably have kept on quarreling for the next half hour, but a thunderbolt shot out of the black cloud and struck the tree underneath which they were standing. Five people were knocked senseless and continued in that state for a quarter of an hour. Then the two peppery old men recovered consciousness, sat up and looked at each other.

"Talbot, where are we?" slowly asked Jones.

"In heaven, Jones."

"Were we killed by lightning?"

"We must have been."

"Well, as we are in heaven and the children married, I don't want to carry no grudge against you. I'm willing to apologize if you are."

"Well, I'm sorry."

"So'm I."

Of course they found out later on that they were no nearer heaven than the huckleberry swamp, and of course there was a little humiliation on the part of both, but, like sensible men, they buried the hatchet and rode home together to congratulate the happy couple.

The Value of Time.

The hours of a wise man are lengthened by his ideas as those of a fool are by his passions. The time of the one is long because he does not know what to do with it. So is that of the other, because he distinguishes every moment of it with useful or amusing thoughts, or, in other words, because the one is always wishing it away and other is always enjoying it. We all of us complain of the shortness of time, saith Seneca, and yet have much more than we know what to do with. Though we seem grieved at the shortness of life in general, we are wishing every period of it at an end. The minor longs to be of age, then to be a man of business, then to retire. Thus, although the whole life is allowed by every one to be short, the several divisions of it appear long and tedious.—Addison.

Science and Safe Cracking.

To one who has seen a modern safe, with its smooth surface of hardened steel, such as offers an impenetrable front to the shot of a battleship, it seems impossible that any burglar could force it, and yet we read of safes being cracked often enough. The modern burglar has modern methods. He uses thermite, which is ignited upon the steel and burns its way through, or nitroglycerin, which is squirted into the crack of the door and exploded by an electric spark.—New York American.

ECHOES FROM RELIGIOUS FIELDS

WHERE TO BEGIN.

What Is Needed Most Is a Revival in Home Religion.

Rev. C. L. Goodell declares that what the church needs to-day most of all is a revival of home religion. "We are getting so busy," he says, "that we do not have time for family prayers. Father has to get off in the morning, and the children have to get off to school, and there are so many social engagements at night. Martin Luther said that prayer and provender hindered no man. "Let us go back to family worship. Let us go back to the training of the home. My father was never so busy that he did not get us all down on the kitchen floor before he went out in the morning, and have prayers. He had the old-fashioned way of praying for each member of the family, beginning with the oldest boy. I was the little one of the family, and whatever I was doing, I would stop when he got to me. I felt that if he was interested enough to talk with God about me, I had better listen, and I have never forgotten it." —Home Herald.

TO PROMOTE SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

Permanent Organization for Furtherance of World Wide Work.

The most significant action taken by the World's Sunday School Congress at Rome was the creation of a new Sunday school organization called the World's Sunday School association. It consists of a picked body of well-known laymen and ministers from America, Great Britain and Europe who will have in charge the promotion of the Sunday school movement throughout all lands. The first president chosen for the new association was Rev. F. B. Meyer of London, while the chairmanship of the executive committee fell to America and was bestowed upon Dr. George W. Bailey of Philadelphia. Some of the well-known Americans who are members of the new association are President E. K. Warren of Three Oaks, Mich.; Mr. W. N. Hartshorn, of Boston; Mr. H. J. Heinz, of Pittsburg; Mr. F. A. Wells, of Chicago; Mr. A. B. McCrillis, of Providence, R. I.; Mr. Marion Lawrence, of Chicago, and Bishop J. C. Hartzell of Africa, formerly of Cincinnati.

To Honor John Calvin.

Already arrangements are being made in this country to assist in the celebration of the quadricentennial of John Calvin, founder of Presbyterianism, in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1909. At a recent meeting in Union Theological seminary, New York city a committee of seven was appointed to secure the cooperation of religious leaders all over the United States in an endeavor to raise $25,000 for the American contribution toward a monument to Calvin, to be erected at his birthplace, Geneva. President Patton, of Princeton Theological seminary, is one of the leaders in the movement.

What of the Future of China?

The forces now engaged in Christian work in China, including independent workers who are without a home society, are under 82 societies, of which 33 are American, with 642 men, 486 wives, and 434 single women, a total of 1,562; 25 British societies have 729 men, 516 wives, and 543 single women, totaling 1,788; 24 Continental societies number 211 men, 131 wives, and 79 single women, in all 421; the "independent" workers make up the grand total of 1,604 men, 1,148 wives, 1,081 single women, aggregating, December 31, 1906, 3,833.

Salvation Army Increase.

The income received at the national headquarters of the Salvation Army last year was $113,285. Of this $9,066 was raised by special appeals and gifts. The result from the self-denial fund and harvest festival was $33,242. The sum of $9,905 was spent for national training homes; $3,099 for homes of rest and for relief to sick and wounded; $14,427 was paid in salaries to the staff and employes.

Well Trained for Work.

Mr. John M. Glenn, who has assumed the work of carrying out Mrs. Sage's wishes with regard to the $10,000,000 Sage foundation, is a wealthy Maryland lawyer, with a large experience in humanitarian enterprises.

A Great Revival.

In a great revival at Thompson Town, Clarendon parish, Jamaica, W. I., over 1,000 persons came forward and declared their desire to lead the Christian life. Evangelist Raglan Phillips conducted the services.

A Big Army, Indeed.

According to the most reliable reports there are 262,000 Sunday schools in the world, with a total enrollment of 26,000,000 pupils.

For Clerk of Court of Appeals.
THOMAS PARRAN of Calvert County

THEY ARE COMING.

The Baltimore News, a Democratic independent paper, is advocating the election of the Republican ticket in Maryland. These Independent Democrats of Baltimore City are coming one by one. It was so calculated that they should and they are. Baltimore is in favor of a man of their own town, who is well-known, whose abilities and character is above reproach, than a man from some obscure corner who is wholly unknown and untired by the people of this commonwealth. Maryland Republicans did wisely when they chose Gaither, a man of Baltimore, and a man who will carry the independent vote to the Republican party. Other Democrats are following The Baltimore News.

A CONTINUAL NAGGING.

"Continual nagging makes the mare go." This is a true saying and especially so in political matters. Many lady readers of newspapers hold up their hands in horror at "political stuff" in papers. They neglect to reason, however, that if politics were not continually brought before men that they would soon fail to take part in voting which neglect would cause bosses to rule and the nation would become corrupt and fall. Such was the fate of Rome. But she had no newspapers to continually nag at the voters to make them do their duty as we have today. So we shall stand longer than Rome. Now, as ever, eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

A CLEAN SWEEP.

There never was a ticket nominated by the Republicans party of Maryland that has met with such hearty approval of the people of the State of Maryland as has the one nominated at the Baltimore convention last week. From all over the State there have come reports that the people are highly pleased with the candidates and that there is every evidence in the world that the Republican party this fall has better chances of winning than it has ever had before in the commonwealth of Maryland. The leaders everywhere, and the rank and file in every county, have not failed to express their gratification of the ticket.

The Democrats in Maryland, however are not so well pleased with Crothers, the Democratic nominee. Dissentions have arisen, and many Democrats are failing to give the campaign the usual snap and ginger which is characterizing the Republican workers. As yet, however, both parties are resting on their oars, but follows of Gaither are husbanding their strength and are solidly united for a great and decisive victory, such that shall sweep Maryland forever into the fold of Republican states.

With all their fault-finding, the Democrats are unable to pick a flaw in the Republican ticket, other than say that it was nominated with the consent of Mudd and Jackson. They fail to mention, however, that these two men simply obeyed the behests of the people of Maryland and obeyed the demands made of them that a man should be nominated whose character is without question and whose abilities were of the highest class.

Unless all signs fail the ticket which is placed today at the head of the editorial column of this paper will be elected and Maryland will be found in the list of states which are following the lead of Roosevelt, the man of the people, the man who has done more for the real benefit of the people, the man who has done more to protect the masses from abuses by the classes, than any Democrat that ever lived. Surely, Maryland can make no mistake by following his policies. Intelligent men see these things and they are going to help make Maryland get on the right road—the road of Republicanism. If Mudd and Jackson, as the Democrats say, were in favor of the nomination of Gaither it only goes to show their good sense, for they worked to give the Republicans and the good people of Maryland a man who possesses everything that can be required of a public official.

BEYOND HUMAN KEN.

Efforts are being made in many parts of the world to learn what sort of substance the soul is. It seems that no one has yet attempted to see it. But there have been made trials to weight it. A person about to die was laid upon a pair of scales a short time ago and carefully weighed; when life had left, the weight was again taken, and there was found to be a difference of a few grains in the weight of the body before and after death. Therefore, the inference was made that the soul has weight.

In reading the neighborly notes in another column of this paper it is seen that an attempt was made to weigh the soul of elephant, the purpose being to see if an animal has a soul. There appeared to be no difference at all in the weight between the dead and live elephant. Therefore, it is now reasoned that animals have no souls, because the body is no lighter after it has gone.

However, the whole idea seems to be a snare and an illusion. Many do not believe that the human body weighs any different before than after death. Science has not found a system of measure of the soul. It could not possible be on weight. Such a scale would be against the wise laws of the Creator, for if weight were the system of measure, then it would take more soul for a large man than for a small man or for a child or a woman. And this is impossible, for in the sight of God all persons are equal; the fat man, with the big soul, is no more precious in his sight than is the smallest woman that ever lived.

UNPRINTABLE NEWS.

Two items of news have come to the editor of THE REPUBLICAN during the past week which are so repulsive in their details that no one of character would care to have them go into the hands of children. The diabolical plots eminated from Satan and newspapers that are continually printing such stories in detail are only furthering his works in dragging people to the lowest depths of perdition. Such crimes will be punished by the laws of heaven and earth and the editor of this paper does not believe that an item of news should appear that any child may not read with profit. The leading newspapers of today are taking this same stand in respect to publishing details of vicious crimes and the aim is to eliminate them as much as possible from the public press.

VICTORY TO THE STRONG.

The Democrats of Maryland are using as their only argument against Gaither, the Republican candidate on the State ticket, that he was nominated with the consent of Mudd and Jackson. The Republicans on the other hand reply that Crothers was nominated at the dictation of Ex-Gov. John Walter Smith. With Mudd and Jackson fighting Smith, in such a contest of two against one, which should win? The answer will be a Republican victory and that is just what every stalwart, gingery, alert Republican in Maryland is today proclaiming in every nook and corner of Maryland.

ACCIDENT.

We have had some beautiful weather the past week and the farmers are almost through making hay.

Adam Richter took a business trip to Westernport last week.

Rev. J. W. Miller and son Paul of Ft. Nayne, Ind., are visiting Rev. Miller's parents, Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Miller.

J. A. Enlow, agent for J. B. Williams & Company, of Frostburg, passed through our town one day last week.

Miss Lillie Miller who has been spending the past year at Ft. Wayne, returned home last week.

Mr. and Mrs. Mahlon Speicher are the proud parents of a little son at their home.

Misses Mary and Clara Georg are spending a few weeks with their parents, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Georg, of this place.

Rev. and Mrs. Dreyer are visiting friends and acquaintances at Accident.

Misses Kate and Etta Hast, of Cumberland, Miss Margaret Richter and Charles and Oscar Oester, of Cove spent Sunday with friends and relatives at this place.

Harvey Speicher took a business trip to Thayerville on Monday.

George Fiek and family, of Somerset, Pa., spent a few days of last week with friends and relatives at Accident.

There was a large family reunion at M. J. Miller's Sunday. Those attending from a distance were: Rev. and Mrs. J. M. Miller and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Moelling, of Ft. Wayne, Mr. and Mrs John Miller and Charles Miller, of Westernport, and Rev. and Mrs. Alex. von Schlichten, of New York.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The Park is entering the last week of the Chautauque with the largest crowd ever on the grounds. The cattages are nearly all accupied and the hotels and boarding houses generally full to their utmost capacity.

Edward A. Brannon, Esq., of Weston, W. Va., with his family are occupying the Beacham cottage on I street. His father, of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, is his guest.

Hamill Spedden and family, of Fairmont, W. Va., are occupying the Swan cottage on D street. They will be here until the close of the season.

The death of Miss L. F. Bacot, which occurred at 9 o'clock Tuesday night, was a great shock to her many friends. She had been suffering from an attack of typhoid fever contracted before her arrival at the Park. She was a teacher of French and German. None of her family were present except her half-brother, Adolph Rambeau; the rest are all in Germany.

Excursion rates will be granted for the first time this season on G. A. R. Day, next Wednesday, when we expect the greatest crowd that ever assembled on the grounds. The program for that day will be one of the best ever given at the Chautauqua.

Mr. Wm. A. Smith, of Hoyes, took in the program here Tuesday.

There have been five cases of typhoid fever in the Park this season, but in every case the patient came after being infected.

BITTINGER.

August's throne is but a sunbeam,
Her domain is everywhere;
And she passes like a day-dream,
On a breath of balmy air.

Her palace is the forest,
Her court in Fairy Land;
And the Katydids in chorus
Constitute her royal band.

Miss Mary Wiley, of Westernport, Md., came up Monday for a few days' visit among relatives and friends.

Noah Stark spent last week seeing the sights at the Jamestown Exposition. He was accompanied by J. F. and Henry Bittinger, of Jennings.

Mrs. J. L. Beachy, who has been ill for some weeks, is arranging to go to Baltimore for treatment this week.

Lewis Orendorf, of near McHenry, is here this week helping his father with his harvest.

Wagoner Bros., of Salisbury, Pa., are painting the public school building at this place.

James Emerick, salesman for the Shipley Hardware Co., of Meyersdale, Pa., was in town Monday.

Berry pickers report great quantities of huckleberries on the nearby mountains.

One feature of the all-day pic-nic to be held at this place on Saturday, Aug. 24th, will be a match game of base ball between the Bittinger and Springs, Pa., teams.

Winds Of Memory.

I sit in the evening twilight,
Weary and all alone,
I think of the days that faded
And the dear ones I have known.

And it seems the winds of memory
Sweep o'er my weary brain,
And the clouds of age are lifted
And I am a child again.

Once more I dream in the forest
And drink from the purling stream,
Again I stray to the forest
And lazily lie and dream.

Then, culling the fairest blossoms
That bloometh along the way,
I turn to the old log cabin
Again at the close of day.

The loved ones of youth, I greet them,
There is father and mother, too;
A sister I lost in life's morning,
A brother with eyes of blue.

And one to my young heart dearer—
My school mate once was she—
A black-eyed lass with a winning smile,
I loved her, she loved me.

But the clouds of age returneth
And the vision fades away,
But I'm better for that dreaming
Throughout the coming day.

So blow the winds of memory,
Ye gentle breezes hie,
And bear me away to the happy land,
The land of days gone by.

WM. L. THOMAS.

Bought Piano With Pennies.

A piano sale was made at Blue Rapids recently which was somewhat peculiar. Mrs. E. B. Reed, the wife of a restaurant keeper of that town, bought a piano for $375. The first payment was $125, which she made all in copper cents. Twelve thousand five hundred cents weigh more than 104 pounds, troy. The salesmen who made the deal placed the money in a large double compartment grip and took it to St. Joseph, where the pennies will be placed in a window of the piano store, with the history of the transaction as an advertisement.

Six years ago Mrs. Reed commenced saving cents while living on a farm. Every copper she got hold of from the sale of butter, eggs, poultry and other produce she put away. Afterward, the family moved to Blue Rapids and engaged in the bakery-restaurant business. Here the opportunity for accumulating pennies was somewhat better, and the lady continued to save them. A short time ago she felt able to invest in a piano.—Kansas City Journal.

Unwise Advertising.

In writing advertisements don't forget to give people credit for a due amount of common sense. Even a schoolboy knows that you cannot afford to sell an article of merchandise "worth $4.50 for 98 cents."

TRIAL SET FOT 30TH.

Charles Maust to be Given a Hearing One week From Tomorrow.

Constable Maffett went to Dodson and arrested Charles Maust on a warrant issued, charging him with negligence to his child, Anna R. Maust, an account of whose wandering was given last week. He was brought to Oakland before 'Squire Teats and August 30th was the date set for the hearing.

Little Anna has had many kind offers of a home from people of this section as well as from people of other states. The story printed seems to have awakened a spirit of helpfullness in several persons who have volunteered to give the little girl a home. State's Attorney Thayer and 'Squire Teats will confer today and decide with whom the child shall be placed.

Another Correction is sent The Republican from Friendsville.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I would not being doing justice either to my people or myself, to let a so-called "correction" in your paper of last week pass by unnoticed. I wish to say,

First: That three of the judges did meet, but on the refusal of two to accept the returns from Selbysport, it caused a hasty adjournment, after which two of the judges met and issued certificates as state in "correction."

Second: These certificates are absolutely false issues, for the decisions of the General Conference, as given in our Discipline, and supported by all Presiding Elders and Pastors, says: "The judges of election shall issue certificates of elections as Delegate and Reserve to the persons receiving the highest number of votes;" this they did not do, for Nathan R. Selby received 55 votes and Geo. E. Bishoff received 36 votes. Mr. Selby received 53 votes from Selbysport, where he holds his membership, and no person voted but once, notwithstanding the rumor to the contrary.

Third: The duties of the judges are to meet and see whom the members have elected, which can only be ascertained by an honest canvass of the returns, and when they refuse to be governed by the law in the matter, it becomes the duty of the pastor to see that the right thing is done, for he is not only commissined to preach the gospel and have an oversight of the spiritual, but also "To enforce vigorously but calmly the rules of the Church, and to administer the Discipline within his Charge," which we have done by seeing that the proper certificates have been issued to Nathan R. Selby as Delegate and C. V. Guard as Reserve, Mr. Guard having received the next to the highest number of votes, which is 53.

The "Return Judges" have no Presidents of their Boards, and there is no law supporting any organization they may try to effect. The Discipline, however, makes the pastor, by virtue of his office, president, or chairman, of all committees appointed by the quarterly conference, and judges election are appointed by that body.

Mr. N. R. Selby may be addressed at his postoffice, Selbysport, Md., and Mr. C. V. Guard at Friendsville, Md., by any prospective delegates to the next General Conference, or by their friends, and we believe they will treat all correspondents with due courtesy.

W. M. Lister,
Pastor of Friendsville M. E. Charge.

I will mail you free, to prove merit, samples of my Dr. Shoop's Restorative and my Book on either Dyspepsia, The Heart or The Kidneys. Troubles of the Stomach, Heart or Kidneys, are merely Simptoms of a deeper aliment. Don't make the commen error of treating the symptoms only. Symptom treatment is treating the result of your ailment, and not the cause. Weak Stomach nerves—the inside nerves—mean Stomach weakness, always. And the Heart, and Kidneys as well, have their controlling or inside nervs. Weaken these nerves, and you inevitably have weak vital organs. Here is where Dr. Shoop's Restorative has its fame. No other remedy even claims to treat the "inside nerves." Also for bloating, biliousness, bad breath or complexion, use Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Write me to-day for sample and free Book. Dr. Shoop, Racine, Wis. The Restorative is sold by all dealers.

Thanks After Reflection.

An unusual card of thanks was left at this office, as follows.

"I did not issue a card of thanks when my husband died, but now that three months are passed I wish to have one printed. I desire to thank, not those friends who came in when he lay dead in the house, bustled around arranging the chairs and flowers, and answering the door, but those friends who have come in since the parade was over, and who have sat with me in my loneliness when they might have been with happier people elsewhere. And I desire to state that few of those busy before the parade have been to see me since it was over. I am no longer in the limelight and am forgotten."—Atchison (Kan.) Globe.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRR. GRACE MANOWN.

Mrs. Grace Manown, wife of Mr. Edward Manown, of Baltimore, died in a hospital in that city Wednesday morning, August 14th, after undergoing a surgical operation. Her remains were taken through Oakland the next morning to Kingwood, W. Va., where the interment was made.

MISS LECARTHA ECHARD.

At the home in Pittsburg, Pa., Miss Lecartha Echard died Wednesday afternoon, August 14th. She was buried in the graveyard near that city on the following Friday. The cause of her death was typhorid fever. She was the sister of Mr. Calvin Echard, of Oakland and the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Willis W. Echard, former residents of Oakland. She was seventeen years of age and was an active member of the Methodist church of which she was a member. She was well-known by many of the young people of this town with whom she was very popular.

LILLIE F. BACOT.

At her summer home in Mountain Lake Park, Miss Bacot died Tuesday evening. She was at the head of the modern language department of the Mountain Chautauqua now in session there. She was about thirty years of age, and she taught last year at Overbrook Seminary, near Philadelphia. A cablegram was sent to her parents, Dr. and Mrs. Rambeau, who are in Berlin, Germany, telling them of her death as well as saying that the remains would be placed in a vault in Baltimore, awaiting their arrival in America when they might be present at the obsequies.

THORNTON SLIGER.

Mr. Thornton Sliger died at his home in Westernport on Monday evening. His remains were interred today. He was the father of Mr. R. E. Sliger, the cashier of the First National Bank of Oakland.

DR. S. E. MERRITT.

Dr. S. E. Merritt, a dentist whose home is at Washington, D. C., but who was at the Park spending the summer, died there Friday from tuberculosis. His remains were taken in charge by Undertaker Bolden and they were shipped to his home Saturday morning.

JOSEPH MARTIN.

Joseph Martin died Saturday evening at his home in Oakland and was buried Monday morning in the Oakland cemetery, Rev. J. B. Workman, of the Methodist church conducting the services. He was well-known to the people of Oakland and of Garrett county, having lived here since 1858. For several years he drove a transfer hack between Oakland and the Park. He was 69 years of age, was born in Downs County, Ireland, coming to America in 1856. He was married twice, his second wife being Miss Sarah Weese, of Virginia. Four children were born to them, but two of whom now live, Mrs. William Hinebaugh, and David, both of Oakland. He was a half brother of Thomas Martin, the liveryman of Oakland. Among those from a distance attending the funeral were Miss Ella Martin, Mr. James Kelley, Mrs. Thomas Roy, all of Benwood, W. Va. Mrs. Roy is the deceased's sister.

AUGUSTA HERMAN.

The subject of this death notice died Monday evening at the Loch Lynn Heights Hotel where he had been pianist for several years. The cause of the death was gastritis and heart trouble. Undertaker Bolden propared the remains for burial and shipped them to the deceased's former home, 1323 Mt. Royal avenue, Baltimore City. The body was accompanied from the hotel to the depot by the band now at the Chautauqua, which played a funeral march while the procession proceeded.

ROBRET LOVELL TUCKER.

At the Echard cottage at Mt. Lake Park, Robert died Monday. He was eight months old and his home was in Sutton, W. Va., where his remains were shipped Tuesday. The parents had brought the child to the Park with the idea of improving his health.

Church Services.

HOYES.

DELAYED.

Mr. and Mrs. John Chase returned to Hoyes Monday, after spending two weeks with Mrs. Chase's sister, Mrs. Custer, at Connellsville.

Miss Bernadette Mattingly was taken suddenly and seriously ill Monday. Dr. H. R. Boyer is the attending physician.

Miss Josie Browning, of Sang Run, returned to her home last Saturday after staying in Hoyes for several week.

Mr. William Callis, who is erecting a barn on his farm, had a "raising" last Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. George Seabold and children were visiting Mr. and Mrs. Willis Mattingly last Sunday. While there Mr. Seabold's baby was bitten by a dog.

Mr. Frank Koonts, of the firm of Koonts and Loudermilk, of Greensburg, Pa., was visiting his aunt, Mrs. J. M. Loudermilk.

Mr. Roy Custer, who has been attending school at Baltimore, is spending some of warm August days at his home at this place.

Mr. Ellen DeWitt, who left this place last spring to visit her children, has returned to her home.

SHERIFF'S SALE
OF VALUABLE
Coal Interests.

I, Albert L. Lee, Sheriff of Garrett county, hereby give notice, that under and by virtue of five writs of fieri facias, issued out of the Circuit Court for Garrett county, and to me directed, said writs being numbered 14, 17, 18, 19 and 20 Judicials, to September Term, 1907, at the suit of John Felty against Joel Bender, I have seized and taken in execution all the right, title and interest, at law and in equity, of the said Joel Bender, in and to the coal under those two tracts of land situate, lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, the first of which was conveyed by Elias Gnagey to Joel Bender, by deed dated July 15th, 1885, and recorded in Liber W. H. T. No. 18, folio 614, etc., one of the Land Records of Garrett county. The other tract is known and described as military Lot No. 3946, and was conveyed to the said Joel Bender by Camille E. Stephens, by deed dated August 27th, A. D. 1901, and recorded in Liber E. Z. T., No. 19, folio 125, etc., one of the Land Records of Garrett county.

I hereby give notice, that on the

5th day of September, A. D. 1907,

at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon, at the front door of the Court House, in the town of Oakland, Maryland, I will offer for sale to the highest bidder, for cash, the said coal to satisfy said executions.

Said coal will be sold subject to a Deed of Trust held by Gilmor S. Hamill, Trustee, for Julia Pierson against the said Joel Bender and others, dated November 21st, A. D. 1904, and recorded in Liber E. Z. T., No. 48, folio 201, etc., one of the Land Records of Garrett county.

Order of Publication.

No. 1479 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland.

Emma Fike vs. Ezra B. Fike.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree divorcing the plaintiff from the defendant a vinculo matrimonii.

The Bill states that the plaintiff was married to the defendant on the 6th day of November, 1898; that no children were born to them as the result of said marriage; that during all of the time that the plaintiff lived with the defendant, the defendant treated her with great cruelty, harshness and brutality, and that about two years ago he deserted her and has provided nothing for her support or maintenance since said time.

The Bill further charges that after the defendant deserted the plaintiff, that he consorted, cohabited and lived with one Mira Lowery; that the said defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, for an order of publication and for general relief.

It is thereupon, this 17th day of July, 1907, ordered by the Circuit Court of Garrett county, in Equity, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 16th day of August, 1907, give notice to the said defendant of the object and substance of this Bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 2nd day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to pass as prayed.

Love's Re-awakening

By AMANDA M. DOUGLAS.

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

Laura Fleming was roused from her reverie and nurse-like vigil by a low rap at the door. Hetty had gone to a neighbor's on an errand, so there was no one to answer it but herself.

A stranger, tall and certainly well-looking, in spite of the dust and fatigue of travel. As he uttered the word, she glanced at him rather sharply.

"Mrs. Parker—my mother—?"

Then she read the anxiety in his face, the almost mortal fear in his eyes, and she hurried to say: "Your mother is better; the fever turned last night."

"Thank God!"

He dropped on the low porch seat and covered his face with his hands. Laura did not disturb him for several minutes, then she said softly:

"Will you not walk in, Mr. Parker? Your mother is asleep, and Hetty is out, so I am playing nurse in the absence of anyone better."

He glanced at her. Tired and anxious as he was, and unnerved by the sudden revulsion, for he had fancied his mother lying a corpse here in the quiet parlor that he remembered so well, he yielded his soul to Laura Fleming at that very moment. I do not say "fell in love," for he really had not a thought of love in his mind, and yet he made one of those unconscious elections that turn the balance in the scale of human chances.

Laura Fleming was 23, though she would have passed for 18 easily. She was simply sweet and pretty, her serene eyes bespoke the motive power of a true, high soul, yet she was what people call a handsome woman at the first glance. She and Hetty Parker were good friends, and she often ran in to help her during the illness of Mrs. Parker.

Mr. Parker saw quite a good deal of the young lady, and every interview tended to deepen his first impression. Mrs. Parker was extravagantly fond of her.

Mrs. Parker improved rapidly, yet she clung to her son with a peculiar tenderness.

He made two or three flying visits to New York, and entered into a new business arrangement, giving up his position at St. Louis, which afforded his mother the greatest satisfaction possible. She watched the young people closely, but said nothing.

It would be necessary for Mr. Parker to take a trip westward for a fortnight or so. His mother was well enough to leave, so he finished his preparations, after making Laura promise that she would spend part of the time with her. She stayed to tea that evening, and he walked home with her. A lovely moonlight night it was. It affected Laura in a peculiar fashion, though she was not much given to romance, and she lapsed into a quiet mood. Mr. Parker was quiet also, and hardly a word was spoken until they reached the gate.

"Laura, I Love You."

"I must say good-by for a fortnight," and he glanced into her face. "It seems hard to go away."

"Does it?" and she smiled, then looked suddenly grave. "Your mother will miss you sadly."

"Yes; but I shall come back soon, Laura—"

He had never called her that before, and there was something in his eyes that startled her, made her heart beat with a quick bound.

"Laura, I love you."

Some strange impulse urged him to say this, though it was altogether unlike the imaginary wooing he had dreamed of so many times. Laura's brow deepened with a conscious flush, and her eyes were downcast.

"Have you no word for me?"

His voice was full of tender pleading, and swayed her powerfully.

"I don't know. I did not think—"

He caught her hand; for when he saw how utterly unconscious she had been, he resolved to make her love him. The delicious ardor of a newly-awakened love should be his.

When he bade her good-by an hour later, they were pledged to each other. He told his mother the welcome tidings that night, and when Laura entered the room the next day, with a shyness quite new to her, she received a mother's kiss and blessing.

Laura smiled over her old dead romance. Doubt, uncertainty, as misunderstanding or two, and a good deal of unhappiness, had made the sum total. Instead all was the very plainest sailing. After John's return, he fell into a regular courtship, and three months later, when he found it necessary to take quite an extended business trip, he insisted upon a marriage.

Laura demurred at first, but finally, after the manner of women, allowed herself to be overruled.

They loved each other very much. His regard had been the warmest and most unreasonable in the beginning; hers, of slower growth, went silently to the very depths of her soul, and at length touched every chord of her being.

And so they came to another summer. Mrs. Parker did not regain her full strength after her illness, and her sister, who lived at the seaside, insisted upon taking her thither for a change. In the meanwhile, Laura's sister, Mrs. Walton, came to make her a visit.

John had been his mother's escort, and just returned. They sat round the tea-table, Mrs. Walton chatting in a merry fashion. John was mentioning some people whom he had met.

"There was a bride—Mr. and Mrs. Eustace—and the groom was a real handsome young fellow, but dreadfully conscious."

"Oh, Laura! it's Harry Eustace. I forgot to tell you. You heard that he had a fortune?"

"No!" and Laura looked up with a mirthful smile.

"Yes. Some old maiden aunt or other left him $75,000, the story goes, and this Miss McGee whom he has married is worth $50,000 or $60,000. See what you missed!"

"All owing to a cruel father," and Laura laughed in spite of herself. "Well, I suppose we all do foolish things in our salad days, as Cleopatra calls them."

A look in her husband's eyes led Laura to change the subject. John had confessed that he was exacting, and might be jealous, but she had only smiled over the announcement when it was made. If he demanded a good deal, he also gave generously. Could such a foolish thing distress him?

He was undeniably grave. Laura was glad when they could be alone. Placing her arm around his neck, and dropping on one knee, a kind of pet fashion she had, she kissed him fondly.

"John," she began, "did you feel troubled about what Kate said? I should have told you if it had been of any importance. I was not quite 17 when this Harry Eustace fell desperately in love with me. He was barely 20, handsome, and morbidly heroic, but indolent, and with no sort of pride or ambition. Father would not consent to an engagement, and sent me away to school. I thought it very cruel, and tried to make myself as miserable as possible; but when I returned home with a year's growth of sense and judgment, I found his sentimental nonsense dreary trash indeed, and had no further desire to continue the acquaintance."

"But I suppose he was not your only lover?" Mr. Parker asked, a little coldly.

"Laura's face was scarlet, partly from a feeling of delicacy, partly indignation.

"Very few girls reach the age of 23 without having had one or more lovers. Yet I think the love I should have given at 17 would have been very immature and unreasoning. I should have married then to please a crude, girlish fancy; now I have learned the sacredness of life, and would take no man's love without being sure that I could give every thought of my soul in return."

"Thank you for the confidence;" and there it ended.

Laura was a little wounded, and too proud to make any further confession. She rose and began to busy herself about some trifle.

It actually seemed to John Parker that he had received a mortal blow. That this woman, in whom he had placed the most implicit faith, who had solemnly assured him that he was her first love, should now confess a fancy for another, and even hint that that there had been more than one! But regret was of no avail. He could not undo the past. He had yielded to a hasty passion, and blighted a life that he had dreamed would be so happy. His faith in Laura was shattered.

And yet he meant to be very noble. He would not betray the secret anguish that must hereafter be his companion.

He was, if possible, more solicitous than ever. Every little act of politeness that he could offer her or Mrs. Walton was done in a kind and graceful manner.

Poor Laura. To keep bright and cheerful when her heart seemed breaking, was not specially productive of enthusiasm. Not that Mr. Parker was insincere or had grown a tyrant in private life, but the charm of tenderness and confidence was gone.

She lived through a wretched month, although they were outwardly gay. Then Mrs. Walton went home and the two were left alone.

Laura resolved, dozens of times, in her husband's absence, that she would seek an explanation, and beg him to forgive whatever in the past might have pained or offended him. Every attempt failed, however.

Mother Parker wrote that she was much improved, and wished to return the first of September? Could not John and Laura come for her? It would be a pleasant change for them both, and she knew that Laura must need a rest.

"Shall we go?" Mr. Parker asked, gently, though there was a sort of indifference in his voice.

A sudden courage came to Laura. She placed her hand on her husband's arm, and said: "John—"

"My dear, it is nothing to be excited about. Act your own pleasure, and you will satisfy me."

"It is not that," and she choked down a strangling sensation. "John, your coldness is killing me! I know I could not endure it under your mother's fond, questioning eyes. If it must be, if you cannot forgive any fancied wrong, let me go home again—I shall be the happier there."

"Laura!" He was so amazed that he could not utter another word.

"Yes," she went on, her eyes deepening with excitement, "I must speak. I know it is the thought of that old fancy—you have not been the same since that night. John, if I could go back to the night on which you first spoke, I would tell you every act of my life—many foolish ones, doubtless, but heaven will bear me witness that I never designedly flirted. I have had several fancies, but as soon as I became convinced that I could not love

"I Tell You Again That I Cannot Endure This Cold, Starved Life."

the man who offered me any attention, I always ended the acquaintance. To-night I feel pure and true in the sight of God; but I am not so in yours, let us part, cost what it may."

"Laura, you are my wife. I have not found any fault. You are hasty in talking of a separation."

She rose and stood before him, in her lofty womanly pride, her eyes lustrous with tears that she kept from dropping by a strong effort of will. A desperate resolution was expressed in every feature.

"I must have your trust and love as entire as they were two months ago, or nothing! I tell you again, that I cannot endure this cold, starved life. John, when our engagement was first made known, a wise gossip desired to enlighten me concerning your past life, declaring that you had flirted desperately with half the girls in Melrose, and that you meant nothing beyond that with me. Perhaps I was credulous, but I felt so sure of your truth that it never gave me an anxious thought. I was quite satisfied to take the love you offered me without making myself miserable over the fact that you had cared for other women, been fond of them, kissed them, and perhaps led them to love you more than well for their happiness. Men often do this thoughtlessly. How can we women tell that this is not all real, and hold ourselves aloof, when our hearts, it may be, declare in favor of the one who sues? And then are we to be blamed for a kiss or caress innocently given? Is it fair for a man to demand the woman he marries shall never have experienced the slightest interest in another person, while he has not hesitated to make himself fascinating to most of the women he has met?"

John Parker opened his eyes wide. There was Laura, beautiful, with truth and courage, placing facts before his eyes in their clearest light.

"Laura!"

They glanced at each other for a moment. In his heart of hearts, John Parker knew that he loved and trusted this woman, and he entertained a faint suspicion that he might have been a little unreasonable. He could not say with truth that he had never flirted; indeed, his conscience was rather tender still on one or two old affairs.

"My darling!"

She came to his arms and wept some tears of passionate joy and grief upon his shoulder. And then, after a long silence, he said, in a tender, solemn voice: "My own wife, I have the most to be forgiven."

"And when I loved you I took you as you were," she whispered, softly. "But I want your perfect trust."

"You shall have it henceforth."

And John Parker felt that she was right. His eyes grew clearer on the subject; I think, too, that he was very glad to be happy again.

And as the years passed on he was more than satisfied with Laura's love. No doubt nor trouble came to mar their confidence, and Kate Walton still declares them a perfect couple. John smiles sagely sometimes as he listens to the demands of younger men, and thinks sorrowfully, perhaps, of the little they have to give in return.

PILGRIM JOE'S DOINGS

Meets Up With an Old Man Who Is Also Traveling.

BUT THEY FAIL TO AGREE.

The Pilgrim Shows How Integrity Triumphs In the Long Run—He Has a Rather Queer Experience In the Town of Happy Day.

[Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.]

I was on the road with my outfit between the enterprisin' towns of Lost Hopes and Kerplunk when I met up with an old kuss who was travelin' in the opposite direction. With his white hair and whiter whiskers he had a venerable appearance, and at first I believed him to be in the pilgrim business with myself. As we both halted I smiled a greetin' at him and said:

"Truth may be buried for a day, but truth cannot be squelched."

"And though integrity may now and then stop to rest she gets there just the same," he replied.

Then we began to tell how good it felt to be good, and I had got to thinkin' that the old chap's soul was fairly swimmin' in benevolence when he observed:

"It has happened to me very often that I wished I could play the game of poker, in order that I might point out to my fellow men the wickedness of it and thereby keep them in the narrow road. Does it happen that you can teach me? Now and then I come across a mortal who has lost his all on ace-full by bein' confronted with four tens. He mourns and mourns and I cannot comfort him."

"I have occasionally played a game in order to send a few dollars to the heathen of Africa," I said. "Any other object would of course be unworthy of our noble callin'."

"Of course. We labor to lift up the downtrodden and soothe the disconsolate. Get thee down and take a seat on the greensward and teach me the game that has brought so much sorrow to the hearts of humanity."

Another Look at His Face.

As I descended from my wagon I got another look at his face. Benevolence had been replaced by cupidity, and in a moment I was on to his little scheme. I went ahead, however, and explained the value of the cards and advised with him as to the sort of frozen look he must wear when he had a poor hand and wanted to bluff. In fifteen minutes he was ready to experiment. I saw him foolin' the pasteboards like an old gambler, but I played my dependence on integrity and said nothin'. After a few hands in which honors were even, he got what he had been sighing for and raised the ante four or five times on me before the draw. When I found myself with a full house I knew that the African heathen would have silk undershirts for the summer. I raised him until we had a hundred bones on the blanket, and then he called and showed a flush and a walloped man. I had scarcely gathered up the long green when he was on top of me and had me by the throat. For three or four minutes it seemed as if villainy must triumph and virtue take a lickin', but then I rallied and turned him over and sat on him and chugged him and plunked him and batted him and swatted him, and when I let up on him he was a man with no ambition left. I believe he was sayin' somethin' as I left, but I passed it by and said to myself that a good man may sometimes get in a tight pinch, but that integrity comes gallopin' up to put fresh beef into his struggles.

Before goin' further I wish to warn the public that an individual without the fear of bein' kicked to death by a mule before his eyes has put upon the market what he calls Sister Mary's Alleviator and is seekin' to carry the impression that I have gone out of the business of cheerin' and alleviatin' sufferin' humanity.

Let no one be deceived.

Sister Mary is not my sister. She is not a sister to any one else.

I have not sold out to a trust or any one else.

Only True Alleviator.

My alleviator is the only true alleviator in this world. It has cheered and cured its millions and is still in the business.

Put up in pink wrappers to look like strawberry ice cream, and the corks stick out of the bottle half an inch, so they can be drawn with the teeth.

If you have lost a horse or a cow, take one dose.

If you are goin' to lose your farm on a mortgage, take two.

If the children are down with the measles, the old woman in for appendicitis and the roof of the barn has fallen in and killed the cows, sip liberally—that is, sip until you find yourself whistlin' "Yankee Doodle" and don't care a darn whether school keeps or not.

Only one failure recorded in twenty years, and that was because the man was born with only one lung and his heart had worked around against his spine.

In showin' my movin' pictures, which do move, in the town of Stop Here a few evenings since I put on "Washington Crossing the Delaware." This is one of my most takin' pictures. It is so lifelike that you can see Washington drinkin' cider out of a flask to warm his cold feet. You can almost hear him say, "Don't give up the ship." In showin' that picture I have had audiences stand on their feet and yell for 'leven consecutive minutes, while women wept and babies howled. I expected it would make the usual hit on this occasion; but, alas, it was received in frozen silence. Not a whoop nor a cheer. I tried to pound it into the audience that it was Washington—George Washington—and that he was crossing the Delaware—the Delaware river, full of floatin' ice—but the harder I pounded the more frozen the silence. I finally stopped talkin' to inquire if American patriotism was dead, and then pandemonium broke loose. The town had just elected a mayor by a large majority, and he was so jealous because I was givin' Washington a lead.

Tried to Explain Matters.

I tried to explain matters, but it was no use. The enraged population swarmed for me and drove me from the town in ignomy, and the destruction wrought to my property was $50. As I drove through the darkness and the pourin' rain I bent my head and reposed my chin on my breast and asked myself why be good? Why seek to solace my fellow mortals? Why care a tinker's dum whether mankind was happy or miserable? I was feelin' that integrity was but a holler reed to lean upon when she appeared through the darkness and changed the whole programme—that is, I caught sight of the light in the house of a pioneer, and upon knockin' at the door he made me welcome. That night I sat with him for two hours showin' him how to avoid the cesspool of poker, and when I departed in the mornin' I was $62 richer and the pioneer had twice that in experience.

At the town of Happy Day next day one of the tintypes I take for 10 cents a take did not please the fairy creature who posed for it. She thereupon rallied all the other fairy creatures in the town, and assisted by a few men who hadn't the interests of their country at heart they descended upon me in solid phalanx. Again I suffered discomfiture. I was mauled with a club, my fightin' dog kicked in the ribs and my tent torn down, and as I drove out of the town on a gallop I was almost determined to give up the pilgrim business for a berth in some legislature where I could sell my vote to both sides. Integrity came gallopin' along just in the nick of time—that is, I looked ahead and saw a fat wallet reposin' in the middle of the road. In another minute it was mine. There was over a hundred dollars in it, and as Integrity had departed before I finished countin' the greenbacks and I couldn't ask her advice I counted the money into my own hoard and went on blessin' her name.

Vice is full of fried oysters and angels' food, and she sits behind plate glass winders, but when you want a 100 to 1 shot try Integrity. She always brings the good with her.

The Workers.

The builders of a city are the lowly men,
but strong.
They DO while others play with art and music in the throng.
The brawn of arm, the thews of chest,
the sturdy frame and limb
Build ever upward through the day until the spires are dim.

The men who go with dinner-pails serve the long hours through
Are those who raise the structure up toward the dome of blue.
No dream of literature or art, no struggling for a name
Debars them from the builder's part—the city is their fame!

Ah ye, who idle through the day and dream of glory's page,
Remember that the kings of men are those on action's stage—
The great, strong men who work all day while you but play with fame
And leave a few charred heaps of Hope behind you for a name!

No city would there be for you in which to dream and play,
If men who go with pick and pail should loiter on their way.
The world has need of men with dreams,
but we should value, too,
The virtue of the builders who have made our dreams come true!

The president of the gas company has a light income.

When a man flatters a woman anent her beauty, she never thinks it necessary to go to the looking glass for the truth.

A Chicago man appeared at a society event recently in a white full dress suit. He was almost as good a joke as Mark Twain in his bath robe.

The Educational Unit Now Means the Community

By JAMES P. MONROE, Organizer of the Social Educational Congress

HALF a century ago the church and the home, directly or indirectly, gave that moral background and ETHICAL DISCIPLINE which every child and youth must absolutely have. Today the church gets even less hold than the school upon thousands of young people, and the houses of many rich, no less than the tenements of many poor, are MOCKERIES OF HOME. Today, with insignificant exceptions, a boy must pick up his trade education as best he may, and our huge industrial establishments are transmuting potential citizens into replaceable parts of an UNTHINKING MACHINE.

Before the civil war the children of New England and the middle west imbibed in the town meeting, the children of the south imbibed in that keenest of political atmosphere, the spirit and ideals of democracy bequeathed by those who MADE America. Today hundreds of thousands are pouring in from every corner of the globe, many of them hostile to all forms of government and knowing no distinction between LIBERTY AND LICENSE, all of them needing to be painfully taught the very ELEMENTS of responsible citizenship.

Most significant of all, the development of machinery, with its attendant co-operation and combination of interests, its resulting wealth, luxury, rapid intercommunication, social congestion and complexity, has so bound society together that the moral ruin of the meanest youth or the failure to assimilate the humblest immigrant affects as never before THE WHOLE CIVIC BODY. The educational unit is no longer the individual, no longer the family, no longer even the school. It is the WHOLE COMMUNITY, and what corrupts or destroys one member of that community contaminates the whole.

THE OLD EDUCATION WAS INDIVIDUAL, AND THEREFORE SIMPLE; THE NEW EDUCATION MUST BE PRE-EMINENTLY SOCIAL, AND THEREFORE MORE AND MORE COMPLEX.

Marriage Minus the Love

By Rev. MADISON C. PETERS

WHEREFORE the evil pre-eminence of our country in the divorce court?

Is not our civilization, our Christianity menaced by this monster that has dared to raise its gorgon head in our midst, whose pestiferous breath is BLIGHTING THE FAIR FAME of our beloved land?

The divorce evil is the direct resultant of LOVELESS MARRIAGES—marriages for money, position, power—marriages of convenience.

Where love is NOT, generally HATE is found, and hate is the name of one of the leading doors to the divorce court.

The husband hates and despises the woman who married him for his gold AND NOT FOR HIMSELF, and hate begets hate and fury.

She who sold herself in the market place to the highest bidder realizes her mistake too late, and all her hatred, spite and vengeance are centered on him who PURCHASED HER with his gold.

Women, young women, take timely warning by the thousands and tens of thousands of your hapless sisters who have bowed before the golden calf BROKEN HEARTED.

LET THEM ENABLE YOU TO STEER A SAFE COURSE INTO THE HAVEN OF EARTHLY HAPPINESS—MARRIAGE FOR LOVE AND WORTH ALONE—A HOLY ALLIANCE WHICH GOD WILL BLESS.

The Only Feasible Method For Reaching the North Pole

By Commander R. E. PEARY, U. S. N.

WHILE I don't want to appear as criticising the plans of others personally, I have NO FAITH in the airship or allied means for reaching the north pole. If it was possible to bring an airship to such a degree of perfection that it would be as reliable as an ocean liner and dirigible enough to withstand the sudden and remarkable fluctuations of circumpolar aerial navigation and be able to go to windward—ALL OF WHICH IT IS NOT—then we might talk with reason about balloons and aeroplanes.

An airship as it is at present would meet with insurmountable difficulties, rapid fluctuations in temperature there being about as fierce and as variable as the winds. Then, the heavy falls of snow weighing on the balloon would make a very APPRECIABLE difference in its weight, with consequent difficulties in its management.

The rise and fall of temperature to the extent of a difference of 25 degrees with or without the sun would naturally have its effect on the gas and on the MECHANICAL OPERATION of the ship.

I have in no way changed my opinion regarding the proper way to reach the pole. My allegiance to the Smith's sound or American route is unimpaired. I have always admitted the possibilities of the drift method of reaching the pole, if a ship can be put into the ice AT THE PROPER PLACE, manned by men of such temperament as would permit them to submit patiently to a campaign which would not be aided in the least by their own efforts.

Of course it is impossible to say how long such a method would require to be successful. It might take five or six or ten years to drift over the pole or to approach sufficiently near it to make it possible for sledge parties to reach it without any extraordinary difficulties.

I am strongly opposed to the use of any attempt to use untried or UNDEVELOPED IDEAS in the polar regions. The far north is not safe ground for experiments, as I have always maintained, and as I have again found that the only practicable agencies for travel over the rough ice floes and ridges of the polar seas are man and the Eskimo dog.

THESE IDEAS OF ELECTRICAL SLEDGES AND AIRSHIPS AS CONTRIVANCES ON WHICH TO REACH THE POLE ARE BASED, IT SEEMS TO ME, ON LACK OF KNOWLEDGE OF PREVAILING CONDITIONS UP THERE.

NATION'S 1906 DRINK BILL.

Increase Of Eleven Millions Over Previous Year—Billion More Cigars.

A billion more cigars and several more million gallons of whiskey and beer were consumed last year by the American people than during the previous year. The annual report of the Collector of Internal Revenue shows receipts from all sources for the year of $269,664,022, or $20,561,284 more than in 1906.

The receipts from spirits were $156,336,901.89, or the surprising sum of $12,942,846 more than the previous year. Tobacco brought $51,811,069.69, as against $48,422,997.38; fermented liquors, $59,567,818.18, an increase of close to $4,000,000; oleomargarine, $887,641.31, compared with $570,037.93; adulterated butter, $12,743.60, last year $9,258.43; renovated butter, $161,796.79, as against $138,000; miscellaneous fell off $40,000.

Of corn, rye and other whiskies the consumption was 11,409,252 gallons above the previous fiscal year, or 134,142,074 gallons.

All Crops Short.

The Department of Agriculture, in its report for July, estimates the shortage in wheat of 95,000,000 bushels of winter, while spring has the promise of almost 2,000,000 bushels more than last year. Indications for corn are for 410,000,000 bushels less than last year. Oats are short 21,000,000 bushels; rye is 2,226,000 bushels less, and barley nearly 12,000,000 bushels under the harvest of 1906.

Blossoms.

Of all the fairest flowers
In spring and summer born,
That close their eyes at even tide
And smile to greet the morn,
There're two that I love dearest—
I mourn for them when dead.
The pure white apple-blossoms.
And the blushing roses red.

Among the time worn relics
Of my hope that long-since fled
Are a faded dust-stained blossom,
And a rose that once was red;
They're more to me than treasures,
Those petals red and white,
They bring to me sacred memories
Of a being pure and bright.

And visions that long have faded
As fresh as in boyhood seem,
And the years with their sorrows vanish
And I dream again youth's dream;
And so, of all earth's flowers
In beauty and purity dressed,
I love the pure white blossoms
And the blushing roses best.

WM. L. THOMAS.

His Dire Threat.

There was determination stamped on his brow.

"Refused, eh!" he hissed, snapping his words like the explosions of a motorcycle. "Then I shall turn on the gas."

The beautiful girl swooned. When she recovered she found him sitting in an easy chair reading the sporting news.

"Ah, you didn't turn on the gas after all did you?" she asked in trembling tones.

"Yes, I did," he replied coldly.

"You—you turned on the gas, Harold?"

"Of course I did. How could I light it if I didn't turn it on?"

And then she asked him forgiveness and accepted him on the spot.

Editorial Inspiration.

"May I introduce to you my friend?" asked a fashionable young man at a recent dance. "He is a litewawy man, you know."

"Indeed!" exclaimed his partner.

"Aw, yes. He sent the Society News a list of the guests at the last pahty, and the editah accepted it."

An Angered Spinster.

"When I was coming home last night," said Miss Skeery, "I saw a man skulking alone in the shadow. Oh, how I ran!"

"An' couldn't you catch him?" inquired her little brother, innocently.

SOME PEN PICTURES OF GEO. R. GAITHER

Telling Facts About the Republican Candidate for Governor.

IS A GREAT LOVER OF HIS HOME

Has No Amount of Personal Egotism —Cares Nothing for So-Called Society—Is a Member of the Episcopal Church—Has Two Sons.

A gentleman of medium size, more "spare" than stout, with a kindly face and a benevolent expression. His eyes sometimes appear blue, and then again you think they are gray. His hair is thin, and what is left of it is of a brownish color, turning a bit gray. His moustache is about the same shade. He wears glasses. His voice is soft, and he talks in well modulated tones. His manner indicates cordiality, sympathy and gentleness but when he opens his mouth he speaks with conviction. This is George R. Gaither, the man nominated by the Republican party of Maryland as its candidate for governor.

Mr. Gaither has no amount of personal egotism. He has, though, what every one would call a "nice face." It is suggestive of kindliness and consideration for others. He has the rare faculty of being mentally and morally strong and at the same time gentle. His whole career in public life has demonstrated that he has the character to stand out for what he believes to be right and to oppose what he believes to be wrong. In this respect he is rugged. It was because he was this sort of man that his party nominated him. He was not selected because he is a "good fellow" or more because people like him. He was the choice of the Convention because he was regarded as having unusual moral and mental force and strength. His running for governor means the paramount issue is George R. Gaither. His individuality must necessarily be the foundation of his platform regardless of the number of planks it contains.

He is a Republican from conviction, having left the Democratic party in the '80s on the tariff question. Since then he has been a consistent Repuolican, but not a partisan, spoilsman or office-seeker. He has stood for the principles of the Republican party and has indorsed bad Republicans no more than he has indorsed bad Democrats. There is not a man in the State who has ever been, and still is, a greater advocate for clean and honest methods in politics.

When Mr. Gaither left the Democratic camp for that of the Republicans he did not forfeit the regard and respect of his friends. They know he was not a grafter and that he was not hunting spoils. Had he not been the man of sterling character he is he could not have made the jump over the political fence and retained his self-respect and that of his former friends. But he did not change his principles with his politics. He had a clear definition between right and wrong, and those who knew him best would not relinquish his high moral standard. He remained true to his personal friends, and they remained true to him. In fact, one of them—a former law partner—is Mr. William S. Bryan, Jr., at present Democratic Attorney General of the State. If anyone would get a fair personal estimate as a man of George Gaither, let him ask "Willie" Bryan, although they are political opponents.

Like many other well-to-do Baltimoreans of the present period, Mr. Gaither has two residences—his "town" house, at No. 602 Cathedral street, and his summer home, called Oak Lawn, on the Old Frederick road and Ingleside avenue, about one mile from Catonsville.

Oak Lawn is an attractive retreat in summer. The house is of weatherboard and it has wide verandas on three sides. There are wicker rockers, settees, and reclining chairs that add a touch of comfort and inspire the visitor with the "stay-longer idea." The front of the porch is protected from the sun by climing vines of Virginia creeper, and on the grassy lawn are numerous oaks and other forest trees. But the garden is the great feature of the out-of-door life at Oak Lawn. Mr. Gaither is much intested in it, but it is the special pride of Mrs. Gaither ,and the gardener. There are quanities of what is known as "hardy flowers." The garden is now resplendent with many variegated blossoms, including hollyhocks, dahlias azaleas, marigolds, heliotrope, scarlet sage, hydrangias and, of course, roses. From the vegetable garden the family table is supplied, with always an extra basket of tomatoes, corn, beans or potatoes for a neighbor.

Mrs. Gaither is a "home woman" and is found of home influences. She of course exchanges visits with feminine friends, entertains some and occasionally attends the entertainments given by others but she does not care a great deal for what is termed "society." Under any circumstances she will probably take a more or less active part in social life next winter, because Miss Imogen Gaither, the youngest child and only daughter of the house, will be one of the season's debutantes. Should her father be elected Governor the young lady would naturally be very much in the public eye. It could not be said that politics is especially attractive to Mrs. Gaither. She has so far kept herself removed from anything of the kind but naturally she is much interested in the success of her husband. Like Mrs. Warfield who has become so popular in the present State administration, Mrs. Gaither is rather adverse to the publicity side of the Governorship business, but she is anxious and willing to help her husband in every consistent way. Her own pleasure, however, is in her home and her flowers. She would be willing to stay at the country home all winter if it suited the rest of the household.

There are two Gaither "boys." The eldest, George R., Jr., named after his father, and also his grandfather, the late Col GeorgeR. Gaither, is at present visiting friends down in the Valley of Virginia. He was sent to Princeton, but has annouuced that he wants to be a "farmer." The second son, H. Granger Gaither, called after his mother's side of the house, is a student at the University of Virginia, but is at home for the vacation period. He is studying law, and will probably enter his father's firm after he graduates. The Gaithers are Episcopalians. They attend Grace Church in winter and join the congregation at St. Timothy's Church, Catonsville, in the summer. Mr. Gaither, the candidate is a simple man in his tastes. He likes the companionship of the the family circle and close friends. He is rather bookish also, and his favorite room in the town house is his library. In the way of out-of-door sports he has a fondness for golf, and has a miniature course at Oak Lawn. But his favorite game is tennis. Briefly George R. Gaither likes his home, his friends, his books, his garden, his cigar, when in congenial company, his club with the right crowd around, golf and tennis. He would also like, it is presumed, to be elected Governor of Maryland, and he has many advocates who wish to see his ambition realized.—The Baltimore News.

FELL FOMR FENCE; BROKE HIS LEG

Alex. Hesen Met With Unfortunate Accident Monday Night.

Last Monday evening about nine o'clock Mr. Calvin H. Echard, who lives on Pennington street adjoining the public school property, heard groan eminating from a source which he was at first unable to determine, but upon going to his door he discovered that some one was laying in an adjacent vacant lot and evidently in great pain as the groaning continued without intermission. Upon investigation he found that Alex Hesen was lying upon the ground perfectly helpless and almost unconscious from pain.

Mr. Echard summoned help and a physician, who upon making an examination of the man discovered that his right leg was broken at a point midway between the ankle and knee. Aside from this no other injury was apparent. He was taken to his home just opposite from where he was found and there the fracture was reduced by Dr. McComas.

The morning following the accident Mr. Hesen stated that he had been struck on the head from the rear and after being robbed of an amount approaching $100 he was thrown bodily over the fence which produced the fracture of his leg.

Wedding at Accident.

The home of Mrs. Elizabeth Englehart of this place was the scene of a pretty wedding, August 18, 1907. The contracting parties were Mr. William A. Hauser, of Hauser, Md., and Miss Anna S., daughter of Mrs. Elizabeth Englehart. The ceremony was performed by Rev. H. C. Salem of Friendsville, who used the beautiful marriage service of the Lutheran church. The wedding march was played by Mrs. Gillian Kight in her usual skillful manner.

After the ceremony refreshments were served. The happy couple will reside at Hauser, Md. The best wishes of their many friends go with them. Both the bride and groom are prominent in social circles and active in church work. The bride will be greatly missed in the English Lutheran church at Accident, where she has served as organist.

The following were the guests present: Mrs. Elizabeth Englehart, Miss Etta Bowser, Alvan and Erman Englehart, Mr. and Mrs. John Englehart and family, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Speicher and family, Mr. and Mrs. D. C. Bowman, Mr. and Mrs. Asa Beeghley and son, Mrs. Gillian Kight and sons, Misses Anna and Nellie Shaffer, Ida Margroff, Sophia Ault, Martha Schlossnagle, Tillie Englehart, Emma Bowman, May Piper, Minnie Kamp, Gertrude Richter, Mr. and Mrs. Bennie Frantz and family, William and Henry Bowman, Erman and Doll Smearman, Howard Schlossnagle, Lawrence Speicher, A. J. Richter, all of Accident; Rev. Salem, wife and family; Ernest Hauser, brother of the groom, and Miss Merrell Fowler, of Hauser; Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Gnegy, of Mt. Lake; Miss Julia Enlow, of Thayerville.

Communicated.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

DEAR SIR:—I wish to make a statement through the columns of THE REPUBLICAN, or in other words "a correction" of a report that has been circulated among the people of District No. 2 in Garrett county. I wish to say to the Republican voters of District No. 2 that I am before you, an applicant for County Treasarer. I stand before you alone; not attached to any combination in any way, and I mostemphatically deny the assertion that I am in combination with Mr. J. S. Myers or any one else. If my opponents wish to base their opposition on this report they are placing it on something that has no foundation whatever. While it is true that there have been several propositions made to me, but in each case I only considered them, but did not accept any of them. I further wish to say that in my judgment the time has come in District No. 2 to do away with combinations and give the voters of our District the privilege of saying by their ballots in the primary which one of the several aspirants for office is entitled to a delegation to represent them in the coming county convention.

Respectfully submitted,
F. G. Fox.

Friendsville, Md., Aug. 27, 1908.

Preached Farewell Sermon.

Rev. George C. Shaw, rector of St. Matthew's Parish, preached his farewell sermon to the Oakland congregation in the church here on Sunday morning to a large audience of parishioners and friends. Mr. Shaw will shortly leave here for Cumbdrland where he has accepted the pastorate of a thriving church in that city. He and his family have the best wishes of their Oakland acquaintances for a pleasant sojourn in the Queen City.

YOUGH RIVER OIL AND GAS COMPANY

Determination to Drive the Well to a Depth of 4000 Feet Arrived At.

PROSPECTS FOR OIL EXCELLENT.

A New Formation Reached at 3000 Feet Which Encourages the Board of Directors to go Deeper—Stockholders Meeting.

The well now being drilled on the John Harned farm by the Yough River Oil Gas Co., on Saturday last reached a depth of 3005 feet. At that depth a formation was reached which is entirely dissimilar to anything heretofore penetrated since the drilling began and the Board of Directors of the company at a meeting on Monday evening, after receiving reports from the well committee and upon the advice of experts in the oil business, determined to push the work of sinking the well to a depth of at least 4000 feet, or until oil or gas is found in paying quantities.

There is every reason for the stockholders and the community generally to be encouraged and the hope of finding oil or gas at the present location is becoming stronger each day.

The stockholders' meeting to be held on the 7th of September for the purpose of increasing the capital stock, should be largely attended and those who find it impossible to be present in person should send in their proxies to the secretary without delay.

It is the firm belief of the management that the company is on the eve of important discoveries and it is possible that before the stockholders' meeting takes place the well will have been drilled into the "pay" sand.

It is the firm determination of the Board of Directors to thoroughly test the territory and should success attend this first effort the stock of the company cannot be obtained at any reasonable price whatever.

Swanton Locals.

Rev. Geo. C. Shaw preached his farewell sermon in Anderson Chapel Sunday evening, August 25th, to an excellent and most attentive congregation.

Mr. J. Morris Miller, of Goochland Co, Va., brother of C. M. Miller, is recovering from his protracted and severe illness from typhoid fever.

Mr. George C. Turner, of the Citizens Bank of Richmond, Virginia, has been on a visit of a week to the Miller family, his close kindred, in Swanton.

Miss Ella Cunningham, and her friend Miss Small, of Washington, D. C., are spending a week with Mrs. Fairall.

NEIGHBORLY NOTES.

Items of Interest of Our Neighbors in West Virginia and Maryland.

Oil has been struck in Barbour county, W. Va.

West Virginia is getting her flags out for the visit of Vice President Fairbanks who will be at Elkins in October.

Attorney W. H. Griffith, of Keyser, while at the Jamestown Exposition, got on a crowded trolly car and was thrown from it breaking his right arm in two places and shattering his left shoulder. At use on the car blew out and gave the car a sudden stop, thus throwing the attorney into a mud hole.

The West Virginia Methodist Protestant Conference which has been in session at Elkins, refused to readmit Rev. I. A. Barnes to its membership. About a year ago he became miffed at something which the Conference had done, withdrew, and then joined another. When he wanted to re-join, he was rejected.

The remains of a baby were drawn last week from a well at Keyser.

ACCIDENT.

We have had a great deal of rain the past week but we are enjoying nice weather this week and the farmers in this vicinity are busy cutting oats.

Mrs. R. A. Ravenscroft and son Randall who have been spending several weeks at their home in Baltimore, returned on Monday.

Miss Laura Ries spent Sunday with Miss Helen Miller.

Rev. Young preached an interesting sermon at the English Lutheran church on Monday evening.

Miss Amelia Ries, who has been spending a few weeks with friends near Meyersdale, returned home on Monday.

Ed. Diehl and best girl spent Sunday last at Jos. Groer's.

Mr. and Mrs. George Margroff are the proud parents of a little girl.

Mrs. Clare Friend and little daughter Melba of Pittsburg, are spending a few weeks with friends and relatives at this place.

Rev. H. H. Flick spent a few days of days of last week with friends and acquaintance at Accident.

Miss Mae Ravenscroft, who has been visiting friends and relatives at Meyersdale for the past two weeks, returned home Tuesday.

Mr. Herman Englehart, who has been spending the past week at Accident, left again on Saturday.

Messrs. F. C. Ries, and Wm. John Goehringer attended the sale at Meyersdale on Saturday.

HOW NEWS IS GOTTEN FROM PROMINENT MEN

How the Big Men Talk to Reporters in New York.

MANY ARE HARD TO REACH

Some Men Talk, Some Talk Sometimes, and Others Will Talk Anytime—J. P. Morgan, the Champion Sphinx.

The manager of one of the big press associations divides into three classes the men who are worth while interviewing: First, men who never talk; second men who will talk if the matter is of great moment; third, men who will talk anytime about anything—this last is the politician class. The classification was made for New York but is good anywhere.

Of the New York men in the public eyes just now Gov. Charles E. Hughes is in the brightest spotlight. He is very approachable to newspaper men. At Albany each day at noon he meets them all. They troop into the executive chamber and one, who has been selected to do the talking, puts categorically to the governor the questions agreed on. He answers them quietly and clearly, but rarely volunteers any information not asked for. He prefers to make his big statements in speeches. He does not give out prepared interviews. His publicity interests are in charge of Robert H. Fuller, his secretary, who was formerly a member of the New York Herald staff. Edward H. Harriman was for years "the sphinx" to newspaper men. Since his controversy with President Roosevelt he has grown approachable. The reporter must send his card and a short statement of the subject he wants to talk about. If Mr. Harriman considers the subject important he will admit the reporter. He now talks on many subjects and talks clearly and well though rapidly. He is courteous to the interviewer.

H. H. Rogers is in the same class with Harriman. He is more brusque in manner, though he will sometimes crack a joke with the reporter.

J. P. Morgan is one of the "never talk" class. It is about as hard for a reporter to see him in his office as to see the king of England.

John D. Rockefeller has been interviewed several times in the past year, but he is still in the "never talk" class. Curiously, the interviews given by Mr. Rockefeller were granted purely because he liked the young men who were assigned to get him to talk.

William R. Hearst has a fine sense of the news proprieties. He knows exactly when and how to talk. He had been a sphinx until his campaign for mayor two years ago. A crowd of newspaper men caught him in the lobby of the Gilsey house one afternoon and bombarded him with questions. He answered quietly, coolly, and his language was clear, forceful and elegant as the writing of Arthur Brisbane. The reporters were surprised. Since then he has been interviewed by many newspapers opposed to him and the reporters like the assignment. He talks best in the library of his own home on Lexington avenue. A stenographer could interview him as well as James Creelman. She would only need the title of her subject and a note book to take what he speaks.

Assignments to see William Travers Jerome, the district attorney, are given to the reporters whom he knows personally. They go straight into his office and fire at him point blank. If he is in the mood he will talk breezily for an hour. At other times no man living can get a word out of him. During the Thaw trial he would not speak a word on any subject to a newspaper man. He rarely gives out a typewritten interview.

In the beginning, Police Commissioner Bingham would talk to anyone at anytime on any subject. He was effusive. His stuff had to be censored for he interpolated between sentences vigorous English that is not printed. He has grown discreet. He meets the newspaper men at a stated time each day.

In spite of his genial character, Mark Twain is a difficult man to interview satisfactorily He avoids the interview if he can do it without being peremptory. If the reporter gets into his house on lower Fifth avenue he is likely to hear a bright thing or two from the humorist, but very little information. Mr. Clement saves his good things for his speeches. He would rather talk about his personal affairs to a big audience than to give facts about himself to a reporter.

Charles F. Murphy, the leader of Tammany Hall, is a very easy man to reach, but difficult to interview. Usually the reporters gather in a body and frame up a list of questions which one man fires. Mr. Murphy answers: "Yes," "No," "I have nothing to say."

Society Reporter at the Fire.

The regular reporter was taking a vacation and the editor was busy in the office, so when it was learned that on the previous evening there had been a fire in a remote part of the city, the young woman who writes the society news was sent to bring in a report of it for the paper. She came into the office an hour later with the following interesting account:

"Quite a number of people in this part of the city attended a fire last night at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Blank, on Thirteenth street. Some went in carriages and buggies, but a majority walked. The alarm was sounded about 9.30 and many who attended the fire had just returned from church, consequently they were already dressed for the occasion.

"Mr. Blank was not at home, being out of the city on business, hence the affair will be quite a surprise to him when he returns. Mr. Blank wore a light percale kimono and had her hair done up in kid curlers.

"The firemen responded readily and worked heroically to subdue the seething flames. Most of them were young and fairly good looking. They were dressed in oilcloth coats, cut short with trousers to match. The hat rims were narrow in front and broad behind, and sagged down in the rear. The chief's hat was ornamented with an octagonal brass spike, which stuck up above his head like a horn, giving him the appearance of a unicorn.

"When the flames broke out through the second story and cast a lurid hue over the surrounding buildings, the view was one never to be forgotten. At a late hour the sightseers went home, and all felt that they had passed an evening full of interest and excitement."—Nebraska (Kan.) Sun.

Mrs. Carter's Dog Dines.

Mrs. Leslie Carter-Payne, actress was the hosthss at a unique dinner at the Bellevue-Stratford yesterday. The guest of honor was Dimple, her English bulldog. The pet's dinner footed up to $7.50.

"It was easily worth it," said Mrs. Carter-Payne.

He husband, William L. Payne, seemed to derive considerable amusement from watching the bulldog partake of the high class fare. However, the dinner was quite in line with other attentions showered on Dimple. The little dog has a valet named Kelly, who wears English livery, including knee breeches.

Kelly manicured Dimple's nails yesterday as a preliminary to the dinner. This is what Dimple ate: Soup, fish, boiled lamb with peas and corn and any amount of filtered water.

Dimple is a temperate dog and wines were not served.—Philadelphia Ledger.

ANOTHER PLANT WIZARD.

Remarkable Achievement By Prof. Leduc, Of Nantes.

If Professor Leduc, of the pretty city of Nantes, in France, had flourished in the Middle Ages he would probably have been tried for witchcraft, tortured and burned. His particular variety of scientific necromancy consists in toying with life and in producing artificial plants and cells which conduct themselves exactly like natural growths, but which are composed only of inert matter.

Leduc's experiments are so simple that anyone can repeat them without elaborate implements. In the first place, a tiny seed must be made, which consists of two parts cane sugar and one part of copper sulphate. Drop this seed is a solution of 1 to 10 per cent. of potassium ferrocyanid, 1 to 10 per cent. of common table salt and 1 to 4 per cent. of gelatin, and in a few hours or days something will happen.

The seed germinates, roots and stems are produced, leaves unfold and branches shoot out in all directions. The growth would baffle a botanist. He could not distinguish it from a real plant.

The plant has all the functions of vegetation except one. Its development is arrested by poisons; it heals its wounds; it feeds; in a word, it does everything that can be expected of a plant except the reproduction of its own kind, and even that Leduc refuses to consider an unsurmountable obstacle.

Although Leduc's artificial plants resemble natural plants so closely, and he is himself inclined to consider them a form of life, his opponents hold that they are no more vital than a paper flower or a wax doll. Nevertheless, the experiments have raised a little scientific tempest in Germany and France.

Scientists are wondering if the gradation of living to dead matter are so fine that it is impossible to determine at what point life begins, just as among the lowermost creatures it is often impossible to classify organisms as plants or animals. If the functions of vegetation can be reproduced by what we have been pleased to regard as dead matter it would seem as though we should have to frame a new definition to life.—The Circle.

According to a recent rumor, a very mean man lives in Meyersdale. At a dance he spied a girl put her chewing gum under a chair when she started to waltz. Taking the gum he spread it out, inserted a piece of tobacco, rolled the gum up again, and stuck it under the chair. When she put the gum in her mouth again and the tobacco began to work, she was too homesick to dance any more.—Somerset Star.

A Grantsville young lady recently had a quarrel with her beau, and returned to him all the letters and little gifts she had received from him during their courtship. He, not to be outdone, sent her a half-dozen boxes of face powder, and with them a note explaning that he had probably carried that much away on his coat collar.—Somerset Star.

DOWN ON THE FARM

The unsophisticated chap from the city had passed his first night in the farmhouse.

"Waal, neighbor," drawled the farmer at breakfast, "how did you sleep last night?"

"Sleep?" blurted the chap in disgust. "Why man I was turning all night!"

The old man laughed uproariously.

"Kept turning, did you, neighbor? Waal, I told you that you would sleep like a top."

"Funny, eh? Well, do you know there was so much loose straw in the mattress it kept getting in my ears and nose all night?"

"Just so stranger. When you asked about the bed, didn't I say it would tickle you to death?"

And then the old farmer passed over the left-over pie and black coffee.

ROCKEFELLER FEARS ROBBERS.

Probably the most complete burglaralarm system in the world is installed in John D. Rockefeller's house at Cleveland. Both the burglar alarm and an intricate signaling system are tested nightly when the master is in the house, and if a defect is found an expert is immediately summoned to repair it.

It is reported, but not confirmed that Mr. Rockefeller sleeps in a room on the top floor the only entrance to which is through several other rooms, in which trusted lieutenants are stationed. At night brilliant arc lamps illuminated the grounds around the Rockefeller house and at least three men are always on duty patrolling the premises.

Mr. Rockefeller's fear of assassination is such that even in his own house he will not sit with his back to a window. When forced to travel he will never, if it can be avoided, enter the public waiting room of a railroad station, preferring to sit in the baggage room or some other secluded place. It was not vanity, it is said, which prompted him to buy his now famous wig, but the fact that his baldness made him too easily recognized. The oil magnate has two trusted bodyguards—one an Irishman and the other a Swiss. A century or more ago Irish and Swiss bodyguards were the favorites of royalty.—Cleveland Leader.

Growing Town and Business.

While in Blaine and Kitzmillerville a few days ago the writer called upon Mr. E. J. Hamill, Cashier of the First National Bank of Kitzmillerville and was surprised to find a prosperous financial institution in what appeared to be a dead town a few years ago. The bank although established only a little more than a year has $58,000 in deposits and a good surplus fund.

Its officers are R. A. Smith, president; C. E. Hilleary, vice president E. J. Hamill, cashier; R. A. Smith, C. E. Hilleary, Dr. R. A. Ravenscroft, F. A. Thayer, E. E. Clark, John M. Davis, A. C. Smith Chas. M. Wilson, Dr. H. P. Copeland, Wade Sapp, Lewis C. Bray and L. C. Hamill. The towns have a population of 1,200, are surrounded by new coal mines and other industries, and on the whole present the appearance of an important business center.—Keyser Echo.

Couldn't be Fooled.

The younger son of a well-known politician of Chicago has spent pretty much all of his life in the big city by the lake, and, consequently, knows little of country ways and things, says the Harper's Weekly.

Not long ago he visited a man he had met in Chicago and who maintains a big farm near Cairo, whither he had insisted the youngster come for a lengthy stay.

One day the Chicago youth was wandering about the farm, closely examining the top-ends and sides of a certain trim, well-made object fenced round in the paddock.

"What are you searching for, Jimmy?" asked the owner of the place, with a quizzical smile.

"Where are the doors and windows?" asked Jimmy.

"Doors and windows! Why, Jimmy, that's a haystack."

"Look here, old man," exclaimed Jimmy; "I may be only a green person from the city, but you can't bluff me that way. Hay doesn't grow in lumps like that."

Using the Blotter.

A woman was trying to lift a big blot of ink from a letter with a piece of blotting paper, with the usual result of making the blot bigger and uglier than it was at first. "Let me show you how to do that," said her friend. "I learned the trick in a stationer's shop in London last year. You just moisten the corner of the blotter first, to get it started, and then apply it to the ink spot. There! Isn't it wonderful how clean it takes it all up?"

The Diplomacy Of Ted....

By IZOLA FORRESTER.

Copyrighted, 1907, by C. H. Sutcliffe.

"You see, I wouldn't mind it a bit if it were not for Uncle Halbert, but if I marry you and go to Denver, Bob, what would become of him? He hasn't a soul in the world but me, and he's forty-nine"—

"Forty-nine isn't old," interrupted Bob gloomily.

"It isn't for most men, but it is for a man like Uncle Halbert," Gwendolin answered seriously. "It isn't as though he had led an active business life, Bob. He has always been so seclusive; you know what I mean—he had lived by himself and for himself until mamma died and I came to live at the Maples. That is over fifteen years ago, and I know that if I were to marry and leave him all alone here it would break his heart."

"Let him come with us," suggested Bob, walking up and down the strip of beach below the sand dune, where the figure in the blue cloak sat in solitary state. "It's a great climate out there. He'd like it all right as soon as he got accustomed to the change. Of course, it might come hard to an old man like that"—

"You just said he wasn't old"—

"Well, he's too old to care one way or the other.

"Bob Daulton, how can you talk so heartlessly?"

Daulton stopped short in his walking and faced the figure in blue, his hands deep in his pockets, his young face set and resolute.

"Just because I want you for my wife," he said, "and any obstacle that stands in my way after you yourself have said yes has simply got to be overcome—that's why. I like Mr. Rutherford all right. He's a fine old fellow, but I don't see just why we should blight our whole life's happiness in order to insure his not getting lonesome. And he won't be. He has lots of neighbors"—

"He hates neighbors," interposed Gwendolin sadly, her chin on her

"WHAT ARE YOU DOING, TED?" ASKED BOB.

palms. "He has quarreled with the Lawrences over the greenhouses they built that spoil the view from the arbor, and he doesn't like the new people at Greystone a bit. He says they're too excitable."

"He did, did he?" laughed Bob. "Well, he must enjoy excitement a little himself. When I drove in to the postoffice yesterday, I saw him riding beside little Mrs. Ainslee in her red and black runabout. They were clipping along the post road to beat the band, and he didn't look worried a bit over any excitement."

"He was not riding for pleasure," said Gwendolin coldly. "Mrs. Ainslee's little boy Teddy was bitten by a snapping turtle, and uncle simply went with her to the doctor's. Teddy was with them."

"Well, he wasn't in evidence, and I didn't hear any moans of pain. The old boy and the widow seemed to be enjoying themselves all right. Anyway, that kid ought to be suppressed. He put one of those snapping turtles in with my terriers last week, and it didn't do a thing but nip Napoleon's ear and take a bite at Lady Gay's nose."

"What were the terriers doing?" Gwendolin's blue eyes lighted with quick merriment.

"Nothing except kiyi-ing. You can't take a grip on a turtle shell, and every time one would make a dash at the turtle's head it would draw it in. And Teddy thought it was great fun."

"So it was," approved the young woman on the sand dune. "I didn't know Teddy had so much sense of humor. That must be why Uncle Hal likes him. Generally he doesn't care for children a bit."

"Maybe Teddy would keep him from being lonesome, then, after we've gone to Denver." Bob waited an instant, then caught encouragement from the face above him and took the sand dune at four steps. "Gwen, darling, quit teasing and behave. It isn't a joke. It's our life's happiness at stake just because this old fossil wants your company. What do we care even if he cut you off without a cent? I'll have enough for two, and I'm not afraid of him. I'll go to him after dinner tonight and tell him the whole thing and let him sizzle"—

"You can't tell him tonight, Mr. Daulton," interrupted an interested, eager little voice from the other side of the dune. "He's coming over to our house for dinner. Why don't you tell him right now?"

Bob withdrew his arm hurriedly from its resting place, and Gwen pinned up some stray tumbled locks with fingers that trembled even while she laughed at the picture below them. Standing in the pool of water left by the tide in the rocks below was Teddy Ainslee. His short duck pants were rolled high about his bare tanned legs, and his face was intensely serious as he balanced a tin pail and toy rake in his hands and stared up at the two figures on the sand dune.

"What are you doing, Ted?" asked Bob impersonally. "Digging for clams?"

"Nope; crabs," returned Ted laconically. "Got five. Two's most dead, though. Why don't you tell him right now? He's over there with mamma, over behind the clubhouse. They're sitting on the rocks, talking about our coming to live in his house. Say, I'm going to have a room all to myself, he says, and a pony, and a real boat, maybe. Aren't you glad I'm coming to live with you, Gwen?"

Gwendolin's hand closed over the strong one that reached for it, with a warm, close grip. For a moment her eyes met Bob's, swift, questioning, amazed, laughing, all in one quick sweeping glance of understanding. Bob started to laugh aloud, but she checked him and bent toward the little figure standing in the water below.

"Indeed, I am glad, Teddy," she said very gently, very diplomatically, "but I didn't know about it. When are you coming, dear?"

Teddy's gaze wandered musingly over the stretch of shore to where the clubhouse made a splash of green and white on the landscape. From where he stood he could see a white parasol, and down behind the chiffon ruffles on that parasol sat Mr. Rutherford and his mother.

"Just as soon as he's my papa," he told the two above him calmly. "I like him real well. He asked me if he could have mamma, and I told him I didn't mind. He used to know mamma a long time ago, and he liked her then, but she liked me best. She don't any more, though. She likes him best, but I don't care. I told him maybe I'd marry you, Gwen."

"That was awfully sweet of you, Teddy, dear," began Gwendolin.

"Just so you wouldn't be lonesome, you know," Ted assured her, "because I s'pose maybe he used to like you best, too, and now he won't any more, 'cause he told mamma he liked her the bestest in the whole world."

"God bless you, Teddikins," murmured Bob thankfully. "I'll buy you a bear for this, six feet tall."

"When are you coming to live with us, Teddy?" asked Gwendolin, her voice a little unsteady, her face flushed rosily. The big hand was crushing her own so that it hurt.

"Pretty soon," said Ted encouragingly. "That's why they made me come away now. They're talking it over. They're going to hurry up and get married before you find it out, so it won't be a sudden shock. That's what Mr. Rutherford said. I heard him tell mamma that they must avoid any sudden shock to Gwen's nerves. So they're going to run away and get married, and then he's going to break it to you."

Bob gave an explosive peal of joy and rolled over on the sand at Gwendolin's feet. But Gwendolin sat still, her eyes bright with happiness and hope ahead, her chin resting on one palm and her eyes filled with sudden tears.

"Don't you cry, Gwen," called up Teddy courageously. "I'll love you and keep you from being lonesome."

Gwendolin laughed, a quick, breaking laugh of tears and happiness combined, and held out both hands to Bob.

"Thanks, Teddy, dear, so much, but I don't think I'll be very lonesome. After—after poor Uncle Hal has broken the news to me I think I shall go to Denver."

Empresses of Japan.

Women played an important part in the early history of Japan. To a woman, the Empress Jingu, belongs the glory of the first conquest made by Japan, that of Korea, A. D. 201. Dressed as a man, she led her fleet over the unknown waters, across which she alone believed a country lay to the westward. "If we succeed," she said to her chiefs, "the glory will all be yours. I will be responsible for the infamy of a possible defeat." The Koreans laid their wealth at the feet of the conquerors, and the king swore that so long as the stars shone and water ran down hill Korea should be faithful to Japan. This achievement of the empress gave rise to the boast of the Japanese, "The arms of Japan shine beyond the seas." But the most important fruit of her victory was the introduction of Buddhism from Korea, as well as Asiatic art, science, medicine and literature. Jingu, however, was never actually proclaimed head of the empire. The first female ruler was Suiko, and since her time eight empresses have governed Japan, some of them with great wisdom.

The Genius of Ancient Greece.

An authority on old Greek history says, and in my opinion rightly, that the average intelligence of the assembled Athenian citizens was higher than that of our house of commons. No doubt the Athenian public was by no means so learned as we moderns are. They were ignorant of many sciences, of much history—in short, of a thousand results of civilization—but in civilization itself, in mental power, in quickness of comprehension, in correctness of taste, in accuracy of judgment, no modern nation, however well instructed, has been able to equal by laborious acquirements the inborn genius of the Greeks.—Mahaffy's "Social Life in Greece."

MY BROTHER'S KEEPER.

How One Little Girl Exerted a Strong Influence for Good.

"Have you received the invitation to my party?"

"Yes; the postman brought it this noon. They are very pretty invitations, but what do those two queer looking letters in the corner mean?"

"That is my secret for the girls to guess; but if you will promise never to tell—not even one girl—I will tell you!"

"Promised; now tell me what 'T. P.' stands for?"

"It means Temperance Party. I am not going to have anything to drink or eat that has alcohol in it!"

"And you have invited Cora Brown, Annie Clifton, and Barbara Ross; you know every one of those girls have wine on their tables every day! What will they think of a party without wine or punch?"

"They need not come again if they do not enjoy this one; but I think there is no danger of their not enjoying themselves at my 'T. P.' party! I am going to have the most delicious lemonade made of oranges, lemons, pineapple and apollinaris water—far better than wine or punch! Anyway, I have made up my mind I shall never, as long as I live, have anything at my parties that may harm others."

"No brandied candies or cake, I suppose, will be allowed!"

"No indeed; mother is going to make part of the candy and cake and we shall buy only those kinds which we know are free from liquors. The caterer has been warned and he is to use fresh strawberries in making the cream. Then we are to have the dearest little cakes iced with white, and my own initials on the top of each in red candy letters—I can hardly wait for the day to come!"

"But I do not see what harm there would be in having punch or even cider!"

"There is alcohol in them. And mother says when you drink alcohol it creates a thirst (as it burns up the liquids in the body, and more alcohol is demanded), and the habit of drinking is easily formed."

"I believe you are right in refusing to have any harmful drink; if anyone were to learn to drink at your party—"

"But they never will, for they never will have the chance! I have determined never to use, as a beverage, anything that contains alcohol, and that I will never place it before others. Mother told me about a boy who went to a party where they had wine; he had never tasted it before; but he liked it so much he drank it every chance he had till he became a drunkard. How can the girl who gave him that first glass, at her birthday party, ever forgive herself!"

"Just the other day I heard a young lady ask a young man to smoke!"

"That is another thing I am never going to do, when I am grown up, to ask a man to smoke; or encourage him to do so. Mother says we are our brother's keeper—that the things we do and say lead others in the wrong or right way. I mean that my T. P. shall lead those who attend in the right way."

"By the way, you did not tell me what favors you are going to have."

"That is another part of my secret—promise not to tell?"

"Never a word!"

"I am going to have white ribbon badges with a tiny silver pin in each for all those who will promise not to use wine, cider, punch or any alcoholic drink when they give their parties."

"Suppose they are not all willing to take that pledge?"

"Oh, I have some red ribbon badges for all who will not take the white; but I hope all will wish the white."

"I promise you I will never use anything that will lead another astray at my parties. Why can we not form a society and call it 'The White Ribbon Band?'"

"And for our motto 'I Am My Brother's Keeper!' Let us do it at the party!"—Elbertine Robertson, in Presbyterian Temperance Tract.

National Purity Congress.

The National Purity congress is to be held in Battle Creek, Mich., October 31 to November 6, 1907. This conference is called by and will be held under the auspices of the National Purity federation, an association formed by the leaders in purity reform throughout the United States for the purpose of securing the cooperation in a national sense of all societies, national, state and local, that are striving to promote purity in the life of the individual and in social relations, and of inaugurating such an aggressive, united, forward movement as shall arouse the conscience of our people to the lawful facts relative to organized vice and the deeds of its promoters, and assure to all a high standard of morality and a right knowledge of the pure life.

Good and Bad Whisky.

The best American whisky contains an average of 43 per cent. of alcohol; the cheaper grades an average of 35 per cent. The common whisky is therefore less harmful than the expensive kind. The strongest of all alcoholic drinks is rum, which is 40 to 80 per cent. alcohol, and of which there were produced in the United States in 1905, 1,791,987 gallons.

Political Announcements.

Announcements of candidates for the various offices to be filled by the voters of Garrett county will be published in this paper at the flat rate of $5 for each announcement, the cash to accompany the order.

FOR SHERIFF.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the office of Sheriff, subject to the decision of the Republican County Convention, and respectfully solicit the support and influence of my friends.

AUSTIN BROWN.

District No. 14.

FOR COUNTY TREASURER.

I hereby announce my candidacy for the office of County Treasurer, subject to the decision of the Republican County Convention. In making this announcement I wish to state that I am in the field on my own personality and am not in combination with any other person. I solicit the support of all my friends.

F. G. FOX.

District No. 2.

NOT HIGHER THAN SOURCE.

November is rapidly coming and candidates for county offices are working for their nomination and election. It is the duty of every citizen of Garrett county to study well the merits and capabilities of each candidate with the aim that the best one shall be selected. For the men elected will be the makers and enforcers of our laws, and nothing can be higher than its source. Therefore, it behooves every Garrett countian to make the source as high as possible; to select the best men for the various offices with the view that our laws may be enacted by the best men, may be enforced by others of the same class and thus, having a high and pure source, our laws will be more wisely enacted and more justly enforced.

ENCOURAGING.

President Roosevelt made a notable speech Tuesday at the laying of the cornerstone of the Pilgrim Memorial Monument at Provincetown, Mass., and effectually disposed of any idea or rumor that he meditated a change in his policy toward "certain malefactors of great wealth." We can not do better to explain his position in this regard than to quote the President's own words:

Once for all, let me say that, as far as I am concerned and for the eighteen months of my administration that remain, there will be no change in the policy we have steadily pursued, nor let-up in the effort to secure the honest observance of the law; for I regard this contest as one to determine who shall rule this Government—the people through their governmental agents, or a few ruthless and determined men whose wealth makes them particularly formidable because they hide behind the breastworks of corporate organization.

It is idle to ask me not to prosecute criminals, rich or poor. But I desire no less emphatically to have it understood that we have undertaken and will undertake no action of a vindictive type and, above all, no action which shall inflict great or unmerited suffering upon the innocent stockholders and upon the public as a whole. Our purpose is to act with the minimum of harshness compatible with obtaining our ends.

Mr. Roosevelt also spoke in favor of governmental supervision of railroads, similar to that which it now exercises over national banks, and for a national incorporation law for corporations which do an interstate business. He did not oppose useful combinations, such as are made with absolute openness and are approved by the representatives of the government, but insisted that experience has shown that it is necessary to exercise a far more efficient control than at present over the business use of vast fortunes and corporate aggregations of wealth. To this end, he hopes the national government will soon pass proper and necessary legislation.

The day before President Roosevelt's speech, Secretary Taft, addressing an audience in Ohio, gave at length his interpretation of the President's views and what may be regarded as his policy in case he should be elected to succeed Mr. Roosevelt. A perusal of his speech shows that he and the President are practically in accord, and that it is the settled plan of the Republican leaders to give this country what many had begun to regard as a failure and a sham—real popular government. Mr. Taft declared against government ownership of the great public utilities but for their more efficient regulation, so that government ownership may not be necessary and that agitation in favor of it may cease. He also declared in favor of an income tax and graduated inheritance tax.

Such plain and wholesome declarations, coming from men who are in positions where they may make their policies effective, and who have already made large progress, are most comforting to the average American voter. A few years ago the hold of the predatory trusts upon the business of the country was so strong and the apparent possibilities of breaking that hold was so small that many good citizens despaired of ever seeing it broken or of experiencing conditions wherein every man might receive a "square deal." But with our courageous and aggressive President, who not only promises but "does things," firmly arrayed on the side of the plain people and fighting for justice and honesty for all, high or low, and with his very probable successor voicing a practically similar policy, though conservative and not revolutionary, any man who loves his country finds it easy to be a patriot and has no need for pessimism.

A PICKED LEGISLATURE.

There was never a time in the history of the state when the inducements for good men to become candidates for the legislature on the Republican ticket were more attractive than at present. The contrast has been sharply drawn by the two conventions between the men and methods of the parties. One pronounced in favor of boss rule and political scrambling. The other stood out for the individuality of the candidate and for orderly effort for the domination of the state by its better elements. All that the representives of the party could do has been done in the direction of securing for the electorate a ticket that will, by its very weight of merit, attract abundant votes. But more remains to be done in order to secure the implicit confidence of the element of the community and the state that desires above all things else to have Maryland governed by as fine a set of lawmakers as any in the Union.

It is now time for the good citizen to play his part. There are men who take upon themselves the function of censor, and with warrant, for that is the right of any citizen interested in the common good who has studiously refrained from participating in the government of the state. It is time for some of the leading citizens to reflect that if their ideas as to decent, high-minded government are to be put through and the class of legislation enacted that the state most needs, the first thing of all is to have these very men in the chambers of the legislature. Every effort is being put forth to induce this class of persons to enter the lists. Like the men in the parable who had bought a piece of land or married or had purchased a yoke of oxen and therefore could not come to the feast, the men who should be foremost in public service enter the plea of business or personal hindrances that are unworthy of their professed devotion to the state.

If Mr. Gaither is to go into office surrounded by a corps of legislators who will be competent to enter into his ideals of government and to carry into effect his recommendations, the men who have reluctance to do this yeoman service must yield their disinclination at the call of public duty. In the early days of Massachusetts it was necessary to impose a fine upon persons selected for public office who declined to accept in order that the executive and legislative functions might be carried on. It would be a grave reflection upon the character of Maryland citizenship if the most capable element of the population refused to discharge its responsibility toward the commonwealth.

Maryland is looking to the Republican party to save it from the machinations of a group of professional politicians. It has every confidence in the ticket that has been put up. But it must have the added assurance of a body of lawmakers of competency and character. So that, lacking the cooperation of its best men, if the party has to accept inferior material, it will be the fault of those most ready to criticise the conduct of the state's affairs should the ticket, if elected, not produce the results expected. The outlook for success, the class of legislation that the Republican party will advance and the splendid candidates that head the ticket, no matter how high his caliber, who will take the stand that public office is a public trust and that it honors the man upon whom it is conferred.

By all manner of means should the most capable men set aside their personal disinclination and permit the convention to name them for seats in the legislature that has been graced in the past by some of the most illustrious characters in the history of the nation. The need of good men is a crying one. It is a need that should be heeded, or else let those who are prone to criticise a party's defects forever after hold their peace.

THE SUN IS SETTING IN THE EAST.

The Baltimore "Sun" was once one of the leading dailies of the eastern cities. In those days, however, it advocated the election of those men who possessed the highest chtracters and stood for the highest principles. But it is not so today. The man who is nominated by the Democratic machine of the State is the "Sun's" hero. Without any respect for man or principles, it is for Crothers through thick and thin. And the only argument that the "Sun" uses against the Republican ticket is that it was made up by Mudd and Jackson. With all of its brightness, the "Sun" is unable to see that every Republican of Maryland was eager to have Gaither accept the nomination. On the other hand, it is proclaimed on every hand by Independent Democrats that Crothers is the tool of John Walter Smith. But the Democratic machine of the State has given Crother's nomination a heavy coating of sugar and "Sun" then gulps it down without an effort. It swallows and gags at a gnat. All of these things are seen by the people of Maryland and there results a great decline in the power of the "Sun" and if it continues to argue without reason and logic, its end is near and soon there will be witnessed by the people of Western Maryland a paradox—the Baltimore "Sun" will fall still farther from its high place, and with the entire Democratic machine it will set forever behind the eastern mountains of the Appalachian system.

Communicated.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I noticed in your valuable paper of Aug. 22nd, 1907, a letter signed W. M. Lister. He claims another correction is sent to The Republican. I sent but one, and it was as mild as I could make it.

If W. M. Lister had taken my advice we would not be having this trouble at the present time. This has come on without any ill will toward anyone, on our part. When Mr. Lister told me he was going to let Selbysport and Blooming Rose vote the second time to elect delegates, I told him to let the people have it as they had voted, and, even if the results did not suit him, to say nothing about it, and let us collect his salary. He said he had not thought about that. I said I had, and if he did not stop the second election, it would make trouble. I told him Mr. Bishoff had his friends and so had the other side, and, although it made no difference to me who was elected I did not want the trouble I knew it would bring. He said Bishoff was against him and he was not satified with the result of the first election. I then asked him if I could get out of the matter. He replied there was only one way: that was for me to appoint another Judge and have the Quarterly Conference approve it. I still urged him to drop the matter and let us have peace. He gave me to understand he would have it his own way and turned me off in his own simple way. So, you see, I could do no more. It is up to me now, and, by the help of Him who has stood by me in all trouble, I will do my best for what I think is right.

The said W. M. Lister said in his letter he would not be doing justice to either himself or his people to let a so-called correction pass by unnoticed. He said that three of the Judges did meet, but, on the refusal of two to accept the returns from Selbysport, it caused a hasty adjournment. We did not adjourn until our business was done. Our minutes will explain all.

The correction from Selbysport in the same paper does not agree with Mr. Lister. They claim the work was done in private session. It is a pity, Mr. Lister, you did not compare papers with Selbysport "correction." After all our business was done our secretary got sick, and we went into my office, where J. S. Myers did some writing for him. Lister also says the return judges have no president of their Board, because the discipline makes the Pastor, by virtue of his offics, President or chairman of all committees appointed by the Conference. It will be remembered that this work belongs to the lay-members of our grand old Church. He has been saying what the discipline says and has not come down to the facts of the question in hand. The General Conference, in the year 1872, wisely decided to give the lay-members of our Church a voice in the General Conference, and by such action left such questions as these all in their hands, after the Judges have been appointed by the Quarterly Conference. It is in the lay-members hands to elect a lay-delegate and a reserve delegate to help elect lay-delegates to the General Conference. If Lister will read his discipline, he will find that we lay-members will attend to our own business and have President and Secretary. We are responsible to no one but the Lay Electoral Conference. Our work will be confirmed by that body, if the man that Lister tried to elect wants to stand a contest. He tried to elect him by letting Selbysport and Blooming Rose vote the second time and letting the polls at Selbysport stand open about two weeks in order to let him look up votes, taking the election out of the lay-members' hands. We found, after looking over the results of the elections held at the four points the first time:

|---|---|---|---|
| Friendsville | gave | G. E. Bishoff | 18 votes |
| " | " | N. R. Selby | 2 " |
| " | " | C. V. Guard | 2 " |
| Hoyes | " | G. E. Bishoff | 18 " |
| Blooming Rose | " | " | 7 " |
| Selbysport | " | N. R. Selby | 16 " |
| " | " | C. V. Guard | 6 " |

So, you will see that by the first election, which was more fair than any other, G. E. Bishoff was elected by the lay-members of the Friendsville Charge. We could not as honest men, do anything else but give G. E. Bishoff his certificate as Lay-delegate and N. R. Selby his as reserve delegate. Mr. Lister says these certificate are false issues, so I will give you a copy of one. "This is to certify that the Returning Board of the Friendsville Circuit has canvassed the returns of the elections and does hereby certifiy that Geo. E. Bishoff of Hoyes, Garrett county, Md., has been declared elected as Lay-Delegate and N. R. Selby of Selbysport, Garrett county, Md., has been declared elected as Reserve Delegate to the Lay-Electorial Conference of the West Virginia Conference to be held at Huntington, W. Va."

We gave due notice to all the Judges, and, if any of the Judges were absent, it is their own fault. Geo. E. Bishoff went to meet W. H. Frazee and let him know where we were going to meet. Mr. Frazee was not well and to make things handy, D. S. Custer kindly consented to let us have his parlor. Now, I will say that all the lay lay-members concerned in this matter are, so far as I know, good men and women; and those personally concerned, Messrs. N. R. Selby, C. V. Guard, W. H. Frazee, G. F. Loudermilk, and Chas. M. Kamp are all pillars in our church; men that have been long faithful to the church of their choice. I had a talk with Bro. Kamp the other day on this matter. He thinks the Selbysport church has not been fairly dealt with in a general way. He thinks they have had to pay more than they were able to pay according to the preaching they have had, and, this trouble coming up in the way it did, they think it was meant to do them wrong. But I can say for myself and all of the lay-members of Friendsville, Hoyes, and Blooming Rose that we had nothing against Selbysport. This matter came up in such a way that we could not get away from it.

B. F. FRIEND.

Letter to F. E. Rathbun.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: We should like to set your boys and girls at work on this question in arithmetic and casuistry.

A farmer is fatting three hogs in three small pens; they have equal room and straw and care, and are fed in these three ways: first hog, on a certain proportion of milk and cooked cornmeal; second hog, on the same, half water; third hog, on same half water and sawdust. How long will it take, how much will they weigh, how much will they cost, and what'll the profit be on the three?

And a similar question in pigmentary. That same farmer is going to paint three barns same size; and he says to three painters: "what'll you take to paint that barn?"

First painter scratches his head a few minutes and says: "I'll do it for $50."

Second painter' "$75."

Third painter: "$97.48."

Will they each get a barn to paint, or one get two, or one all three, or nobody any; and what'll they make on the job?

That's about how painting goes sometimes.

But there is a way to reckon: $5 a gallon. The difficulty is knowing how many gallons to buy. There's a way out of that.

Buy the least-gallons paint, Devoe. No matter how much ones buys; he returns what's left: costs nothing.

Yours truly

A Pretty Wedding.

A very pretty wedding occured on the 26th inst. at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Marshall Friend, near Brays, this county. The contracting parties were Mr. Cecil Z. Ramsey, of Upshur county, W. Va., and Miss Ethel Friend, the handsome daughter of Mr. and Mrs Friend above named. The bride was handsomely attired in a beautiful costume while the groom was dressed in conventional black. The ceremony was preformed by A. Engle, the pastor after with the bride and groom and all the guests were called into the dining-room where a table was laden with all the good things necessary to gratify the fastidious appetite of an epicure had been prepared, of which all the friends and relatives partook, and did really enjoy the good things which disapeared like magic. We learn that Mr. and Mrs. Ramsey will make their home in Keyser, W. Va. May their pathway through life be strewn with flowers.

Don't teach your children that it is a shame to wear worn and patched clothes if you are not able to afford better, but that it is no honor in wearing new ones that are not paid for. A poet said, "remember, that rags may cover a boy who will some day be the great world's joy."

In this paper today we publish the statements of the Garrett National and the First National Banks of Oakland, and the First National Bank of Friendsville. In every case the exposition of the financial strength of these institutions show an appreciable increase in volume over the preceding statements made in May of this year. Garrett county is to be congratulated upon the fact that her banks are growing stronger every day.

In democratic countries like America and Canada, where the fate of the nation is in the hands of the people the future of the nation is in the hands of the children. They must be fitted for their high responsibilities by the influences of the home. These countries should fear the disloyalty and contention of the fireside more than the nefarious plots of scheming politicians. If boys wrangle and contend at home, if they cannot discuss with dignity the little questions that arise daily intercourse with one another, be sure they will not honor the nation when they take their places in the senate, parliament or congress to discuss the great problems that confront the civilization of the twentieth century.

MAIL FELL UNDER TRAIN

But, Like Lawson's Book, It Escaped Damage At Deer Park.

Two oil barrels on the station platform at Deer Park caused the mail sacks which were thrown from a fast-moving train to bounce back under the train. The sacks slid and struck the barrels. The sacks were cut to pieces, but the letters escaped damage.

A copy of Thomas W. Lawson's "Friday, the 13th," and other heavy mail matter circulated through the air as far as the Deer Park Hotel, several hundred yards away.

The family is the oldest and most valuable institution on earth. It begins properly with the first offsping. In reality there is no family until the husband and wife can say to each other: "Two times one are two and one to carry makes three." And the little third party often brings the husband and wife closer together than anything else could possibly do.

The great foe to home, peace and happiness is worry. The habit of worry keeps us crossing bridges before we reach them. The evils that fret us most are those which threaten us but have not yet arrived. Stop worrying about the bread that you are afraid will not rise, the new drew you are sure the dressmaker will spoil, and the next month's rent. If you will firmly resolve to worry about the evil or special hardship this hour or minute and can't be avoided, ninety-nine cases out of one hundred you will find there is no such evil or hardship.

Mr. F. E. Rathbun, who for two months was associated with this paper in an editorial capacity severed his connection on Saturday last and on Monday went to Keyser, West Va., where he is attending the Mineral county (West Va.) teachers' institute, now being held there. Next week Mr. Rathbun will remove his household goods to Piedmont where he will be engaged this winter as superintendent of the public schools of that town. During Mr. Rathbun's associate editorship on THE REPUBICAN we always found him pleasant and agreeable at all times and his removal from Oakland is greatly regretted by his many warm friends.

Every wife should be a helpmate to her husband. For instance, if you have the pleasure of a large washing before you and he has the laborious task of going to the city, or taking a trip through the country, change work with him; let him help you wash in the forenoon. A good wife will deny herself to entertain her husband, especially on wash day. But some men will say, "When I come down to that I'll hire it done." We find no fault with hiring it done, but as to coming down to help a women, my dear sir, who created you so far above a woman that you have to condescend to come down?

I will mail you free, to prove merit, samples of my Dr. Shoop's Restorative and my Book on either Dyspepsia, The Heart or The Kidneys. Troubles of the Stomach, Heart or Kidneys, are merely Simptoms of a deeper aliment. Don't make the commen error of treating the symptoms only. Symptom treatment is treating the result of your ailment, and not the cause. Weak Stomach nerves—the inside nerves—mean Stomach weakness, always. And the Heart, and Kidneys as well, have their controlling or inside nerve. Weaken these nerves, and you inevitably have weak vital organs. Here is where Dr. Shoop's Restorative has its fame. No other remedy even claims to treat the "inside nerves." Also for bloating, biliousness, bad breath or complexion, use Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Write me to-day for sample and free Book. Dr. Shoop, Racine, Wis. The Restorative is sold by all dealers.

McGraw at his summer home at Deer Park, where they remained until Monday afternoon.

Epworth League Festival at Hoyes.

On Friday and Saturday evenings, Sept. 6 and 7, 1907, the Epworth League of Hoyes will hold a festival on the public school grounds, for the benefit of M. E. church, which is in course of repairs. An abundant supply of refreshments has been ordered, which will be served on the grounds. Arrangements are being made to have all kinds of amusement, such as music, both vocal and instrumental, recitations, dialogues, etc. Everybody come and see if we can't show you an up-to-date affair.

SERIOUS WRECK AT SNOWY CREEK

Which Ten Large Coal Cars Were Wrecked and Tracks Blocked.

There was quite a serious and expensive wreck at Snowy Creek last Monday afternoon when ten large steel coal cars, all of them loaded to their full capacity, were wrecked and both tracks torn up, which blocked traffic eight hours or more.

The cause of the wreck is not known, but it is the supposition of the trainmen that one of the cars jumped the track and was followed by the rest of the train. The train was drawn by engine No. 1866, in charge of Engineman Robert Bird of Cumberland.

Each member of the train crew happened to be in a place of safety at the time and consequently no one was injured.

Train No. 55, westbound, was held from four until seven o'clock before the wreckage was cleared and the track placed in condition for the resumption of traffic.

A second wreck occurred Monday afternoon on the Seventeen Mile Grade in which several cars were derailed, among them being a stock car containing swine, five or six of the animals being killed and a large number more or less injured. None of the train crew sustained injuries.

Horrible Punishment.

While there are punishments inflicted today which are not altogether lovely, yet none of them is quite as brutal as one an old gray haired citizen of Oakland was telling the other day.

A man away back in the '50's had committed an atrocious crime which set everyone in the community crazy with anger. The culprit was pursued by a mob all the way from Pennsylvania to South Carolina. He was caught and marched by foot back to the scene of the crime.

Here a cabin was built and the victim was fastened to an upright board therein, being tied everywhere except at the arms; these were left free to move in all directions. Beside him was placed a dirty, rusty case knife. The crowd then withdrew, telling their victim that they were going outside and set fire to the building. If he did not want to burn up, then all he had to do was to cut off his right arm and walk out of the burning building a free man, after he shall have cut loose the cords that bound him.

The crowd surrounded the building, with guns and pistols cocked to prevent their victim's escape. All eyes were set upon the flamed-licked building, eager to see which horn of the dilemma he would sieze.

Their answer was found in the chared corpse that lay in the smouldering ruins.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. MARGARET E. BROWNING.

Died, on Wednesday morning at her home near Oakland, after months of suffering with a cancerous growth, Mrs. Margaret Ellen, widow of the late Stephen Browning, aged 60 years, one month and fifteen days. Mrs. Browning was a daughter of the late William Casteel and a sister of Mrs. A. B. Gonder, of Oakland, Mrs. B. T. Keller, of Ohio, and Dr. D. T. E. Casteel, of the Insular Service. She was married Oct. 25, 1866, to her late husband. One daughter, now Mrs. Joseph T. Glotfelty, was born to them, who survives. Mrs. Browning was a true Christian woman. Her funeral will take place this afternoon at three o'clock from St. Paul's M. E. church in Oakland, and the interment will be made in the cemetery here.

Lawn Fete.

The Ladies' Aid Society of St. Mark's Lutheran congregation will hold a Lawn Fete at the home of Mrs. B. H. Sincell next Thursday evening.

Attempt to Wreck Train

An attempt was made to wreck a passenger train on the Grafton & Belington branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad Monday. Mrs. Hugh Warder, Mrs. Thomas Moran and Miss Margaret Moran discoversd a number of iron obstructions placed on the rails. These were removed, but a quarter of a mile further they discovered a fireman's rake cleated down over a heavy piece of iron. The ladies after exercising great strength tore the cinder rake from the rails. At the point it was placed the train would have been turned into the river at a hole at least twenty feet deep.

Church Services.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Storming the Castle

By Eleanor H. Porter

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

"But I'm determined to win you, Kathleen."

"As if you could against my will!"

"It won't be against your will—you'll wish it,"

She raised her eyebrows in unbelief. "I'll make myself so necessary to you that you can't help wishing it," he went on confidently.

"But I don't need you for—anything," she objected.

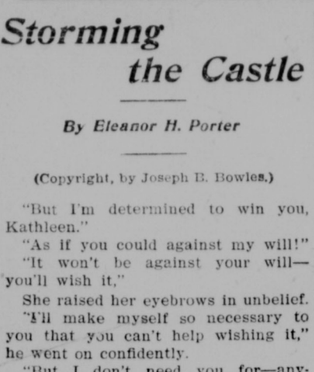
"Oh, but you may, you know," he smiled, imperturbably. "I'll be your knight and fight for you as in the olden time."

"I'm no princess shut up in a castle, Charlie," she retorted, all the more scornfully because his words had given her a curious little thrill. "The extent of your warfare thus far has been to procure me an ice or to bring me my fan," she went on, with up tilted chin.

"Not very dragon-like obstacles, I acknowledge," he laughed back at her; "still—there's time yet, so long as the princess remains unwed," he finished, bringing his thin, clean-cut lips together decisively, as Kathleen turned away.

When Kathleen Randal had unexpectedly fallen heir to a small fortune, she immediately announced her intention of traveling.

"All my life," she declared laughingly, "I've been like Helen's Babies and have wanted to 'see the wheels



"As If You Could Against My Will!"

go 'round'—if only they were carwheels and taking me somewhere!" she supplemented. "Now I'm going to go—and go—and go, and see if I can't satisfy this longing that is devouring me."

It was but two days now before she, and the aunt who had been a mother to her all these years, would start on their journeyings. Trunks and tickets, plans and packing, filled the house with confusion and her soul with delirious joy; there was no time for Charlie Heywood and his love-making—love-making that had become trite in its periodic repetition ever since her pinafore days. That Charlie was young, good to look upon, rich, and altogether approved by her relatives, made it only worse—as if she could grow sentimental over her next-door neighbor, with whom she had made mudpies in her babyhood!

At the very outset of her journey, Kathleen seemed doomed to disappointment, for the stagecoach—her only means of transportation from the village to the railroad station five miles away—failed to call at her door, and disappeared far down the road in a cloud of dust.

"Why, Auntie—if they haven't left us!" cried Kathleen, dropping in limp dismay onto the piazza steps.

"Never mind; we'll go to-morrow," soothed Mrs. Howells.

"But the boat—oh, Auntie, we'll lose the boat!" wailed the girl, springing to her feet in sudden realization of what the delay meant.

"Not gone yet?" called Heywood cheerfully, over the fence. "Old Abe's late this morning," he continued, with an airy innocence that gave no hint of his knowledge of the shameless bribe even then in Old Abe's pocket. "I was just going down to the station to see you off."

"Oh, Charlie, he's left us—we've lost the boat!" moaned Kathleen, wringing her hands.

"Not much, you haven't!" shouted Heywood over his shoulder, as he turned with suspicious promptness and ran towards his open stable door. "Here, jump in, both of you," he commanded a minute later, bringing his huge red automobile to a standstill before them.

"Oh, lovely, lovely!" gurgled Kathleen bundling Mrs. Howells into the back seat and leaping in beside her.

"Let's see—your baggage went last night, I believe," said Heywood—as if it had not gone at his own suggestion!

It was somewhat later that Heywood said musingly, as he held her hand in parting:

"Him-m, well, I don't know—an automobile is a pretty good substitute for a rusty sword."

"Don't be ridiculous," she returned with some dignity; then her eyes danced. "I'll take the auto every time, though!" she laughed, as she skipped up the car steps after her aunt.

Heywood gave a few short orders to the man beside the machine, caught the satchel from his hand, and swung himself onto the last car after the train had started.

Kathleen and her aunt had no trouble during the short journey to New York, nor in establishing themselves comfortably in their staterooms on board the boat; but the first three days at sea were very rough and the ladies scarcely left their berths. On the fourth day a clear blue sky and a warm sun enticed Kathleen into her steamer chair on deck. She had sat there half an hour in listless endurance of an uncombortable position, when a low voice said in her ear:

"If you'll let me put this cushion at your head, and readjust your footrest, I think you'll be easier."

"Charlie Heywood."

'At your service."

"Why, how in the world—" she began delightedly, then her whole figure stiffened. "This is never going to do at all," she finished with decision.

Heywood busied himself with the cushion and the foot-rest and did not seem to hear.

"I am traveling with my aunt," she began again, with some asperity.

"Certainly!" he responded cheerfully, picking up her magazine for her. "There, now I am sure you will be more comfortable." And he bowed himself off.

All through the rest of the voyage Kathleen did not see him once, though she watched for him every day—first fearfully, then resentfully.

When once again on land, Kathleen stood guard over her trunks and traveling-bags with a frowning face.

"Why can't they have checks over here and transfer one's baggage in a good, Christian manner?" she demanded wrathfully of her aunt.

"Suppose I attend to it for you," suggested Heywood at her elbow.

"Oh, then you are on earth!" returned Kathleen, a bit ungraciously, though a relieved look came into her eyes. The look remained until Heywood had seen then enroute for their hotel then it changed to one very like regret as his form was lost to sight in the crowd.

"Er—ah—what's Charlie doing over here?" inquired Mrs. Howells, with the hesitation one always showed in asking Kathleen questions regarding Heywood.

"Business, he says," she replied, with a shrug of her shoulders.

In London Kathleen saw Heywood just three times—once when she and her aunt lost their bearings on the Strand, again when he obtained for them permission to enter a certain palace which they wanted very much to see, and a third time when in a panic in a London theater made his presence something in the nature of a godsend.

"Charlie Heywood has a remarkable faculty of making his advent delightfully opportune!" observed Mrs. Howells, with a shrewd glance at Kathleen's face.

"Humph! it strikes me he's a little bit officious," retorted Kathleen, again trying to banish with scornfulness that curious thrill.

Kathleen had friends in Paris, and she danced and flirted and drove and shopped in an endless whirl of gayety.

Days passed. Save with the eye of her fancy, Kathleen had not once seen Heywood, though she looked for him at every turn. One afternoon, ignoring the fact that Paris is not New York, she slipped out alone for a short walk. She was strangely restless, and her feet flew faster and faster; even then, they seemed to her to be but crawling over the pavements. An hour passed and she turned to go back, but after another 60-minute walk, she awoke to a realization that she had lost her way.

"How stupid of me!" she murmured, biting her lips with annoyance.

She stopped to rest at a table in an open-air restaurant, but when a beringed, bestudded man slipped into the seat at her left, she fled again to the sidewalk.

"You are looking for some one?" a voice at her side suggested.

A sudden throb of joy tingled to Kathleen's finger-tips.

"Go—go away!" she cried feebly, glorying in the absolute certainty that the man wouldn't obey her.

"Right away—now?" he asked.

She nodded—but drew nearer to him.

"I—I'm tired of being rescued, Charlie," she laughed, hysterically.

He gave a keen glance at her flushed cheeks and hailed a carriage. He helped her in without speaking, gave an order to the driver, and seated himself at her side.

"How stupid of me—I never thought of a carriage," she quavered, brushing back the loose hair from her eyes. She stole a glance at the man's gloomy face, and a rose-pink flushed to her forehead. "Let me see," she went on softly, "an automobile, a cushion, a—a—"

"Don't!" he interrupted harshly.

"But, really," she continued, a queer little tremor in her voice, "I was only naming them over—the weapons have been so very — effective — that—"

Heywood looked up quickly.

"Kathleen, you don't mean that—"

"The castle has been stormed and the princess is—is—" She raised shy eyes to his face.

"Mine at last!" he breathed, the light of a long-deferred joy in his eyes.

RESCUE OF A DRUNKARD.

How Jimmy Was Led to Quit the Accursed Drink Habit.

Dr. C. L. Goodell, of New York, tells this story: "Jimmy was a member of the church, but prosperity came to Jimmy, and as he got money he forgot God. He fell into bad company and began to drink; all his fortune, an interest in a whaling vessel, went down Jimmy's throat until he wasn't worth a dollar. He had a place as salesman in the fishing business, that was all. He hadn't been in a church for years, but I noticed him at meeting one night sitting on the back seat. Somehow, my heart was drawn toward the fellow, and he was moved by the heartfelt interest that he knew I had in him, so he came week after week. Sometimes he would be sober and sometimes he would be so drunk that I hardly knew if he could get out of the church alone.

"One Sunday night Jimmy came in and dropped heavily down in the back seat. I was in the pulpit and I said to myself, 'He has either been drinking more than usual or else there is something going on. No, Jimmy is sober enough so that he knows what is going on.' After the service was over Jimmy had taken his place again on the back seat. I went to him and threw my arm around his shoulder and talked to him. He said, 'Doctor, I want it and I am going to turn over a new leaf, but I have got to have just one more drink.' I said to him: 'You want something to eat, Jimmy.' He replied, 'I guess you are right; I haven't had anything to eat to-day.' I got him down to a restaurant where they had nothing but tea and coffee to drink. I ordered black coffee and beefsteak, and after he had eaten the steak and drank two or three cups of coffee he began to feel quite like himself, and he said, 'I feel better; I guess I will go home now.' I said, 'I will go home with you.' At the front steps he said 'good-night.' I answered, 'I will go up with you to your room and see you tucked into bed.' So I stepped in and tucked him in bed and talked with him, and then went home. When he heard my feet echoing down the street, he said to himself, 'Now the minister is gone, I will put on my clothes and go down and have a good time.' He got out of bed and started to put on his clothes, when all at once he stopped and said, 'I won't do it; I am a mean man, but I am not mean enough to do that. After the minister was kind enough to come clear home with me and tuck me into bed, I am not mean enough to go back on him.' A strange thing happened when Jimmy woke up the next morning; for the first time in 25 years he didn't want any liquor. I can't explain it, but I know it is a fact that Jimmy didn't want any liquor and he didn't get any. He went on day after day, and he didn't want any liquor, and he came into the meeting and gave his testimony."

CAUSING ALARM.

Anti-Liquor Measures in France to Combat Evil Consequences of Drink.

The rapidly increasing consumption of alcohol in France with the widespread evil resulting is attracting the serious attention of French statesmen. Following the example of Belgian and Swiss legislators, a bill has been introduced into the legislature with a view to restrict the sale of strongly-alcoholic drinks, and to prohibit the manufacture and sale of absinthe. The bill on its initial reading was endorsed by men of almost all parties in the chamber of deputies and is strongly supported by interests outside the trade.

Temperance agitation under existing conditions aims chiefly to discourage the use of strongly-alcoholic drinks, to prevent the manufacture of chemically prepared wines, and to obtain the prohibition of absinthe. This liquid, which in some brands contains more than 70 per cent. of alcohol, has been strongly denounced on all sides, and will be completely suppressed by the present drastic measure if successfully adjusted by the government in regard to revenue.

Missouri Becoming Temperance State.

"If the anti-liquor sentiment in this state continues to increase as it has in the last ten years, I predict that Missouri, like Kansas, will be in the prohibition list," declares Maj. James H. Whitecotton, representative in the state legislature from Monroe county, and former speaker of the house. On May 18, the governor, in his message, urged a law for local option by wards in cities of over 25,000 population.

W. C. T. U. at Jamestown.

The National W. C. T. U. has a special exhibit at the Jamestown exposition. Rest rooms are being conducted under W. C. T. U auspices, and informal receptions are being held every Thursday. July 19 was set apart as W. C. T. U. day, on which occasion National President Lillian M. N. Stevens and National Vice President Anna A. Gordon spoke.

Beware of Benedicts!

By H. M. KERNER.

Copyrighted, 1907, by Homer Sprague.

The new Mrs. Wolcott regarded Billy Bevan distrustfully. Not until the train had pulled out and she had sent her newly acquired husband forward to the baggage car to remove excess baggage in the shape of white satin streamers from their trunks would she feel safe. Billy Bevan was only happy when playing practical jokes. He was happiest when his victims were bridal couples.

Suddenly Bevan snapped a handcuff upon her husband's wrist and was drawing the bride and groom together with a mocking "till death do thee part" when he felt the cold steel on his own wrist and heard the fatal click. He, not the bride, was handcuffed to Wolcott.

"I say," he cried protestingly, "this is not fair."

"You can unlock yourself in time to leave at the next station," said Wolcott. "It's poetic justice, Billy."

"It's confoundedly unpleasant," Billy retorted. "You see, I did not get the key; never supposed that I should need one. I just could see you going to the hotel and asking that a pitcher of ice water and a policeman be sent to your room."

"YOU WISH HIM RELEASED AT THE NEXT STATION?" ASKED THE MAGICIAN.

"This is the better joke," smiled Wolcott. "It will teach you that marriage is something sacred, not merely a peg upon which to hang fool jokes. Let's go ahead to the smoking car. We will be less conspicuous there than here."

Arm in arm they made their way to the cafe car, but once there Wolcott dropped Bevan's wrist and let the cuff show.

They immediately became the center of attention. One man, more curious than the rest, turned to Wolcott. "Your prisoner?" he asked. The bridegroom regarded Bevan with a benevolent smile.

"He is a prisoner of his own making," Wolcott explained. "The jail yawns for him, but it is more likely to be the insane asylum that finally comes into its own."

"I see," grinned the questioner. "You're that bridal couple three cars back."

"I am part of that happy pair," conceded Wolcott, "but this is not the partner of my joys and sorrows. He simply shares my sorrows at the present time."

"You're a sharer all right," agreed Bevan with a chuckle. "There's some consolation in that. Think of poor Bess back there in the chair car all alone."

"She would rather be rid of us," said Wolcott comfortably. "It is all your own fault, Billy. I begged you not to try any of your fool tricks. Beware of the benedicts, Billy. They will all pay you back some day when your neck goes under the matrimonial yoke."

"The lady says to come on back and bring your friend," reported the white coated porter. "There's a seat next yours he can get."

Bevan's eyes snapped. He could make things interesting back in the chair car. But his amiable intention to turn the joke on his involuntary host was checked, for a dapper little man stepped forward.

"Permit me," he said. "I am a handcuff magician. "I can take those off if you wish."

"Then he'll go ranting through the train," said Wolcott. "I'd rather have him where I can watch him."

"No, it will be all right," said the magician as he drew a handkerchief over the cuffs. A click and Wolcott withdrew his hand, rubbing his chafed wrist. Bevan attempted to do the same, but when the handcuff king removed the cloth it was seen that the cuff had been slipped around the arm of Bevan's chair.

"You wish him released at the next station?" asked the magician.

"Better carry him to Presby," said Wolcott. "He has some friends there."

Bevan groaned. Grace Coburn lived at Presby. If any one should detect his plight and tell her— He shook his free fist after Wolcott's retreating form.

At Presby, Wolcott came up just as the first cuff was unfastened from the chair.

"Let him keep the other," he suggested. "He seems so fond of them it would be a shame to remove them."

"Quite so," agreed the magician. "Monsieur is too fond of a joke to let this terminate so abruptly? Is it not so?"

"Give my regards to Grace in case you see her," called Wolcott as Bevan made for the door. Bevan breathed a prayer that he would not see her, but as he stepped to the platform she came toward him with sparkling eyes.

"Why didn't you let us know that you were coming?" she cried as she shook hands.

"I didn't know it myself," he explained. "You see, I was carried off while I was saying goodby to Ted Wolcott and Bess, so I came on for a call."

"I'm glad you did," she said smilingly. "It's too bad I did not know that Bess was on the train. I came to see May Lewis off. Oh, have you hurt your wrist, Billy?"

"A little," he admitted lamely, scowling at the handkerchief bandage around the offending cuffs. "I'll tell you about it as we drive out."

He followed her over to the dog-cart.

"That was very careless," she scolded. "You must have hurt your wrist."

"It's not my wrist that hurts; it's my feelings," he began. When he had explained his plight he added, "Bert was hoping you would be here to see me—and you were," he ended miserably.

"Are you sorry that I was?" she demanded.

"Sorry? Not a bit of it, only a man feels such a fool."

"If you ever marry what a lot of back scores there will be to be paid off."

"Yes, Ted was telling me to beware of the benedicts. No girl would want to marry a man that will get the send-off that's in preparation for me."

"She would not care very much for you if she could not stand a little teasing for your sake," she said softly.

"A little teasing!" he echoed. "Why, they are liable to wreck the train to get square. How would you like"—

"There's a blacksmith shop just ahead," she said hurriedly to change the topic. "I guess he could cut that off."

The blacksmith could and did.

"That lets you out of a scrape," Grace said when they were under way again.

"Only to get into a greater one," he declared. "I—well, I've been trying for months to get up my courage to ask you to marry me, dear. I think you know that I love you. I know that you love me or you would have joked me about the scrape I was in. Do you think, dear, that you love me enough to say 'Yes?'"

"I think I can brave even the benedicts," she answered shyly.

Physical Horrors Not Art.

The subject of discussion at the Impressionists' club was a picture, "Circe's Swine," by a young German painter, a grotesque study showing the enchantress among a herd of bestial things, variously diverging from the human type—furry eared fauns, shaggy hipped satyrs, apes with pink palms, snuffling jackals and thick jowled swine—all with more or less of agonized human intelligence protesting mutely from their hideous lineaments.

"They are all errors, these freakish excesses," declared an old painter of the second empire. "Triboulet, Quasimodo, Gwynplaine, have no proper place in art. Such art belongs to the Huns and Iroquois, who could only be stirred by laceration and dismemberment. The only effects of horror properly within the province of the artist are psychological. Everything else is a mere matter of the abattoir. The body as nature has evolved it is sanctified by her purpose, in any natural function or attitude decent and comely. But lop away so much as a finger and you have wounded the creature beyond reparation."—Willa Sibert Cather in McClure's.

Indian Bug Eaters.

A reporter went over into the Indian Territory and ate locusts with the full bloods. He says: "The insects are caught at night just before they are strong enough to fly away. The Indians select a smooth spot of ground where they have ascertained that the grubs are plentiful and clean it off nicely. When it is dark they go to the place thus prepared with torches and beat the ground with a maul or jump up and down on it, with the result that the young locusts swarm out and are swept into bags and baskets, where they are salted, put in an oven and browned. Impelled by curiosity, the writer took a helping of the suspicious looking bugs and bit gingerly a plump one in the middle and then ate the whole bug and helped himself to more, for he found that the locust was not a bad tasting bug at all. It has a flavor somewhat like that of a dried herring or salted peanuts, and the crisp, brown bugs make very good eating."—Joplin (Mo.) News-Herald.

Character In the Eyes.

Character reading from the features is an interesting study in which most people indulge, though perhaps unconsciously. A man is heard frequently to remark that he never [illegible] a person by external appearances, but let a person apply to this [illegible] for a position and the first [illegible] will do will be to make a mental estimate of the character, ability and general condition of the applicant. And he does this from outward appearances entirely. When a man applies for a job, look at his eyes. More signs of character are expressed through the eyes than any other feature. The eye is the window to the brain, and through it an expert character reader can often see many a tale that would be lost to the average person. A guilty eye has sent more than one criminal to meet his fate, and a steady, unflinching one has helped many a man through a serious difficulty.—Frequenter.

"Chocolate."

His name was Georgie Washington—they called him "Choc." for short.
He put up with his "mammy" and she worked for Deacon Bort.
Now, "Choc." was just a negro at the pickaninny stage—
About ten years, I reckon was the little duffer's age.

The kids they sorter liked him cus allus laughed like June—
They didn't seem t' mind it if the la was a "coon."
Nobody ever questioned "Choc." abou his dusky skin
When fellers at the river used t' shuck and hiper in.

One day a dude frum Hinckley cum t' stay awhile in town—
He said he wasn't bound t' play with "niggers" that was brown.
The first time in his hist'ry "Choc." was sorry fer his face
And felt the sharp distinction put upon the colored race!

At swimming times they barred him frum the pleasures of the swim—
A sittin' there a-waitin' wusn't lively fun fer him.
Th' fellers they wuz sorry that the color line was made—
They wished that "Choc." was in it every game o' ball they played.

And then the Hinckley kiddie got a cramp and couldn't swim—
There wa'n't a single feller that could go and rescue him!
"Choc." up and shucked his trousers and he dove t' fetch the lad—
Wasn't nuthin' mean ner selfish 'bout this colored boy—ner bad!

He saved him, with a struggle, but he couldn't git t' shore—
They ain't no more race question fer our fellers any more!
And, somehow, I sorter figger that perhaps God planned his fate,
Knowin' best jest how to end it an' t' take our "Chocolate."

Water in the Suburbs.

Not far from the River Tiber in a suburb of Rome—to be precise, the Rialto des Retired Farmeria—a dust-covered traveler from Kalamazoo, Mich., drank greedily at the town pump!

Again and again he filled the rude gourd-shell and drained it to the last globular prism!

"Dost like the water?" queried Adolphus Buttinski of 7-11 Rip Van Winkle boulevard, standing hard by.

"Ah, indeed! Have one?" responded the man from the town where the celery grows.

"For 80 long years I have partaken of this liquid fount in the public arenio," began Mr. Buttfinski, laving his lips lovingly in the cooling water of the gourd and drinking deep! "Fed by the pure rains of heaven, its nectar passeth the sweetness of wine! Invigorating cup, I drink to thee once more as I have again and again for 80 long—"

"Git out o' there, ol' whiskers! Outen the way!" bawled the plebeian foreman of a repair gang. "I come to' fix a wheeze in this here town pump!"

And they fell to work madly, not being members of a labor union!

"Ah, ha! What's this?" suddenly cried a burly Roman appearing above the well brim and gingerly holding a deceased and decrepit cat by the tail. "Have a drink, fellers!"

"'Alas, poor Yorick! I knew him well!'" gasped the man from Michigan vigorously poking his finger down his throat to superinduce nausea!

"Hey, you resident of the Rialto des Goldbrickibus!" he shouted, "it's been rainin' cats and dogs in Rome again!"

But Adolphus Buttinski was out behind the toga shop of Romeo de Gonzales, tickling his palate with a whisp of chippy-grass in a mad endeavor to cause the upheaval of an acquired liquidation of 40 years!

"Rome! Rome! How many crimes are committed in thy name!"—and this is one of the worst of them!

John's Arithmetic.

Teacher—"Now, Johnnie, the farmer's wife has four eggs left after sending her husband to market, and he three salwart sons are clamoring for breakfast. If she divides them equally what will she have left?"

Johnnie—"Nuthin'!"

Teacher—"Nothing? Why, Johnnie, how stupid you are!"

Johnnie—"She has four eggs and three boys?"

T.—"Yes."

J.—"Ain't none of 'em bad?"

T.—"No, not one!"

J.—"She won't have nuthin' left 'ceptin' the shells! Who ever heard of three boys leavin' anything left of four scrambled eggs!"

Stub Ends.

Death always seems to be lying in wait for the man who is just gettin ready to rest and enjoy life.

The trouble with a married man is that he doesn't get a new suit often enough to feel real comfortable in one.

The proof of a wife's cooking sometimes is the undertaker's bill.

Many a man is in jail because he was found out.

The average man gives better advice than he takes.

The difference between what men infer they make and what they really make, would keep a large family in luxury.

What we need in this country is a batch of married folks who will act toward each other as they did before marriage.

Extension of Federal Power Is Dangerous.

By Judge GEORGE GRAY of the United States Circuit Court.

IT would be idle to close our eyes to the fact that there are many good people in this country to whom AN ENLARGEMENT OF NATIONAL POWER SEEMS ATTRACTIVE and who would transfer to the general government many of the responsibilities and duties which have from the beginning been recognized as belonging to the local government and sovereignty of the states.

It has been more than suggested that this enlargement of federal power should take place as the result of judicial action and that by some of those subtle refinements of which the human mind is always capable and to which human language is always amenable we may create and AGGRANDIZE a national government that would strip the states of much of their reserved sovereignty.

The greatest blessing of our system of government in the past has been that the people of the states, AS SEPARATE BODIES POLITIC, have been compelled to develop their capacity for self government and provide, by their own civic activity, for the healthful exercise of those great police powers upon which the WELL BEING AND SAFETY of the individual and of the community must depend.

The danger of this centralizing sentiment is that it appeals to the selfishness of human nature and to the willingness to be relieved of the BURDENS AND RESPONSIBILITIES of self government. But I am persuaded that the prevailing sentiment of the American people does not favor the exchange of our self governed communities and the INDIVIDUAL liberty that they foster for the paternalism of a national government which suppresses the one and must, in the nature of things, tend to extinguish the other.

There is no danger that our courts AND ESPECIALLY OUR SUPREME COURT will respond to such a suggestion, whatever be its source.

THE FEW AND SIMPLE WORDS WHICH HAVE CONFERRED ON CONGRESS THE POWER TO REGULATE COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES HAVE SERVED AS A DOOR WHICH HAS BEEN OPENED WIDER AND WIDER IN RECENT TIMES FOR THE ADMISSION OF THE GENERAL GOVERNMENT INTO PARTICIPATION IN THE INTERNAL AFFAIRS OF THE STATES. WE DO NOT WISH TO CLOSE THAT DOOR, BUT IT DOES BEHOOVE ALL WHO LOVE OUR INSTITUTIONS TO GUARD SO FAR AS THEY CAN AGAINST ENTRY THROUGH IT OF THOSE FORCES OF CENTRALIZATION WHICH UNDER THE MERE PRETENSE OF REGULATING INTERSTATE COMMERCE ARE NOW CLAMORING FOR ADMISSION.

Admitted UNGUARDEDLY, they will throng thick and fast over all the barriers of the constitution and reduce to ruin the citadel of local self government, so long and so fondly believed to be the palladium of our liberties. It is no fancied danger against which I presume to warn you.

IT IS A DOCTRINE FULL OF PERIL TO OUR LIBERTIES THAT CONGRESS MAY SEIZE UPON ANY WEAPON IT PLEASES OUT OF THE GREAT ARMORY OF FEDERAL POWERS AND WIELD IT FOR A PURPOSE FOR WHICH IT WAS NOT THERE DEPOSITED.

America's Hope Lies In The Common Schools.

By BENJAMIN IDE WHEELER, President of the University of California.

HUMAN society of this present time and place evidently believes in education. IT IS INCLINED TO STAKE ITS LIFE UPON IT. It believes on the whole with a faith that is childlike and bland. It is often perplexed about what to teach and why and how to teach it and through whom, and yet the perplexities seem only to sanctify the deep mysteries of pedagogy and strengthen faith in the systems that issue from the cloud wrapped mount of education. If education fails in an individual case, the faith is still strong enough and the charity gentle enough to judge that THERE OUGHT TO HAVE BEEN MORE OF IT IN QUANTITY OR ELSE A HIGHER VOLTAGE. The operation was successful, though the patient died.

For all the social ills education has come to be as universal a prescription as bloodletting in the older medicine. If people are leaving the farms, if divorce is undermining the family, if the political machine is looting the cities, the remedy is to be found in education. The schools must look out for it. This is the habit of opinion today. This appears to be a good one. THE OPINION IS PRESUMABLY IN SUBSTANCE CORRECT.

AT THE HEART OF THE PRESENT DAY BELIEF IN EDUCATION IS OUR PEOPLE'S FAITH IN THE COMMON SCHOOLS. THEY HAVE DEVELOPED EQUALLY WITH OUR DEMOCRACY. OUR PEOPLE ARE PERSUADED THAT THE MAINTENANCE OF OUR PECULIAR INSTITUTIONS OF POPULAR GOVERNMENT IS DEPENDENT UPON THEIR EXISTENCE AND THE FULL AND SUCCESSFUL WORKINGS OF THESE INSTITUTIONS UPON THEIR EFFICIENCY. THERE HAS APPEARED NO COMPETENT REASON FOR IMPUGNING THE WISDOM OF THIS DECIDED AND INCREASING POPULAR CONVICTION.

Railroads Do Not Pay Fair Returns.

By Justice DAVID J. BREWER of the United States Supreme Court.

THERE is much said about the railroads. It is a popular practice to say that they are VERY WICKED. For instance, like life insurance companies, there has been a great deal of wrong, such as granting of special favors, bad stock speculations and the like.

But taking the earnings and the money invested in railroads as a whole, THERE IS NOT A FAIR RETURN ON THE MONEY INVESTED. The attempt to squeeze those who built up the railroads and through them the country is not right.

THE MEN WHO INVESTED THEIR MONEY ARE ENTITLED TO A REASONABLE RATE OF INTEREST.

PARTY SPLIT INTO HOSTILE FACTIONS

Enemies of Gov. Warfield Have Knives Gleaming Under Every Bush.

The enemies of Gov. Warfield within the Democratic party—and their name is legion—are jubilant over the announcement that Warfield will enter the primaries for the United States Senate. They see in this the chance for which they have waiting—and that is to show on the face of returns that the governor is not a strong political factor in Maryland. It must not be forgotten that although the primaries will be under the Crawford county system the old Democratic ring is in control of the machinery and will attend to the count of ballots.

Even the close friends of the governor, those who believe that he will withdraw from the race, admit that Warfield is not popular with even the politicians outside of the ring—men who take an active part in the politics of their respective sections, yet are not tied up with the machine. On the eastern shore, for instance, even the most sanguine Warfield man could not hope for a single county. That section will be solid behind Col. John Walter Smith. In Baltimore city Warfield would only have the independent Democrats, and this would not be sufficient to swing the city senators and delegates to the governor. These eight senators and twenty-four delegates would be controlled by former Gov. Brown, just as the city delegation in the state convention was controlled.

Howard, the home county of Gov. Warfield, would be the scene of a hot fight and presents a peculiar condition should State Senator Gorman enter the primaries, whice is regarded as most likely. In Howard county Warfield has, perhaps, more friends than in any other section of the state, but the regulars have their knives glistening for the governor and will go to any extreme to down him in the primaries. Senator Gorman, too, has many enemies within the ring and outside the ring. He is in a word, not so popular in Howard county as a state senator should be, but he has this advantage over Warfield—no one questions his party regularity. The fight for the control of the Howard county delegation in the legislature would be a hot one, and the result either way would be close, with the chances favoring Senator Gorman. It is conceded that Warfield would win in Anne Arundel county, a test of strength having been made in the primaries some weeks ago, when the organization forces were routed. In southern Maryland there is little or no hope for Warfield to carry a single county.

In the western tier of counties it was reasonable to assume some weeks ago that Warfield would have a chance to carry Washington county, but conditions have changed. This is due to the fact that Gov. Warfield and Col. Buchanan Schley had a row during the recent state convention and the entente cordiale has not been re-established. Col. Schely, too, was treated very kindly in the matter of patronage when John Walter Smith was governor, and it is only reasonable to assume that if Col. Smith wants any aid from Col. Schley he will receive it. Garrett and Allegany counties are hopelessly lost to Warfield and it is an open question where Montgomery would stand as between Warfield and the other candidates who may declare themselves.

One thing however, is certain, and that is that in twenty of the twenty-three counties of the state the chances would be all against Warfield. Every man of the famous Gorman-Rasin guard would bring every influence at his command to down Warfield and would contribute freely of his money and time to bring about such a crushing defeat for the governor that he would for all time be eliminated as a factor in politics.

The man in absolute control of the Democratic situation in Maryland today is former Gov. Smith, and he has not the slightest intention of releasing his grip. It is Smith who will finance the campaign and Smith who will bear the brunt of attack during the fight. Smith has passed through this experience before and has become a stoic. He has had his eye on a seat in the United States Senate for years and if Democratic success comes this fall he intends that after March 4, 1909, it shall be "John Walter Smith, United States senator and political boss of Maryland." Col. Smith during the years of his retirement in Snow Hill has nursed the wrongs that were his at the hands of the old machine. He has many scores to settle and thirsts of revenge. He is the only wealthy Democrat who is willing to tap the bar'l in this campaign. He will ask no man in the party to assist in carrying the financial burden of of the fall fight. He will go it alone and if victory comes to the Democratic ticket then Col. Smith will have none to dispute his right to shake the plum tree.

Chairman Parran of the Republican state central committee will open headquarters in the Calvert building in this city next week, and from then until the polls close next November the most vigorous campaign ever waged by the Republicans will be conducted. The fight will be waged on honest elections and the managers will never run short of ammunition, as was shown in these letters of the past week. The present election law is probably the most iniquitous that ever blotted the statute books of a state, and under the manipulation of the Democratic ringster no honest expression of the will of the people of Maryland is possible. The law was drawn by former Attorney General John P. Poe, and, as it was intended it should be, disfranchises a number sufficient to give the Democrats a reasonable certainty of success at the polls. The Republicans will probably use "Gaither and Good Government" as their campaign slogan and will make capital of the fact that Warfield, who stood for the same principles that Gaither represents in state government, was turned down by the ring Democrats because he would not permit affairs to be run so that the Democratic party heelers could benefit at the expense of the state. They will also bring prominently to the fore the fact that Judge Crother is the personal candidate of Col. Smith, who when governor called an extra session of the legislature for the sole purpose of emasculating the fair and square election law passed by the Republican legislature during the administration of Gov. Lloyd Lowndes.

Both parties will settle upon the candidates for the senate and house of delegates next week. There is little or no chance of contests in the Republican ranks, the leaders being outspoken for a give-and-take open-door policy in order to preserve the harmony now existing through the party in this city.

In the Democratic camp, however, there is a wide scramble and the ward executives are up a tree. By some former Gov. Brown is regarded as the Democratic boss of Baltimore town, while others are casting their fortunes with "Sonny" Mahon, who aspires to become the undisputed boss of city politic. In every senatorial district there are two or more candidates—one favored by Mahon, the other by Brown, and in some cases still another, who is making an independent canvass for the nomination. In the second district the two candidates present a knotty problem—one being opposed by the prohibitionists and the other one favored. In this district in seems likely that a dark horse may develop. In the other districts, too, the liquor question is giving the Demacratic managers much concern. So, altogether, the Democrats have a rocky road to travel even before the campaign proper opens.

The Republican for Job Printing.

"Pillows? Ladies, Pillows?"

The porter came through the car with his arms filled with clean, white pillows. Number one was nearing Oakland, and a well-dressed young lady took six and very kindly handed them around to friends of her's in the party. The porter very potitely placed them beneath the weary heads of the half dozen. He then with equal politeness took his stand beside the very polite young lady who had ordered the pillows. She in the meantime had closed her eyes for a restful snooze.

The porter touched her gently on the arm and looked her in the eyes with an enquiring gaze. He finally said,

"A dollar and a half, please, mum."

"What for?" she inquired.

"For those pillars, mum."

"What, doesn't the railroad company furnish them free to the passengers?"

"No, mum."

"Then take back your pillars!" the young lady exclaimed as she jerked the one out from beneath her head.

And long were the faces of the other five as the porter took from them their head rests of down and explained that he and wife and children would starve to death if he did not get the revenue that came from the sale of pillows.

As to the humiliation of the kind young lady who ordered the pillows—we shall let that go undescribed.

Ill-Mannered Motorists.

It is idle for people to cry out against the motor car, though they may object and rightly, to the recklessness with which some of the inexperienced, young and badmannered drivers forget the rights of the pedestrian, the cyclist and and the occupant of a horse-drawn vehicle. These are matters calling for severe punishment.

Japan and United States Cannot Afford to Quarrel

By CHOZO KOIKE,
Japan's Consul-General in United States, New York City.

WAR between the United States and Japan to me is inconceivable.

All talk of it is an absurdity. Of course, in my capacity as consul general I have nothing to do officially with diplomatic questions which may arise between the two countries.

All of those matters are dealt with by the Japanese embassy in Washington. My official functions relate chiefly to the commerce of the two nations.

The Japanese embassy has decided, and very wisely, too, in my opinion, not even to discuss the possibility of war between the nations, in the hope that the whole matter will die of inanition and be forgotten so completely that it will never arise again. For that reason I hesitate even to mention the subject even in a most general way.

I have said before, and repeat it, that what Japan and the United States both want is commerce and not war. Both nations are devoted to commerce, not to conflict.

All of the Japanese merchants in this country and all intelligent, thinking Japanese in Japan and elsewhere regard all talk of war between the two nations as nonsense.

I am told that the thinking, intelligent American people take precisely the same view of the matter.

Whatever questions have arisen can easily be settled. If there be any cause for friction, all that is necessary is to find the specific thing which produces the trouble, examining it closely, study it carefully and thoroughly, and a solution will easily be found.

There is an old saying in Japan: "Rich men do not quarrel." This saying is applicable to the present situation. If there be any Americans who are belligerently inclined toward Japan they should study the statistics of the commerce between the countries.

For the year ending December 31, 1906, the exports of the United States to Japan amounted to 69,948,681 yen and the exports of Japan to the United States 125,964,408 yen.

So far this year there has been a tremendous increase in the commerce of the two nations, and the aggregate promises to exceed by a heavy margin the figures of last year.

When these figures are considered it can be seen that war between the two nations can only be done at a sacrifice of this tremendous trade. The commerce of the two countries shows that Japan and the United States are dependent more or less in a business way upon each other. Any interruption of the steady increase in the volume of trade between the two countries would be a calamity of itself regardless of all the other horrors of war.

I hope that the newspapers will cease printing anything at all on the subject of war. If one gets in the habit of even talking of war in a most general way it brings about a condition of the public mind that is undesirable.

Any ordinarily insignificant happening becomes distorted and assumes an importance altogether beyond its real meaning, and in the hands of sensationalists is easily made the bone of a new contention.

The Modern Pagan and His Home

By REV. HARRY GRANISON HILL.

We do not worship a Thor, nor a Woden, nor a Jove, nor a Mar, yet we daily bow the knee to amusement, ease and commercialism.

The pagan is not necessarily a bad man—as the term man is applied—but he lives as though Christ had not lived, and he dies as though Christ had not died. He spends his Sundays in athletic sports and amusements, at public parks or in pay meuseums. This may be healthful and it may be pure—but it is the time and not the thing that develops this class of pagans.

The modern pagan home has its fine tapestries, musical instruments, creations of art, libraries of fiction and of farce, and over and against the plan and frugal home of the past, with its chief library volume—the Bible. This pagan home has its springs of pleasure, but none of joy; its sources of vigor, but none of power; its fountains of recreation, but none of inspiration.

The question of amusements needs a Christian discrimination. Some are entirely wrong within themselves, some are wrong in circumstance, some are wrong in time. A proper amusement will do no wrong to self; will bring no blush of shame to the cheek; will work no loss of time and will do no wrong to others.

The body was made to serve the soul. Think of what man is capable and then think what he is doing. Endowed with an intellect and a will which make him a little lower than the angels, having the precepts and practices of a living Christ to guide him, he still bows the knee to Baal.

The Marriage of Convenience

By FRANKLIN H. GIDDINGS,
Professor of Economics at Columbia University.

Our view of the relative merits of romantic marriage and the marriage of convenience is necessarily determined by our view of what marriage is for.

In the days of ancestor worship the supreme purpose of marriage was to insure offspring to "pour upon the earth of the tomb the milk of mountain heifers, libations of wine and the honey of yellow bees" with which, Iphigenia remarked, the living were wont to "rejoice the dead."

If the object of marriage is to obtain or to raise the social position of the family, the marriage of convenience is certainly a more effective means to that end than the marriage of love.

But if it is admissible to regard the personal happiness of husband and wife, and the physical and mental well-being of their offspring for indefinite generations, as the supreme objects of marriage the so-called love or romantic marriage is the only one that can claim biological and psychological sanction.

The literature of evolution, from Darwin to Westermarck, is clear and, on the whole, conclusive on this point. If it is true, as has been alleged, that many people in America are of late maintaining that the European marriage of convenience is better than the American romantic marriage, the fact undoubtedly means that the wealthy stratum in American society is beginning to feel a strong desire to segregate itself as an exclusive or aristocratic class. That, I suspect, is true.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1907. NUMBER 27

SEPTEMBER SUNSHINE

ill Not Be Greatly in Evidence, Says Peter R. Smith.

Peter R. Smith forecasts the weather for September as follows:

The indications denote September a stormy and erratic month in most all portions of the country in some form of disturbance. The month is likely to be attended by many intense storms of wind, rain, hail, electric showers, and unpleasantly cool snaps. The Southern Atlantic, Gulf of Mexico and the contigious country may be visited by equatorial storms. The lakes are open doorways to storms also to the reaction of storms. Threatening causes and exciting influences are very prominent within September. However, these forces may be counteracted by causes which may direct the forces and expend them in some other way than entirely in meteorological disturbances, such as earthquakers, etc.

On or touching the 3d a high temperature will be experienced; clouds will form and be on transit in the different sections to the 8th. The clouds will be charged in most places with rain and in some places with hail, wind, and rain.

On or touching the 10th a return to storm conditions will be denoted by black, threatening clouds and vigorous rains and windstorms. The terrestrial forces, such as magnetism, become oscillatory before the earth's equinox which adds force to all the other disturbing factors. From the 14th to the 23d much cloudy weather will continue with many repeating storms in some form of meteorological disturbance, such as rain, hail, wind, and electric showers, will be in transit, interchangeable with some sunshine. At the close of these storms the weather will become cool with northwest air current on passage.

A repetition of storm conditions will return about the 29th, bringing a wave of warmer weather, followed by an excited meteorology. September will most likely sail the ship of weather conditions clear of the frost line by at least eight or more days.

PRODUCTION OF COAL IN MARYLAND IN 1906

More Than Five Million Tons, Valued At Six and a Half Million Dollars.

The Geological Survey announces that the coal production of Maryland in 1906 amounted to 5,435,463 short tons, having a spot value of $6,474,793, exceeding the production of 1905 by 326,914 short tons (6.4 per cent.) and reaching the highest figure in the history of the State. The maximum output prior to 1906 was 5,271,609 short tons, mined in 1902, when the anthracite mines of Pennsylvania were idle on account of the great strike. Compared with 1902, the output for 1906 shows an increase of a little more than 3 per cent.

The coal-producing area is confined entirely to Allegany and Garrett counties, in the western part of the State, and from this area, estimated at 510 square miles, there had been mined up to the close of 1906 over 142,000,000 short tons of coal. The output has not varied materially in the last 10 years, having ranged from a maximum of the last year, and averaging 4,853,764 short tons for each year of the decade.

The restricted area of the field and the fact that it is already well developed make it improbable that any marked increase in production will be obtained. The unusually large tonnage in 1906 was due to an extra demand created by shortage in other States. This shortage also resulted in an advance in the price of Maryland coal of from $1.14 a ton in 1905 to $1.19 in 1906. The total value increased from $5,831,760 to $6,474,794, a gain of $743,033, or 11 per cent., as compared with an increase of 6.4 per cent in tonnage. The maximum value was attained in 1903, when, with a product of 4,846,165 tons, the value amounted to $7,189,784, an average of $1.48 a ton.

The total number of men employed in the coal mines of Marylahd in 1906 was 6438, who worked an average of 250 days, against 5948 man for an average of 252 days in 1905. The average production per men in 1906 was 844.3 tons, 858.9 tons in 1905, and 3.38 tons in 1906.

Practically all the mines in Maryland are operated 10 hours a day. Out of a total of 6438 men employed in the coal mines of the State, 6358 men, in 45 mines, were reported as working 10 hours a day. The statistics relating to the use of mining machines shows that although the number of machines in use has increased (from 38 in 1904 to 42 in 1005 and to 59 in 1009), the amount of machine-mined coal decreased from 584,373 tons in 1904 to 468,822 tons in 1905 and to 427,450 tons in 1906.

Stricken With Paralysis.

Mrs. Horace R. DeWitt, wife of County Treasurer DeWitt, was stricken with paralysis on Friday afternoon, her right forearm and hand being affected. At present her condition is somewhat improved we are glad to state.

PROHIBITIONISTS NAMED STATE TICKET SATURDAY

They Named Many For Governor Before One Accepted.

WILLIAM GISREAL WILL LEAD

Convention Was Attended By a Large Number of Delegates and Some Men of National Reputation Made Addresses.

William Gisreal, of Baltimore, for Governor; Harry E. Gilbert, of Baltimore, for Attorney-General; George A. Horner, of Baltimore county, for Comptroller; J. H. Dulaney, of Wicomico county, for Clerk of the Courts of Appeals.

This is the ticket nominated Saturday at Mountain Lake Park by the Prohibitionists of Maryland. Many delegates were present and all seemed pleased over the day's work. The session began at 2 p. m., with the election of James W. Frizzel, of Baltimore, as chairman, and Rev. Charles M. Elderdice, Baltimore, as secrerary of the convention. Resolutions were adopted adopted condemning the liquor traffic, advocating election of the United States Senators by the people, favoring alcohol for indutsrial purposes and praying Congress to enact laws that shall prohibit the wagoning of liquor into dry districts and counties.

Rev. Mr. Elderdice was elected State chairman and organizer for the prohibitionists of Maryland. An effort will be made to raise $1,500 annually to pay Mr. Elderdice for his entire time to be devoted to the cause of temperance.

When the delegates arrived there was no candidate in the field for the Governorship. James W. Frizzell, of Baltimore, was first nominated, but owing to bad health he declined. State Chairman Finley C. Hendrickson was next placed in nomination but he too declined. The third party was George R. Gorsuch, of Baltimore, but owing to recent business relationships he also was unable to accept the honor. No one seemed available, and so it was decided to think over the situation until after supper, when the name of Mr. Gisrael was placed before the convention by George R. Gorsuch and seconded by Finley C. Hendrickson.

Chairman Frizzell was instructed to named later the time, place and committee of notification to the nominees. National Chairman Charles R. Jones, of Chicago, was present and made an address on the status and results of the Prohibition reform to date.

A Sunday School Outing.

The North Glade and Fort Hill Sunday schools united in a well conceived and most successfully managed picnic in "Howell's Grove," near Beckman, Saturday, August 31st, 1907.

Men and weather blended for a day of social freedom and refreshing recreation. Summer in her brightest robes was decked in enchanting beauty and if the brisk breeze bore a tinge of approaching autumn it came up from the vast glade sweet in the perfume of newly cut grass, shrubbery and blossoms. The place of assembling had been happily chosen in nature's pavilion of stately oaks and sloping in a graceful curve about the head of a mighty stretch of glade scenery. Under the sheltering branches of great trees platforms, tables and stands had been improvised for a super-abundant dinner of breads, meats, icecream, melons, and delicacies of the larder and the season. More than a hundred, no doubt, were in attendance and every body seemed to catch the best spirit of the prevailing enjoyment and to enter with lively zest into the entertainment of the time. In the afternoon the platform was cleared for speaking which was open by preliminary remarks from C. M. Miller, who was followed in an address by the Rev. J. B. Shoup, the well known and universally admired Lutheran minister of Bittinger and who is always heard from the pulpit and the rostrum by our people with pleasure and profit.

RELLIM.

B. & O. Warns.

General Manager Thomas Fitzgerald, of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, has issued an order to the superintendents of the various divisions calling attention to the rule of the company in regard to the use of intoxicants and directing that it be rigidly enforced.

The company has always prohibited the use of intoxicating liquors by employes while on duty and has done what it could to discourage its men from frequenting saloons at all times. The general manager's present order is more in the nature of a reminder than anything else.

JUDGE JOHN JAY JACKSON DEAD

Remains Taken Home Tuesday Morning Accompanied by Distinguish Men.

The remains of Judge John Jay Jackson of Parkersburg, who died Monday morning at Atlantic City, passed through here Tuesday morning on train No. 3, en route to Parkersburg. The remains had been placed in the private car of Mr. Geo. F. Randolph, and in the car, accompanying the remains to their destination, were, among others, Judge Alton B. Parker and Judge Moore, of New York City, and Col. John T. McGraw of Grafton.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The season at the Park is practically over, though many cottagers and guests will remain through September and many well into October. The season has not been up to our expectations, owing to very wet weather, the failure on the part of the railroads to grant the usual excursion rates and the Jamestown Exposition.

The crowd Grand Army Day was very large—larger than that of last year. This was the only occasion during the season that the B. & O. Railroad granted excursion rates. There was considerable feeling on the part of the old soldiers and their friends on the announcement that there would be no free admissions. Heretofore from the first session of the Mountain Chautauqua and on every succeeding year the gates have been open to our country's defenders on G. A. R. Day, and this year nothing was said to the contrary in the program and posters, and the announcement at the gate was a surprise and mortification not only to the aged, tottering, maimed veterans, but to their families and friends. The result was that several hundred people who had intended to purchase tickets refused to do so. Had the forty or fifty old soldiers present been admitted free the management would have received from one hundred and fifty to two hundred dollars from their families and friends on that day and many more dollars in the future than they will while the memory of this treatment of their fatners and grandfathers is retained.

The sorrow and gloom occasioned here by the announcement of the sudden death of Dana Miller at Charleston, W. Va., was deepened when it was known that his death came by his own hand. Temporary insanity is given as the only possible cause as it was known to his associates for several days before the occurrence that Mr. Miller was not exactly himself. On the morning of the terrible deed a friend had called at Mr. Miller's room and asked him to accompany him to church. Mr. Miller refused and asked the friend to remain with him. The request, however, was not granted. The visitor noticed at the time that Mr. Miller had finished shaving and that his razor was lying open on the dresser. During the day several friends visited him at his room and at seven o'clock Mr. Charles McWhorter went to the room and found Mr. Miller lying in front of the dresser, with his throat cut from ear to ear. It is thought that in the state of mind in which he was, the sight of the razor had crazed him.

The remains were interred in Woodlawn Cemetery, Fairmont, on Wednesday morning, after services at the residence of John S. Hamilton, uncle of the deceased.

Mrs. Flora Hayden and daughter Fay of Kingwood, W. Va., spent several days at the Park with relatives.

Dr. W. W. Davis will preach in the Tabernacle at 11 o'clock Sunday morning. Offering to go to local church.

Regular services will be resumed in the M. E. church Sunday evening at 8 o'clock, when Rev. J. B. Workman will preach.

Our sick are all in a fair way to recover, and no new cases within the past two weeks.

The store in the Hocking building, managed by Mr. C. W. Hopkins during the season, will be closed next week.

Mr. Adolph Rambeau took the civil service examination at Cumberland yesterday.

Mr. Charles Wilson, of the Insular Department, Washington, D. C., is spending a short vacation here with his parents.

Miss Blanch Chance will have charge of the Firm Rock school the coming session.

Miss DeBerry, who conducted a successful boarding house this season, will have charge of the Hutton school the coming session as principal.

Call for Your Letters.

Miss Lillie Calhoun, Mrs. Charles Carter, Mrs. Danary Davis, Miss Mollie E. Gladden, Mrs. Chas. Helbig, Mr. Jud. Kimmel, Mr. Peter Malloy, Wm. Shiliy.

TRIBUTE TO AN OLD FRIEND.

From The Venerable Jacob Brown, of Cumberland, Md., of Similar Age And Close Birth Places.

Chauncey F. Shultz died on the 19th of August, 1907, in St. Louis, Mo. He was born May 29, 1824, in the old Shultz stone house mansion, near Salisbury, Somerset Co., Pa., and was in the 84th year of his age. He was the seventh of the 18 children of Adam Shultz by his two marriages. About 1836 the large Shultz family moved to "old Grantsville," where they lived, prospered and were prominent for many years. They were engaged in the tanning and leather business. The old father died in 1864 and rests in the cemetery at Grantsville, Md. Some of this large family had gone west before his death, but soon thereafter the whole family followed, with one exception, and she, the oldest of the 18, and yet living, high up in her nineties, on the highest peak of Keyser's Ridge, Garrett county. Such is Eliza Royer

Most of this large family located in St. Louis, where our subject settled down in 1859, and spent a prosperous and honorable life. He was a thorough business man. His education was limited. Such as was usual in the days of his youth. His successful business life showed plainly his make, and energy. Additional to his prominence as a business man, he held, and filled several high and responsible official positions in St Louis. Was presiding judge of the county court for six years, was U. S. subtreasurer for four years, besides holding other positions of a public character. All of which he filled with fitness, fidelity and ability. He had a clear and perceptive mind, which he was careful to improve, and control. In manners and social relations he was civil and courteous, careful not to offend or resent what some might regard as an offense. His society was much sought. Was prominent in church circles and needs and work. He was named after Chauncey Forward, a prominent states-of Pennsylvania.

Chauncey F. Schultz was sutiably and happily married to Miss Hadessa Brown, of Washington Co., Md., in 1848. She was of ancient family and a lady of culture. The union was a fit and proper one in every respect and was so regarded by all who knew their kindly relations. Her lamented death occurred in 1887. He was a devoted husband, a wise and watchful parent, and a faithful friend. Of fine address, much respected everywhere and deferred to. His loss will be much and long felt by many, even beyond the large kindred circle. But his four children, two sons and two daughters, are the chief sorrowers. He prided in being a grandson of a Revolutionary soldier, Christain Shockey. Four living brothers enjoy the same honors, as well as several sisters.

The Walking Kettles.

By FLOYD INGALLS.

Copyright, 1907, by James Schreiber.

I WAS introduced to them in an unexpected way, and I did not soon recover from the intense curiosity excited by my first impressions of them.

I had gone to the old Minot house, in Dorchester, Mass., to take dinner with my aunt. We two, my aunt and I, had wandered over the house, up the huge stairway and down into the cellar. Suddenly aunt opened the door of an old pantry on the floor of the porch and said, "Child, look here!"

"What, aunt?"

"The two brass kettles."

Two enormous brass kettles met my eyes. They were turned over on the floor, and each would have held the contents of a half barrel.

"Those are the ones, my dear."

"What ones, aunt?"

"The ones that saved the two children from the old Indian straggler."

"What Indian straggler?" I asked, with intense interest.

"Oh, the one in King Philip's war. Didn't you ever hear the story?"

"No, aunt."

"Well, I'll get Uncle Zebedee to tell it to you after dinner. Come."

"But what could any one do with such kettles as those? Where did they hang them?" I continued.

"Come here, and I will show you."

She swept away, and I shut the door of the dark room, which was lighted only by opening the door, and followed her. We went into the kitchen. She pointed to an enormous fireplace and said, "There, child."

"But, aunt, how did the two brass kettles save the children?" I asked again.

"Oh, they crawled about all over the floor here, there and yonder," pointing.

"Which crawled about, the kettles or the children, aunt?"

A din here fell upon the air and echoed through the great, fortress-like rooms. It was the huge bell for meals.

"Come, child, let's go. Uncle Zebedee will tell you all about it."

In a moment we were in the dining hall. How grand it all seemed! The sideboard was full of baked meats and steaming pies. Over it hung a flintlock gun or a blunderbuss. The room had been decorated for the occasion with creeping jenny and boughs loaded with peaches that had been broken off by a September gale. There was a whitewashed beam across the room on which were great hooks and staples. The table was oak, and the chairs were of a curious old pattern. At the head of the table was a great chair, and in it sat Uncle Zebedee, a good old man, now nearly ninety years of age.

After the family were seated Uncle Zebedee was asked to say grace. He had a habit of saying "and" after ending a sentence, and this made another sentence necessary, often when he had nothing more to say. It was so even in his prayers and was very noticeable in his story telling. There usually followed an "and" when the story was done.

It was a queer structure, the old Minot house in Dorchester. It was really a brick house incased in wood—a fort house it was called. It was built in this way to protect the dwellers against rude Indian assaults. There were many such houses in the old colonies, but one by one they grew gray with moss and went back. The Minot house itself was burned about twenty years ago after standing about 250 years.

The old people of Dorchester and Neponset must remember it. It rose solemn and stately at the foot of the hill that overlooked the sea meadows. The high tide came into the marsh mouth near it and went out again, leaving the abundant shellfish sparkling in the sun. The fringed gentians grew amid the aftermath of the mayflels around it. The orioles swung in the tall trees in summer time, and ospreys circled and screamed in the skies above all.

But it is needful. Here were the fullness and perfection of the old New England orchards! The south winds of May scattered the apple blossoms like snow over the emerald turf and filled the air with fragrance. The earliest bluebirds came to them, and there the first robins built their nests. How charming and airy it all was in May, when the days were melting into summer, and how really beautiful and full of life were all of these venerable New England homes!

After the old house was burned I visited the place and brought away a few bricks as a souvenir of a home of heroic memories—of happy memories, too, if we except a single tragedy of the Indian war. The great orchards were gone, the old barns and their swallows. Only the well remained and a heap of burned bricks and the blackened outline of the cellar wall.

It was a house full of legends and stories—wonder stories that once led a stranger to look upon it with a kind of superstitious awe. It had its historic lore, and, like all great colonial houses, its ghost lore, but the most thrilling legend associated with the old walls was known as "The Two Brass Kettles." The legend may have grown with time, but it was well based on historic facts and was often told at the ample firesides of three generations of Dorchester people.

The dinner, like Uncle Zebedee's prayer, seemed never to end. After the many courses of food there was an "and"—and pies and apples and nuts and all sorts of sweetmeats.

"Uncle Zebedee," I piped.

"Well, dearie."

"Aunt said that you would tell us the story of the two brass kettles after dinner."

"Why, dearie; yes, yes. I've been telling that story these eighty years, come October. Didn't you never hear it? I thought all little shavers knew about that. The two brass kettles—yes.

"They're in the old cupboard now. Bring them out, and I will tell you all about 'em. I shan't live to tell that story many more years. Maybe I shall never tell it again."

The servants brought out the two kettles into the kitchen where we could see them through the wide dining room door.

"Put 'em in the middle of the floor before the window," said Uncle Zebedee. "There, that will do. That is just where they were when the Indian came. You see the window?" he added.

It had a great, deep set casement. Grapevines half curtained it now on the outside, and the slanting sun shone through them, its beams glimmering on the old silver of the table. It was past the middle of the afternoon of the shortening days of autumn.

"You have all heard of Philip's war," continued Uncle Zebedee, leaning forward from his chair on his crutch. "Everybody has. It destroyed thirteen towns of the old colony and for two years filled every heart with terror. Philip struck here, there and everywhere. No one could tell where he would strike next. The sight of an Indian lurking about in the woods or looking out of the pines and bushes usually meant a massacre.

"One Sunday in July, in 1675, the family went to meeting, leaving two small children, a boy and a girl, at home in the charge of a maid named Experience. The kitchen then was as you see it now. The window was open; the two brass kettles had been scoured on Saturday and placed bottom upward on the floor just as you see them there."

"It was a blazing July day. The hayfields were silent. There was an odor of hayricks in the air, and the bobolinks, I suppose, toppled about in the grass and red winged blackbirds piped among the wild wayside roses just as they do now. I wish that you could have seen the old hayfields in the long July afternoons, all scent and sunshine. It makes me long for my boyhood again just to think of them. But I shall never mow again.

"Let me see. The two children were sitting on the floor near the two kettles. Experience was preparing dinner and had made a fire in the great brick oven, which heated the bricks, but did not heat the room.

"Well, on passing between the oven and the window she chanced to look toward the road, when she saw a sight that fixed her eyes and caused her to throw up her hands with horror, just like that."

Uncle Zebedee threw up both hands, like exclamation points, and let his crutch drop into his lap.

"Well, the maid only lost her wits for a few moments. She flew to the window and closed it and bolted the door. Then she put one of the children under one of the brass kettles and the other child under the other kettle and took the iron shovel and lifted it so and waited to see what would happen, and"—

Uncle Zebedee lifted his crutch, like an interrogation point, and we could easily imagine the attitude of the excited maid.

"And—where was I?"

"The children were under the two brass kettles, and the maid was standing with the fire shovel in her hand so," said aunt. "La, I've heard that story ever since I was a little girl."

"Yes, yes; I have it all now," said Uncle Zebedee. "She was standing with the fire shovel up so, when she discovered that the Indian had a gun—a gun.

"You see that old flintlock there over the sideboard? I used to fire it off every Fourth of July, but the last time I fired it kicked me over once. Don't you never fire it, children. It always kicked, but it never knocked me over before. I don't think I am quite as vigorous as I used to be, and"—

"What did the maid do with the gun?" asked aunt.

"The gun—yes, that was the gun, the one up there. The gun was up in the chamber then, and she dropped the shovel and ran upstairs to find it. But it was not loaded, and the powder was in one place and the shot in another, and in her hurry and confusion she heard a pounding on the door, just like that."

Uncle Zebedee rapped on the old oak table with startling effect, and then, after a moment's confusion, continued: "She loaded the gun and went down to the foot of the stairs and looked through the latch hole of the stair door, so—and—yes, and the Indian was standing at the window—that window. His two eyes were staring with wonder on the two brass kettles. He had probably never seen a kettle like these before, and he did not know what they were.

"While he stood staring and wondering the kettles began to move. Two little hands protruded under the bail of each of them, like turtles' paws, for the kettles stood on their ears, which lifted them a little way from the floor. One of the children began to creep and to cry, moving the kettle. The other began to do the same. The cries caused the kettles to ring. Two creeping kettles! They looked like two big beetles or water turtles, and such the Indian might have thought them to be, but they bellowed like two brazen animals, and—did you ever hear a child cry under a kettle?" said Uncle Zebedee, with a curious smile.

We all confessed that we never had.

"Then, child, you just get under one of those kettles and holler. You needn't be afraid. There ain't no Indians now to do you any harm. Holler loud!"

I did so.

"Do you hear that?" said Uncle Zebedee. "You never heard such a sound as that before. Hollow as a bell.

Another child was placed under one of the kettles and uttered a continuous cry. The sound rang all over the room.

"There!" said Uncle Zebedee. "Did any one ever hear anything like that? It rings all over the room, scary-like.

"Well, the children did not know about the Indian, and they began to creep toward the light of the window, moving the kettles like two enormous beetles and crying and making the kettles rumble and rumble all around, boom-oom-oom, just like that. The Indian's black eyes glowed like fire, and he raised his gun and fired at one of the kettles. But nothing came of it. The shot did not harm the children under the kettle. It frightened both of the children and made them cry the louder and louder and scream as though they were frantic. 'Ugh!' said the Indian. 'Him no good.'

"The kettles were all alive now, moving and echoing. He was more puzzled than before. What kind of creatures could these be with great brass back and living paws and full of unheard of noises like those? 'Ugh, ugh!' said he, just like that. The kettles kept moving and sounding, and the Indian grew more and more excited as he watched them. Suddenly he threw up his great arms and turned his back, and— Now it all goes from me again."

"He said 'Ugh!' and threw up his arms and turned his back," prompted aunt.

"And the maid opened the stair door and fired," continued Uncle Zebedee. "She drew quickly back and waited for the family to return. The children continued to cry. But they were safe, as they could not overturn the kettles and bullets could not reach them. The family came in an hour in great alarm. They had seen human blood in the road, but no Indian.

"A few days afterward the Indian's body was found in some hazel bushes by the brook. It was buried in the meadow there, and"—

"The Indian's grave," said aunt, prompting.

"Yes, I used to mow over it when I was a boy and"—

"That is all, Uncle Zebedee," said aunt. "You've got through now."

"Yes, I've got through now. I don't think that I shall ever tell that story again and"—

There was something pathetic and yet beautifully prophetic in the continuance. The slanting sun shone through the old window, and the chippering of birds was heard in the fields.

Uncle Zebedee never did tell the story again. The final conjunction of his long, peaceful life came soon after he told the tale to me. The violets and mosses cover him in the old Dorchester burying ground. The old house is gone; the two kettles, the gun and even the gray stone from the field that rudely marked the Indian's grave.

NOTES FROM MEADOWBROOK FARM

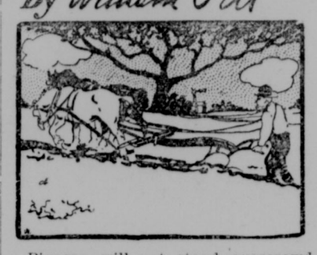
By William Pitt



Pigeons will not stand overcrowding.

Pedigree alone never filled the milk pail.

Lambs should be docked the second week.

Clean out the swill barrel once in a while.

Keep the best of the pigs for future breeding.

Breeding for size must be followed by feeding for size.

Screen the barn and protect your stock from the flies.

Too much milk or too cold, will cause scours in calves.

Soil must be in good physical condition to grow good crops.

It is not the fat, sleek-looking cow which gives the most milk.

Sprigs of mint in lemonade adds a fine flavor to the beverage. Try it.

It is said that the American hen ranks fifth in value in the agricultural products of the country.

The muley has come to stay. Do you still retain the old-fashioned horns in your herd?

The feeding of stallions requires more care than that of mares or geldings.

Be neat and tasty in putting up the fruit packages for market. They will sell more readily and for more money.

Better raise on colt right than half a dozen mongrels in an indifferent sort of way.

In Europe the mutual plan of insurance against the damage of hail is quite popular.

Hundreds of fruit trees set every year die because of the neglect of the owners.

Don't trim the young tree too severely, as it needs enough foliage to supply its feeding powers.

An alfalfa special is doing the state of Kansas. Keep cultivating the corn until it shallows, but run shallow.

The afternoon work will go easier and faster if you take a few moments' rest after the noonday meal.

The healthfulness of the stock depends largely upon the feed and management.

Finish fattening the animals you intend to market as quickly as possible. It will increase your profits.

Prove the question as to which is of the most value—deep or shallow plowing—by trying both methods.

The animal that is allowed to suffer discomfort takes from the farmer's profits.

In breaking the cold it is a good practice to drive him with a fast stepping horse.

That high check rein is torture to the horse, and unprofitable to his owner, for it cuts down the efficiency of the horse.

The draft horse is the one to raise on the farm, as he will if well raised return more money per pound than any other animal on the farm.

Put a mud scraper on the porch, and then use it. Wife will be grateful, and you will feel more like a man.

Label the fruit trees when setting out, but be careful that the label wires do not strangle the trees as they grow.

The large orchard poorly planted and poorly managed will not give as good a return as the one that is smaller but well planted and cultivated.

If your cow holds up well in the milk yield during the summer months she is a good animal and should be held on to.

Stop the churn as soon as you detect granulation, if you want it in condition to work out all the buttermilk.

It is the cow with the dainty appetite, that does not eat much or drink much, which is short on her milk yield.

The red rust in the blackberry patch must be dug out and burned promptly if you would save your bushes from serious injury.

More cuttings can be made from a good stand of alfalfa than from clover, hence this is one reason why it is better.

Animals must relish their food in order to get the most good out of it. Try a little variety in the feed to act as an appetizer.

Try one-half ounce daily of ground ginger in the feed of the young horses that show signs of muscular lameness. Give a larger dose for horses that weigh over 1,000 pounds.

Millet and other small seeds are good for chicks, and even for mature fowls, where they are fed in the straw and they have to be scratched for.

The use of scales and the Babcock tester detect the unprofitable cow, and no cow owner is willing to keep the animal when he learns her real status.

Give the work horses good care these hot, trying days. Take the harness off at noons and at night and always give them a little rub off. They will be fresher in the morning if you do.

Notice the conformation of the horse's legs below the knees before you buy. If they are light in proportion to the rest of the leg there is apt to be a weak point there which will lessen the stability of the animal.

The good prices for produce of all kinds which are prevailing ought to fill the farmer's days with sunshine and his nights with pleasant dreams of the profits he is to realize when crops are in.

Watch the potato vines. Don't let the bugs get ahead of you. By a little timely work you can strip off the bugs, but all the kins' horses and all the kings' men together with all your sighing cannot put the destroyed foliage back on again.

It is said that farmers in the United States annually lose $800,000,000 through the ravages of insects. There is no doubt that much of this tremendous loss might be prevented by wise and faithful warfare on the pests. What are you doing to help?

It certainly does not improve one's temper after a hard day's work to have the cow give you a slap in the face every little while, but try and not give way to your ill feelings. If necessary, fasten her tail, but never strike her because she has sought to rid herself of the pestering flies.

If you have any care for the future, practice rotation of crops. Prof. Hopkins says that no profitable and permanent system of agriculture can be adopted which does not include a rotation of crops with a liberal use of le gumes and as much manure as possible.

The real test of the horse is not in his appearance but in the amount of work you can get out of him on the smallest amount of feed. Some horses are poor workers but heavy feeders, while others who are moderate eaters give a good return for every pound of food consumed.

A sprout starting from the stump of an old tree can be grafted and will produce fruit much sooner than a planted tree. It cannot be expected to live so long and may fail in its later years, but will render good service while a newly planted tree is getting the growth needed to bring it into bearing.

Perhaps the "poor stand" of corn you are complaining of is the result of unfavorable weather conditions, but ten chances to one it is only the inevitable folly of lack of thorough cultivation or care in the matter of seed selection. Haphazard methods never yet improved the quality or quantity of the corn crop.

The agricultural department of the University of Wisconsin has imported from Germany a new variety of potato for the purpose of testing its availability in the production of denatured alcohol. These potatoes, which are too coarse-grained for domestic purposes, are said to yield from 300 to 500 bushels per acre. The Germans make alcohol from these tubers.

That boy of yours would enjoy a patch of ground all his own. Let him raise all he can on it and sell either to you or the neighbors, after you have exacted a fair compensation for the land and the use of the tools. Thus you will not only be holding his interest upon the farm but you will be instilling business principles in him which will prove valuable in the years to come.

The Kansas experiment station recommends the following preparation as good to spray on cows to lessen the fly evil: Two cakes of laundry soap dissolved in warm water. To mix one and a half pounds of resin, one-half pint of fish oil and enough water to make three gallons. Add one-half pint of kerosene when ready to use, and apply with a brush or spray pump. Each cow should be given about half a pint at an application. It will be necessary to make the application about three times a week till the hair has become coated with resin.

GERMAN TRADE AGREEMENT DENOUNCED AS PERNICIOUS.

Belief That Flat Free Trade Would Be Less Detrimental Than Such Bartering Away of Our Industrial Rights by Special Concessions in Favor of Foreign Competitors.

The San Francisco Chronicle is indignant regarding the extraordinary diplomatic dicker by which the United States government has bound itself, without the knowledge or consent of congress, to reduce tariff rates on competitive imports from Germany. The Chronicle, one of the most ably conducted and influential among the leading Republican newspapers of this country, condemns the new German agreement in unsparing terms as "an arrangement to permit undervaluations on imports, subject to an advalorem duty." Says the Chronicle:

"It could have been asked for by Germany for no other purpose. It could have been granted by our government for no other purpose. It is contrary to the express terms of the administrative customs act, and is to be attacked as such in the United States courts."

To assert that the privilege accorded to German exporters of naming their own export values "could have been granted by our government for no other purpose" than that of permitting undervaluation, is a more sweeping condemnation of the crass blundering of our gifted state department than any which has been expressed by the American Economist. Yet, when all has been considered, what else could have been the purpose of this astonishing concession? To assume that Secretaries Root and Cortelyou were ignorant of the purpose of the Germans in asking for such a concession is to reflect upon the intelligence of those two secretaries. There is not a customs administrative officer in the service of the United States, not one—scarcely a day laborer who handles and unpacks goods in the apparisers' stores—who does not know that the opportunity to undervalue exports was sought by the Germans. So far as we have been able to discover, there is not an intelligent man in the entire customs service who does not know that the privilege of naming export values is in effect the privilege of undervaluation.

It is past comprehension that even our gifted secretary of state, who knows nothing of customs administration, and our inexperienced secretary of the treasury, who knows little more, should not have somehow or other guessed what was at the bottom of the German demand for the "export price" privilege. Still, we would rather believe that they blundered like schoolboys than that with eyes wide open they deliberately betrayed the revenues of the government and the interests of American labor and industry.

Frankly the Chronicle expresses its preference for open free trade rather than the double dealing of "reciprocity" tariff concessions. "Free trade," it says, "is foolish, but it is honest. Trading tariffs are devices of the devil." There are many protectionists who concur in this view, believing that the even keel of a tariff for revenue only would in the long run work less mischief than the dishonest policy of assassinating some industries for the benefit of some other industries. "Double tariffs are trouble tariffs," the American Economist has said in this connection. That is the solid truth. Rightly the Chronicle urges that:

"The only dual tariff which is defensible is a surtax added to imports from countries which in any way discriminate against us."

The McCleary bill embodied a sound principle—that of increased tariffs against the exports of any and all countries having two sets of tariffs, and enforcing maximum rates against the products of the American people. Such a bill should be passed by the Sixty-first congress at its first session, and in addition, a joint resolution giving six months' notice of termination of the German agreement. With such a bill passed and such a notice given we should hear no more about German threats and French bluffs. Neither would the country be shocked and humiliated by a repetition of the colossal blunder of permitting foreigners to write the American tariff to suit themselves.

Facts, Proof and Figures.

Not long ago Senator Rayner of Maryland said in an interview:

"We must meet the Protective league with facts and proof and figures, and not with glittering generalities. The time has gone by for discussing the general policy of tariff reform."

Facts and proofs and figures are precisely what are wanted. By means let the Democratic enemies the Dingley tariff bring forward a revised list of duties so that the country will know what to expect of a Democratic administration. Republican tariff rippers should do the same. They deal wholly in generalities. Let them now come forward with the details. Thus far nobody, whether Democratic or Republican tariff ripper, has furnished a bill of particulars. They have asserted that the tariff is all wrong and needs revising, but have not said wherein. Let us have facts and proof and figures.

Medicine Taking Only A Habit.

By Sir FREDERICK TREVES, King Edward's Surgeon.

I AM afraid a long time will elapse before people break off the EXTRAORDINARY HABIT of taking medicine when they are sick. It is a prejudice deep down in the hearts of the people. Why it exists it is hard to say, but there it is, and I suppose it must continue some little time longer.

IF YOU PICTURE THE ENVIRONMENT OF A DOCTOR, YOU SEE A ROOM WITH A MULTITUDE OF SHELVES COVERED WITH BOTTLES FROM FLOOR TO CEILING. THESE BOTTLES RAPIDLY ARE VANISHING, AND THE TIME IS NOT FAR DISTANT WHEN THEY WILL BE REDUCED TO AN EXTREMELY SMALL NUMBER. THE EMPTY SHELVES WILL BE REPLACED BY SIMPLE LIVING, SUITABLE DIET, PLENTY OF SUN AND PLENTY OF FRESH AIR.

The astonishing history of certain infectious maladies surpasses in interest every romance that ever has been written. The tubercle at this moment is killing 50,000 people per annum. NOT ONE OF THOSE PEOPLE NEED DIE—THE DISEASE IS PREVENTABLE. The history of it is an astonishing romance to this extent. Many people can remember the time when consumption was regarded as something that came out of the heavens—a blight—and the unfortunate victim was said to fall into a decline. It was a complete mystery. Nothing could be done to stop it, and nothing was done.

But then came the picture of an oldish man in a laboratory holding up a little speck on the point of a needle. IT WAS NOTHING, BUT IT WAS AN ABSOLUTE EPOCH IN THE HISTORY OF MEDICINE. That man held on the needle a tubercle—he had found the seed of the disease. Since then that seed has been analyzed and in it has been found the germ of tuberculosis which CANNOT BE DEALT WITH BY PHYSIC, BUT ONLY BY THE REMEDIES OF FRESH AIR, SUNLIGHT AND THE LIKE.

Besmirched Corporation Officials In the Minority.

By President ROBERT MATHER of the Rock Island Railroad.

THE great commercial enterprises of today are ALMOST EXCLUSIVELY conducted by corporations. The corporation presents manifest and admitted advantages for the development of the industrial opportunities, especially in making EFFECTIVE the capital of scattered individuals, who but for this agency of co-operation would not readily be brought in united effort.

But concerning the methods of organization, of management and of control of some of our great corporations facts of late have been revealed that have SHOCKED THE CONSCIENCE AND STIRRED THE ANGER OF THE PEOPLE.

Every form of crime conceivable of commission by or through or against a corporation has been displayed in proof—enormous overcapitalization of companies whose shares would be sold to the public at fictitious prices under cover of respectable names; gross discrimination by common carriers and consequent oppression of competitors by the favorite shippers; CRIMINAL MISUSE of the trust funds of great life insurance companies for the private benefit of individuals; the use of the favors and power of great railroad corporations for the private gain of the officer wielding the power; THE MAKING OF PRIVATE PROFIT BY TRUSTEES for the stockholders in their dealings with the securities and property of the corporation.

And with the commission of each of these offenses there have been connected some of the GREATEST NAMES in the world of industry and finance. The sensationalist and demagogue would have us believe that the whole commercial fiber is rotten.

I make no apology for the crimes disclosed in the investigations, and I hold no brief for the culprits there discovered. But I have not on account of these disclosures lost my faith in my fellow man.

THE FACTS THAT HAVE BEEN MADE KNOWN ARE SENSATIONAL AND BAD ENOUGH IN ALL CONSCIENCE, BUT THEY TOUCH ONLY THE EDGE OF THE FIELD OF CORPORATE ACTIVITY AND SMIRCH BUT A SPOT OF ITS BROAD EXPANSE. THE NUMBERS OF THE DISHONORED YOU MAY COUNT ON YOUR FINGERS, BUT THEIR NAME IS LEGION WHOSE LIVES OF HONOR, OF RECTITUDE AND OF PROBITY HAVE ADORNED THE HISTORY OF CORPORATE MANAGEMENT AND DIGNIFIED THE COMMERCIAL CAREER.

Government Will Have To Finance Railroads.

By JAMES J. HILL, President of the Great Northern Railroad.

THE business of the United States has OUTGROWN THE CAPACITY OF ITS RAILROADS, and the railroads are in no position to catch up. If men cannot get their freight moved, they must cease to produce it.

In a letter to Governor Johnson last January I estimated that $1,100,000,000 a year for five years would be necessary to put the railroads in shape to move the traffic of the country. It does not appear any easier for a railroad to get money now than a few months ago. Railroads cannot increase their facilities under these conditions.

The government will ultimately be forced TO LEND ITS CREDIT to finance the needs of the railroads. The public in its exasperation will demand that the railroads shall lay certain rails and add more cars. The railroads will answer that they cannot, that their credit has been ruined.

THE GOVERNMENT WILL BE OBLIGED TO STEP IN AND LEND ITS CREDIT TO SUPPLY THIS DEFICIENCY. THE SITUATION MIGHT LEAD TO GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS. THAT WOULD BE THE END OF REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT.

This is NO MERE THEORY, but an actual condition. The country is large and still growing. The railroads are away behind. Their credit has been ruined. They cannot finance a recovery. What will be the result?

District No. 2.

THE BUSINESS SITUATION.

It pleases some great law-breaking corporations and trust magnates to say that the present sick condition of the stock markets is due to the course of the Roosevelt administration in prosecuting the Standard Oil Co. and other vast corporate interests.

If this accounts for the slump in certain stocks, it argues that the watered condition of such stocks in such that it shrinks from the legal light which is being turned on by the department of justice in its efforts to enforce the anti-trust laws that have been flagrantly violated by said corporations.

The squeezing out of the water from these inflated stocks causes a flurry on Wall street but does not effect the general prosperity of the country. There is however, a tightness in the money market; but this is not confined to the United States where the business tide is almost unprecedented, but is almost world-wide, and several powerful causes of wide reach have prevailed to bring it about.

In the first place, it is estimated that the losses by wars, earthquakes and fires in the past seven years have reached the enormous total of four billion dollars. There is a fear in Europe also that Russia may default in its bond interest, while Japan's financial condition causes uneasiness.

The disclosures in life insurance scandals and some other big corporations shocked public confidence, and the hysterical anti-corporation legislation passed by many states, especially in the west and south, have all affected the money market unfavorably because of the apparent crusade against corporate capital, which is always timid at best.

Another important factor is the over-expansion in industries and the consequent extra demand for capital. The country's business has grown at a pace that outstrips the ordinary increase in the capital which is relied on to supply the wants of trade. There is more money in the country than ever before but there is also a much greater demand for it.

We believe these conditions will gradually improve, and the country's great flow of prosperity will not be checked by the flurries of a Wall street panic.

SOME DEFINITIONS.

A general discussion throughout the country has been going on over the now famous question of the New York World, "What is a Democrat?" Some interesting facts concerning the great parties have been brought out. In general, the editors have treated the matter frivolously, but it has its serious side and is worthy of careful consideration. Truly,

What is a Democrat?
What is a Republican?
What is a Populist?
What is a Prohibitionist?
What is a Socialist?

Wherein lies the real differences over which men contend with all their might and main? Is it only a scramble for office with the principles of one as good as the principles of the other? In some measures, yes, but in a wider sense, no. A Democrat is an honest member of the old school of politics whose policies are not broad enough and purposes lofty enough to keep abreast of the progress of so great a nation as the United States has become. The Democratic idea was good for a small, undeveloped confederations of States with few intricacies and few difficult problems. The party taught false notions about State's rights and Nation's wrongs. Its devotees naturally became narrow and unprogressive. Instead of growing as the Nation grew the Democratic party kept trying to run a Nation of the time of Lincoln with policies of the time of Jefferson. It still keeps that up and the proudest title a Democrat can claim today is that he is a Jeffersonian. Jefferson died nearly a hundred years ago. Times since then have changed; conditions are very different. It is not enough to-day to be a Jeffersonian. It is very noticeable that you rarely ever hear of a Washington, or Hamilton, or Adams or even a Lincoln Republican. Republicans are aggressive and progressive. The party grows as the Nation grows. Its policies keep pace forward not backward. It solves problems by present day rules and in accordance with twentieth century needs. It believes the Nation's best days are yet to come. In short, a Republican is a patriotic American citizen who believes in his country and who thinks that problems must be solved as they raise for the good of the whole people. He believes in peace, progress, protection and prosperity. He welcomes advanced ideas and is unwilling to be hampered by antiquated precedents. As to Populists, Prohibitionists and Socialists, they are hardly to be classed as members of great political parties; they are mere enthusiasts for a particular idea, and their policy seems to be more an expression of dissatisfaction with existing conditions than a practical method of ruling a Nation. So, after all, the real political parties to be reckoned with in the United States are the Democratic and Republican whose policies have been set forth above.

THE GIST OF THE MATTER.

"In the man of great wealth who has earned his wealth honestly and used it wisely we recognize a good citizen, worthy of all praise and respect. Business can only be done under modern conditions through corporations, and our purpose is to heartily favor the corporations that do well. The administration appreciates that liberal but honest profit for legitimate promoters and generous dividends for capital employed, either in founding or continuing an honest business venture, are the factors necessary for successful corporate activity, and therefore for generally prosperous business conditions. All these are compatible with fair dealing as between man and man and rigid obedience to the law. Our aim is to help every honest man, every honest corporation, and our policy means in its ultimate analysis a healthy and prosperous expansion of business activities, of honest business men and honest corporations."

—From the address by President Roosevelt at Provincetown.

ONE of the most interesting of the off year political situations is that of Maryland. Gov. Warfield has announced himself a candidate for United States senator. He is opposed by the old Gorman guard of Democratic politicians, but they are split up by the candidacy of several aspirants among whom is Senator Gorman's son. The better elements is with Warfield but the party machinery is in the hands of the old regulars and they will probably be able to keep him from going to the senate. The Republicans are united and have a strong state ticket in the field, with hopes of carrying the state as they did in the presidential campaigns of 1896 and 1900. But for the law which disfranchises many thousands of voters, Maryland would be safely Republican.—Uniontown Standard.

Resolutions.

Resolutions on the death of Mrs. Amanda Sturgis Hosmer, of New York City and Washington, D. C.

WHEREAS, It has pleased our all-wise and loving Father to grant to our esteemed co-worker and benefactor, Mrs. Amanda Sturgis Hosmer, "An abundant entrance" into Life Eternal; and

WHEREAS, Her Christian fellowship and interest in the welfare of the Union Sunday School of Deer Park, makes it fitting we record our appreciation of her.

Resolved, That the removal of such a friend from our Sunday school, where for nearly two decades, by personal efforts, by deep sympathy and financial aid she upheld the the banner of her Lord, and leaves a vacancy sadly realized by the officers, teachers and members of the Union Sunday school, and will also prove a great loss to the town of Deer Park where her cordial interest was felt by the community during her summer sojourn among us, and where her beautiful courtesy, and Christ-like example has proved that "the memory of the just is blessed."

Resolved, That our sincere sympathy be extended to the family of the deceased, and that these resolution of respect be recorded on the minutes of our Sunday school and a copy of them sent to the Garrett county papers.

LUCIA ANNA HENDRICKSON,
REV. WM. H. CLARY,

Real Estate.

Under and by virtue of an execution issued out of the Circuit Court for Garrett county, on the 30th day of July, 1907, in a case wherein E. C. Shafer is plaintiff and Wayman Kitzmiller is defendant, the same being No. 13 Judicials to September Term, 1907, I have seized and taken in execution all of the right, title and interest of the defendant in and to the real estate hereinafter described, by an actual entry upon said land for making said levy, and I hereby give notice that on THURSDAY,

The 26th Day of September,

1907, at 11 o'clock A. M., in front of the Court House in the town of Oakland, Maryland, I will offer for sale and sell to the highest bidder, for cash, all of the right, title and interest of Wayman Kitzmiller in and to all that piece or parcel of land situated in said Garrett county, the same being a part of a tract of land called and is bounded as follows: Beginning for the same at a stone pile at the end of the 6th line of a tract of land called "Roby's Delight," which is also the end of the second line of the tract of land described in a deed from Frederick A. Thayer, Trustee, to Alex. Kitzmiller dated October 9th, 1899, and recorded in liber E. Z. T., No. 36, folio 586, etc., one of the Land Records of Garrett county, Maryland, and of which said land the land hereby advertized is a part, and running thence with the 7th and part of the 8th lines of the said tract of land called "Roby's Delight," South 58 degrees East 79 perches, North 26 degrees East 102 perches to a stone pile, then South 15 degrees East 25 perches to a stone in the 3rd line of the land described in a deed from Lewis Kitzmiller to George W. Wilson dated June 5th, 1873, and recorded in Liber W. H. T., folio 739, one of the Land Records of Garrett county, and reversing it and the 2nd line thereof, North 68 degrees West 123 ⅞ perches to a small hemlock and two beech trees standing on the bank of Shields Run, South 50 degrees West 42 perches, to the 1st line of the whole tract which was conveyed by Frederick A. Thayer, Trustee, to Alex. Kitzmiller as hereinbefore described, and running with it North 30 degrees West 126 ⅝ perches, North 77 degrees East 56 perches, North 50 degrees West 40 perches to the 2nd line of the land described in the deed from Frederick A. Thayer, Trustee, to Alex. Kitzmiller, and with it North 77 degrees East 5 perches to the beginning, containing 135 acres, more or less.

This property will be sold subject to a life estate held by Alexander Kitzmiller in the same.

TERMS OF SALE—Cash on day of sale.

ALBERT L. LEE,
Sheriff of Garrett County.

Too many of our young people fail in showing considerate attention, and too often do not fully appreciate the self sacrificing love and benign presence of mother. Like the air and the sunlight, she and her tender ministries are received and looked upon as a matter of fact. When she is at rest in the home of the soul, this thoughtless negligence will cost them many a tear.

Miss Estelle Hamilton returned Saturday night from Mt. Lake Park where with her parents she had spent the summer. Miss Hamilton is now the guests of Miss Julia Nuzum at the Grould home on Bridge street. Mrs. Hamilton, Misses Louise and Lucile Hamilton had expected to remain for a few weeks longer but returned today on account of the death of the former's nephew, Dana Miller.—Fairmont West Virginia.

To check a cold quickly, get from your druggist some little Candy Cold Tablets called Preventics. The old man may not recall all the experiences, all the struggles and triumphs of his early manhood, but every feature of his childhood home, every little playhouse that he helped his sister to build, is a photograph on his heart's tablets and can never fade away. Perhaps the golden light of eternity will not dim the brightness of that picture. What else the heart may forget, it cannot forget the place of its brith; it cannot forget the little broken cart, the sled and the kite, the sister's fond caress, the brother's generous aid, the father's counsel, the mother's anxious prayers.

A weak Stomach, causing dyspepsia, a weak Heart with palpitation or intermittent pulse, always means weak Stomach nerves or weak Heart nerves. Strengthen these inside or controlling nerves with Dr. Shoop's Restorative and see how quickly these ailments disappear. Dr. Shoop of Racine, Wis, will mail samples free. Write for them. A test will tell. Your health is certainly worth this simple trial. Sold by all dealers.

The evolutionists have for a long time been trying to find the missing link—just where the ape drops his caudal appendage and turns to a man. They have never been able to propagate that species, but the inventer has been more fortunate for he has found the missing link in the farm implement business. The time when the small farmer boy's dreams were haunted with the thought of when harrowing time came; and when it did come he felt at night like he was worn off up to the knees, but that time is past. Now the old man can harrow seated on his harrow cart, and do better work and with all ease. This implement milks the cows without a pain or an ache and empties the slop to the hogs without a murmuring word, after a hard day's work has been done. If you don't believe it just try it for a day.

Hon. Henry G. Davis is at Deer Park taking much interest in the arbitration proceedings now going on there over the building of his road, the Coal & Coke railway. The Ferguson Contracting Company, of Pittsburg, had the contract for the building of the railroad in question, and in the contract there was a penalty for failure to complete within a certain time. The road was not built within the time specified, and it is claimed that the amount of the penalty was withheld from payment to the contractors. Suit was bought by the Ferguson people against the Coal & Coke road, and an arbitration resulted, which is now being heard. Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Hon. John G. Carlisle represents the contractors, Mr. C. W. Dailey the Coal & Coke Company. The parties mutually agreed to suspend the proceeding in court and pursue arbitration.

This office is in receipt of three commnications bearing upon the contention which has arisen between members and the pastor of the Friencsville church, which will not be published, as we realize that the matter has now gone too far and no good can be accomplished by giving the controversy further publicity. The columns of this paper are always open for matters of public interest, but in the Friendsville incident the public generally is not interested. Both sides have been heard and for the good of the church as well as for other reasons we deem it best to close our columns against further communications bearing upon the controversy.

Rev. D. H. and Mrs. Ada Lee, of Calcutta, India, who have been spending the past year at Mountain Lake Park and over in West Virginia with relatives, will sail from New York on October 9th for their far eastern home, going via Liverpool, England. Dr. and Mrs. Lee are the managers of the Lee Memorial Bengali Mission in Calcutta, which was established by them. In the school attached to the Mission are one hundred and sixty girl students who have no parents or whose parents are too poor to support and educate them. The mission home is located at 13 Wellington Square and is said to be one hundred years old. It fronts on one of the most beautiful squares of the city and it is the hope of Dr. Lee that before long a more modernly constructed building may be erected to take its place. The Home Secretary of the Mission is Mrs. Fannie L. Sperry, of Mt. Lake Park, to whom the editor returns his thanks for an illustrated booklet showing the Mission home, its surroundings and the inmates.

There are some few in this section who have not yet finished the making of hay, while others have finished all their harvests and have already threshed.

Mr. Joseph Thomas' son is sick, his ailment being a gathering under his jaw. The lad has suffered very much for some days.

Mr. A. C. Sines and Miss Effie Thomas, of White Rock, were visiting relatives and friends in this vicinity a few days last week.

Wm. L. Thomas is ill at this time. The doctor pronounces his ailment gastritis.

The photographers of this place are having plenty of work to do.

The weather during the past week has been moderately fair for being such a rainy season.

The teachers here are anxiously awaiting the time to start for the Institute and then go to their schools where they expect to spend a pleasant and profitable winter.

Miss Annie B. Thomas and little daughter are contemplating a visit to her parents Saturday.

Mr. Christian Fike was plowing last week a couple of days for Mr. L. K. Fike.

Mr. Wm. H. Thomas and son purchased a yearling heifer of Mr. L. K. Fike for the sum of $16.

Most of the farmers of this place made a trip to Somerfield, Pa., one day last week to haul their fertilizer which was ordered of Mr. Geo. F. Wass.

Wm. H. Thomas and son killed a beef one day last week, selling it for 8 and 10 cents per pound. The beef was sold in a remarkably short time.

Mr. Frisby Humberson is, and has cause to be proud, for on last Sunday night he become father to a little girl and boy.

One of Mr. Jonas Conner's little girls who is now staying at Mr. F. T. Fike's is very ill at present. We all hope for her speedy recovery.

Mr. Joshua Burgess' little boy cut his foot on a scythe. Three of the boy's toes are cut but, one being aimost cut clean off.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Baroah probably Uses Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

SOVEREIGNS AS MERRY MAKERS

They Make and Enjoy Jokes But Permit no Familiarity of Any Kind.

Although the Kaiser has been known to allow one American millionaire to slap him heartily on the shoulder, and another to tell him that he is "a jolly good fellow," without showing a trace of offended dignity, he is said never to permit the least familiarity from even the most exalted of his subjects.

And yet no monarch better enjoys a joke at the expense of his officials, as was recently proved by a remarkable photograph presented by him to an admiral who usually accompanied him on his yachting expeditions. On a recent trip this admiral was not present and his majesty, in order to show him what he had missed, had a wonderful photograph faked representing a gigantic and fearsome sea serpent glidiug through the water within pistol shot of the imperial yacht.

A more frolicsome monarch is the Shah of Persia, of whom the following story is told: During his last visit to Paris the Shah just as he was leaving his hotel, summoned the two police inspectors who always accompany him on their bicycles and begged the loan of their machines, as his court marshal and chief chamberlain were anxious to try them. These dignified officials had never been on a bicycle in their lives, and great was their consternation when their royal master commanded them to mount the unstable steeds and ride away.

There was, however, no escape, so summoning up their courage the two dignitaries tucked up their frock coats got somehow astride of their respective wheels and began to wabble down the Champs Elysees. They had scarcely gone half a dozen yards, however, before crash! went one machine, and then the other, and the gallant riders were sprawling on the ground, while the Shah laughed so consumedly at the ludicrous spectacle that he was obliged to dry his eyes with his handkerchief. "All you want is a little practice," he gasped between his paroxysms of laughter, as the fallen heroes picked themselves up and began ruefully to brush the dust off their garments.

On another occasion his majesty put several of his most adipose and grave courtiers on roller skates, and was so convulsed by their antics that he had to command them to desist.

But perhaps no living sovereign relishes a joke of this kind more heartily than the irrepressible King of Spain, who is never so happy as when he is shocking his grave and decorous courtiers. Only the other day, it is said, he interrupted an interview with one of his ministers to show him how cleverly he could turn a somersault, an acrobatic feat which he also performed for the benefit of Queen Alexandra a short time ago in one of the corridors of Buckingham Palace.

Francis I practiced some cruel jokes on Jacob Paul von Gundling, an eminent scientist, on one occasion dressing up a monkey in clothes similar to those worn by the professor and making the latter embrace him in public and acknowledge him as his own son, and on Gundling's death the King had his body dressed in state uniform and buried in a wine cask.

Charles III loved to go around in disguise, assailing his subjects in the coarsest terms. He would enter the shops of venders of breakable materials, and taking up a mirror or drinking glass would let it fall to the ground, laughing unrestrainedly at the damage done and at the abuse that was showered on him. And to give but one more example, Peter the Great loved at Christmas time to take part in the annual sledge procession in which the clergy, gorgeously attired, stopped at certain houses, sang a carol, and received charitable offerings.—London Tid-bits.

GEORGE R. GAITHER TRIED AND TRUE

His Record in Office Leaves no Doubt as to His Policy.

"Baltimore has made great progress in its local government," says the Baltimore News: "Assuming that the present administration will uphold the same or even higher standard than those of previous administrations, and that Baltimore can safely go further afield for her advancement, our great need today is an intelligent recognition of our needs at Annapolis. We must look beyond the City Hall to the State House. Annapolis is the battleground on which is to be fought out the question of Baltimore's destiny as a great commercial city and a well-ordered municipality. Everybody recalls the city's unsuccessful fight two years ago for State authority to protect her water supply. Important as it is, this is only one of a long list of problems for the solution of which we must appeal to the Governor and the General Assembly.

"When the Democrats under the domination of a big Eastern Shore politician nominated a small Eastern Shore politician for Governor, the Republicans, looking squarely in the face the certainty that in order to succeed they must excel, chose for their standard bearer a man who not only possessed the broad qualifications for the Governorship, but who exactly met the requirements from a Baltimore standpoint. There is neither exaggeration nor invidiousness of comparison in the statement that Mr. George R. Gaither knows Baltimore's municipal situation better than any other man. To the Governorship he would bring the largest experience and the best-trained ability in respect to present conditions and future needs. And he would apply his ripe judgment with absolute faithfulness and non-partisanship. His record in office has been such as to leave no room for doubt as to his policy. He is 'a known quantity.'"

NOT MUCH BOSSISM IN THIS.

In a statement published in the Baltimore American of Monday last, made by Hon. Sidney E. Mudd, in an interview on the previous Saturday, and attested by his signature, he tells in a simple, straightforward way the story of the proceedings of the recent Republican convention which he has been accused of bossing. In the first part of the interview he nails a carnard attributing to Hon. Wm H. Jackson a declaration that "Sidney and me had the votes to nominate anybody we wanted." Having seen the publication of this alleged declaration he wired Mr. Jackson to know whether he had made it, and received, both by wire and by mail, a positive denial of the story. He then gives corroborative proof of the truth of this denial.

Following this he shows that Mr. Jackson strongly desired the nomination of Mr. Goldsborough; that his preference was in that direction, but that upon arriving in Baltimore he reached the conclusion that the majority of the delegates to the convention, uninfluenced by any one, had concluded that Mr. Gaither was the strongest man with the Republican voters of the State; that the sentiment of the Republicans of Baltimore was overwhelmingly in Mr. Gaither's favor; that both Collector Stone and Mr. Wachter agreed in that sentiment, and that Mr. Goldsborough also reached the conclusion just recited and acted upon it by withdrawing his own name and putting Mr. Gaither in nomination before the convention.

Mr. Mudd futher explains that instead of favoring the renomination of Mr. Parran for Clerk of the Court of Appeals he had advised that gentleman to be a candidate. Finding, however, that the convention was practically unanimous in favor of the renomination, Mr. Parran, against his own expressed desire, finally agreed to accept it.

And this is the story, as briefly as it could be told, of Mr. Mudd's exercise of bossism in the Republican convennion, epitomized from that gentleman's own statement.

The Republican for Job Printing.

MARYLAND DAY AT JAMESTOWN

September 12 will be a Great Occasion at the Exposition.

September 12 will be Maryland Day at the Jamestown Exposition, and there is every indication that it will be the biggest and most brilliant event of the great fair. The day is not only a red letter date in Maryland history, but it is also the birthday of the Star Spangled Banner and thus it has a national significance which will be fully recognized this month when the United States authorities will cooperate with the Marylanders in making the celebration a splendid success.

The program will be divided into three parts: First will be the exercises in the beautiful auditorium which has been given over to the Marylanders for the day. The speakers will include Governor Warfield of Maryland, Governor Swanson, of Virginia, President Tucker, of the Exposition, Director General Barr, Captain Frederick M. Colston, chairman or the Maryland Commission, Admiral Winfield Scott Schley, Colonel James R. Randall, author of "Maryland My Maryland," United States Senator William Pinkney Whyte and others. The music will be the finest heard at the exposition and will include the great organ with an orchestra and brass band and a full chorus. "Maryland, My Maryland" will be sung with the author leading. "The Star Spangled Banner" will be sung from the original manuscript by Mayor Smith of Frederick, where Francis Scott Key is buried.

After the exercises there will be a reception with refreshments at the Maryland Building for the Marylanders and their friends and a tent will be erected to accommodate the overflow. Maryland has made the record for hospitality and special efforts will be put forth to increase it on Maryland Day.

In the afternoon there will be a review of the troops by Governor Warfield and the reviewing stand will be reserved for the Marylanders.

The Maryland Building at the Exposition remains the center of popular interest. It is praised by many as the handsomest on the grounds and all find a real home welcome. More than 25,000 have registered since the exposition opened and the number of visitors has passed the 100,000 mark. The building is not only wonderfully interesting in its historical and art treasures but it is a place for Marylanders to rest and enjoy themselves. The building is open from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m.

Against That Rainy Day.

The farmer is demanding higher prices for his farm products; the transportation companies are threatening to increase rates; the railroad employes, the carpenters and all other tradesmen are demanding higher wages, and there is a general increase all round. The country is on a swell and prosperity seems to still be in the saddle. This is a good time, nevertheless to learn the art of economy in living and saving all the money you can, and thus in times of possible adversity have something laid by against that rainy day.—Grafton Sentinel.

Much in Little.

INCIDENT OF THE REBELLION.

Brave Soldier Who Defied His Colonel After the War Was Over.

The war was over. Lee had surrendered. Johnson had given in, even Kirby Smith had folded his banners, and the regiment that had enlisted to put down the rebellion thought the time had come when they might well "turn their happy feet toward their long-deserted homes." There was a difference of opinion between the officers and the enlisted men. The men somehow or other felt that, the war being over, discipline should be measurably relaxed. The officers felt, the war being at an end, our former enemies being now our friends, the most stringent discipline should be maintained, lest perchance the tender sensibilities of the people amongst whom we were quartered might be disturbed.

The habit of foraging is one that is easily acquired, and, like all bad habits, difficult to discard, writes William A. Ketcham in Indianapolis Star, and occasionally complaints were received that corn in the car or melons in the field disappeared by night without a quid pro quo being left with the former owner, and vigilance to prevent such improper conduct was redoubled. Finally one of the old boys was caught with the goods on his person and, as a warning to evil-doers, was tied up by the thumbs in front of the commandant's quarters, the commandant being the colonel of the regiment. When the word came to the regiment that one of the boys that had served four and one-half years was subject to the humiliation of being tied up by the thumbs in front of the colonel's quarters for a few miserable ears of corn, excitement ran high and in a few moments a rescue party was organized, at the head of which was the orderly sergeant of Company ——, a nephew of Thaddeus Stevens, the grand old commoner and a devotee to liberty. The party moved down to the colonel's quarters in broad daylight without asking leave or license of the colonel, cut their comrade's bonds and brought him back to the regiment in triumph. The colonel was outraged. He was a gallant officer; had begun as a lad in April, 1861, as sergeant of Company ——; had ascended through every grade—second, first lieutenant, captain, major, lieutenant colonel—and finally put the eagle astride of his shoulders while he was yet in the eye of the law an infant, incompetent to make a contract, but competent to command a regiment of 800 men in the field. He had been twice mentioned in general orders for conspicuous gallantry under fire, but he was withal a rigid disciplinarian and a good deal of a martinet, and when he learned of the outrage that had been perpetrated upon military discipline it took but little time for him to get a guard together, come to the regiment and arrest the ringleader, the orderly sergeant aforesaid, and have him taken to the guardhouse, where he gave the command, "Tie him." The guard was comparatively new, but they knew something of his character as a soldier, and he was a splendid soldier. He ought to have had a captain's title to his name, and doubtless would have had but for a fatal impediment in his speech as the result of which it was feared that in the time of action when it would become necessary for him to give the command that would open the ball he would be standing until after the battle was over with the command, "F-f-f-f-f-fire," still halting on his unready lips until after the emergency had passed, and so he had been kept all the time in the ranks. These men, however, knew the stuff of which he was made, and when he, in answer to the colonel's command, said that he would kill any man that undertook to tie him they knew that it was not an idle threat and they hesitated. The colonel took the matter in his own hands, but he was a small man while the orderly sergeant weighed 50 per cent. more and was a powerful man, and as a result of a few moments' mutual embracing the orderly sergeant disappeared from the tent, the colonel's uniform was tattered and torn and the men failed to heed his command to "fire." The sergeant took to the woods. We were daily expecting orders to return. Everybody in the regiment, including the officers, with the exception of the colonel, knew where he was, but somehow or other the colonel could not find out, and then the orders came to march home.

On the line of the road between Virginia and the Old Tar Heel state where we had been stationed the regiment debouched from the train for dinner. The colonel had found in the meantime that the sergeant was with his company. He called for a guard and sent them to Company —— with instructions to arrest the sergeant and bring him to headquarters. The guard came and with them the sergeant, apparently in no apologetic or humble humor. Nothing passed between the sergeant and the colonel, but the colonel directed the guard to load their guns. They loaded. He ordered them to prime. They primed. "Now," he said, "tie that man, and," with an oath, "if he resists, kill him." I shall remember to my dying day how one foot went up on the log in front of him, his eye met the colonel's and it never quailed, and he said, "Colonel ——, four years and a half ago I enlisted to fight and, if need be, to die for liberty. I might as well die here for liberty as anywhere else, and by the eternal (he used a shorter word) I will die before I will go to Indiana tied." He shook off the grasp of the guard and started for the timber. The colonel ordered the men to "fire," but the order was unheeded. The sergeant reached the free safety of obscurity in the North Carolina pines. The regiment came home and was mustered out, colonel and private alike. The sergeant came home and was mustered out with an honorable discharge, despite the colonel's efforts to prevent it.

The colonel has long since been gathered to his fathers. The sergeant many and many years ago answered the final roll call, but I shall never, while life lasts, forget the sentiment, "I'll die before I'll go to Indiana tied."

HIS FIRST ENGAGEMENT.

How the Soldier Who Ran from the Enemy Became Brave Fighter.

Col. Mosby, who commanded the Mosby guerrillas during the civil war, was so admired and beloved by his men, writes the author of "Reminiscences of a Mosby Guerrilla," that his commands were never questioned. They would undertake the seemingly impossible at a word of suggestion from him.

In the busiest part of the Berryville affair, when teams were running wild in every direction and the confusion was at its worst, Col. Mosby saw a splendid four-in-hand team of big bays attached to a heavy portable army forge which had become upset on the pike, and from which the horses were struggling in vain to free themselves.

Turning to me, he ordered me to take a man and extricate the team from the tangle they were in, and bring them out safely. That sounded just as easy as if he had said, "Take a cigar," but I did not find it so. I took with me a young fellow who had joined the command only a few days.

When we galloped up to the struggling team and began to untangle them we were fired upon by a lot of infantrymen hidden behind a stone fence. When the rain of bullets flattened against the metal of the forge it sounded as if there were a thousand of them, and my young companion, this being his first engagement, toppled over in a dead faint.

It was no time just then to look after a sick man, for our horses were frantic with fear and excitement, and I had to hold both of them when the boy fell. I let him lie where he was, and in time got my team untangled and tied securely. I was just ready to lead them out when my youngster revived. Getting up in a surprised way, he jumped on his horse and galloped off, leaving me to mount my half-mad charger and get my team out as best I could.

That boy developed into one of the best soldiers in the command, and until the end of the war was up near the front in every engagement. This was one of the ways a beginner had to be initiated into our service.

His Introduction to West Point.

I was assigned to a tent on the left of the street, occupied by another West Point plebe and a yearling. Night finally came. I had lit a candle and, with my locker for a table, was writing a letter to my mother—I daresay it was gloomy enough—when someone struck the back of the tent with a broom, not only extinguishing the candle, but spilling the ink all over the letter and on to the tent floor. I had barely lit the candle again and taken account of the situation when bang! went the broom, blowing it out again. Thereupon I sat down in the darkness and let the hours wear away. Later on in the night Farley and Noyes, "Gimlet" Lee and Watts and others, yanked us out of bed several times. Friendless, unknown, and with a natural reluctance to open my heart to any one, I don't think I ever passed a more dismal night, writes Gen. Morris Schaff, in Atlantic. The sweetest note that could have reached my ear would have been the bark, across the fields, of the old home dog that I had hunted and played with as a boy.

What Niagara Falls Costs.

To an electrical engineer the beauty of the falls is somewhat dimmed as he reflects that the 3,500,000 horsepower is worth more than $100,000,000 a year.

HER REASON.

She always met my ardent looks
With ill concealed disdain
And wouldn't share my cab when caught
One morning in the rain.
But all at once her freezing air
Dissolved in sunny smiles.
She danced with me and drove with me
And spread for me her wiles.

My locks may be a trifle thin,
My mustache slightly gray,
But still my heart is twenty-one,
Romantic, light and gay.
She pinned a rosebud in my coat
(I keep it, dry and brown),
And I began to think I ought
To wed and settle down.

On operas, dinners, books and flowers
My money dwindled fast
Until that calculating maid
Unclosed my eyes at last.
"It's been so good of you," she said,
"To entertain me, when,
Since I have been engaged, I can't Go out with younger men."
—Minna Irving in Lippincott's.

Reflections of a Bachelor.

Kissing is the only real impediment of the speech.

No man expects anybody else to believe half the bad he tells about himself.

A woman would never be as happy if she thought her husband took as good care of himself when she was away.

Fortune may knock at every man's door, but he goes around first to the ones that have "at home" notices hung out.

A man may really expect to be an angel and have wings, but he doesn't spend near as much time as his wife thinking how nice it will be.—New York Press.

A Medical Examination.

It was during an oral examination at a medical college. As the examination proceeded the student who was being questioned got warmer and warmer, and the sweat broke out over his forehead.

"What would you do to throw a patient into a profuse perspiration," at length asked the examiner, "if you had tried the ordinary drugs without effect?"

"Send him here to be examined," replied the student without a moment's hesitation. "If that doesn't do it there's nothing that would."

Beyond a Doubt.

"The right man in the right place."

Alarmed Her.

"Yes," said the learned boarder from the city, "the antipodes are right beneath our feet."

The farmer's wife reached for a shoe.

"Right beneath our feet, Mr. Wartman?" she gasped. "Lands sakes! Let me kill them before they get way. We can stand centipeds and lizards, but none of these here reptiles with newfangled names."—Des Moines Register.

The Transplanet Limited.

"What in creation is all that noise?" gasped the startled passenger on the big airship.

"Just growls," laughed the sky pilot. "You see, we just passed the dog star."—Detroit Tribune.

A Stickler For Correctness.

"You say," said the city editor, "that he walked forth from the grim walls of the prison a free man."

"Yes, sir," answered the reporter.

"Well, he didn't. His wife was with him."

Investigative.

"Miss Alice, are you rich?"

"Why, little Tom?"

"'Cause Uncle Tom goes with you all the time, an' I heard him say he wuz so lazy that he'd have to marry a rich girl."

Dictum of Science.

"Doctor, is there not a certain scientific justification for the command of etiquette not to eat pie with a knife?"

"Oh, assuredly! It would be far better for a person to eat only the knife."

"No. The Japs are in no mood to accommodate us just now."—Baltimore American.

CHAPTER I.
Hampton, of Placer.

It was not an uncommon tragedy of the west. If slightest chronicle of it survive, it must be discovered among the musty and nearly forgotten records of the Eighteenth regiment of infantry.

Yet the tale is worth telling now, when such days are past and gone. There were 16 of them when, like so many hunted rabbits, they were first securely trapped among the frowning rocks, and forced relentlessly backward from off the narrow trail until the precipitous canyon walls finally halted their disorganized flight, and from sheer necessity compelled a rally in hopeless battle. Sixteen,—ten infantrymen from old Fort Bethune, under command of Syd. Wyman, a gray-headed sergeant of 30 years' continuous service in the regulars, two cowpunchers from the "XL" ranch, a stranger who had joined them uninvited at the ford over the Bear Water, together with old Gillis, the post-trader, and his silent chit of a girl.

Sixteen—but that was three days before, and in the meanwhile not a few of those speeding Sioux bullets had found softer billet than the limestone rocks. Six of the soldiers, four already dead, two dying, lay outstretched in ghastly silence where they fell.

Then the taciturn Gillis gave sudden utterance to a sobbing cry, and a burst of red spurted across his white beard as he reeled backward, knocking the girl prostrate when he fell. Eight remained, one helpless, one a mere lass of 15. It was the morning of the third day.

The beginning of the affair had burst upon them so suddenly that no two in that stricken company would have told the same tale. None among them had anticipated trouble.

In all the fancied security of unquestioned peace these chance travelers had slowly toiled along the steep trail leading toward the foothills. Gillis and the girl, as well as the two cattleherders, were on horseback; the remainder soberly trudged forward on foot, with guns slung to their shoulders. Wyman was somewhat in advance, walking beside the stranger, the latter a man of uncertain age, smoothly shaven, quietly dressed in garments bespeaking an eastern tailor, a bit grizzled of hair along the temples, and possessing a pair of cool, gray eyes. He had introduced himself by the name of Hampton, but had volunteered no further information, nor was it customary in that country to question impertinently.

Hampton, through the medium of easy conversation, early discovered in the sergeant an intelligent mind, possessing some knowledge of literature. They had been discussing books with rare enthusiasm, and the former had drawn from the concealment of an inner pocket a diminutive copy of "The Merchant of Venice," from which he was reading aloud a disputed passage, when the faint trail they followed suddenly dipped into the yawning mouth of a black canyon. It was a narrow, gloomy, contracted gorge, a mere gash between those towering hills shadowing its depths on either hand. A swift mountain stream, noisy and clear as crystal, dashed from rock to rock close beside the more northern wall, while the ill-defined pathway, strewn with bowlders and guarded by underbrush, clung to the opposite side, where low scrub trees partially obscured the view.

All was silent as death when they entered, yet they had barely advanced a short hundred paces when those apparently bare rocks in front flamed red, the narrow defile echoed to wild screeches and became instantly crowded with weird, leaping figures. It was like a plunge from heaven into hell. Blaine and Endicott sank at the first fire, while Wyman's stricken arm dripped blood. Indeed, under that sudden shock, he fell, and was barely rescued by the prompt action of the man beside him. Dropping the opened book, and firing madly to left and right with a revolver which appeared to spring into his hand as by magic, the latter coolly dragged the fainting soldier across the more exposed space, until the two found partial security among a mass of loosened rocks littering the base of the precipice. The others who survived that first scorching discharge also raced toward this same shelter, impelled thereto by the unerring instinct of border fighting, and flinging themselves flat behind protecting bowlders, began responding to the hot fire rained upon them.

Scattered and hurried as these first volleys were, they proved sufficient to check the howling demons in the open. It has never been Indian nature to face unprotected the aim of the white men, and those dark figures, which only a moment before thronged the narrow gorge, leaping crazily in the riot of apparent victory, suddenly melted from sight, slinking down into leafy coverts beside the stream or into holes among the rocks, like so many vanishing prairie dogs. Now and then a sinewy brown arm might incautiously project across the gleaming surface of a rock, or a mop of coarse, black hair appear above the edge of a gully, either incident resulting in a quick interchange of fire. That was all; yet the experienced frontiersmen knew that eyes as keen as those of any wild animal of the jungle were watching murderously their slightest movement.

Wyman, now reclining in agony against the base of the overhanging cliff, directed the movements of his little command calmly and with sober military judgment. Little by little, under protection of the rifles of the three civilians, the uninjured infantrymen crept cautiously about, rolling loosened bowlders forward into position, until they finally succeeded in thus erecting a rude barricade between them and the enemy. The wounded who could be reached were laboriously drawn back within this improvised shelter, and when the black shadows of the night finally shut down, all remaining alive were once more clustered together, the injured lying moaning and ghastly beneath the overhanging shelf of rock, and the girl, who possessed all the patient stoicism of frontier training, resting in silence, her widely opened eyes on those far-off stars peeping above the brink of the chasm, her head pillowed on old Gillis' knee.

Twice during the long night volunteers sought vainly to pierce those lines of savage watchers. A long, wailing cry of agony from out the thick darkness told the fate of their first messenger, while Casey, of the "XL," crept slowly, painfully back, with an Indian bullet embedded deep in his shoulder. Just before the coming of dawn, Hampton, without uttering a word, calmly turned up the collar of his tightly buttoned coat, so as better to conceal the white collar he wore, gripped his revolver between his teeth, and crept like some wriggling snake among the black rocks and through the dense underbrush in search after water. By some miracle of divine mercy he was permitted to pass unscathed, and came crawling back, a dozen hastily filled canteens dangling across his shoulders. It was like nectar to those parched, feverish throats; but of food barely a mouthful a piece remained in the haversacks.

The second day dragged onward, its hours bringing no change for the better, no relief, no slightest ray of hope. The hot sun scorched them pitilessly, and two of the wounded died delirious. From dawn to dark there came no slackening of the savage watchfulness which held the survivors helpless behind their coverts. The merest uplifting of a head, the slightest movement of a hand, was sufficient to demonstrate how sharp were those savage eyes.

Another long, black night followed, during which, for an hour or so in turn, the weary defenders slept, tossing uneasily, and disturbed by fearful dreams. Then gray and solemn, amid the lingering shadows of darkness, dawned the third dread day of unequal conflict. All understood that it was destined to be their last on this earth unless help came.

For two days Wyman had scarcely stirred from where he lay bolstered against the rock. Sometimes he became delirious from fever, uttering incoherent phrases, or swearing in pitiful weakness. Again he would partially arouse to his old sense of soldierly duty, and assume intelligent command. Now he twisted painfully about upon his side, and, with clouded eyes, sought to discern what man was lying next him. The face was hidden so that all he could clearly distinguish was the fact that this man was not clothed as a soldier.

"Is that you, Hampton?" he questioned, his voice barely audible.

The person thus addressed, who was lying flat upon his back, gazing silently upward at the rocky front of the cliff, turned cautiously over upon his elbow before venturing reply.

"Yes; what is it, sergeant? It looks to be a beauty of a morning way up yonder."

There was a hearty, cheery ring to his clear voice which left the pain-racked old soldier envious.

"My God!" he growled savagely. "'Tis likely to be the last any of us will ever see. Wasn't it you I heard whistling just now? One might imagine this was to be a wedding, rather than a funeral."

"And why not, Wyman? Didn't you know they employed music at both functions nowadays? Besides, it is not every man who is permitted to assist at his own obsequies—the very uniqueness of such a situation rather appeals to my sense of humor."

The sergeant, his teeth clinched tightly to repress the pain racking him, stifled his resentment with an evident effort. "You may be less light-hearted when you learn that the last of our ammunition is already in the guns," he remarked, stiffly.

"I suspected as much." And the speaker lifted himself on one elbow to peer down the line of recumbent figures. "To be perfectly frank with you, sergeant, the stuff has held out considerably longer than I believed it would, judging from the way those 'dough boys' of yours kept popping at every shadow in front of them. It's a marvel to me, the mutton-heads they take into the army. Oh, now, you needn't scowl at me like that, Wyman; I've worn the blue, and seen some service where a fellow needed to be a man to sport the uniform. Besides, I'm not indifferent, old chap, and just so long as there remained any work worth attending to in this skirmishing affair, I did it, didn't I? But I tell you, man there is mighty little good trying to buck against Fate, and when Luck once finally lets go of a victim, he's bound to drop straight to the bottom before he stops. That's the sum and substance of all my philosophy, old fellow, consequently I never kick simply because things happen to go wrong. What's the use? They'll go wrong just the same. Consequently, upheld by my acquired philosophy, I'm merely holding back one shot for myself, as a sort of grand finale to this fandango, and another for that little girl out yonder."

These words were uttered slowly, the least touch of a lazy drawl apparent in the low voice, yet there was an earnest simplicity pervading the speech which somehow gave it impressiveness. The man meant exactly what he said, beyond the possibility of a doubt. The old soldier, accustomed to every form of border eccentricity, gazed at him with disapproval.

"Either you're the coolest devil I've met during 30 years of soldiering," he commented, doubtfully, "or else the craziest. Who are you, anyhow? I half believe you might be Bob Hampton, of Placer."

The other smiled grimly. "You have the name tolerably correct, old fellow; likewise that delightful spot so lately honored by my residence. In brief, you have succeeded in calling the turn perfectly, so far as your limited information extends. In strict confidence I propose now to impart to you what has hitherto remained a profound secret. Upon special request of a number of influential citizens of Placer, including the city marshal and other officials, expressed in mass-meeting, I have decided upon deserting that sagebrush metropolis to its just fate, and plan to add the influence of my presence to the future development of Glencaid. I learn that the climate there is more salubrious, more conducive to long living, the citizens of Placer being peculiarly excitable and careless with their firearms."

The sergeant had been listening with open mouth. "The hell you say!" he finally ejaculated.

"The undefiled truth, every word of it. No wonder you are shocked. A fine state of affairs, isn't it, when a plain-spoken, pleasant-mannered gentleman, such as I surely am,—a university graduate, by all the gods, the nephew of a United States senator, and acknowledged to be the greatest exponent of scientific poker in this territory,—should be obliged to hastily change his chosen place of abode because of the threat of an ignorant and depraved mob. Ever have a rope dangled in front of your eyes, sergeant, and a gun-barrel biting into your cheek at the same time? Accept my word for it, the experience is trying on the nerves. Ran a perfectly square game, too, and those ducks knew it; but there's no true sporting spirit left in this territory any more. However, spilled milk is never worth sobbing over, and Fate always contrives to play the final hand in any game, and stocks the cards to win."

"A breath of good, honest prayer would serve better than anything else," groaned the sergeant, soberly.

The gray eyes resting thoughtfully on the old soldier's haggard face became instantly grave and earnest.

"Sincerely I wish I might aid you with one," the man admitted, "but I fear, old fellow, any prayer coming from my lips would never ascend very far. However, I might try the comfort of a hymn, and you will remember this one, which, no doubt, you have helped to sing back in God's country."

There was a moment's hushed pause, during which a rifle cracked sharply out in the ravine; then the reckless fellow, his head partially supported against the protecting bowlder, lifted up a full, rich barytone in rendition of that hymn of Christian faith—

"Nearer, my God, to Thee!
Nearer to Thee!
E'en though it be a cross
That raiseth me,
Still all my song shall be,
Nearer, my God, to Thee!
Nearer to Thee."

Glazed and wearied eyes glanced cautiously toward the singer around the edges of protecting rocks; fingers loosened their grasp upon the rifle barrels; smoke-begrimed cheeks became moist; while lips, a moment before profaned by oaths, grew silent and trembling. Out in front a revengeful brave sent his bullet swirling just above the singer's head, the sharp fragments of rock dislodged falling in a shower upon his upturned face; but the fearless rascal sang serenely on to the end, without a quaver.

"Mistake it for a death song likely," he remarked dryly, while the last clear, lingering note, reechoed by the cliff, died reluctantly away in softened cadence. "Beautiful old song, sergeant, and I trust hearing it again has done you good. Sang it once in a church way back in New England. But what is the trouble? Did you call me for some special reason?"

"Yes," came the almost gruff response; for Wyman, the fever stealing back upon him, felt half ashamed of his unshed tears. "That is, provided you retain sufficient sense to listen. Old Gillis was shot over an hour ago, yonder behind that big bowlder, and his girl sits there still holding his head in her lap. She'll get hit also unless somebody pulls her out of there, and she's doing no good to Gillis—he's dead."

Hampton's clear-cut, expressive face became graver, all trace of recklessness gone from it. He lifted his head cautiously, peering over his rock cover toward where he remembered earlier in the fight Gillis had sought refuge.

CHAPTER II.
Old Gillis' Girl.

Guided by the unerring instinct of an old Indian fighter, Gillis, during that first mad retreat, had discovered temporary shelter behind one of the largest bowlders. It was a trifle in advance of those later rolled into position by the soldiers, but was of a size and shape which should have afforded ample protection for two, and doubtless would have done so had it not been for the firing from the cliff opposite. Even then it was a deflected bullet, glancing from off the polished surface of the rock, which found lodgment in the sturdy old fighter's brain. The girl had caught him as he fell, had wasted all her treasured store of water in a vain effort to cleanse the blood from his features, and now sat there, pillowing his head upon her knee, although the old man was stone dead with the first touch of the ball. That had occurred fully an hour before, but she continued in the same posture, a grave, pathetic figure, her face sobered and careworn beyond her years, her eyes dry and staring, one brown hand grasping unconsciously the old man's useless rifle. She would scarcely have been esteemed attractive even under much happier circumstances and assisted by dress, yet there was something in the independent poise of her head, the steady fixedness of her posture, which served to interest Hampton as he now watched her curiously.

"Fighting blood," he muttered admiringly to himself. "Might fail to develop into very much of a society belle, but likely to prove valuable out here."

She was rather a slender slip of a thing, a trifle too tall for her years, perhaps, yet with no lack of development apparent in the slim, rounded figure. Her coarse home-made dress of dark calico fitted her sadly, while her rumpled hair, from which the broad-brimmed hat had fallen, possessed a reddish copper tinge where it was touched by the sun. Mr. Hampton's survey did not increase his desire for more intimate acquaintance-ship, yet he recognized anew her undoubted claim upon him.

"If I Select Your Bullet Rather Than the Rocks, What Then?"

"Suppose I might just as well drop out that way as any other," he reflected, thoughtfully. "It's all in the game."

Lying flat upon his stomach, both arms extended, he slowly forced himself beyond his bowlder into the open. There was no great distance to be traversed, and a considerable portion of the way was somewhat protected by low bushes. Hampton took few chances of those spying eyes above, never uplifting his head the smallest fraction of an inch, but reaching forward with blindly groping hands, caught hold upon any projecting root or stone which enabled him to drag his body an inch farther. Twice they fired directly down at him from the opposite summit, and once a fleck of sharp rock, chipped by a glancing bullet, embedded itself in his cheek, dyeing the whole side of his face crimson. But not once did he pause or glance aside; nor did the girl look up from the imploring face of her dead. As he crept silently in, sheltering himself next to the body of the dead man, she perceived his presence for the first time, and shrank back as if in dread.

"What are you doing? Why—why did you come here?" she questioned, a falter in her voice; and he noticed that her eyes were dark and large, yielding a marked impress of beauty to her face.

"I was unwilling to leave you here alone," he answered, quietly, "and hope to discover some means for getting you safely back beside the others."

"But I didn't want you," and there was a look of positive dislike in her widely opened eyes.

"Didn't want me?" He echoed these unexpected words in a tone of complete surprise. "Surely you could not desire to be left here alone? Why didn't you want me?"

"Because I know who you are!" Her voice seemed to catch in her throat. "He told me. You're the man who shot Jim Eberly."

Mr. Hampton was never of a pronounced emotional nature, nor was he a person easily disconcerted, yet he flushed at the sound of these impulsive words, and the confident smile deserted his lips. For a moment they sat thus, the dead body lying between, and looked at each other. When the man finally broke the constrained silence a deeper intonation had crept into his voice.

"My girl," he said gravely, and not without a suspicion of pleading, "this is no place for me to attempt any defense of a shooting affray in a gambling house, although I might plead with some justice that Eberly enjoyed the honor of shooting first. I was not aware of your personal feeling in the matter, or I might have permitted some one else to come here in my stead. Now it is too late. I have never spoken to you before, and do so at this time merely from a sincere desire to be of some assistance."

There was that in his manner of grave courtesy which served to steady the girl. Probably never before in all her rough frontier experience had she been addressed thus formally. Her closely compressed lips twitched nervously, but her questioning eyes remained unlowered.

"You may stay," she asserted, soberly. "Only don't touch me."

No one could ever realize how much those words hurt him. Not until he had completely conquered his first unwise impulse to retort angrily, did he venture again to speak.

"I hope to aid you in getting back beside the others, where you will be less exposed."

"Will you take him?"

"He is dead," Hampton said, soberly, "and I can do nothing to aid him. But there remains a chance for you to escape."

"Then I won't go," she declared, positively.

Hampton's gray eyes looked for a long moment fixedly into her darker ones, while the two took mental stock of each other. He realized the utter futility of any further argument, while she felt instinctively the cool, dominating strength of the man. Neither was composed of that poor fiber which bends.

"Very well, my young lady," he said, easily, stretching himself out more comfortably in the rock shadow. "Then I will remain here with you; it makes small odds."

Excepting for one hasty, puzzled glance, she did not deign to look again toward him, and the man rested motionless upon his back, staring up at the sky. Finally, curiosity overmastered the actor in him, and he turned partially upon one side, so as to bring her profile within his range of vision. Her dark, glowing eyes were lowered upon the white face of the dead man, yet Hampton noted how clear, in spite of sun-tan, were those tints of health upon the rounded cheek, and how soft and glossy shone her wealth of rumpled hair. Even the tinge of color, so distasteful in the full glare of the sun, appeared to have darkened under the shadow, its shade framing the downcast face into a pensive fairness. Then he observed how dry and parched her lips were.

"Take a drink of this," he insisted heartily, holding out toward her as he spoke his partially filled canteen.

She started at the unexpected sound of his voice, yet uplifted the welcome water to her mouth, while Hampton, observing it all closely, could but remark the delicate shapeliness of her hand.

"If that old fellow was her father," he reflected soberly, "I should like to have seen her mother."

"Thank you," she said simply, handing back the canteen, but without lifting her eyes again to his face. "I was so thirsty." Her low tone, endeavoring to be polite enough, contained no note of encouragement.

"Was Gillis your father?" the man questioned, determined to make her recognize his presence.

"I suppose so; I don't know."

"You don't know? Am I to understand you are actually uncertain whether this man was your father or not?"

"That is about what I said, wasn't it? Not that it is any of your business, so far as I know, Mr. Bob Hampton, but I answered you all right. He brought me up, and I called him 'dad' about as far back as I can remember, but I don't reckon as he ever told me he was my father. So you can understand just what you please."

"His name was Gillis, wasn't it?"

The girl nodded wearily.

"Post-trader at Fort Bethune?"

Again the rumpled head silently acquiesced.

"What is your name?"

"He always called me 'kid,'" she admitted unwillingly, "but I reckon if you have any further occasion for addressing me, you'd better say 'Miss Gillis.'"

"Heaven preserve me!" he exclaimed good naturedly, "but you are certainly laying it on thick, young lady! However, I believe we might become good friends if we ever have sufficient luck to get out from this hole alive. Darn if I don't sort of cotton to you, little girl—you've got some sand."

For a brief space her truthful, angry eyes rested scornfully upon his face, her lips parted as though trembling with a sharp retort. Then she deliberately turned her back upon him without uttering a word.

For what may have been the first and only occasion in Mr. Hampton's audacious career, he realized his utter helplessness. This mere slip of a red-headed girl, this little nameless waif of the frontier, condemned him so completely, and without waste of words, as to leave him weaponless.

Mr. Hampton was a thorough-going sport, and no quality was quite so apt to appeal to him as dead gameness. He glanced surreptitiously aside at her once more, but there was no sign of relenting in the averted face. He rested lower against the rock, his face upturned toward the sky, and thought.

It was no spirit of bravado that gave rise to his reckless speech of an hour previous. It was simply a spontaneous outpouring of his real nature, an unpremeditated expression of that supreme carelessness with which he regarded the future, the small value he set on life. He truly felt as utterly indifferent toward fate as his words signified. Deeply conscious of a life long ago irretrievably wrecked, everything behind a chaos, everything before worthless,—for years he had been actually seeking death; a hundred times he had gladly marked its apparent approach, a smile of welcome upon his lips. Yet it had never quite succeeded in reaching him, and nothing had been gained beyond a reputation for cool, reckless daring, which he did not in the least covet. But now, miracle of all miracles, just as the end seemed actually attained, seemed beyond any possibility of being turned aside, he began to experience a desire to live—he wanted to save this girl.

"I Can't Help Him, But There Remains a Chance for Your Escape."

His keenly observant eyes, trained by the exigencies of his trade to take note of small things, and rendered eager by this newly awakened ambition, scanned the cliff towering above them. He perceived the extreme irregularity of its front, and numerous peculiarities of formation which had escaped him hitherto. Suddenly his puzzled face brightened to the birth of an idea. By heavens! it might be done! Surely it might be done! Inch by inch he traced the obscure passage seeking to impress each faint detail upon his memory—that narrow ledge within easy reach of an upstretched arm, the sharp outcropping of rock-edges here and there, the deep gash as though some giant ax had cleaved the stone, those sturdy cedars growing straight out over the chasm like the bowsprits of ships, while all along the way, irregular and ragged, varied rifts not entirely unlike the steps of a crazy staircase.

The very conception of such an exploit caused his flesh to creep. But he was not of that class of men who fall back dazed before the face of danger. Again and again, led by an impulse he was unable to resist, he studied that precipitous rock, every nerve tingling to the newborn hope. God helping them, even so desperate a deed might be accomplished, although it would test the foot and nerve of a Swiss mountaineer. He glanced again uneasily toward his companion, and saw the same motionless figure, the same somber face turned deliberately away. Hampton did not smile, but his square jaw set, and he clinched his hands. He had no fear that she might fail him, but for the first time in all his life he questioned his own courage.

Father's Vacation.

Mother has gone to the country to play.
Sister has gone to the hills—
All of the family have flitted away—
Father is paying the bills.

No one to bother him now when he sleeps,
No one to take him to task—
He can go down to the club every night
No one expects him to ask.

Father is having the time of his life,
Mousie is sporting his best—
Mother has gone to the country to play—
Father is having a rest!

Hot.

It is hotter than Inferno in the office and the street;
When you walk upon the pavement, blisters come upon your feet.
The caloric 'round the hundred spot is hanging in a trance
And the scintillating sunbeams fairly sizzle at your glance!

There's an incandescent fervor in the breezes filled with blaze
And the pyrotechny quivers all a-tremble in the haze.
It is worse than Afric summer or the Bengal, broiling heat—
Oh, a hot day in Chicago, it is pretty hard to beat!

Every street is like a furnace and the bricks are piping hot;
You could roast a steer's hind quarters on the pavement in a pot!
And the torrid, filt'ring sunshafts strike you on your aching head,
'Til you fret and fume like fury at the earning of your bread!

In the reeking, baking caldron you toil on through weary day
As you strive to be a general and to win the upper way.
Every morning in the summer you ride down and fight the blues—
For a man must work and suffer just to buy the baby shoes!

American People Becoming Inoculated With Germ of Honesty

By DR. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS.

The geologist tells us that the White mountains were the first peaks to emerge from the sea; then, little by little, the whole continent appeared, rising above the hot waters of either ocean. That was a great moment when Mount Washington first cleared itself of water, steam and mud and stood forth, crowned with sunlight, the forerunner of a new continent.

But more wonderful still the sudden entrance of conscience and ethics into the industrial and corporative life of the republic. For years, doubtless, the preparatory processes have been going on, but the ethical movement has published itself only in the last few weeks and months. To-day the railroads are posting their rates and withdrawing secret rebates. Alarmed, politicians no longer hawk franchises in the lobbies of the city hall.

More striking still the ethical note in the realm of public morals. Man wants money—but when a man is hungry he must not eat coals of fire. And when a man is avaricious he must not seek satisfaction by getting money through crime and fraud. The whole nation is rising up to shake off its former lies, vices and sins. In politics if a youth wants position and preferment he must plead the cause of the poor. In literature and fiction if the novelist wants to succeed he must portray the triumph of honor and the defeat of sham and humbug. If a magazine wants to increase its circulation it takes up some cause and becomes a voice for the public conscience. On every side are young men of ability and large mental acquirements who have tried to get on by adopting the low ethical ideals of the politicians of the old school, with the result that these ambitious young men are now utterly discredited and without any hope of future preferment.

Honesty is becoming a contagion. It is an auspicious hour for our people. It is the golden age for which the fathers longed. And this new note of conscience in public life prophesies a new era of happiness and progress for the people of the republic.

Vital Problem to be Solved

By OSCAR S. STRAUSS,
Secretary of Department of Commerce and Labor.

No greater, more important, and vital question has ever come forward for solution than the relation between capital and labor. It is today agitating the parliaments of all enlightened nations, and is receiving the thoughtful attention of statesmen and legislators, who recognize that the plane of solution lies high above the narrow pathways of selfish interest.

The effect of combination of either capital or labor is not in itself an evil. The methods by which such combination is arrived at or by which it is maintained or operated, if those methods are inequitable or unfair, should not only be exposed, but should be drastically dealt with. A corporation desiring to perpetuate its domination may use its combination power to give better service—that is a public good—but when that power is used to prevent any one else from giving a like service or the best service it can, then its combination power is being used as an encroachment upon the rights of others and against the public welfare.

It is not within the power or proper sphere of government to equalize competitors, but it is within the power and proper sphere of government to equalize the opportunities of competitors. It is the sphere of government to keep open equally to all men the avenues of commercial development, to maintain the opportunity for competition, and to prevent the use of unfair means that diminish or destroy such equal opportunity.

A Treatise on Terrapin

By JUDGE J. UPSHUR DENNIS,
of Supreme Court of Maryland.

Terrapin is the acme of creation, and I think terrapin and not man was made on the sixth day. The odd time was filled up in making field mushrooms.

What are the essentials for terrapin?

Plenty of it. I like them served in the shell, but you can't make them bad. They should have the merest suggestion of sherry and be seasoned with butter, pepper and salt. If thin, a good deal of cream should be put with them. The best kind are fresh caught mud terrapin.

When is the best month to eat terrapin?

Any time you can get them. After November they lay up food, and get fat. They should be boiled until thoroughly done and then stewed. Celery and Maryland biscuit belong to them, and champagne is the piece de resistance as the beverage; but good old burgundy is all right at any time. An old darkey, named Aaron Lloyd, down in my country on the Eastern Shore, used to have a song that appealed to me very much. It began this way:

When the honeysuckle bloo ms and the dogwood's white,
Then the terrapin lays, and the red drums bite.

Olive Oil out of Cotton Seed

By MAJ. JOHN M. CARSON,
Chief of the Government Bureau of Manufacturers.

The cotton-seed industry presents greater attractions and offers greater possibilities in the immediate future for enlargement in foreign markets than many others of our principal industries. If it were more generally known in the United States, that the best cotton-seed oil is equal in purity and healthfulness to olive oil, the demand for cotton oil at home would expand to a point that would seriously interfere with the profits of those manufacturers of olive oil in France, Italy and Spain who find cotton oil so profitable in the conduct of their business. Our manufacturers of cotton oil might profitably direct their efforts to bringing their product to the attention of the American people. If our own people were made familiar with the real qualities of cotton-seed oil, very much of the olive oil now imported would be permanently displaced, and very much of the animal fats now so extensively used in the preparation of food would be expelled from American kitchens.

If you are a business man, did you ever think of the field of opportunity that advertising opens to you? There is almost no limit to the possibilities of your business if you study how to turn trade into your store. If you are not getting your share of the business of your community there's a reason. People go where they are attracted — where they know what they can get and how much it is sold for. If you make direct statements in your advertising see to it that you are able to fulfill every promise you make. You will add to your business reputation and hold your customers. It will not cost as much to run your ad in this paper as you think. It is the persistent advertiser who gets there. Have something in the paper every issue, no matter how small. We will be pleased to quote you our advertising rates, particularly on the year's business.

CAPITAL STOCK INCREASED BY VOTE OF STOCKHOLDERS

Of Yough River Oil and Gas Company From $10.000 to $20.000.

WELL WILL BE SUNK DEEPER

The Opinion Unanimous That Oil or Gas Will be Found At Present Location, Hence Action of Stockholders in Voting More Capital.

The stockholders of the Yough River Oil and Gas Company held a largely attended meeting at the court house in Oakland last Saturday afternoon at which more than the necessary three-fourths of the stock was represented either in person or by proxy.

The meeting was held for the purpose of considering the advisibility of increasing the capital stock of the company from its original amount ($10,000) to that of $20,000, which after a number of those who are particularly interested in the success of the project had made explanatory speeches and laid before the gathering the tremendous profits that would accrue should oil or gas be found, was unanimously decided upon, hence the company is at present capitalized at $20,000, which amount will furnish sufficient capital to carry the development forward without additional increase.

The stockholders present at the meeting are more than pleased with the prospects confronting them and it was the general opinion that the well now being sunk should be bored to a greater depth, work in which will be recommenced as soon as the necessary equipment of cable and other material reaches the well, which is expected daily.

The subscription books for the new issue of stock are now open and persons desiring the invest in the project will be furnished with the necessary application blanks by calling upon any of the directors of the corporation, by writing to Mr. N. S. Heindel, secretary, or to Col. A. G. Sturgiss, treasurer.

POLITICS IN GRANTSVILLE

Candidate For the House of Delegates in the Person of L. F. Green.

To the Editor of The Republican:

The time is nigh at hand when every citizen of the county should feel it his privilege and duty to voice his sentiments at the coming primaries for the selection of good and honorable men for the various positions to be filled at the election in November.

The political situation seems quiet and harmonious in this end of the county.

It is generally supposed that each section of the county should have its proportionate quota of representation and in this the lower end has often fell short. The time is at hand when it should be recognized, especially if it can produce the material.

Grantsville district has a candidate in the person of L. F. Green for the House of Delegates, subject to the Republican primaries. Mr. Green is well known by the teaching profession of the county and has taught four years successfully. Mr. Green is well posted on civil government, the state's history and is an orator of no mean ability and if nominated and elected no doubt will stand for a square deal for every man.

Grantsville, Sept. 10, 1907.

Letter to M. Ashby.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: What will it cost to sow ten acres half wheat and half daisy mixed? and what'll the crop be worth?

We don't know what daisy-seed costs nor how bulky it is; we suspect half wheat and half daisy would make a big crop of daisies, and last a long time; the wheat might be short.

The parable throws some light on the cost of a paint half whitewash. Whitewash, mixed half-and-half with paint, is all-paint in look and feel; indeed nine-tenths of the "paint" in the stores is part whitewash: some half some more, some less.

Paint has to be spread with the brush, the surface prepared, the ladders scaffolds pulleys and ropes arranged and moved, there's a great deal of labor in putting paint on; it costs $2 to $4 a gallon to do it.

What it costs to paint whitewash? Just the same. Half-whitewash? Just the same. It doesn't seem worth while for the whitewash does harm, not good.

Will the paint hold the whitewash fast? or the whitewash loosen the paint?

Better paint pure paint, the least gallons paint, the least-money paint, Devoe.

Yours truly

PROHIBITIONISTS WILL NOMINATE COUNTY TICKET

Call for Convention Has Been Issued By County Chairman Cuppett.

TO BE HELD AT MT. LAKE PARK

Saturday, September 21, When Full County Ticket Will Be Placed In the Field—Interest In Movement Given New Impetus.

The causes of Prohibition has been given a new impetus by reason of the recent Prohibition convention held at Mountain Lake Park, which closed Monday, 2nd inst., after having nominated on the Saturday previous a full State ticket, the names of the nominees appearing in this paper last week.

To still further the cause of temperance and in order to keep the issue before the people locally, H. N. Cuppett, of Mountain Lake Park, chairman of the County Prohibition Committee, has issued a call for a County Convention to be held at Mountain Lake Park on Saturday, September 21th, when a full county ticket will be placed in nomination to be voted for at the election in November of this year.

Twelve county offices are to be filled and four state offices. With the Republican, Democrats and Prohibitionists each having full county and state tickets in the field and the Socialists having four nominees for state offices, makes a total of fifty-two names to appear on the officiaj ballot. In addition to these names the question of a Constitutional Convention will be submitted to the people, which will also be printed on the ballot, which will result in making the official ballot the largest ever handled by the electorate in Maryland, and it therefore behooves each and every voter to study carefully the form and arrangement of the same when it is issued by the Board of Supervisors.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. MARGARET JANE KEPNER.

Mrs. Margaret Jane Kepner was born November 18, 1831, at Emmittsburg, Md. She lived there during her girlhood and in 1850 was married to Enos D. Kepner, of Adams county, Pennsylvania. Together they came to Oakland in October, 1854, and lived here to the time of her death. As a result of this marriage eleven children were born: Joseph, Frank, William, Martha J., Flora, Jacob E., Mollie, Nettie, Harry, John and Alice. Of these Frank, Joseph and Harry are dead and those living are William Kepner, of Grafton, W. Va.; Mrs. Martha Alexander, Morgantown, W. Va.; Jacob Kepner, Scottdale Pa.; Mrs. Mollie Getty, Cumberland, Md.; John Kepner, Grafton W. Va.; Mrs. Flora Porter, Alice and Nettie Kepner of Oakland, Md. Mrs. Kepner joined the M. E. Church shortly after the civil war and was a faithful member to the time of her death. Of late years she had suffered from rheumatism and had been prevented from attending church regularly but had always kept up her membership in the church. In Oakland she was well known and always had a cheery word for those with whom she come contact. Those present at her funeral besides her sons and daughters were Mr. Benjamin Kepner, Mr. Jas. Coldwell, Gettysburg, Pa.; Charles Lantz, Edward Manown, Baltimore, and Frank Manown, Phillipi W. Va.; Dr. Percical Lantz, Alaska, W. Va.; Joseph Lantz, Davis, W. Va

Mrs. Kepner's funeral took place Sunday afternoon at two o'clock from her late residence, the services being conducted by Rev. J. B. Workman, of St. Paul's M. E. church, assisted by by Rev. John M. Davis. The pall bearers were Messrs. Fred. A. Thayer, S. E. Shirer, George M. Mason, Charles S. Davis, A. D. Naylor and D. M. Dixon. The interment was made in the Oakland Cemetery.

BUSH ARNOLD.

At Jacksonburg, West Va., Tuesday at six o'clock, Bush Arnold, age 26 years. The deceased was a son-in-law of Thomas A. Nethken, of Oakland, who went to Jacksonburg on Tuesday morning, returning here the same evening with the body, which will be interred this afternoon in the Oakland cemetery. Mrs. Arnold is just recovering from an attack of typhoid fever.

The prompt and surprising relief which this remedy immediately brings is entirely due to its Restorative action upon the controlling nerves of the Stomach, etc.

A COLONIAL WEDDING

At Which Miss Thomasson Became the Bride of Mr. C. E. Offutt.

On Monday, the 9th inst., Monte Vista, the country home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Thomasson, of Chicago, was the scene of a brilliant wedding, when Mr. Elwood Offutt, son of Mr. and Mrs. D. E. Offutt of this town, became united in marriage with Miss Nanniene Norton Thomasson, the accomplished and only daughter of the above.

The spacious lawn, porches and driveways were beautifully illuminated with Japanese lanterns, while inside the house only the soft light of myriads of candles, after the fashion of our grandmothers, were used.

Sweet peas were the flowers used, and they, with quantities of green, were everywhere in profusion.

An aisle in the spacious dining room, where the marriage ceremony took place, was formed with white ribbons attached to small white posts, which led to a raised dais in the broad curved window at one end. Solid green here formed a beautiful background for the picturesque ceremony.

Promptly at eight o'clock the procession was formed up stairs, while Daisy's orchestra played "Maryland, My Maryland," in striking contrast to the time-worn Mendellsohn and Lohengrin marches usually used. Later they played many other Southern and dance tunes. The ushers and bridesmaids, one by one, preceded the bride and her father, who gave her away, to the miniature stage where she was met by the groom and his best man, Mr. D. E. Offutt, Jr.

The beautiful Episcopal ceremony was used, and performed most impressively by Rev. Mr. Cooley, of Madisonville, Ohio, a cousin of the bride's mother.

The bride looked lovely in a white tulle over satin decolette gown, en train, trimmed with very old real lace and made after a fashion of just fifty years ago. Her tulle veil was fastened with a coronet of orange blossoms and was most gracefully arranged. Her only ornaments were a pearl necklace and a diamond crescent, the latter being a gift of the groom.

The ushers were Dr. J. E. Legge, of this town, Mr. Nelson Thomasson, a brother of the bride, of Chicago, and Mr. J. B. G. Roberts, Jr., of Cumberland. They all wore evening dress, white gloves and boutonieres of white sweet peas. The maids were Miss Howland of Amherst, Mass., Miss Owsley of Chicago, and Miss Nell Offutt of Oakland. They wore quaint but simple gowns of filmy flowered material, slightly decolette, and carried flower fans, ormed of sweet peas. Each maid, clasped around her wrist, wore a pearl heart on a black velvet band, a gift of the bride.

After the ceremony the bride and groom proceeded at once to the reception hall, where they received the best wishes and congratulations of their friends.

Delicious punch was served throughout the evening, and about 9.30 Rauscher, the celebrated Washington caterer, served refreshments. The bride's table, which was a large white heart, was placed in the breakfast room to itself, and was beautifully decorated. The heart effect was carried out in refreshments and wherever possible.

True Southern hospitality prevailed, and every one seemed to enjoy the occasion.

The presents, which were displayed in an upstairs room, were numerous and beautiful.

The bride and groom left in an automobile for Deer Park where they took train No. 4 for New York city and a northern tour.

Upon their return Mr. and Mrs. Offutt will take up their residence in their recently purchased home on the edge of town, formerly occupied by Judge Shellabarger and family.

Among those present from Oakland were Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Sturgiss, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Sincell, Mr. George Sincell, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Offutt, Mr. and Mrs. Gilmor S. Hamill, Mr. Stewart Hamill, Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Pollock and Mr. and Mrs. King Delawder.

Notice to Sunday School Superintendents of Garrett County.

All Sunday School Superintendents are requested to elect at least three delegates and urge them to be present at the first meeting of the County Convention which will be held in Oakland Friday, September 20th, in St. Paul's M. E. Church, beginning at 9.30 a. m. An interesting and helpful program has been arranged. Send names of delegates to Rev. J. B. Workman, who will provide accommodations for them. Please attend to this at once and help make this convention a success.

H. N. CUPPETT,
Acting County President.

THE GARRETT COUNTY TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

Annual Gathering of the Public Instructors In Oakland.

SESSIONS HIGHLY INTERESTING.

Program Is Being Carried Out Faithfully By Those Who Were Assigned Parts—Large Numbers of Teachers Present.

The Garrett County Teachers' Institute opened at Oakland Monday morning, Sept. 9th, at 10.30 a. m.

The presence of M. B. Stephens, State Superintendent of Education, and Prof. T. L. Gibson, instructor of Music at State Normal in Baltimore, gave assurance of a successful and helpful Institute, and later when Dr. R. A. Armstrong of West Virginia, and Dr. T. D. O'Bolger of Pennsylvania were introduced, the assurance was made doubly sure.

The program as followed Monday and Tuesday was:

MONDAY FORENOON.

|---|---|
| Song | Prof. Gibson |
| Prayer | Rev. J. B. Workman |
| Song, Institute | Led by Prof. Gibson |
| Address of Welcome | Dr. E. H. Bartlett |
| Response | Prof. M. K. Turner |
| Music | Prof. Gibson |
| Address | Dr. Stephens |

AFTERNOON SESSION.

|---|---|
| Address | Dr. Armstrong |
| Lecture | Dr. O'Bolger |
| Address | Dr. Stephens |

While under the influence of inspiration from Prof. Gibson's interpretations of words and music; Dr. Stephen's concise, helpful statements; Dr. Armstrong's eloquence regarding literature and art, and Dr. O'Bolger's expert handling of composition, one is conscious of a creation of new effort, and remembering the kind promise and rich fulfillment, says, "The evening and the morning were the first day."

TUESDAY FORENOON.

|---|---|
| Music | Prof. Gibson |
| Prayer | Rev. E. Manges |
| Music | Prof. Gibson |
| Address | Dr. Armstrong |
| Music | Prof. Gibson |

INTERMISSION.

|---|---|
| Music | Prof. Gibson |
| Address | Supt. A. C. Willison of Allegany county. |

AFTERNOON SESSION.

"What and How to Teach Pupils during First Year of School Life." Misses Olive DeWitt and Mattie Riley. The subject was opened by Miss DeWitt and handled in such a way as to convince her hearers that when experience has added to her natural ability and excellent normal training, she will be one of the best of primary teachers. Her talk was indeed delightful and instructive. Miss Riley's remarks corroborated those of Miss DeWitt and the subject was laid before the institute for discussion. This was ably done by Prof. Gibson, Dr. Armstrong, Dr. Bartlett, Dr. O'Bolger, Supt. Willison and Supt. Browning.

EVENING SESSION.

The crowd which assembled in the evening to hear the lecture of Dr. O'Bolger on "The Teacher in Relation to Civic Life," while not so large as might have been wished for the sake of those who did not hear it, was appreciative and all were impressed by his clear presentation of startling truths. We wish we could have more lectures to awaken each to his individual duty.

WEDNESDAY FORENOON.

|---|---|
| Singing | Institute |
| Devotional | Dr. Armstrong |
| Announcements | Prof. Schaffer |
| Address | Dr. Armstrong |
| Address | Dr. O'Bolger |
| Music | Prof. Gibson |
| Address | Rev. Dr. Hall |
| Music | Prof. Gibson |

AFTERNOON SESSION.

|---|---|
| Music | Prof. Gibson |
| Address | Prof. A. W. DeWitt |
| Announcements | Prof. Loraditch |
| Bible Lecture | Dr. Armstrong |

The devotional exercises were made more impressive by the explanatory reading of the twenty-third Psalm.

Prof. Schaffer of Cumberland, representing the Tri-State Business College, explained the method of obtaining a free scholarship to that college.

Dr. Armstrong set forth the beauties and importance of the study of English, giving many valuable hints as to its presentation.

Dr. O'Bolger continued his discussion of composition and criticized papers submitted by some of the teachers at his suggestion.

Dr. Hall of Louisville, gave us some beautiful thoughts on true aims, and prepared for himself a welcome should he ever return to Garrett county.

Prof. DeWitt's masterly way of handling his subject on Grammar was highly praised and should be a help to teachers of technical grammar.

The Bible talk on the Book of Esther was in perfect keeping with all of Dr. Armstrong's work. He not only gave the historical setting, but set forth its literary value and moral and spiritual teachings.

After the Institute adjourned a meeting of the Garrett County Teachers' Association was held for re-organization. The following officers were elected: President, H. A. Loraditch; Vice-President, A. W. DeWitt; Recording Secretary and Treasurer, Marion Leary; Corresponding Secretary, Orley V. Dunham.

While this is a young organization, we hope all teachers and friends of education will become members and assist in the great work before us.

PRIVATE AND PUBLIC SCHOOLS

A Comparison of the Worth and Influence of Each Institution of Learning

IN FAVOR OF THE FORMER

A Writer in the New York Sun Discusses the Subject.

This is the week and indeed this may be the very day when thousands of parents must decide the question as to what kind of schooling they will give their children for the coming school year. Shall it be a public or a private school?

The answer depends usually upon the condition of one's purse. If a parent can not afford to spend money for a specialized training of his children, why, to the public schools they must go, and a very good training they will get in these days if they apply themselves and manage to attract the attention of their teachers by studious work. There are also many well to do Americans who send their children to the public schools on general principles, under a theory that it is democratic; that it does the boys and girls good to take their chances with the other boys and girls not so fortunate in the way of surroundings at home; that rough and ready and "no favor" theories of education are just what certain children need.

All this is very well in its way, but the fact remains that in nine cases out of ten when parents can afford to send their children to private schools they do so. There must be reason aside from the desire exclusive. Any one who knows American life knows that there does exist a certain element of snobbery among persons who have money, but they are few in number compared with the entire body of those who have so-called wealth. They are from the ranks of the newly rich as a rule. Private schools could not exist if they depended upon such persons rarely know anything of the advantages of education; they may send their children to private schools, but it is done chiefly from a desire to show off; not to give the children a superior training.

The great reason why hundreds of private schools exist is simply because they deserve to exist. They produce better results than the public schools. Consequently those who can afford to patronize them in order to secure the best in education for their children do so for the cold blooded reason that it pays to do so. It isn't a matter of keeping one's children away from "the common herd," although there are some thin brained individuals inspired with that motive; it isn't a matter of the expenditure of money for the purpose of showing off, although there are some featherweights who do that.

It is a matter of getting specialized training in these schools, which is the one great feature differentiating them from the excellent public schools, especially those of the high school or secondary education stage. The person who wants to keep his children from "the common herd" is a fool, according to general belief, for life consists of mixing with the masses and every one has to do a great deal of it. The American masses are bright people and no one was ever hurt by coming in daily contact with them. The man who uses his money solely for the sake of a display and to attract attention to himself is generally laughed at and deservedly so.

The most ardent advocate of the public school system will not dispute the statement that there is no room for the specialized training in these schools. A summary of the preliminary training of the men at leading colleges shows that that the private schools give the best training. At Yale the statistics show that more than three-fifths of the students are prepared at private schools. In Harvard the percentage of private school students is about 70. Throughout the country the figures are about 60 percent.

"Ah," says the critic, "I've got you there. It is only the rich, as a rule that goes to college. They are the ones who send their children to private schools because they can afford it. It is natural that most of the college students should come from these schools. Parents of such boys can afford to send them to college, while the parents of the average public school boy or girl keep them in school only until they are fairly well fitted to earn their own living."

"Pretty good argument," the private advocate says, "but there is one crushing answer. It is this: Fully 70 per cent. of the honor men at the great American universities come from the private preparatory schools."

The private schools led the way for the public schools and the general testimony of pedagogues and educators is that they have kept in advance in book learning. The average class in the public school consists of forty pupils. Under present system of double terms a year a teacher has these forty pupils only four months at the most. The teacher often has difficulty in recalling the names of the entire forty. Sometimes the members of the class are not called upon to recite in any one subject more than once a week, and sometimes not so often. The teacher rarely has an opportunity to study out the defects mentally of each pupil and the best way of correcting these defects.

Everything is done by rote. A machine is set up, the hopper is put in operation, certain mental tasks are given out to fit the pupils for squeezing themselves through the hopper. Those who get onto the trick go to the next hopper. Those who are dull fall behind and try it again. From one hopper to another the progress leads until it is time to quit school. Every pupil has had in training just what every other pupil has had and the only difference between them is that the brighter pupils have higher marks in book learning.

The wise man Plato once defined education in this way:

"Good education is that which gives to the body and to the soul all the perfection of which they are capable."

Educators say that there has never been a better definition. If it is sound, it stands to reason that machine made school children are not as well equipped toward securing perfection as those who have had individual training. The private school classes are rarely larger than fifteen. The training in these schools are far more than book learning. If it were simply book learning perhaps there would be little call for the private school, although it is admitted that in this respect the private school has its superior advantages.

That development which has what might be called soul perfection as its aim, the influence which a teacher with a personal interest in each pupil gives, which directs the thoughts of the pupils than to books, to nature, to other high ideals of truth and justice, the influences that uplift humanity—these are the things that count in after life and there is no place in the world where they can be acquired as the private school. Moreover the private school teacher is usually of a higher intellectual grade than the public school teacher. The best teachers go to the private schools. They are generally those who enter teaching from a desire to make it a life work, a profession, rather than a means of a mere livelihood.

One of the most interesting events in New York last winter was a dinner given by the old "old boys" of the famuos schoolmaster George W. Clarke on his ninetieth birthday anniversary. The company of his former pupils that assembled presented one of the most distinguished collections of men in town during the season. They all had that peculiar fraternal spirit that animates college. They all said that they got more from Mr. Clarke in the way of mental and moral training, outside of mere book learning, than they could have got in any other way. His ideals entered into their lives. They became mirrors of his thought in after years they saw what he told them was sound and good. It was personal contact with this grand old man that gave his pupils character had most to do with their success in life.

It is a mistake, however, to think that only the rich can send their children to private schools and that such schools are places where a democratic spirit does not exist. These schools are really most democratic. The pupils are not taught to regard wealth as the chief thing in life. There is practically no snobbishness in them. It is recognized that if there ever can be an aristocracy in this country it must be an aristocracy of education only. The best trained man mentally is the superior person in American life.

Hence it is a question of training alone. If one has a boy that needs discipline a wise parent reflects that it would be a good investment to send him to a military school. It is not done to fit him for a soldier's life. It is done to teach him the advantages of a regular, well order existence, one amenable to the duties of life down to the last degree. The boy arises at a certain time. He goes throught tasks, many of them hard, at a certain time. He has certain hours for work and certain hours for play. All through he is taught to obey promptly and without questioning. He must subordinate himself to the general good. Such a boy goes into business with some well defined ideas of what work is, how necessary and dignified it is, and ready to perform his tasks with the least possible effort to secure the largest possible results.

The specialization of education has a most important bearing on daily life. If a boy wishes a business college, even those of the most moderate means afford that for their children on a pinch.

Such a college is a specialized private school. Suppose law attracts a young fellow. What better preparation than a course in stenography before he takes up the law books, so that he may work in a lawyer's office for a time at a trade and thus absorb a lot of legal methods and the way of doing things? It doesn't take money to secure that training.

There are thousands upon thousands in this country, highly educated specialists too, who have secured their training through correspondence schools. Many a civil or electrical enginer has got on the world in this way. Suppose one wishes to make a specialty of modern languages in business life. It is one of the most fruitful sources of income that a person can have. A man who is expert in half a dozen languages is a valuable asset to a large house with business branches all over the world. In the old days these language experts were persons who had once been rich and who had traveled and lived in other countrtes a long time until they had become expert in the languages and who by reverses were compelled to make a living.

In these days such persons are trained. They don't go to a private school and take a lot of other studies that will be of little use to them. They listen to the correct pronunciation of the language over and over again. The grammar of the language soaks itself into their minds. They learn the real language. One doesn't have to have a fortune to attend such a school.

So it is with other schools that make some subject the exclusive aim of instruction. There are art schools, schools of acting and elocution, dancing schools, schools of music, pharmacy and dentistry schools, schools of medicine and law, all devoted to one special idea and it is within the range of anybody who saves a little money to send his boy there and give him a most practical equipment for the tasks of daily life.

There are many advantages to be secured in the so-called fashionable schools in the city for those who can afford to send their children to them. They are brought in contract with the best there is in art, in the drama, the opera, by living in the city. These advantages go far to prodnce that mystical quality which is known as culture, a quality that is hard to define but never difficult to recognize. For a boy or a girl who lives in a small town or city or stays at a city school has some marvelous advantages in the way of brightening up the mind.

On the other hand, for city boys and giils a stay at any of the scores of excellent preparatory schools in the country has its great advantages. One of the chief of these is the study of nature and daily contract with the simple truths that nature unfolds. Street pavements and brick walls tell no such stories as brooks and birds and animals. There is sound health in such schools.

There are many coeducational private schools. These have a refining influence which a school for one sex exclusively often does not possess. It is well for boys and girls to get used to one another in the contract of daily life and to be free from influences that absence from such contact sometimes brings.

The great point of all this special education is that parents should study their children and find out what they need most in the way of education. That once settled the way is easy, for there are hundreds of schools at one's disposal to secure just what the boy or girl needs especially. It doesn't require large means, although a large amount of money may be spent if a parent desires.

The truth is that specialized education is within ther each of almost any well to do person for his children. The private schools were the pioneer school of this country. They have kept the lead. If one can afford it the best educational training is secured in these schools. —New York Sun.

MIDSUMMER EVE RELIEFS

Plants That are Love Potions and Supposed to Keep off Witches.

In remote parts of England, Scotland and Wales, the St. John's wort, mingled with birch boughs and ferns, is still hung up on midsummer eve. In the North country it was formerly worn to keep off witches and warlocks. Irish "colleens" gather the mystic herb, with yarrow, and the pink or purplish blossom of the marsh orchid, in order to weave love spells and compound phitres on midsummer eve. It is one of "the seven herbs of power," of the Irish fairy-man or speedwell, vervain, evebright, mallow, and selfhelp (prunella). Plucked at noon on midsummer day or eve, they have extra virtues.

A belief in love potion lingers to a great extent, even in these days of schools and motor cars, in parts of our isles where the celtic element remains and young folks continue to resort to these time-honored expedients for winning the affections of hard-hearted lads and lasses. In such places girls hang up St. John's wort from the ceiling of walls on midsummer eve usually naming one sprig for themselves and another for their lovers. If the plants bend toward each other during the night, the pair will be married before next midsummer; if they turn aside, estrangement will follow, and if they are withered when the drawn drives away the brief dusk of the midsummer night, the person represented by the faded flower will be dead before St. John brings round his fiery wheel again.

The custom of going to gather fern seed at midnight on midsummer eve is not quite extinct yet in some parts of our isles, but nowadays it is rather observed as a bit of fun than from any faith in its mystic powers. Those who go in quest of the seed are to start alone, and time themselves so as to arrive at the ferns by 12 o'clock. They must on no account turn their heads, no matter what they may see or hear en route, and the spirits of the wood and heath were formerly said to do all in their power to induce them to turn, placing obstacles in their path, and whisking round their heads, as Aubery asserted that the elves did to a person who went to gather fern seed in the West Country in his time. Reaching the cluster of fronds from which they mean to gather the seed, they should hold a white napkin, paper, plate, or box under the fronds till midnight tolls out from the village belfry, and at the moment the seed is said to fall of its own accord into the plate or cloth, but the frond must not be shaken or even touched. On the way home the fairies will try to throw the bold mortal down, so that the treasure may be lost. And often, when he has reached home in safety, it has been found that the pocket was empty—not very surprising, when we think how minute the fern seed is!

One story is that precisely at midnight on midsummer eve the ferns put forth a blue flower, which ripens at once into magic seed and the mortal who sees this event may obtain his heart's desire, and have the power of finding buried treasvre and precious minerals. In the Tyrol fern seed is said to shine like gold on St. John's Eve, and those who gather it can discover treasure by scattering the seed on the ground, when fiery lines will mark the spot where the precious ore lies. In Russia, too, people go on St. John's Eve to look for the azure blossom of the fern, for the finder can ever afterward do exactly as he likes. Grimm says that at Thiers the fern gathered at midnight on St. John's Eve is thought to bring luck at play, a supersitition connected in Ireland with a four-leaved shamrock gathered on St. Patrick Day. In England, Wales and the Isle of Man the fern was said to be the common male or shield fern, but the Green Isle the magic species is the "fairy fern," which is thought to be a special favorite with "the good people." Some of the country folks are rather afraid to gather it, except at midsummer, but if it is brought into a garden and flourishes there, good luck will attend the owner; and if any one is ill, the fairy fern is sometimes brought indoors and set in clay or water in a saucer. If it is fresh next morning, the patient will recover, but if it fades, the illness will have a fatal termination. —Gentleman's Magazine.

A LOVER WHO LOST.

The Trouble Was That His Rival Proved More Enterprising.

"Just my infernal luck!" growled one of our most eligible bachelors as he threw himself on a couch and looked daggers at his closest male friend, as though he were the dispenser of fate. "If a fellow wants to get married and fulfill his proper destiny in life, fortune trips him up and makes a fool of him. You know that I've popped to three or four girls, and in every case I've been just too late. You may put it down now that if I ever marry a woman she will do the proposing and make all the preliminary arrangements."

"Scored another failure?"

"Yes; lost by an eyebrow, as usual. You recall that divine creature I pointed out to you from the club window the other day? That little Ruddins and I have both been sweet on her—rivals, I suppose you would say. I called where she is visiting early last evening to put my fate to the test. While I was screwing my courage up to the sticking point and trying to separate her from the other people there she was called by one of the servants. She came back looking so rosy and sweet that I pushed matters, piloted her to a side veranda and told her, with all the gush and sentimentalism of some callow youth, how I loved her, how I could not live without her. She never looked more beautiful than when she told me how sorry she was to cause me pain, but she had just accepted Mr. Ruddins by telephone. It was to talk with him that she had been called by the servant. I stammered my way to the hatrack and out of the house the best I could. The impudent little rascal! He knew I was going there, for I told him myself, and I went early for the express purpose of heading him off. No other man would have had the cold nerve to propose by telephone. If any girl wants me after this, she knows where to find me."—Detroit Free Press.

Brief, but Forceful.

Colonel Z. was colonel of a volunteer regiment in the war of '61. He was zealous and enthusiastic and unsurpassed as a drillmaster, but his knowledge of the manual was occasionally at fault. He always knew what to do, but sometimes his orders were more in the spirit than the form of military commands—as, for instance, this: "Out o' one line into two lines! Git!"

On one occasion his command came during a long march to a stone fence. Here was a dilemma—no laying it down, as they could a rail fence; nothing in the manual about stone fences. Colonel Z. did not hesitate long. Clear and firm came the word of command: "Git and this side the fence—form on the other side—forward, march!"—Woman's Home Companion.

CHAPTER III.

Between Life and Death.

The remainder of that day, as well as much of the gloomy night following, composed a silent, lingering horror. The fierce pangs of hunger no longer gnawed, but a dull apathy now held the helpless defenders. One of the wounded died, a mere lad, sobbing pitifully for his mother; an infantryman, peering forth from his covert, had been shot in the face, and his scream echoed among the rocks in multiplied accents of agony; while Wyman lay tossing and moaning, mercifully unconscious. The others rested in their places, scarcely venturing to stir a limb, their roving, wolfish eyes the only visible evidence of remaining life, every hope vanished, yet each man clinging to his assigned post of duty in desperation. There was but little firing—the defenders nursing their slender stock, the savages biding their time. When night shut down the latter became bolder, and taunted cruelly those destined to become so soon their hapless victims. Twice the maddened men fired recklessly at those dancing devils, and one pitched forward, emitting a howl of pain that caused his comrades to cower once again behind their covers. One and all these frontiersmen recognized the inevitable—before dawn the end must come. No useless words were spoken; the men merely clinched their teeth and waited.

Hampton crept closer in beside the girl while the shadows deepened, and ventured to touch her hand. Perhaps the severe strain of their situation, the intense loneliness of that Indian-haunted twilight, had somewhat softened her resentment, for she made no effort now to repulse him.

"Kid," he said at last, "are you game for a try at getting out of this?"

She appeared to hesitate over her answer, and he could feel her tumultuous breathing. Some portion of her aversion had vanished.

"Come, Kid," he ventured finally, yet with new assurance vibrating in his low voice; "this is surely a poor time and place for any indulgence in tantrums, and you've got more sense. I'm going to try to climb up the face of that cliff yonder,—it's the only possible way out from here,—and I propose to take you along with me."

She snatched her hand roughly away, yet remained facing him. "Who gave you any right to decide what I should do?"

The man clasped his fingers tightly about her slender arm, advancing his face until he could look squarely into hers. She read in the lines of that determined countenance a inflexible resolve which overmastered her.

"The right given by Almighty God to protect any one of your sex in peril," he replied. "Before dawn those savage fiends will be upon us. We are utterly helpless. There remains only one possible path for escape, and I believe I have discovered it. Now, my girl, you either climb those rocks with me, or I shall kill you where you are. It is that, or the Sioux torture. I have two shots left in this gun,—one for you, the other for myself. The time has come for deciding which of these alternatives you prefer."

"If I select your bullet rather than the rocks, what then?"

"You will get it, but in that case you will die like a fool."

"You have believed me to be one, all this afternoon."

"Possibly," he admitted; "your words and actions certainly justified some such conclusion, but the opportunity has arrived for causing me to revise that suspicion."

"I don't care to have you revise it, Mr. Bob Hampton. If I go, I shall hate you just the same."

Hampton's teeth clicked like those of an angry dog. "Hate and be damned," he exclaimed roughly. "All I care about now is to drag you out of here alive."

"Well, if you put it that way," she said, "I'll go."

"Come on, then," he whispered, his fingers grasping her sleeve.

She shook off the restraining touch of his hand as if it were contamination and sank down upon her knees beside the inert body. He could barely perceive the dim outlines of her bowed figure, yet never moved, his breath perceptibly quickening, while he watched and waited. Without word or moan she bent yet lower and pressed her lips upon the cold, white face. The man caught no more than the faintest echo of a murmured "Good-by, old dad; I wish I could take you with me." Then she stood stiffly upright, facing him. "I'm ready now," she announced calmly. "You can go on ahead."

They crept among low shrubs and around the bowlders, carefully guarding every slightest movement lest some rustle of disturbed foliage, or sound of loosened stone, might draw the fire of those keen watchers. Every inch of their progress was attained through tedious groping, yet the distance to be traversed was short, and Hampton soon found himself pressing against the uprising precipice. Against that background of dark cliff they might venture to stand erect, the faint glimmer of reflected light barely sufficient to reveal to each the shadowy outline of the other.

"Don't move an inch from this spot," he whispered. "It wouldn't be a square deal, Kid, to leave those poor fellows to their death without even telling them there's a chance to get out."

She attempted no reply, as he glided noiselessly away, but her face, could he have seen it, was not devoid of expression. This was an act of generosity and deliberate courage of the very kind most apt to appeal to her nature, and within her secret heart there was rapidly developing a respect for this man, who with such calm assurance won his own way. Then, suddenly, that black curtain was rent by jagged spurts of red and yellow flame. Dazed for an instant, her heart throbbing wildly to the sharp reports of the rifles, she shrank cowering back, her fascinated gaze fixed on those imp-like figures leaping forward from rock to rock. Almost with the flash and sound Hampton sprang hastily back and gathered her in his arms.

"Catch hold, Kid, anywhere; only go up, and quick!"

She retained no longer any memory of Hampton; her brain was completely terrorized. Inch by inch, foot by foot, clinging to a fragment of rock here, grasping a slippery branch there, occasionally helped by encountering a deeper gash in the face of the precipice, her movements concealed by the scattered cedars, she toiled feverishly up. The first time she became aware that Hampton was closely following was when her feet slipped along a naked root, and she would have plunged headlong into unknown depths had she not come in sudden contact with his supporting shoulder. Faint and dizzy, and trembling like a leaf of an aspen, she crept forward onto a somewhat wider ledge of thin rock, and lay there quivering painfully from head to foot. A moment of suspense, and he was outstretched beside her, resting at full length along the very outer edge, his hand closing tightly over her own.

"Remain perfectly quiet," he whispered, panting heavily. "We can be no safer anywhere else."

Shots and yells, the dull crash of blows, the shouts of men engaged in a death grapple, the sharp crackling of innumerable rifles, the inarticulate moans of pain, the piercing scream of sudden torture, were borne upward to them from out the blackness. All at once the hideous uproar ceased with a final yelping of triumph, seemingly reechoed the entire length of the chasm, in the midst of which one single voice pleaded pitifully,—only to die away in a shriek. The two agonized fugitives lay listening, their ears strained to catch the slightest sound from below. Hampton's ears could discern evidences of movement, and he heard guttural voices calling at a distance, but to the vision all was black.

These uncertain sounds ceased, the strained ears of the fugitives heard the crashing of bodies through the thick shrubbery, and then even this noise died away in the distance. Yet neither ventured to stir or speak. It may be that the girl slept fitfully, worn out by long vigil and intense strain; but the man proved less fortunate, his eyes staring out continually into the black void, his thoughts upon other days. His features were drawn and haggard when the first gray dawn found ghastly reflection along the opposite rock summit, and with blurred eyes he watched the faint tinge of returning light steal downward into the canyon. At last it swept aside thase lower clinging mists, as though some invisible hand had drawn back the night curtains, and he peered over the edge of his narrow resting place, gazing directly down upon the scene of massacre. With a quick gasp of unspeakable horror he shrank so sharply back as to cause the suddenly awakened girl to start and glance into his face.

"What is it?" she questioned, with quick catching of breath, reading that which she could not clearly interpret in his shocked expression.

"Nothing of consequence," and he faintly endeavored to smile. "I suppose I must have been dreaming also, and most unpleasantly. No; please do not look down; it would only cause your head to reel, and our upward climb is not yet completed. Do you feel strong enough now to make another attempt to reach the top?"

"Can we?" she questioned helplessly.

"We can, simply because we must," and his white teeth shut together firmly. "There is no possibility of retracing our steps downward, but with the help of this daylight we surely ought to be able to discover some path leading up."

He rose cautiously to his feet, pressing her more closely against the face of the cliff, thus holding her in comparative safety while preventing her from glancing back into the dizzy chasm. The most difficult portion of their journey was apparently just before them. More than once they tottered on the very brink, held to safety merely by desperate clutchings at rock or shrub, yet never once did the man loosen his guarding grasp of his companion. Pressed tightly against the smooth rock, feeling for every crevice, every slightest irregularity of surface making use of creeping tendril or dead branch, daring death along every inch of the way, these two creepers at last attained the opening to a little gulley, and sank down, faint and trembling. The girl glanced furtively at him, the long lashes shadowing the expression of her lowered eyes. In spite of deep prejudice she felt impelled to like this man; he accomplished things, and he didn't talk.

It was nothing more serious than a hard and toilsome climb after that, a continuous struggle testing every muscle, straining every sinew, causing both to sink down again and again, panting and exhausted, no longer stimulated by imminent peril. The narrow cleft they followed led somewhere away from the exposed front of the precipice, yet arose steep and jagged before them. It was bridged finally by a cedar trunk, which Hampton wrenched from out its rocky foothold, and the two crept cautiously forward, to emerge where the sunlight rested golden at the summit. They sank face downward in the short grass, barely conscious that they had finally won their desperate passage.

Slowly Hampton succeeded in uplifting his tired body and his reeling head, until he could sit partially upright and gaze unsteadily about. The girl yet remained motionless at his feet, her thick hair, a mass of red gold in the sunshine, completely concealing her face, her slender figure quivering to sobs of utter exhaustion. Before them stretched the barren plain, brown, desolate, drear, offering in all its wide expanse no hopeful promise of rescue. With hand partially shading his aching eyes from the blinding glare, the man studied its every exposed feature, his face hardening again into lines of stern determination. The girl stirred from her position, flinging back her heavy hair with one hand, and looking up into his face with eyes that read at once his disappointment.

"Have—have you any water left?" she asked at last, her lips parched and burning as if from fever.

He shook the canteen dangling forgotten at his side. "There may be a few drops," he said, handing it to her, although scarcely removing his fixed gaze from off that dreary plain. "We shall be obliged to make those trees yonder; there ought to be water there in plenty, and possibly we may strike a trail."

There was nothing more said between them. Like two automatons, they started off across the parched grass, the heat waves rising and falling as they stumbled forward. Neither realized until then how thoroughly that hard climb up the rocks, the strain of continued peril, and the long abstinence from food had sapped their strength, yet to remain where they were meant certain death; all hope found its center amid those distant beckoning trees.

No one can explain later how such deeds are ever accomplished; how the tortured soul controls physical weakness, and compels strained sinews to perform the miracle of action when all ambition has died. Hampton surely must have both seen and known, for he kept his direction, yet never afterwards did he regain any clear memory of it.

CHAPTER IV.

On the Naked Plain.

It was 218 miles, as the crow flies, between old Fort Bethune and the rock ford crossing the Bear Water, every foot of that dreary, treeless distance Indian-haunted, the favorite skulking place and hunting ground of the restless Sioux. Winter and summer this wide expanse had to be suspiciously patroled by numerous military scouting parties, anxious to learn more regarding the uncertain whereabouts of wandering bands and the purposes of malcontents.

One such company, composed of a dozen mounted infantrymen, accompanied by three Cree trailers, rode slowly and wearily across the brown exposed uplands down into the longer, greener grass of the wide valley bottom, until they emerged upon a barely perceptible trail which wound away in snake-like twistings, toward those high, barren hills whose blue masses were darkly silhouetted against the western sky. The animals moved steadily forward, reluctant and weary, their heads drooping dejectedly, their distended nostrils red and quivering, the oily perspiration streaking their dusted sides. The tired men, half blinded by the glare, lolled heavily in their deep cavalry saddles, with encrusted eyes staring moodily ahead.

Riding alone, and slightly in advance of the main body, his mount a rangy, broad-chested roan, streaked with alkali dust, the drooping head telling plainly of wearied muscles, was the officer in command. He was a pleasant-faced, stalwart young fellow, with the trim figure of a trained athlete, possessing a square chin smoothly shaven, his intelligent blue eyes half concealed beneath his hat brim, which had been drawn low to shade them from the glare, one hand pressing upon his saddle holster as he leaned over to rest. No insigna of rank served to distinguish him from those equally dusty fellows plodding gloomily behind, but a broad stripe of yellow running down the seams of his trousers, together with his high boots, bespoke the cavalry service, while the front of his battered campaign hat bore the decorations of two crossed sabers, with a gilded "7" prominent between. His attire was completed by a coarse blue shirt, unbottoned at the throat, about which had been loosely knotted a darker colored silk handkerchief, and across the back of the saddle was fastened a uniform jacket, the single shoulder strap revealed presenting the plain yellow of a second lieutenant.

Attaining to the summit of a slight knoll, whence a somewhat wider vista lay outspread, he partially turned his face toward the men straggling along in the rear, while his hand swept across the dreary scene.

"If that line of trees over yonder indicates the course of the Bear Water, Carson," he questioned quietly, "where are we expected to hit the trail leading down to the ford?"

The sergeant, thus addressed, a little stocky fellow wearing a closely clipped gray moustache, spurred his exhausted horse into a brief trot, and drew up short by the officer's side, his heavy eyes scanning the vague distance, even while his right hand was uplifted in perfunctory salute.

"There's no trail I know about along this bank, sir," he replied respectfully, "but the big cottonwood with the dead branch forking out at the top is the ford guide."

They rode down in moody silence into the next depression, and began wearily climbing the long hill opposite, apparently the last before coming directly down the banks of the stream. As his barely moving horse topped the uneven summit, the lieutenant suddenly drew in his rein, and uttering an exclamation of surprise, bent forward, staring intently down in his immediate front. For a single instant he appeared to doubt the evidence of his own eyes; then he swung hastily from out the saddle, all weariness forgotten.

"My God!" he cried, sharply, his eyes suspiciously sweeping the bare slope. "There are two bodies lying here—white people!"

They lay all doubled up in the coarse grass, exactly as they had fallen, the man resting face downward, the slender figure of the girl clasped vice-like in his arms, with her tightly closed eyes upturned toward the glaring sun. Never once questioning but that he was confronting the closing scene of a grewsome tragedy, the thoroughly aroused lieutenant dropped upon his knees beside them, his eyes already moist with sympathy, his anxious fingers feeling for a possible heart-beat. A moment of hushed, breathless suspense followed, and then he began flinging terse, eager commands across his shoulder to where his men were clustered.

"Here! Carson, Perry, Ronk, lay hold quick, and break this fellow's clasp," he cried, briefly. "The girl retains a spark of life yet, but the man's arms fairly crush her."

With all the rigidity of actual death those clutching hands held their tenacious grip, but the aroused soldiers wrenched the interlaced fingers apart with every tenderness possible in such emergency, shocked at noting the expression of intense agony stamped upon the man's face when thus exposed to view. The whole terrible story was engraven there—how he had toiled, agonized, suffered, before finally yielding to the inevitable and plunging forward in unconsciousness, written as legibly as though by a pen. Carson, who in his long service had witnessed much of death and suffering, bent tenderly above him, seeking for some faint evidence of lingering life. The anxious lieutenant, bareheaded under the hot sun-glare, strode hastily across from beside the unconscious but breathing girl, and stood gazing doubtfully down upon them.

"Any life, sergeant?" he demanded, his voice rendered husky by sympathy.

"He doesn't seem entirely gone, sir," and Carson glanced up into the officer's face, his own eyes filled with feeling. "I can distinguish just a wee bit of breathing, but it's so weak the pulse hardly stirs."

"What do you make of it?"

"Starving at the bottom, sir. The only thing I see now is to get them down to water and food."

The young officer glanced swiftly about him across that dreary picture of sun-burnt, desolate prairie stretching in every direction, his eyes pausing slightly as they surveyed the tops of the distant cottonwoods.

"Sling blankets between your horses," he commanded, decisively. "Move quickly, lads, and we may save one of those lives yet."

As if by some magic discipline the rude, effective litters were rapidly made ready, and the two seemingly lifeless bodies gently lifted from off the ground and deposited carefully within. Down the long, brown slope they advanced slowly, a soldier grasping the rein and walking at each horse's head, the supporting blankets, securely fastened about the saddle pommels, swaying gently to the measured tread of the trained animals. Beneath the protecting shadows of the first group of cottonwoods, almost on the banks of the muddy Bear Water, the little party let down their senseless burdens, and began once more their seemingly hopeless efforts at resuscitation. A fire was hastily kindled from dried and broken branches, and broth was made, which was forced through teeth that had to be pried open. Water was used unsparingly, the soldiers working with feverish eagerness, inspired by the constant admonitions of their officer, as well as their own curiosity to learn the facts hidden behind this tragedy.

It was the dark eyes of the girl which opened first, instantly closing again as the glaring light swept into them. Then slowly, and with wonder-ment, she gazed up into those strange, rough faces surrounding her, pausing in her first survey to rest her glance on the sympathetic countenance of the young lieutenant, who held her half reclining upon his arm.

"Now Miss, Just Take a Sip of This."

"Here," he exclaimed, kindly, interpreting her glance as one of fear, "you are all right and perfectly safe now, with friends to care for you. Peters, bring another cup of that broth. Now, miss, just take a sup or two of this, and your strength will come back in a jiffy. What was the trouble? Starving?"

She did exactly as he bade her, every movement mechanical, her eyes fastened upon his face.

"I—I reckon that was partly it," she responded at last, her voice faint and husky. Then her glance wandered away, and finally rested upon another little kneeling group a few yards farther down stream. A look of fresh intelligence swept into her face.

"Is that him?" she questioned, tremblingly. "Is—is he dead?"

"He wasn't when we first got here, but mighty near gone, I'm afraid. I've been working over you ever since."

She shook herself free and sat weakly up, her lips tight compressed, her eyes apparently blind to all save that motionless body she could barely distinguish. "Let me tell you, that fellow's a man, just the same; the gamest, nerviest man I ever saw. I reckon he got hit, too, though he never said nothing about it. That's his style."

The deeply interested lieutenant removed his watchful eyes from off his charge just long enough to glance inquiringly across his shoulder. "Has the man any signs of a wound, sergeant?" he asked, loudly.

"A mighty ugly slug in the shoulder, sir; has bled scandalous, but I guess it's the very luck that's goin' to save him; seems now to be comin' out all right."

The officer's brows knitted savagely. "It begins to look as if this might be some of our business. What happened? Indians?"

"Yes."

"How far away?"

"I don't know. They caught us in a canyon somewhere out yonder, maybe three or four days ago; there was a lot killed, some of them soldiers. My dad was shot, and then that night he—he got me out up the rock—, and he—he was carrying me in his arms when I—I fainted. I saw there was blood on his shirt, and it was dripping down on the grass as he walked. That's about all I know."

"Who is the man? What's his name?"

The girl looked squarely into the lieutenant's eyes, and, for some reason which she could never clearly explain even to herself, lied calmly. "I don't know; I never asked."

Sergeant Carson rose stiffly from his knees beside the extended figure and strode heavily across toward where they were sitting, lifting his hand in soldierly salute, his heels clicking as he brought them sharply together in military precision.

"The fellow is getting his eyes open, sir," he reported, "and is breathing more regular. Purty weak yit, but he'll come round in time." He stared curiously down at the girl now sitting up unsupported, while a sudden look of surprised recognition swept across his face.

"Great guns!" he exclaimed, eagerly, "but I know you. You're old man Gillis' gal from Bethune, ain't ye?"

"Yes," she acknowledged simply, "but he's dead."

"Never mind, little girl," the lieutenant said, with boyish sympathy. "I knew Gillis, and, now the sergeant has spoken, I remember you quite well. Thought all the time your face was familiar, but couldn't quite decide where I had seen you before. So poor old Gillis has gone, and you are left all alone in the world! Well, he was an old soldier, could not have hoped to live much longer anyway, and would rather go fighting at the end. We'll take you back with us to Bethune, and the ladies of the garrison will look after you."

The recumbent figure lying a few yards away half lifted itself upon one elbow, and Hampton's face, white and haggard, stared uncertainly across the open space. For an instant his gaze dwelt upon the crossed sabers shielding the gilded "7" on the front of the lieutenant's scouting hat, then settled upon the face of the girl. With one hand pressed against the grass he pushed himself slowly up until he sat fronting them, his teeth clinched tight, his gray eyes gleaming feverishly in their sunken sockets.

"I'll be damned if you will!" he said, hoarsely. "She's my girl now."

A "SHARP" BARGAIN

RECKONING OF THE NEW DICKER WITH GERMANY.

Considering That by Larger Undervaluation Privileges We Open the Door to Increased Competition, the Bargain Does Not Seem so Very Fine for Us After All.

As $6,664,000 a year is to $208,168 a year—that is what we are told the United States has gained in its tariff dicker with Germany. More specifically stated the claim is that the reduction in Germany's tariff on American exports will amount to $6,664,000, while the reduction in our tariff on German exports will amount to only $208,168.

If this be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, then Germany has been completely overreached, swindled, buncoed, confidenced, bamboozled, thimblerigged. The sharpest traders the world has ever known have been "made to look like suckers!" Our gifted state department has outgeneraled Germany very much as the natives of Timbuctoo might be outgeneraled. We have handed Germany a lemon. We have sold to Germany for $6,664,000 a gold brick which assays $208,168.

But is this the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, as our gifted state department endeavors to show in its optimistic analysis of the net results of the new German agreement? No; it is not the truth, but only a small part of the truth, as events will abundantly prove.

Germany did not put up her maximum tariff bluff for the paltry advantage of saving $208,168 in tariff duties under the limited provisions of section three of the Dingley law. It was not to sell us more of her argols, crude tartar, vermouth, still and sparkling wines, paintings and statuary that Germany doubled and tripled her tariff on our foodstuffs and manufactures. The whole trade in the articles named in section three amounts to considerably less than $2,000,000 a year. Certainly it was not for this petty trade that Germany provided herself with a maximum tariff club with which to frighten the United States into a cowardly surrender.

Where, then, does Germany expect to "get even?" Somewhere, you may be sure. This is where: By the nullification of law and procedure in American customs administration, whereby German exporters, consigning goods to their own agents in the United States, are practically permitted to undervalue their exports anywhere from ten to 50 per cent. That is where Germany will "get even."

Says the German exporter: "Let me write my own values and I care not who writes your tariff schedules." And he is right.

By so much as the German exporters are allowed to undervalue the $170,000,000 of mostly competitive goods which come to this country, by so much will our tariff be reduced. Ten per cent. of reduction in values would reduce the dutiable value of the imports from $170,000,000 to $153,000,000; 20 per cent. of reduction in values would make the total $136,000,000, and so on, according as the new undervaluation privileges shall work out larger or smaller percentages.

If the reduction through undervaluation amounts to 20 per cent., Germany will escape tariff payments on $34,000,000 of goods. At an average rate of 50 per cent. this would amount to $17,000,000 which the Germans will save in one year.

Not $208,168, as the state department optimist would have it, but $17,000,000 a year, is what Germany will get out of us.

Seventeen millions a year is a tidy sum to have in tariff payments. It is also a tidy sum for the United States treasury to lose in revenues. But the increased volume of German exports dumped on our market at cut prices represents a much greater sum of gain to Germany, compared with which that $208,168 is made to look "like 30 cents."

What it represents to American producers undersold in their own market and American wage earners robbed of employment, as the result of increased competition—this is another story which remains to be written when the results of our government's humiliating "lay down" to Germany shall have become visible.

For the present it is sufficient to say that the sharp traders of Germany are not the ones who have been overreached and swindled as $6,664,000 is to $208,168. Nothing of the sort. Wait and see who has been overreached and swindled. Six months or less of the new "export value" regime will determine whether or not American labor and industry have been overreached and swindled.

CROTHERS UNDER FIRE.

It is a new experience to have the character of a nominee for the high office of Governor assailed and something approaching a sensation was caused last week by the publication in the Baltimore News of grave charges affecting Austin L Crothers, the Democratic candidate for Governor. The charges do not deal with generalities but are set out in detail without mincing words.

He is charged with being actively engaged in politics while on the bench.

He is charged with debauching a voter.

He is charged with accepting the assignment of the Court in a criminal case and collecting a fee of $100 therefor from the State and afterward suing and collecting $200 from the brother of the accused.

He is charged with accepting money to secure liquor licenses.

In general he is charged with being a county boss of the baser sort, using his power for his own personal aggrandizement.

It is unfortunate and humiliating to the people of Maryland that the good name of the candidate for Governor of any party should be open to question, but it is not only right but is a duty not to be shunned, to lay bare a bad record rather than to drag down the high office of Governor by conferring it upon an unworthy man. The Baltimore News is a journal of the highest standing and charges made by it cannot be pooh-poohed or ignored but should be answered. The Sun has taken up the cudgels in behalf of Mr. Crothers but so far it has not made a satisfactory explanation. In fact the explaining process looks bad. It is so extraordinary that the people stand amazed over such things being charged against a candidate for Governor. Mr. Crothers should frankly answer the charges himself. He has everything to gain by so doing, for if he can disprove them he will get the sympathy of hundreds of men who will resent it if it can be shown that it is merely mud-slinging. On the other side if he is guilty the people will honor a public journal for having the courage to tell the people the truth. The issue is joined and truth or falsity of the charges is a matter of vital public concern. Mr. Crothers should speak for himself.

REPUBLICANS SHOULD WIN.

If the charges made by a Democratic newspaper against Mr. Crothers are true it undoubtedly adds another reason why the Democrats should not carry Maryland this year, but admitting that there is no question of the personal fitness of the two candidate, there are the very strongest reasons why the Republicans should be successful in electing their State ticket and a majority of the members of the General Assembly this year. In the first place, let no man deceive himself—the old Democratic leaders are in full control of the Democratic party and so great is their power that neither Edwin Warfield, whose good record and personal strength with the people had no weight with them, nor had they any use for him—nor Joseph D. Baker, of Frederick, could be nominated for Governor. A machine politician of their own kind was chosen, and that in this day, when all over the land the people are demanding that men of courage, ability and freedom from the domination of political bosses shall be chosen to high office. Mr. Gorman is dead. Mr. Rasin is dead. Old hands, taught in their school, but without their ability or sagacity, are playing for control along the old way. These are the men who have wiped off the fairest election law our State ever had and substituted a dishonest law designed to entrap voters and hinder them in the exercise of the highest right of freemen. This lowering of the standard of purity of elections has been demoralizing and has put a stain upon the good name of the State by putting a premium upon all sorts of election trickery and fraud. Shall the men responsible for such things be given more power? If so we may be sure that they will find a way to fasten their grip upon the State for years to come through the enactment of partisan laws—the Poe scheme and others but by another route. The Republicans deserve to win because they have headed their ticket by a man whose nomination the people earnestly hoped for. Why did they hope for his nomination? Because he was regarded as a man of great ability, with high ideas, a broad understanding of public needs and with a fine record as a public officer sincerely devoted to the cause of good government. George R. Gaither answers to all that is best and most progressive in the political life of today and no wonder that the Republicans are behind him as one man and hundreds of men of other parties intend to vote for him. It makes a big difference who the man is. Governor Hughes, of New York, has recently shown what one determined man can do even when the politicians oppose him. Maryland is at the parting of the ways. On the one hand it gives its endorsement to the old methods and out of date machine domination of public affairs; on the other commissions George R. Gaither and his associates to lead a movement for progress and reform in this State in sympathy with that which has so blessed sister commonwealths in other parts of the union. Under which banner will you enlist?

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The Park is fast settling down into the quiet, restful winter home.

Among the many late departures we note that of Mrs. S. C. Speers, of Speers, Pa., who reluctantly took her departure for her winter home yesterday.

Last Sunday morning Dr. W. W. Davis preached an able sermon to an interested audience in the M. E. church, and in the evening Presiding Elder Ward preached and administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. At these services fifty dollars was raised which completed the amount necessary to pay off the indebtedness on the church.

Major J. M. Burns and frmily leave tomorrow for their winter home in Morgantown, W. Va.

Gay W. Hayden is temporarily in his brother Grant's store in Westernport.

Our public school will start Monday with Mr. Weitzell as principal and Miss Rose Wilson as assistant.

Hotel Chautauqua was the scene of a merry gathering on last Saturday evening, when Mr. and Mrs. Creed Dunnington entertained for their daughter, Miss June. The guests of the hotel and a number of out-of-town friends were present, and a charming literary and musical program was enjoyed by all. Later an amusing "English Tea" was served in the dining hall, followed by delicious refreshments. This hotel has enjoyed a most successful season. No illness has dampened the spirits of the guests, and all will be sorry when the season closes upon the genial courtesy of the host and hostess of Hotel Chautauqua.

BITTINGER.

When you feel your temper "riling,"
"Keep 'er down" and force a smile—
Never frown and sulk, for smiling
Is by far the better style.

Miss Sarah Jane Custer was visting in this neighborhood last week.

Lawrence Bittinger, of Grantsville, and his sister, Mrs. Irene Dayes, of Meyersdale, Pa., were visiting relatives here last Saturday.

Miss Mary Wiley, who spent her three weeks' vacation with relatives here returned to Westernport last Sunday.

Mrs. Lewis Stanton and children, of Frostburg, were visiting Gus. Stanton and family last week.

Miss Jennie Stanton, of Grantsville, was visiting her brother T. Stanton near this village last week.

C. E. Ellithorp took a small child of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Barkholder to Oakland to be examined be Dr. Muncaster. The unfortunate child has almost entirely lost her sight and it is to be hoped that some treatment may be supplied to afford relief.

Messrs. Bittinger & Meyers are in this section with their threshing outfit and are doing good work. Oats is yielding about up to the-averrge, but wheat is not so good.

CAMPING IN MOUNTAINS OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Mr. Percy Procter Describes Outdoor Life In the Land of Sunshine.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., AUG 29, 1907.

To the Editor of The Republican:

In the mountains of Southern California there are no resort hotels as are common in the Allegheny, Catskill and White mountains, for example. Most of the people who go to the San Bernardino and Sierra Madre mountains near Los Angeles, Pasadena, Redlands and Riverside, spend the summer in what are known as camps. These are perched high up in the air, four, five or six thousand feet above sea level. Few, if any, can be reached in wheeled vehicles, it being necessary to ride on horseback a part of the way at least. The most popular camp near Redlands, for example, is forty miles by wagon road, but only twenty-two miles by wagon road and trail, fourteen by the former and eight by the latter. Usually there is a central dining hall, kitchen and dormitory for employees, scatter l around are log houses, with wooden floors, rugs, screened doors and windows, brass bedsteads and wooden furniture. Many have running water and bath rooms. For families who wish to keep house there are groups of living cottage, kitchen, workman's hut, barn, shed, etc., all made of logs and completely furnished. Milk, eggs, chickens and ice are kept on the premises, but groceries have to be laid in for weeks at a time, hauled from the nearest city, while fresh meat and vegetables are brought in from ranches in the valleys, at least once a week. Game and fish are easily obtainable by skillful sportsmen. These places are open by the middle of June and close by October first. The temperature is about the same as that of the Allegheny mountains, but the climate is much better, there being very few cloudy or rainy days. Last winter there was sixteen feet of snow on the level, for most of the season, where is located one of the most popular summer camps. It is this melting snow that helps to irrigate the orange groves of the valleys. Riding is the chief amusement. Women and girls all ride astride, wearing yellow coverings over their skirts, as a protection against dust, bushes and rocks. So many of the trails are narrow, steep and on the edge of precipices, that it would not be quite safe for a woman ta ride on a side-saddle, which would be apt to slip and throw the weight on one side at a time when the horse was balancing himself on the brink of a gorge. Walking, croquet, tennis and afternoon tea out-of-doors are popular with the ladies, who also can play "Bridge" morning, noon and night. Those who have kept house in camps say that it is easy. A family of four or five will take a maid and a Jap for a cook, procuring their supplies from the same source as does the proprietor of the camp, while there is daily messenger communication with the nearest city, not to mention telephone connection. In these camps—in the best of them—board and lodging will average about $10 a week per person. There are enough employees in a company for all.

In camps not so pretentious as the above, nor so elevated, most of the guests will live in what is known as "tent-cottages." A wooden frame work, shaped like a one story cottage, with roof sloping from center to eaves, is covered with plain white or striped canvas, openings being left for ordinary windows and doors; sometimes the roof is made of board, and where the sun is apt to beat down fiercely, a canvas is stretched about a foot or eighteen inches above the permanent roof, so as to permit circulation of air between and temper the heat. An ordinary wall tent separated from the living tent, which has a wooden floor and is otherwise comfortably finished answers for a kitchen, but in this class of camp the guests usually have their meals served together in a central dining room. Still more simple are the camps of two, three, four or five men. From all the coast towns and cities in Southern California small parties go for a week or two, to the mountains, taking their tents and supplies with them fifty miles. Camp is formed on the edge of a canon stream and the campers spend most of the time in fishing, shooting and following the many trails. During the summer in Southern California there are no thunder and lightning storms nor rainy days to interfere with recreation out of doors.

A typical Southern California summer resort is situated in the foot hill of the Santa Ynez mountains, about six miles from Santa Barbara, two miles in a direct line from the Pacific Ocean, and five hundred feet above sea level. The proprietors own nearly five hundred acres, but much of this is mountain side, held to protect water rights. The cultivated and occupied land is fan shaped, speading out towards the ocean on the South and narrowing into the canon on the north, through which runs rapidly from an elevation of thirty-five hundred feet a narrow stream of ice cold water, dashing over and between huge boulders, in one place falling sixty feet and in other places, five, ten, fifteen twenty feet, spreading out now and then into deep, dark pools, and finally emptying what is left of its water after land owners on the banks have impounded their shares for irrigation purposes, into the Pacific Ocean, adding the product of fresh mountain spring and melted snow to the salt sea. There is a forest growth of oaks, sycamores, alders and ceanothus in the canon, with ferns bordering the water, and follow the stream for nearly three miles up to its source, is a path for mountain climbers, while on the lower levels are wagon roads and trails leading to many beautiful spots and view points. The cottages twelve of them, are scattered about on different slopes so that one may not obstruct the view of another, and all face more or less South, which happens to be toward the ocean as well. They vary in size from one to five rooms are substantially built of wood, wood and stone or stone entirely. All have facilities for heating with wood stoves or open grates, have hot and cold running water, and, with one or two exceptions, contain bath rooms. Each is provided with a covered porch or verandah. The furniture is of the best, and includes many small articles that one seldom finds in hotels and not always in private houses. The dining hall is in a stone building, formerly used as a lemon warehouse, with room for fifty people. The roof of the old building has been ceiled with redwood, and window sashes with small glass panes have been set in the narrow casements. The ventilators required when fruit was stored in the house, remain, and along one side a verandah, covered with vines, extends, shutting off the rays of the western sun. The ground slopes away from the entrance side which permits of a basement underneath, used as a store room. The thick white walls, the dark trim, the small windows and the vines, have a cool and comfortable effect. An adjoining building has an extra large piazza, a combination music room and library and a pool-table room, for the joint use of all guests. The office is the one story adobe building that was part of the old ranch house.

Forty people are easily accommodated in this summer and winter resort, not counting children and maids. The proprietor gets the milk, cream, eggs and most of the chickens from off his own ranch. Fish and meats come from dealers in Santa Barbara, the former caught off shore and the latter home fed and killed. Grape fruit, oranges, lemons, loquets, berries and many vegetables also grow on the ranch. There is no well-defined season for vegetables; as fast as one crop is disposed of, another is planted in its place. Daily sunshine, warm weather and irrigation do the rest. Until this summer oil lamps were used all over the grounds and in the cottages for lighting. Refined oil for lamps comes from the East and the safest costs 32 cents a gallon in Santa Barbara. Because of dryness of everything in summer when there is no rain, there is much danger from fire. Lanterns hung on the trees were very pretty at night, but the owner of this resort found it better and cheaper to install one hundred and eighty electric light.

He and his wife both attend to the details of the resort, the former taking care of office work and labor on the ranch, while the latter has charge of kitchen, dining room and cottages. Two Chinamen and one Japanese are employed in the kitchen. There is a pantry girl and three waitresses, two chambermaids, three outside men and a young woman assistant in the office. All of these get their board and lodging in addition to wages. The monthly payroll is about $500, as labor commands high prices in Southern California. Fish, meats, fruits and vegetables are one-third less than in the East, but ham and bacon, which nearly all comes from Chicago, is more expensive.

So much for the outgo. Now, what are the receipts? The rates are $12 to $25 a week for each guest, children and maids being charged full rates. The proprietor claims that children and maids consume as much food and occupy as much room as regular guests and do not spend money for extras. There is a charge for meals furnished in cottage and for fire wood. As some of the guests do not care to go to the central dining hall for all meals and as most of them require fires occasionally, especially in winter, the income from these sources is considerable. The eight horses in the stable are kept going pretty constantly and a team, with driver, bring in $3 a half day, a runabout and one horse, $1.50, and a saddle horse, $1.

The winter guests are from the East, who have come to Southern California to escape cold weather and to enjoy sunshine and flowers, with plenty of out-of-door exercise. Winter in Southern California undoubtedly is a pleasant change from winter in Northern and Eastern states; there are no snow, sleet and ice, while there are flowers, fruits and sunshine, but, all the same, summer is more delightful than winter in Southern California or summer in the East. The season most tourists choose to spend here, January to May, may be more agreeable than the same season on the Atlantic coast, but it is the least agreeable on this part of the Pacific coast, as rainy days are the rule, rather than the exception. The normal annual rainfall at Baltimore is 45 inches, and half that amount came as rain in less than six months here during the season of 1906-7. From June to October, on or near the coast, the climate is ideal. The days, many of them, are very hot, from ten until four, but the early morning sun generally is slightly obscured by mist and before noon the breeze from the ocean sets in regularly. Sixty degrees is the most frequent reading of the thermometer at night and seventy-five in the hottest parts of the days, in doors. Dusty roads and trails are the disagreeable features, but all the most used roads are well oiled, and from them dust does not rise.

GRANTSVILLE.

Miss Ella Beachy, who spent the summer at Mt. Lake Park with her brother Dr. Beachy, we are glad to say, has returned home. We missed Miss Ella very much.

Dr. Briscoe and wife, of Pocahontas, Pa., were visiting relatives here for a few days. Rumor has it Dr. would like to locate here.

Dr. Bowen, from Frostburg, has just located here, and has his office in Mr. Henry Baker's residence

Dr. Robinson has been and is still kept very busy and no doubt will be glad for some help. He has several typhoid patients who are doing nicely.

Miss Frances M. Luley, of Warren, Ohio, who has been visiting Miss Nellie Broadwater for sometime, will return to her home this week. She is very much liked and we regret to see her go.

Mr. Charles Beachy, after spending a few days with his mother and sister, left for Seattle, Wash. Our best wishes go with Charlie.

Mrs. McCoy and two sons have left for a visit to her parents at Mannington, W. Va.

Quite a number from Salisbury are stopping in Grantsville. Among them we noticed Dr. Lichty and wife, Mrs. May, Miss Johnson and Mrs. Barcus.

Mr. Meshic Shultz, of Shipman, Ill., who has been calling on old time friends here and all were delighted to see him, has now returned to his home.

Mr. Lloyd Durst, of Oakland, was seen on our streets last week. Lloyd was visiting relatives here before returning to his work at Johnstown, Pa.

We are glad to have Mrs. Anna Belle Brown and little son still with us. Her mother Mrs. Charles will return later.

A town with nothing to do in a public way is on the road to the cemetery. Any citizen who will do nothing for his town is helping to dig the grave. A man that cusses the town furnishes the coffin. The man who is so selfish as to have no time from his business to give to city affairs is making the shroud. The man who will not advertise is driving the hearse. The man who is always pulling back from any public enterprise throws boquets on the grave. The man who is so stingy as to be howling hard times, preaches the funeral, sings the doxology, and thus the town lies buried from all sorrow and care.

The bicyclists have their rights as well as other people. It would be well for drivers on the public highways to remember that the bicyclists or a person riding a wheel is entitled to half the road, and should a person with a team meet wheelmen or drive past one on the road, they must turn out the same as if they met another team. Should a team run down a bicycle on the highway and injure the person or damage his his wheel, the person so doing would be held for damages. The courts have so ruled, and it is important that drivers should understand the law and know that wheel men have rights which all are bound to respect.

Parents do wrong in keeping their children hanging around home, sheltered and enervated by parental indulgence. The eagle does better. It stirs up its nest when the young eagles are able to fly. They are compelled to shift for themselves, for the old eagle literally turns them out, and at the same time tears all the down and feathers from the nest. 'Tis this rude and rough experience that makes the king of birds so fearless in his flight and so expert in the pursuit of prey. It is a misfortune to be born with silver spoon in your mouth, for you have it to carry and plague you all days. Riches often hang like a dead weight. Yea, like a millstone about the neck of ambitious young man.

COMMITTEE.

COMMUNICATED.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Many of the finest and most successfully managed farms in Grantsville, Accident, "Number Eight" and other districts in Garrett county, are owned and managed by members of the Dunkard and Amish churches.

More than sixty years ago many of them came to my father's saw mills at Glendale for white and yellow pine lumber to build their houses and immense barns. At first the boys were disposed to make fun of their queerly cut clothes with hooks and eyes in place of buttons. I have never forgotton the lecture my father (the late Benjamin Tasker) gave them all on this subject, viz: "Boys, I want you all to remember that whenever you see men clothed in that kind of garments you are looking at honest and truthful citizens and you must respect them as such."

Later on I kept store and postoffice for the late Richard Fairall at Accident and always gave them credit for goods when they asked for it, and they never failed to pay up to the cent as promised. In 1873 I established the Garrett County Herald as an independent newspaper and most ot them subscribed and I am proud to say that they all paid their subscriptions like honest men, which, I regret to say, is more than can be said of members of other churches.

They taught our southern people how to build bank barns 100 feet long. They never go to law with each other, and whenever they fail to agree they submit their cases to arbitration.

As a class they are large taxpayers, and one object of this letter is to remind them that they are paying at least 25 per cent. more taxes than they ought to pay, and point out the way for them to have their taxes reduced. In January, 1888, it was discovered that over two million dollars worth of coal lands were omitted in Garrett and six million dollars worth in Allegany county were omitted from the assessment books. The commissioners of both counties employed me as their "Special Agent" to abstract the titles to all these untaxed lands, locate them on the plats and report them to the Boards. I was also requested to aid in securing the passage of suitable laws to end the boundary disputes with West Virginia and Allegany county. I have have faithfully discharged my duties in these matters, but the foreign corporations and trusts that own these omitted Coal lands have wedded such a power in politics as to keep these lines in dispute as a pretext for keeping their lands off the assessment books. With Allegany solidly arranged against Garrett there is no hope of a settlement. I have stuck to my job for twenty years and know what I am writing about. The only hope of the taxpayers is to elect such men to the Legislature this winter as will authorize the Governor to appoint a State Agent clothed with power to compel, if necessary, a fair assessment of these omitted lands. I had such a law introduced in the Senate last winter but after it had been "favorably reported" by the Senate Committee on Finance, it was stollen from the files, presumably by some of the hired emissaries of these tax dodging coal corporations and trusts.

Fortunately I have preserved 2,000 copies the "Tri-State Herald" containing the most complete history ever published of these outrages, and I hereby invite all farmers and taxpayers generally to call at the Hotel Manhattan, Oakland, Md., and get as many copies of these papers as will supply all their neighbors, regardless of creeds or party politics. We are all in the soup together and must unite in our efforts to get out.

H. P. TASKER.

SWANTON.

Quite a number of people from this community attended the quarterly meeting at Wilson's last Sunday. Dr. R. B. Ward preached an excellent sermon. The service was well attended.

We are sorry to note that Mr. Lewis Littman is on the sick list.

The Improved Order of Red Men has organized a Tribe here with the following officers: Prophet, A. F. George; Sachem, John W. McRobie; Senior Sagamore, W. W. Sweet; Junior Sagamore, J. C. Condron; Chief of Records, W. B. Sweet; Keeper of Wampum, Geo G. Lee; Guard of Wigwam, Tho's A. McRobie; Guard of Forest, Jos. Swietzer.

The present indications are that this will be a strong Tribe of this excellent order.

Mrs. Truman Mosser who has been on the sick list, is able to be out again.

The M. E. Sunday School is steadily growing. The members are now getting ready for "Rally Day" services.

The telephone in the B. & O. station at this place is proving a great convenience to our people. Mr. Phillipi, the courteous agent, is prompt and obliging in answering the calls.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's simply better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

C. AUSTIN JOHNSON.

[Copyright, 1907, by C. Austin Johnson.]

So you would like to hear how I, a poor sailor, chanced to marry a pretty wife, possessed of thousands and without exception mistress of the finest estate in Santos? Well, come out on the piazza. We have a fine view of the bay there, and I love to listen to the roar of the surf. It reminds me of old times, you know. Light a fresh cigar. You have nothing like them in the states, I can assure you of that. And now for my yarn.

Many years ago I was chief mate on board of a down east brig engaged in the South American trade. The captain was good enough at heart, but he did love a gold dollar so much that the passion of avarice at times warped the better and prevailing instincts of his nature.

I was young, careless and free, without a soul living I could claim as kin, and as happy in my lone state as you can well imagine. I had but little responsibility on my shoulders, the skipper taking entire control, even to details.

We were to the southward of the line, outward bound, and upon the eventful night in question, which was truly an era in my life, I had the first watch. The wind was light and the ocean as calm as though asleep.

We had all our light kites set to woo the gentle breeze, running through the water not over three knots an hour. Absorbed in my own thoughts and reflections, I was leaning idly over the taffrail watching the bubbles and phosphorescent light playing about the restless rudder when a touch on my arm from the man at the wheel brought me to myself.

"What do you call that, sir?" he inquired, pointing over the quarter.

I gazed in the direction pointed out by the man and, to my intense surprise, saw a bright light, not unlike a ball of fire, which threw a lurid, tremulous light across the dark waters.

"It can't be the moon, sir?" said the seaman, with an inquiring look.

"The moon rising in a quarter bearing south-southwest? No; that is some craft on fire as sure as my name is John Watkins, and I'll rouse out the captain at once."

In another instant I was rapping in no gentle manner at the skipper's stateroom, who turned out in a hurry.

"What—what is the matter?" he stammered, rubbing his eyes. "Is there a squall coming?"

"No, sir; it's as pretty a night as I ever saw. But, Captain Thompson, there is a vessel on fire to leeward of us, and I will, if you say so, run down to her assistance."

"I'll be on deck in a moment. Don't be in a hurry. Don't like to run the vessel off her course—prolongs her voyage." And, leaving the sleepy skipper grumbling to himself, I regained the deck.

In a few moments the old fellow was by my side.

"It will cost money to take all hands off yon craft and feed them till we make a port."

"True, sir; but is human life to be reckoned or valued by money? In all probability there are poor fellows there in danger of their lives who, if we leave them to their fate, would place us on a footing with pirates." And, turning abruptly, I walked aft, having expressed my indignation in a voice tremulous with anger.

"WHAT DO YOU CALL THAT, SIR?" HE INQUIRED.

"Bless my soul, Mr. Watkins, I would not leave any one to perish. I was only calculating the chances in a commercial point of view. You can hoist the longboat out if you like and take four of the boys for a crew to pull you to her. She will burn down to the water's edge if you wait for us to get there. It is growing calmer all the time, and to tell the truth, Mr. Watkins, I would advise you to bear a hand and get back as soon as possible, for I don't like the looks of the weather. The air is hot and oppressive-like."

In ten minutes I had the longboat over the side, and a stout, weatherly craft she was too. A bag of biscuits, with a beaker of water, was stowed away in the stern sheets, and, bidding the lads to give way with a will, we shoved off from the sides of the old brig. I saw the tall, bent form of Captain Thompson peering down upon me for a moment, but the next instant the boat rose on the bosom of a swell, and that was the last I ever saw of my old skipper.

The brig quickly faded from sight, hid by a thin mist of haze which had suddenly arisen, and, in fact, I was conscious of a strange change in the appearance of the weather. The stars had entirely disappeared from the firmament, hid behind the gauzy veil which had so mysteriously arisen, and low down on the horizon I noted a dark bank of clouds. The heat was intense, the stout seamen wiping the perspiration from their streaming brows as they toiled at their oars. Not a breath of air disturbed the glassy waves. All nature appeared to be hushed into a terrible calm.

I must confess I felt rather apprehensive as I glanced about the horizon and looked back in the direction where I knew the old brig must be, rolling and pitching idly on the long swell, which every moment was increasing. But my fears and apprehensions were soon chased from my head by matters of more exciting interest.

As we neared the burning craft I read the name of La Hembrilla in letters of gold on the huge stern. The light cast by the burning spars and rigging aloft afforded ample power for me to form my conclusions.

The ship was a Spaniard. The empty davits and dangling falls told their own story plain enough to a seaman's eye.

The burning wreck had been deserted.

Shooting under the broad, heavy counter, we caught at the iron work of the mizzen channels, and, directing two men to remain in the boat, I clambered on deck, followed by the other two seamen.

The ship had evidently been on fire some time, the flames having full control of the forward portion. The foremast had gone by the board. The topgallant forecastle was a sea of fire. The mainmast was already tottering, and I knew there was no time to lose. The smoke was dense and stifling, but as yet did not affect the extreme after portion of the vessel. The decks were strewn with remnants of provisions, half open cases and articles of clothing, but no trace of a human being could be seen.

Diving down into the main cabin, which was half filled with black twisting smoke, I took a hasty glance about. The rich hangings, appointments and ornamentation surprised me, showing that the unfortunate ship had been designed to carry passengers. The sharp, shooting gleams of writhing flames from aloft penetrated through the broad skylight, tinging every object with a ruddy glaze.

From stateroom to stateroom I hurried, but found them all empty until I came to the after one. There I experienced some difficulty in opening the door, the smoke every moment becoming more dense and respiration more difficult. Exerting my strength, the woodwork gave way, revealing a confused mass of white drapery lying on the stateroom floor. The very sight made my heart beat quick with apprehension, and, stooping, I soon ascertained that it was a woman.

Placing my hand over her heart, I felt it throb, and without further delay I rushed on deck with her in my arms. Through the companionway I staggered, with a strange dizziness in my head, gasping for breath, but still retaining my grasp on her I had saved. The fresh air revived me, and the pain left my head, so that I was enabled to pay proper attention to the woman who lay helpless in my arms.

Then, for the first time, I looked at the face of my burden, and by the bright light of the wreck I discovered she was both young and handsome. At that moment the mainmast went crashing over the side, sinking with a hiss in the black water. A shower of cinders and sparks, a column of roaring flames, shot on high, followed by the excited shouts of the men, who had leaped, panic stricken, into the boat, urging me to follow.

Clasping the lady with my left arm, I used my right in gliding down the ship's side. The men's oars were poised. I gave the word, and the next instant we were clear of the vessel, which was now wrapped in flames from stem to stern.

Dashing some water into the lady's face, I began to chafe her hands. The treatment, though rough, had the desired effect. She opened her eyes, closed them again as if the awakening was painful, but in a few moments was fully herself. In a few words I told her how she had been saved and assured her that in a short time she would be in safety on board the brig.

In return she told me that her father was the Senor Jose Gonzales of Santos, the wealthiest planter in the country. She had been on a visit to Spain, where her father had a large number of relations, and had taken passage for home in the Spanish ship.

The ill fated vessel, by some means to her unknown, had caught fire during the night. A panic ensued, and, overcome by terror, she fainted away. Probably, in the excitement and alarm which followed, her absence was overlooked, and when the boats shoved off from the ship the Senorita Marie Gonzales was left unconscious in her stateroom to perish.

Glancing round the horizon, I could see no sign of the brig. Not the flash of a light betrayed the position of the vessel. But I had a compass with me and noted the course I had steered while pulling for the burning wreck.

It was not the fact of the brig being invisible that caused me uneasiness, but the startling knowledge that a great convulsion of the elements was about to burst upon us.

The dark bank I had at first noticed low down on the horizon had risen rapidly until the entire heavens were obscured. The atmosphere had grown dense, and the darkness was simply intense, relieved only by the now dismantled hulk, which occasionally threw out a gleam of light.

A strange, indefinable, rushing sound pervaded the air, a slight ripple ruffled the stagnant waters, a cold breath of air fanned my cheek, while under the black, frowning clouds I saw a white line rapidly rushing upon us.

Louder and louder grew the sounds. The men gazed at one another aghast. With a wave of my hand I motioned the seamen to pull the boat round so as to bear before it, and the next instant the hurricane burst upon us in all its fury.

The shriek of the tempest drowned my voice. The oars were dashed from the sailors' hands, while they in terror threw themselves down in the bottom of the boat.

In an agony of terror Marie clung to me, while I with all my strength and skill managed to keep the boat head before the gale.

On rushed the frail structure through the murky darkness, enveloped in a whirl of foam which half blinded me as the salt spray filled my eyes. The water was torn up by barrelfuls and hurled with cutting force and violence through the air.

Drenched to the skin, with the delicate girl crouching by my side wrapped up in all the spare coats I could find, I kept watch during the long hours of that eventful night.

How we ever escaped destruction a merciful Providence alone can tell, but with daylight the fierce gale showed signs of abating, and by noon we were flying upon a summer sea. A rough temporary sail had been rigged and the boat's head directed toward the land, for, of course, we had given up all hope of seeing the brig, for awhile at least. If we would be saved we must get to rely upon our own resources. Carefully I dealt out a slim allowance of bread and water from the scanty supplies which were in the stern sheets, cautioning the men to make the precious fluid go as far as possible.

I could enlarge upon the sufferings we endured, tell you about the calm which succeeded, how the scorching rays of the sun beat down upon our heads and how the men with noble generosity surrendered their few drops of water to the pale, suffering woman, who never murmured once, though her throat was all but on fire and her tongue parched and swollen in her mouth.

You can imagine my feelings when the last crumb of bread was exhausted and the beaker had been drained dry. Death in its most terrible form, with the attending horrors of hunger and thirst, stared us in the face, and I groaned in anguish as I gazed upon the now inanimate form of the poor girl. She was dying—perhaps dead already—and I stretched myself by her side to meet the fate I was powerless to avert.

Well, we were picked up shortly after by a Brazilian fishing boat, placed aboard a man-of-war cruising on the coast, and the surgeon soon had us under his care. Strange to say, none of us succumbed to the privations we had undergone, but we all recovered to congratulate one another upon our escape. The Senor Jose Gonzales fairly hugged me in his delight at the escape of his daughter and insisted upon my making his residence my home. The men were rewarded by him beyond their most sanguine hopes, and I—well, I rewarded myself by marrying the fair heiress, and when her father died a few years ago I assumed full control of the estates.

As for the old brig and Captain Thompson, neither was ever seen or heard from after the terrible storm which swept the coast of South America, strewing its shores with the wreck of many a noble craft.

THE BLUE SHOES.

An Incident at a Flag Presentation in the Time of the War.

The heroine of this true tale of war days was a little red-haired, chubby girl of seven years, and we will call her Eva, because that was the name of her best friend, and both of the girls are yet alive.

Eva was born in a clearing of the Wisconsin woods and she had never seen any sky that was not held up, all round, by the great arms of tall trees. Even the village, where there was a courthouse, three stores and a mill, had a rib of trees around it.

War had come, and the men of the settlement and the village were mustering to march away. The county had furnished a whole company, and the women had made a flag for the departing soldiers.

Eva had been chosen, being the daughter of the major of the regiment, to present the colors to the company on the day of its march forth from the village. The speech, written by the combined aid of the major's wife, two school teachers and a minister, was safely stored in the small brain of the heroine of the day. She could say that speech forward or backward, or begin in the middle and go both ways. She was "letter perfect."

But something happened on the momentous morning of the going away of the troops and the giving of the flag, writes Ada C. Sweet in Chicago Journal. Eva's aunt brought, from the nearest city, a pair of blue shoes for the garnishment of the small maiden. Already a white dress, and a red, white and blue sash had aroused the vanity and pride of the little girl, and when the blue shoes came her head was turned entirely. No one in the clearing or the town had ever heard of blue shoes up to this time.

It was hard to submit to the hair curling and the general primping up that was necessary for an appearance in public, but with fortitude the child stood the supreme test of being "dressed up," and came out with flying colors.

It was a stormy day in early May in the first year of the war, and the parting exercises were held in the great hall of the courthouse. Here the rustic company was drown up, undrilled, almost, and as yet ununiformed. But a martial fire glowed in every eye, and every man looked at last a foot taller than he actually measured.

There was singing and praying and there were speeches by dignitaries, and at last came the presentation of colors.

The silken banner, surely the most beautiful thing that had ever been seen by this small girl—was unfurled, and its staff was placed in her hand as she stood on a table to be seen by all in the hall.

Of all the things there present, though, the small girl had in mind only the lovely blue shoes. It was certain that the position on the table showed them off to the best advantage, and she wondered what her envious schoolmates were thinking as they looked upon her in all her glory.

The major, in the first uniform ever seen in the county—it had come with him from Madison the day before—stood behind his daughter with the written speech in his hand ready to prompt in case the child's memory should fail. None of the women could see, for tears, that day.

The speech was to the effect that the wives and mothers of the soldiers had made the flag, and that every stitch stood for a prayer for the safety of the brave boys who were to carry that banner through the storms of war.

It was impressed upon the men that they were expected to bring home the flag with every star, and every stripe unsullied by dishonor and made glorious by victory. It must be brought back without fail, and in honor, this glorious flag of the nation.

The major murmured the opening line in the ear of his daughter. But she was silent, for the first time probably in her life when there was a chance for her to speak. Rigidly she stood, and from her face all expression had fled. Her mind was as blank as her face, and the major, in pity, was about to ask his accomplished and gentle wife to present the flag, when, with a supreme effort, the little maid spoke.

"Soldiers," she said, in a high, strained voice, "Soldiers, here is your flag. We have made it for you, and we have prayed and cried while we were making it. Take it and be careful of it. Don't tear it, don't get it soiled, and be sure and bring it back!"

Then the small speechmaker covered her face, jumped down from the table and fled out of the hall.

The audience went wild. Salvoes of cheers greeted the flag, but Eva knew that all her school friends, and all of her cousins were laughing over her failure. She was inconsolable, and she refused to be comforted. From her feet she tore the blue shoes, realizing that they had been the cause of her undoing. Nothing could persuade her to wear them again.

Only when the time came for goodbys and the marching away of the company, its flag gloriously to the fore, the tears of the girl were dried. Then, awe at the grief and the stern repression of tears which she saw all around her entered her self-absorbed brain, and for the first time the small woman wept for others and felt the woes of humanity pressing upon her hitherto untouched heart.

She walked along the road in her white stockings and forgot everything but the marching men, with the fife and drum playing "The Girl I Left Behind Me"—they, and the women and children who walked beside them to the bridge over the river.

Then the stay-at-homes stood still. And the hundred men marched away.

STILL A MYSTERY.

Unexplained Conduct of Hooker and Howard at Chancellorsville.

There has been much speculation as to whether those who accused Gen. Hooker of having been intoxicated during the battle of Chancellorsville, were right or wrong. The weight of the testimony of competent witnesses is strongly against the theory. It is asserted, on the other hand, that he was accustomed to the consumption of a certain quantity of whisky every day, that during the battle of Chancellorsville he utterly abstained from his usual potions for fear of taking too much inadvertently, and that his brain failed to work because he had not given it the stimulus to which it had been habituated. Whichever theory be the correct one, certain it is, that to all appearances Gen. Hooker's mind seemed, during those days, in a remarkably torpid condition. On no such theories can we explain Gen. Howard's failure to foresee the coming of Jackson's attack upon our right flank—for he was a man of the soberest habits. How he, in spite of the reports constantly coming in, in spite of what, without exaggeration, may be called the evidence of his senses, could finally conclude on the second of May that Jackson, instead of intending to attack, was in full retreat, I have never been able to understand, writes Carl Schurz in McClure's Magazine, except upon the theory that his mind simply failed to draw simple conclusions from obvious facts.

SCHURZ STORY OF LINCOLN.

His Keen Wit Proved Too Much for the Ambitious Count.

One of the many foreigners who sought my intercession was a young German count, whose identity was vouched for by a member of the Prussian legation, writes Carl Schurz, in McClure's Magazine. He had a long row of ancestors, whom he traced back for several hundred years. He was greatly impressed with the importance of this fact, and thought it would weigh heavily in securing him a position in our army. If he could only have an "audience" with the president and lay his case before him, he believed, the result could not be doubtful. He pursued me so arduously with the request for a personal introduction to Mr. Lincoln that at last I succumbed and promised to introduce him if the president permitted. The president did permit. The count spoke English moderately well, and in his ingenuous way he at once explained to Mr. Lincoln how high the nobility of his family was, and that they had been counts so-and-so many centuries. "Well," said Mr. Lincoln, interrupting him, "that need not trouble you. That will not be in your way, if you behave yourself as a soldier." The poor count looked puzzled, and when the audience was over he asked me what in the world the president could have meant by so strange a remark.

Relics of Franklin.

In the rear of the Philadelphia library is a beautifully planted plot of ground, which is overlooked by a porch at the rear of the building, to which access is through the French windows of the library building. In the wall by the side of this porch is the inscribed cornerstone, which bears tribute to the young artisans who founded the library at the suggestion of Benjamin Franklin. Nearby is the broken stone that once formed the inscribed part of the pedestal of Franklin's statue. Few visitors to the library appear to be aware of the existence of this spot or of its interesting features.

Don't Soak Egg Beater.

A dover egg beater never should be left in the water to soak, as the oil will be washed out of the gears and make it hard to turn.

THE TEMPERANCE PLEDGE.

A Reviving Interest in This Phase of Reform Work.

It is very gratifying to see a revi of interest in the temperance pledge. An instrument that has brought so great good should never be abandoned. While no thought should be entertained of relaxing our efforts for prohibitory legislation, it is greatly to be desired that all should realize the importance of getting men, women and children to sign the pledge. The larger the army of abstainers, the less demand there will be for intoxicating drinks. Cut off customers from the saloons and the liquor business will decline. Stop the flow of money to the dramshops, and there will be a great and increasing demand for groceries, provisions, clothing, furniture, houses and lots. Benjamin Franklin said: "Temperance puts wood on the fire, meal in the barrel, flour in the tub, money in the purse, clothes on the children, vigor in the body, intelligence in the brain and contentment in the house."

The temperance pledge is a helper to the poor, bringing food and raiment to their door, says Rev. Francis J. Collier, D. D., in a pamphlet issued by the Presbyterian committee on temperance; it is a shield to the innocent, giving protection against the assaults of the tempter; it is a staff to the drunkard, aiding him to walk in the path of sobriety; it is also a personal testimonial, commending the signer to those who desire the services of one who is worthy of confidence and respect.

The pledge was first used in this country in 1789, at Litchfield, Conn. In its first form, however, it proved to be of little value in the promotion of temperance, since it allowed the use of malt and fermented liquors. In 1833, the pledge of total abstinence from every intoxicating beverage was introduced from England. Thousands of persons, old and young, who heard the earnest and eloquent pleadings of Father Mathew and John B. Gough, signed their names to the pledge of total abstinence from the use of all intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and kept it faithfully.

Objections to the use of the pled are sometimes made, even by so good people, who favor the cause temperance. One says: "It is n right to take a pledge of any sort. This cannot be true. In ancient days the Nazarites pledged themsel among other things, not to wine. Samson, Samuel and John the Baptist were Nazarites. Jacob vowed to give one-tenth of his income to the Lord. Paul took a vow when he went the last time to Jerusalem. We believe it is right to take marriage vows and church vows. Ministers, elders and deacons assume vows when they are ordained. So do civil magistrates when they are inaugurated, and the officers of various societies when they are installed. All business contracts and all promissory notes are pledges. The life of the Christian Endeavor society is in its pledge.

Children should be encouraged to sign the temperance pledge. They are in danger of entering the paths of the destroyer. Boys are sometimes found in a state of intoxication. A saloonkeeper was caught in the act of giving beer to children returning from school.

Let all bear in mind that the pledge is a declaration of independence; a shield for protection; a refuge for safety; a lifeboat to rescue the perishing. The signer has made up his mind that he will not be a drunkard; that he will not take the risk of being a moderate drinker, knowing the rapid growth of appetite; that he will not bring disease upon his body and mind by the use of alcoholic liquors; and that he will not set a bad example to others by drinking. When asked to drink, he can say: "You must excuse me; for I have signed the pledge, and I intend to keep it. The pledge fortifies the weak in the hour of temptation. It has kept thousands of young persons from becoming drunkards, and it has helped many intemperate men and women to reform. The method used by Father Mathew, John B. Gough, Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler and others with good results should not be neglected or despised.

Laboring Man's Greatest Curse.

Cardinal Gibbons has said: "The great curse of the laboring man is intemperance. It has brought more desolation to the wage earner than strikes, or war, or sickness, or death. It is a more unrelenting tyrant than the grasping monopolist. It has caused little children to be hungry and cold, to grow up among evil associates, to be reared without the knowledge of God. It has broken up more homes and wrecked more lives than any other cause on the face of the earth."

New Law In Nebraska.

The legislature of Nebraska has passed a law to prevent brewers from owning saloons, by a vote of 67 to 2. The brewers are said to own 75 per cent. of the saloons in Omaha.

Consumption of Tobacco.

The consumption of tobacco in the United Kingdom has increased 30 per cent. in the past 15 years. Its use almost universal among males above the age of 16 years.

Business Will Have to Slow Up.

By ISIDOR STRAUS, New York Merchant.

THERE CAN BE NO DOUBT THAT WE HAVE REACHED A PERIOD OF NECESSARY CONTRACTION IN MANY LINES, IN SO FAR AS TO PUT A CHECK TO THE CONSTANT GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT OF ENTERPRISES, SUCH AS HAS BEEN GOING ON WITH GEOMETRICAL PROGRESSION FOR A NUMBER OF YEARS.

We have also reached a period of higher interest rate. The cost of living, which has been STEADILY INCREASING of recent years, has borne severest on those who were living on fixed incomes from bonds and real estate mortgages. But it is a long road that has no turn, and this country is too young and our resources as yet so far from full development that we should have reached an interest basis of 3½ to 3¾ per cent, which, up to the setback of about a year ago, had almost come to be looked upon as a fixed fact.

SO LONG AS OUR CROPS ARE FAIRLY REMUNERATIVE WE CANNOT HAVE ANY SERIOUS DISASTER, BUT THE CURTAILMENT OF IMPROVEMENTS AND THE CESSATION OF NEW ENTERPRISES MUST NECESSARILY PRODUCE A CONTRACTION IN MOST LINES OF BUSINESS.

Until, however, a READJUSTMENT OF WAGES, which have been steadily going up for more than ten years past, has been had, the real foundation for business finding its proper level cannot be reached. How long a time it will take to adjust matters to their new bearings so that liquidation may have come to an end and business again resume its NORMAL GROWTH commensurate with the yearly increase in population it is difficult to say.

How to Treat Criminals.

By ALBERT T. PATRICK, Now Serving a Life Sentence In Sing Sing Prison, New York, For Murder.

IT is nothing less than BARBAROUS to inflict the death penalty upon any human being. Any man or woman who takes human life and thereby commits the crime of murder IS NOT OF SOUND MIND and therefore should not be put to death, either in the electric chair or by any other method that may be in use in any of the states of the Union.

But we should go much further than that and practically abolish all the various forms of confinement in state prisons as now prescribed in the penal code.

INSTEAD OF FIXING A POSITIVE TERM OF SENTENCE, AS FAR AS IMPRISONMENT IS CONCERNED, THE REFORMATION OF PRISONERS CAN ONLY BE ACCOMPLISHED WHEN THE SENTENCE IMPOSED BY THE COURT PRESIDING AT THE TRIAL OF A DEFENDANT IS ONE OF LIFE IMPRISONMENT, AND THEREAFTER IT SHOULD BE LEFT TO THE HONEST DISCRETION OF A MAN LIKE STATE SUPERINTENDENT OF PRISONS COLLINS OR ANY OTHER CRIMINOLOGIST OR PRISON REFORMER AS TO HOW MUCH OF THAT SENTENCE SHOULD ACTUALLY BE SERVED.

The courts should have it at their discretion to impose a fine instead of a life sentence. OF COURSE THIS PUNISHMENT ONLY REFERS TO FIRST OFFENDERS. The first offenders should be treated under the good conduct system, and it should be determined by competent judges as to when a prisoner should be given his freedom. Men who commit the crime of murder are thus to be dealt with just as are the thieves and highwaymen and firebugs and other offenders, provided that it is the first time that they have been haled to the bar of justice.

A PLEA OF INSANITY SHOULD BE ENTIRELY IGNORED. Such pleas oftentimes lead to gross miscarriage of justice. Every offender, no matter whether he is of apparently sound mind or not, should first be sent to a state prison, and there the proper authorities, through observation, should be able to determine whether such a prisoner should be detained in the state prison or whether he should be transferred to an asylum for the criminal insane.

As far as second offenders are concerned, the best reform that could be brought about would be by sentencing them to the MAXIMUM TERM at once. For instance, where the maximum penalty that could be imposed by a judge upon an offender is ten years, no less a sentence should be inflicted, and SUCH OFFENDER SHOULD BE MADE TO SERVE THE FULL TERM.

Supreme Court the Place to Settle State Rights Dispute.

By Attorney General BONAPARTE.

THE department of justice was given by the laws creating it supervision and control of the several United States marshals, and this involves the duty of seeing that the process of the federal courts is duly executed.

When question arises whether an act of a state legislature conforms to the constitution, or, in other words, WHETHER IT IS A LAW AT ALL OR A MERE NULLITY, and judges, all of them equally bound in duty and by oath to uphold the supremacy of the constitution, differ as to the answer to this question, IT IS EVIDENT THAT THE QUESTION SHOULD BE SUBMITTED FOR DECISION AS EXPEDITIOUSLY AS MAY BE POSSIBLE TO THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, THE COMMON SUPERIOR OF ALL OUR COURTS IN DEALING WITH SUCH QUESTIONS, and, pending this decision, the rights of all parties affected should be so safeguarded that, so far as circumstances may render it practicable, they may be placed, after the final decision, where they would have stood had every one known in advance what the decision would be.

The propriety of an arrangement to this effect is so obvious that I feel confident one will be made appropriate to the circumstances of the North Carolina case, since IT WOULD BE ALTOGETHER INADMISSIBLE TO QUESTION THE GOOD FAITH AND PATRIOTISM OF ANY AMONG THE PUBLIC OFFICERS CONCERNED.

they climb thee fense where the willers is tall.
"Aw, cum along," sed thee Kids, "and play Ball!"
I 'spose i haf 2 spend sum time fer joy—
nuthing but Work makes a offul DUL BOY!

Old Nibs.

When I was a boy we played a game called "Old Nibs." It was fearfully and wonderfully made, and was played in and about a roomy old barn in the neighborhood.

"Old Nibs," supposed to be a demon of infernal conception, reigned in the stable. He was transformed from one of the innocent bevy of boys by a chance selection and immediately retired to the barn to become a monster of hideous mien.

Then we made sallies at the barn, and brave was he who could clamber in at a rear window and pass out at another, trespassing upon the domain of the demon as he snorted in his lair.

On one occasion I slipped through the hay-mow door from an apple tree hard by, and scrambled aloft on the redolent hay. The adolescent accomplices on the ground were supposed to keep "Old Nibs" busy while I watched my chance to lock him out of his own home; but they didn't! He came crashing up the stairs after me, smoke issuing from his nostrils, a weird and mighty bellow emanating from his throat.

I stood for a moment almost paralyzed with fear. Then my eye caught the hay chute orifice, and with one fell swoop, I dove for it, head first! It was a leap for life on the spur of the moment, and while the execution was good the results were poor.

Like the ordinary hay chute, it was big at the top, tapering to a small hole at the bottom. The result may be guessed—I stuck head foremost in the chute! I not only stuck in the chute, but I stuck so tightly that even "Old Nibs" had to turn in with his persecutors and help extricate me.

Then they made me "Old Nibs." That was the game.

There are no games nowadays like "Old Nibs." At least I haven't noticed any such—and I'm not pessimistical about boys and their games, either.

Willie Spriggs.

Wings—"That boy, Willie Spriggs, that used to live in the Atkins house, is in the papers agin!"

Bings—"Worst boy I ever see. Twenty years ago he used to steal the corn from my shoats and peddle it out at half price around town!"

Wings—"Yes."

Bings—"He smoked cigarettes, played the races when a mere stripling, tied cans to dogs' tails, wore a red necktie, and always said 'Huh?' when asked anything.

Wings—"Well, the paper's full about him this morning."

Bings—"Come to some bad end, of course. I allus knew he would! What's he done now?"

Wings—"Scandalous! He's just been elected president of a coal company and now he's got another corner on coal."

Brain Leaks.

A Georgia editor is in favor of large hats for women. He has slept in the shade of one many a time at church, he says, without being detected by the pastor.

There is a man in Nebraska of the name of Slippen Fall. He must belong to the banana-peel family.

The Aval islands, between India and Africa, are said to have the hottest temperature of any place on earth. The thermometer frequently registers as high as 140 in the shade. I mention this merely to make you contented with your own country.

An Indiana town has 90 widows. An epidemic of literature, I suppose.

It is hard to make a wife believe, with Pope, that "Whatever is, is right," when he comes home at three in the morning carrying a "load of peaches."

At a play called "The Fall of Santiago," recently given in an Iowa town, the shells fell among the audience. Some of the boys in the gallery were eating peanuts. Fancy!

HICK'S WEATHER FORECAST FOR SEPTEMBER.

We publish below from Word and Works the Hick's weather forecast for this month:

"A regular storm period covers the first week in September, being central on the 4th. A very threatening barometer, with high temperature will appear in western extremes by the 3d and 4th and storms of much energy will sweep progressively over the country from the 4th to 7th. The culmination will come on and touching 7th.

"A reactionary storm period comes close after the crisis of the first period, it is central on 9th, 10th, and 11. Heavy storms of rain, hail, wind and thunder will move out of the northwest, also, and be followed by great change to cooler, with probable frosts.

"A regular storm period the 14th to 19th is one of great and almost certain severity. It is at the crisis of the autumnal equinox. This period, and this whole central part of the month, is full of perturbing causes and phenominal possibilities. Hurricanes and cyclonic storms should be anticipated about the southern coasts, with sympathetic, equinoctial, tornadic storms over the interior. The chances are that general storms and atmospheric unrest will continue until after.

"A reactionary storm period, which is central on the 20th, 21st and 22d. At the wind up of this prolonged time of general and violent disturbance, look for a phenomonally high barometer, fierce northwesterly gales, and a dash of almost early winter out of the northwest. The boreal change will lie approximately between the 21st and 25th.

"A regular storm period covers the closing week of September. It is central on the 27th and its culminating days fall on Friday, 27th to Sunday 29th. This period will bring a change to warmer, falling barometer and return of marked storm conditions. The chances are that September will be disturbed, if not phenomenally stormy and out of joint, to the last. Such may not be the case—we do not affirm positively that it will. But we do say that the astronomic outlook for this month strongly points out such results. We do not mean that great calamities are in inevitable, or that the foundations of nature will be out of order but unless there is a compensating resultant of warring forces that we can not now see, the meteorological record for September, taking the whole world over, will approach the phenomenal.

"We have often called attention to the fact that premature spells of cold weather are almost certain to come when a Venus disturbance falls in an autumn month. The storm diagrams for three months show that at Venus equinox is central on the 18th, extending from the closing day of August almost to the middle of October. It is greatly to be desired that a warm, late fall should compensate for the late, cold spring, and such is sometimes the case: but there is reason to fear that a spell of unreasonably cold days and nights will come during the Venus period named. It is safe to say that some of the warmest days of the season will come in September, culminating in severe tropical storms; but it will be wise to anticipate sudden and far-reaching changes to much colder weather and frost over wide areas to the northward. Such changes may not culminate fully before the closing stages of the Venus period, during the first two weeks of October, but the chances are that one or more of the Sepember storm periods will end in sudden high barometer from the northwest, bringing boreal gales, cold nights and severe frosts in all northern parts of the country.

American People Becoming Inoculated With Germ of Honesty

By DR. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS.

The geologist tells us that the White mountains were the first peaks to emerge from the sea; then, little by little, the whole continent appeared, rising above the hot waters of either ocean. That was a great moment when Mount Washington first cleared itself of water, steam and mud and stood forth, crowned with sunlight, the forerunner of a new continent.

But more wonderful still the sudden entrance of conscience and ethics into the industrial and corporative life of the republic. For years, doubtless, the preparatory processes have been going on, but the ethical movement has published itself only in the last few weeks and months. To-day the railroads are posting their rates and withdrawing secret rebates. Alarmed, politicians no longer hawk franchises in the lobbies of the city hall.

More striking still the ethical note in the realm of public morals. Man wants money—but when a man is hungry he must not eat coals of fire. And when a man is avaricious he must not seek satisfaction by getting money through crime and fraud. The whole nation is rising up to shake off its former lies, vices and sins. In politics if a youth wants position and preferment he must plead the cause of the poor. In literature and fiction if the novelist wants to succeed he must portray the triumph of honor and the defeat of sham and humbug. If a magazine wants to increase its circulation it takes up some cause and becomes a voice for the public conscience. On every side are young men of ability and large mental acquirements who have tried to get on by adopting the low ethical ideals of the politicians of the old school, with the result that these ambitious young men are now utterly discredited and without any hope of future preferment.

Honesty is becoming a contagion. It is an auspicious hour for our people. It is the golden age for which the fathers longed. And this new note of conscience in public life prophesies a new era of happiness and progress for the people of the republic.

Vital Problem to be Solved

By OSCAR S. STRAUSS,
Secretary of Department of Commerce and Labor.

No greater, more important, and vital question has ever come forward for solution than the relation between capital and labor. It is today agitating the parliaments of all enlightened nations, and is receiving the thoughtful attention of statesmen and legislators, who recognize that the plane of solution lies high above the narrow pathways of selfish interest.

The effect of combination of either capital or labor is not in itself an evil. The methods by which such combination is arrived at or by which it is maintained or operated, if those methods are inequitable or unfair, should not only be exposed, but should be drastically dealt with. A corporation desiring to perpetuate its domination may use its combination power to give better service—that is a public good—but when that power is used to prevent any one else from giving a like service or the best service it can, then its combination power is being used as an encroachment upon the rights of others and against the public welfare.

It is not within the power or proper sphere of government to equalize competitors, but it is within the power and proper sphere of government to equalize the opportunities of competitors. It is the sphere of government to keep open equally to all men the avenues of commercial development, to maintain the opportunity for competition, and to prevent the use of unfair means that diminish or destroy such equal opportunity.

A Treatise on Terrapin

By JUDGE J. UPSHUR DENNIS,
of Supreme Court of Maryland.

Terrapin is the acme of creation, and I think terrapin and not man was made on the sixth day. The odd time was filled up in making field mushrooms.

What are the essentials for terrapin?

Plenty of it. I like them served in the shell, but you can't make them bad. They should have the merest suggestion of sherry and be seasoned with butter, pepper and salt. If thin, a good deal of cream should be put with them. The best kind are fresh caught mud terrapin.

When is the best month to eat terrapin?

Any time you can get them. After November they lay up food, and get fat. They should be boiled until thoroughly done and then stewed. Celery and Maryland biscuit belong to them, and champagne is the piece de resistance as the beverage; but good old burgundy is all right at any time. An old darkey, named Aaron Lloyd, down in my country on the Eastern Shore, used to have a song that appealed to me very much. It began this way:

When the honeysuckle bloo ms and the dogwood's white,
Then the terrapin lays, and the red drums bite.

Olive Oil out of Cotton Seed

By MAJ. JOHN M. CARSON,
Chief of the Government Bureau of Manufacturers.

The cotton-seed industry presents greater attractions and offers greater possibilities in the immediate future for enlargement in foreign markets than many others of our principal industries. If it were more generally known in the United States, that the best cotton-seed oil is equal in purity and healthfulness to olive oil, the demand for cotton oil at home would expand to a point that would seriously interfere with the profits of those manufacturers of olive oil in France, Italy and Spain who find cotton oil so profitable in the conduct of their business. Our manufacturers of cotton oil might profitably direct their efforts to bringing their product to the attention of the American people. If our own people were made familiar with the real qualities of cotton-seed oil, very much of the olive oil now imported would be permanently displaced, and very much of the animal fats now so extensively used in the preparation of food would be expelled from American kitchens.

TEACHERS INSTITUTE CLOSED LAST FRIDAY.

Proceedings of The Last Days' Sessions Interesting.

SPLENDID RESULTS ANTICIPATED.

The Corps of Instructors As Good As Could Be Secured—Dr. Armstrong's Address on the "Law of Service" Contained Many Noble Thoughts.

CONTRIBUTED BY MISS LEARY.

The Teachers Institute resumed its sessions on Thursday morning.

Devotional exercises.....Prof. Gibson.
Address.....Dr. O'Bolger.
Music.....Prof. Gibson.
Address.....Dr. Armstrong.
Number Work.....Wm. E. Bishoff.
Mental Arithmetic...Supt. Browning.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

Music.....Prof. Gibson.
Lecture.....Dr. Armstrong.

Dr. O'Bolger's close criticism of written work submitted by some of the teachers should fill us with the desire for great improvement and a disgust for poor work in composition.

Prof. Gibson's earnest work in the musical part of the program should make each one eager to waken all the pupils along this line.

Dr. Armstrong's talk in the forenoon upon the necessary qualifications of the good teacher was helpful and inspiring.

Mr. Bishoff presented a carefully prepared paper on Number Work, in which he gave many practical suggestions, based upon psychological principles.

Mental Arithmetic, as presented by Supt. Browning, was interesting and well handled. Both subjects were discussed by the Institute.

In the afternoon many visitors heard with us the excellent lecture by Dr. Armstrong upon "The Law of Service." The many noble thoughts given by the Doctor were uplifting for all and particularly applicable to the teacher.

Thursday evening a very enjoyable social was held in the school house. A fine program had been arranged and was very well carried out. It consisted of singing by the Institute; vocal solos by Misses Callahan and Kearney, Prof Gibson, Prof. Turner and Prof. King; piano solo, Miss Callahan; readings by Miss Anna Manges, and story telling by Dr. Harves, Dr. O'Bolger and Dr. Armstrong.

After the program refreshments were served by the Oakland teachers and members of the Oakland High School. When, just before separating, an expression of appreciation and thanks was made, there was not one present who did not assent most heartily.

FRIDAY FORENOON.

Institute met at 8 o'clock and the following program was carried out:

Music.....Prof. Turner.
Association and Reading Circle announcements....Prof. H. A. Loraditch.

Short address by Dr. O'Bolger, in which he acvised the reading of more modern literature.

Query Box, conducted in a most helpful manner by Dr. Armstrong.

Expression of thanks, by Prof. Turner.
Address.....Dr. E. H. Bartlett.

Then followed instructions to the teachers concerning reports, incidental expenses and other matters, interesting to those immediately connected with the schools. Resolutions were read and adopted and at noon the Institute adjourned for the school year.

We feel this has been one of the best Institutes ever held in this place and that great help has been given the teachers of our county by the good men who have been with us. Let us then do as they have done: i. e.; pass it along.

Married.

RICHTER—SAUERWALD. Miss Helen Sauerwald, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Francis Sauerwald, of Glen Rock, Pa., was married to Mr. Adam J. Richter, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Richter, of Accident, Md.

The ceremony was performed at the home of the bride on Wednesday, Sept. 4, at 7:30 p. m., by the Rev. Wolf, D. D., pastor of the Glen Rock Lutheran church. Mr. Fred. P. Miller, of Accident, Md., was best man, and Miss Mary Bosch, of Baltimore, Md., was the bridesmaid, she being a cousin of the bride.

The following named persons were present: Mr. and Mrs. John P. Miller, of Westernport, Mr. Louis Trier, of Ft. Wayne, Ind., Mr Frank Sauerwald, of Baltimore, Miss Verna Holt, of Cumberland, Mr. Clyde Brillhart, Miss Lottie Boser, Miss Carrie Moody, Mrs. Wolf and daughter, of Glen Rock, and a number of other friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Richter will spend several weeks in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, D. C., and Jamestown, Va., and then return to Accident where Mr. Richter is engaged in business.

CLIMATIC CONDITIONS IN SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. Percy Procter Writes of Dusty Roads. Earthquakes. Rains. Etc.

METHODS OF LAYING THE DUST.

Oil Freely Used on The Roadways—Seven Hundred Earthquake Shocks Recorded In The Past Ten Years.

To the Editor of The Republican.

For a number of years an amiable old man named Bailey used to call on the people of Garrett County to sell them bulbs, seeds and nursery stock. This agent had many customers, as he was an honest, kindly and friendly man, who gave freely of his advice and his experience, and was a welcome visitor at most farm houses, where he always could go with a clear conscience, the stock he sold being reliable and all that he claimed for it. Mr. Bailey represented a large nursery in New York state and the proprietors are laying out a huge plantation near Riverside, to grow in the open air such plants and shrubs that would have to be started under glass at the nursery in the East. It was like meeting an acquaintance in a strange land to come upon suddenly this nursery owned by a firm from whom one had made frequent purchases in a far away state. And the driver of the hired vehicle originally was from Hamilton, Ohio, distant twenty-five miles only from Cincinnati, where he was familiar with the name of the people in his carriage. Incidents such as these are pleasant to the traveler.

By the first of August roads in Southern California that are not oiled become very dusty. Dust a foot deep is not unusual, and there may be no rain to wash away this dust until November or December. The dust covers all the grass, shrubs and trees along the roads until they are grey in color. Careful housewives hang feather dusters on the outside of their houses so that all who intend to enter may remove the dirt from their clothes and shoes; streets in towns are either oiled macadamized or made of asphalt. The last two kinds have to be sprinkled with water frequently to keep them clean and free from dirt. The county roads most used are oiled. The first time a road is oiled the roadway is ploughed and harrowed, then it is shaped, higher in the middle than at the sides, so as to shed water, but no higher than is necessary, a road too rounding breaking up almost as fast as a road with gutters down the middle instead of at the edges. Shale or gravel is then sprinkled over the harrowed soil. If these are not available, sand or crushed stone is spread on the loose earth, then the oil is poured over the roadway from a big iron tank on a wagon, having near the ground and at the back, a pipe about seven feet long, with holes in it through which the oil drips on to the ground. California oil contains about eighty per cent. of asphaltum and cannot be refined into high grade gasoline or naptha. It sells for eighty cents a barrel, and eight barrels of fifty gallons each, costing $6.40, will oil fifteen hundred feet of roadway to the width of seven feet. When a new road is made and oiled as above, a light covering of fine gravel, crushed rock or even sand is spread over it, and the whole surface is rolled or tamped. Oiled roads are repaired once a year, in the dry season, by cleaning out the depressions or holes with a coarse brush or broom, and filling them up with gravel, shale or coarse sand, pouring oil over this, and covering the oil with the loose gravel, shale or coarse sand by raking or brushing it up from the edges and gutters. The object of the repairing is to restore the surface of the roadway to its original smooth and sloping form, so that when the wet season comes the water will not settle on the bed, but run off into the gutters. Such roads will sustain wagon loads of several tons without injury, but all vehicles other than those for pleasure must have tires three or four inches wide on the wheels. Some of the roads around Cincinnati are oiled and Oak street, Oakland, from the end of the brick pavement East to the corporation line could be oiled every June at less expense than it would cost to keep it free from dust by watering it, during the Summer. Simply to keep down dust it is not necessary to make over such a roadway. After the street is shaped by a road machine, the loose stones removed and holes filled up, the oil can be dripped on the driveway. Over the oil should be sprinkled gravel, crushed stone or coarse sand, and then the whole should be rolled or tamped. For the first week after the street is oiled horses and vehicles should go over it slowly, so as not to scatte the soft surface, which flying hoofs and rapidly revolving wheels throw like mud.

The climate of Southern California is its greatest attraction to those who do not like cold weather. The months which are the most unpleasant in Garrett county, December to April, are liked best by some people in Southern California, as the sunshine is relieved by frequent rains, there is absence of dust, and the weather never is hot. From the first of May the rains become less frequent and by June they have ceased entirely, not to begin again for five or six months. The heat and dust increase in Los Angeles, Pasadena, Riverside, Redland, and all places distant twenty miles or more from the Pacific Ocean, but near the sea the climate is delightful. Fogs rise in the night and sometime are not dissipated until late in the morning or noon. They prevent the sun's rays from beating down the whole of a long summer's day and have somewhat the same effect upon flowers and plants as does dew in the East. These fogs are so heavy at times that the moisture can be seen falling like very fine rain. As the season advances the fogs or mists become less frequent and during September and October are rare. These two months, and November also, if the rainy season does not set in, which are delightful months in Western Maryland, are the most unpleasant of the year in Southern California. Intense dry heat, dust so thick and common as to cover everything within a hundred yards of each street or road, and scarcity of water makes a third of the year very unpleasant. Work has to go on, heat or no heat, in the orange groves, truck farms, and chicken ranches, but the natives do as little as possible. A man in Santa Barbara, who sold rope and baskets made by Mexicans from plaited grass and rushes, found his stock getting low. One day he drove out in the country several miles to a hamlet where rope and baskets were made, to learn why the supply had fallen off. He found most of the women seated in the shade of the largest adobe house, caring for their babies, sewing or preparing vegetables for the mid-day meal, while opposite them were grouped the men, all smoking cigarettes and listening to one of their number who was playing upon a guitar. White people from the East, if they stay here continually, lose their energy also, and it is advisible that such should spend a winter in a cold climate at least every three or four years. Curiously enough people who live here five or six years become so used to warm weather that a temperature of forty or fifty degrees is as uncomfortable to them as is zero weather to a Garrett county farmer's family. All the better class of houses and public buildings have fireplaces, stoves or furnaces. Coal costs in Southern California $12 a ton and fire wood, $16 a cord, but fuel oil, which is mostly used, is cheap, one dollar a barrel for fifty gallons. So much is written here about the climate, for the information of those who may imagine they would be better off in Southern California than where they are.

During the last ten years more than seven hundred earthquakes shocks in California have been recorded. Most of these shocks were so slight as not to be felt, and their existence might not have been known were it not for recording instrument in observatories and scientific laboratories. Many of the shocks, however, were felt, and some, especially the one which caused the partial destruction of San Francisco a year ago last April, caused damage to property and loss of life. Up to the date of the San Francisco disaster, residents paid little attention to earthquake shocks, they were so common.

An acquaintance of the writer said she counted five shocks in one morning. Since the big quake of 1906, all people are more or less nervous when they feel shocks, these are most common in early Spring and late Fall. Last June the writer was awakened out of sleep at night by a violent shaking of the room door. He thought some one was trying to enter, but there was no more disturbance; the next morning he was told that there had been a slight earthquake. A month later, as he was seated on a porch, about nine o'clock in the evening, the floor swayed and the posts supporting the roof appeared to be about to fall, the shock lasted a second only, but was accounted a sharp one. In the theatre in Santa Barbara, six miles away, when the shock came the audience climbed over the backs of the chairs in their haste to get out of the building, fearing that the ceilng would fall. No damage was done to either person or property. Acquaintances who were residents of San Francisco were so unnerved by these shocks that they sat up the remainder of the night outside of their cottage. One meets with many people who have not yet recovered from the effects of the disaster of 1906 and some of them never will. It is a question often discussed, earthquakes or thunder and lightning storms, which would you rather not have? In the East they have the latter, but not the former, while in South California there are earthquakes and no thunder and lightning, so it goes. No section of the United States has a monopoly of perfect climate or conditions.

Off To Old "Virginny."

"Uncle Harvey," the well known and much respected sexton of St. Paul's M. E. church, through the kindness of the congregation and other friends of this old time character, left here on No. 4 Monday morning for his old home in Virginia, where the water millon and 'possum and the "sweet 'tater" abounds. His vacation is to last two weeks or more and his friends kindly provided for the expense of the trip.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Please allow me space in your valuable paper and I will give you the political outlook from our standpoint of view.

As the date for holding Republican primaries and the county nominating convention is close at hand, I think as a Republican voter and taxpayer of Garrete county that now is the time for the voters to be alert to secure the nomination of the best men.

Our State ticket is a strong one, so let us endeavor to make our county ticket as strong. We do not believe that we should look only in the ranks of the office seekers for men to be placed on our ticket, but believe that the time is here when the office should seek the men and not the men seek the office, as is at present the case.

We have not one word to say against our present county officers, nor of the men who are asking for office; but there are plenty of men who never have asked for office nor ever will if they have to enter into a scramble in order to get the nomination, and yet they would make ideal officers, and again the temperance people are being aroused as never before, not only in Garrett county but all over the State and Nation. Many is the voter we have heard say they would never again vote for a man who was known to indulge in intoxicating drinks. Corporations and companies are cutting men out of their employ who are known to drink or frequent the saloon, and we think that the Republicans of Garrett county should adhere strictly to this rule: none but temperance men shall go on our ticket this fall. We speak thus because we have known men that tippled while in office, and after their term of office expired they set up shops that manufactured crime and criminals. These things are to be abhored by all sober thinking citizens.

Now just one word of reply to your correspondent from Grantsville in last week's REPUBLICAN: I want to say that there are other sections of the county that have not had their equal representation on the Republican ticket. I refer to my own district, No. 10. It is ten years this fall since the district has had a man on the Republican ticket and yet No. 10 is among the largest districts in the county and is largely Republican in its number of votes.

Let us put our shoulders to the wheel and nominate men equally distributed over the county and men that stand for honesty, integrity and sobriety.

I will close by saying I am a Republican voter and one that has no ax to grind nor am I tarning the grindstone for another individual.

REPUBLICAN COUNTY PRIMARIES CALLED.

Which Are To Be Held on The 28th Inst., and Convention on Oct. 1.

TWELVE CANDIDATES TO BE NAMED

A Ballot of Unusual Size Will Have To Be Provided by The Election Officials to Accommodate Candidates' Names.

Tuesday the Republican County Central Committee for Garrett county, composed of Col. A. G. Sturgiss, Mr. A. F. George and Mr. H. J. Speicher, met in Oakland, and set the day for holding the District Primaries and the County Nominating Convention. The former, according to the call issued by the Committee will be held on Saturday, September 28th, and the Convention will be held on Tuesday, October 1st, in the court house in Oakland.

The number of candidates to be nominated by the members of the convention will total twelve, as follows: State's Attorney, Sheriff, two members of the House of Delegates, one County Commissioner, Clerk to the Board of County Commissioners, County Treasurer, three Judges of the Orphans' Court, Register of Wills and County Surveyor.

To accommodate these twelve names and the nominees to be placed in the field by the Democrats and Prohibitionists, equalling twenty-four more, besides the names of the Republican, Democratic, Prohibition and Socialist candidates for State offices, numbering sixteen more, in addition to the question of a Constitutional Convention which is to be submitted to the voters, the Board of Election Supeevisors will be compelled to provide a ballot of unusual size, which will probably be a sheet about twenty-two by thirty inches.

TIMBER LANDS OF OREGON

History of a Jounrey In Which Mr. N. U. Bond was a Pilgrim.

Portland, Ore, July, 30, 1907.

Rev. Daniel L. Rader,

Editor Pacific Advocate.

Dear Doctor:—

As requested, this morning I will undertake to state as briefly as I can some of the impressions I have received on this visit to your great State and beautiful city. On my way from the last General Conference at Los Angeles to Alaska, I stopped here two days. Ever since I have desired a more extended opportunity to know something of this country. Having been in this quarter of the State now for over two weeks, one-half of which time has been in the city and the balance in the country, I am already prepared to say that it is a great country.

The impress to the early history of State on its future is greater than we sometimes realize. The courage and enterprise of Lewis and Clark at the begining of the last century, as exemplified by their now historic expedition, was an inspiration to their intrepid country men who, in the middle of that century, came over the "Oregon Trail" to win from the savage and the forest wild the prosperity made possible by that early and heroic adventure. The people who are here now in the beginning of a new century are not unmindful of this illustrious beginning. It finds a large place in their historic collections, in their pioneer associations and in all their current literature. They are rooted in heroic past, but their fame and purpose is to the front and to a greater and better future. They are an Americanized people. They are therefore, not much given to strikes. They are here for a better purpose. Not much of their public money is needed or used either for the suppression of strikes, or for the prosecution of strike murders and other crimes. It is, therefore, applied to needed public improvements, and to the development of of a fine a system of public instruction as is to be found on the continent. Their strick is into their rich soil, and into their great timber, and into the future of material prosperity which these assure.

In the condition of the people, in the quantity and quality of the timber this is truly a great State. The health and cheer and contentment of the people is one of the sure and marked results of the material prosperity found on every hand. I have talked to many of the men who have carved their small clearings out of the forest. On a few acres they raise more and better hay and grain and vegetables and fruit than are often raised on large and expensively cultivated farms in the east. They are quite conscious of this advantage. More than one of them has said to me: There is no country in the world where we could get as much for the same amount of work.

Their homes are generally built of split cedar. These trees split so easily and smoothly that the houses look at a distance like planed lumber. Not only the sides and flooring but doors and facings and shingles are all so made. In parts of the east the pioneers made a rough kind of roof of split pine. To make it reach they made the pieces long so that three courses would cover a pretty good sized shed or side of roof. Often they were held in place by logs or stones at the ends instead of nails. They called them clapboards and they were. The split cedar by reason of its strength and smooth line of cleavage makes very much better and better looking lumber. It is said that one man from a single tree can split enough boards in a day to build one of these small houses.

It is true, that the clearing of the land is difficult and expensive because of the heavy timber and k undergrowth. Ferns of different kind are of such luxuriant growth as to be a serious obstacle in cleaning, and, also in many places, in keeping clean the land. But the time has come when the value of the timber removed is more than the cost of the clearing. Much, however, is still burned or otherwise destroyed that in Pennsylvania would be of great value.

But when this serious business of clearing is done, the settler is not only compensated by the sale of the timber but he has something for his work in a soil of great richness. Not only in the valleys and on the rugged hillsides and in the deepest forest is the soil of remarkable fertility and vigor. The strength of the soil is well tested in some of the older settlements, as in Washington and Yamhill counties, where cultivated lands are of great value by reason of the well known productiveness of the soil.

With the other gentlemen accompanying me is was upon some of the best timbered lands in the State. To get there we went to Hillsboro, county seat of Washington county, twenty miles distant. This place also enjoys the distinction of having the oldest person in the United States. It is a woman over 120 years. On the fourth of July last with appropriate ceremony she was crowned queen of Oregon. Judge Williams of this place delivered the address. There we stayed over night and from there we went to Buxton seventeen miles distant and present terminus ot the railroad. From there we drove 18 miles over a mountain and for several miles close to the Nehalem river to Veronia at the point where Rock Creek flows into the Nehalem. At this point the creek appears larger than the river. From that point we drove about ten miles to Keazey Post Office, on Rock Creek, kept by George Stitt, with whom we stopped for the night and from that point went up the creek about one and one-half miles where camped. The way up the creek was through dense undergrowth and very difficult traveling. To see the timber of the kind referred to, we traveled five or six miles futther into the wilderness encountering more difficult traveling.

The size to the timber is almost fabulous. Trees of 24, 26, 28 and even 30 feet in circumference are found. The length of the timber, its slowly and gradually decreasing diameter and its freedom from damaging knots and limbs for a great height are as remarkable as the great girth, a few feet from the ground. The yellow fir and white cedar are the prevailing timbers of the region where we were. This timber has greatly increased in value in the last ten years and will much more rapidly increase in the next ten years both because of rapid consumption of the timber of the country and the nearer access to the railroads now projected or in process of construction. The facilities for handling big timber has kept pace with its growth. Instead of cutting roads to the timber and dragging it out to the skidding place, as in former days, an engine in placed at or near the railroad and by wire ropes the trees, some of them 100 feet or more in length, are dragged from the stump to the skidding place, and by another engine on the railroad from the skids to the car. The unloading process, at the other end of the line, is equally novel and efficient. Instead of rolling the log from the car, and engine is put on a side track by the loaded car and from it a wire rope runs around the whole load and in a few seconds that whole load dumped into a pool. Another novelty was to find a whole camp outfit, office, store, ware room, supply room, and boarding or mess room and men's sleeping quarters on wheels, upon the side tracks, that they could be readily moved with the advance of the railroad and the forest. One building of the old-time camp was missing. That was the stable. The horse appears to have no place in the modern lumber camp. I well remember a horse who worked on a farm in summer and at the timber in the winter. During the summer as he was driven to the blacksmith shop, he passed the end of the road leading off to the timber. As he approached this spot he invariably bore off to the other side of the road, fearing that he might be turned into the timber road. This with many other things shows that the horse had memory, but one of his unpleasant memories passes out, since he is absolved from the timber work.

Among the lumbermen operating in a large way, whose extreme courtesy enabled us to witness the the practical operation of the facilities just referred to, are Simcoe Chapman, President of the Chapman Timber Company; C. C. Barker, President of the Peninsular Lumber Company; George R. Wentworth, President of the Portland Lumber Company, also President of the Banker's and Lumberman's Bank, organized only last year, and having amoug its directors several large lumbermen of Pennsylvania, whose large foresight enabled them from the start to see the assured future of this institution.

Our own small company is in charge of John E. DuBois, of DuBois, Pa., who owns a large body of timber in the counties of Clatsop, Columbia, Washington and Tillamuth, but principally in Clatsop county. With him are Judge J. E. Magers, his counsel, and J. K. Gamble, his land agent at this place, C. J. North of Buffalo, N. Y., who is associated with him in property interests in Utah, N. U. Bond of Bond, Md., who with his brother, is jointly interested with Mr. DuBois in lumber operation at that place, and the writer. We have had a delightful trip. One of our party is a poet. His description, in verse, of this memorable trip will probably prove to be his masterpiece. Another is a philosopher If the observations and deductions made by him upon this trip were printed and put in circulation they would probably affect the sale of Franklin's writing. At least to our company he would be a formidable competitor of Poor Richard. A third member of our company is a photographer. He never was such before this trip. This he will be able to prove by the character of the photographs taken. We are obliged to rely for their idenity with the places taken upon his assurance that they are the same. To us they look like some other places but we are entirely helpless in the matter and are obliged to rely solely upon his word.

This city has become a metropolis. In it are types of the best citizenship and the best development of the State. Its forestry building is a uniqne and instructive exhibit of the vast and valuable timber growth of the State. Its city hall is a fine example of modern architecture and contains a treasured collection of relics that came with a now departed ancestry over the "Oregon Trail." This collection includes old wagons, spinning wheels, weaving looms, tin lanterns, and other like reminders of earlier and harder days. It also contains the Sea Chest of Captain Gray who landed at the mouth of Oregon's Great River in 1792, and named it Columbia in honor of the noble ship with which he made its discovery. Its water ways and trolley lines and steam roads, and its low elevation make every place near and far tributary to it. Its growth appears to be quite phenomenal.

But to what end and purposes all this history and development? Without the church and its influence it could not have come, and without them it can neither continue nor be wisely nor profitably directed. The pioneer in this great work were God fearing and praying men. It is, therefore, fitting as well as encouraging to find that the church has here a large and strong place. May its advancement and the light it furnishes to this enterprising and progressive people be such as to encourage them to preserve all that is best in their heroic past and be commensurate with their vast resources and their unlimited opportunity.

Your excellent paper has a large place to fill and a great purpose to serve here.

The city's attraction to the writer has been enhanced by the fact that it is the home of a few old friends and acquaintances, some of whom he has been able to see, others not. Among these are Mrs. Mary J. Shope who came here from the state and county, and originally from the very township where he was born and where all his early days were spent. Judge Caples, of honored name and fame, who sat with the writer in the General Conference at Cleveland, 1896, who he met there three years ago. Judge George H. Williams, whom he first met in Washington in February, 1874, when Attorney-General of the United States. He has had a long and distinguished career in this state and enjoys a vigorous as well as an honored and useful old age right here in the place and among the people where he first rose to fame and distinction. Judge P. A. Marquam, whom he has never seen, but of whose career he learned, (and in it became deeply interested) from a son of the Judge whom he met in Alaska three years ago. Allen Murray and Albert Markie, of St. Johns, both cousins of the writer. The former engaged here, as formerly in Pennsylvania, and alway at about the hardest kind of manual labor, in this instance cutting and ranking fir timber in a hot sun on a steep hill side. The latter, Associate Editor of "St. John's Review," an enterprising paper in which the energy and enterprise of this new part of the great city is exhibited and encouraged, and I doubt not, greatly promoted in true western style. Last, but not least, Rev. Dr. T. B. Ford, whom the writer met first in the General Conference of 1888, and has met every four years since. He is a genuine specimen of the stalwart preachers who carried Methodism into the wilds of the west and northwest in the last century; projected now into this century to remind your people of the heroic ancestry from which they came, and at the same time actively to remind them that the land marks of the church's developement in that century must not be forgotten or obliterate in this, however, progressive and aggressive the growth of her empire may have become.

The Army Mule.

(The quartermaster's department at Washington has recommended the substitution of transportation automobiles for army mules.)

We performed our deeds heroic for the blue and for the gray;
We've saved the boys in Cuba, and we're saving 'em to-day
Where they're learnin' of their lessons in the Igorrote's school—
But at Washington they've figured that it's best to shelve the mule.
We have plugged along the desert with our tongues and ears adroop,
But we never let a redskin catch us laggin' from our troop;
We have frozen in Montana, where we chased the bands of Sioux,
But we took our doses proper, for us army folks can't choose.
So let 'em do their bluffin' with their autos on parade;
Real fightin's 's never pulled off on smooth roads and level grade;
If wheels can ever make it they can pack me till I grunt—
Can my gasoline successor ever do that little stunt
Just wait until the hills are spittin lead upon you folks;
And wait until the wagons only show up half their spokes;
It's then you'll hear the whiplash a-crackin' something crool.
And, a-strainin' in the traces, that same old army mule!

IN THE SOLDIERS' HOME.

One Old Veteran Who Had Discovered What True Religion Was.

The electric cars bearing the legend "S. & S. Home" run along streets liberally supplied with bill-boards which proclaim that young men between the ages of 17 and 35 are wanted for the United States navy and army. Those seeking recruits for the navy predominate, because a large portion of the recruits for the navy comes from inland. They are inviting four-sheet posters, with a spruce-looking young sailor in the foreground and a battleship lying in the offing, overarched with the legend, "An opportunity to see the world."

To look on this picture, then on the picture of the wreckage made by war, at the end of the car-line, seems hardly to constitute an attractive invitation; yet perhaps the comfort of the home provided by the government for its disabled veterans adds its own suggestion of attractiveness to a military life.

"I Come Out and Entertain de Birds."

Within the gates are ample grounds and commodious buildings. Old soldiers bask on benches in the sunshine, or fish in a little lake with an apparent satisfaction which seems to be no whit lessened by the lack of fish; or they limp or shuffle along the walks, or do light work about the grounds.

Each man has his own story. Here are 2,000 separate tragedies of the long aftermath of war.

One old soldier, who saluted with military grace, the visitor stopped; and his cheerful story, with its human interest, stands out from among the dozen or 20 others of the day's casual acquaintanceships, says the Youth's Companion.

"How long have you been here?" seemed the natural question for the opening of conversation; and as the questioner had thought might be the case, it afforded a point of departure for a narrative.

"I am ashamed to tell you," answered the veteran, selecting his words with precision, but speaking with a strong German accent. "I haf been here 14 years.

"I did not t'ink ven first I came dat I should be blessed mit so much sorrow as to lif so long. And maybe if nature hat not joint de great pusiness interests opposed to mine, I coult haf been out part of de time.

"It is hard for one man in small pusiness and not strong to compete mit great fortunes and nature, too.

"I made candles; and de oil and de var and my diseases and all put me out of pusiness. And I haf much pain, and it is hard for me to valk about, and dere is no pusiness for me. For who shall buy candles any more from me? And how shall I go into de oil pusiness? So I get a little more poor, and a little more veak, and a little more ache and pain, and I gif it up, and t'ink, 'It is not for long'; and here I stay and haf aches and pains for 14 years!

"It is too long! I did not t'ink it vill be so long! But I try to make de pest of it, and do vat little goot I can.

"Religion? Yes, I t'ink so. But sometimes not. In de olt country ve vas all raised Lutheran. And ven I come to dis country, my religion vas first I was getting into my vork, and den it vas var. And var is hart on religion. And den I read, and I find how many religions are in dis country, and more in de vorld, and I say, I haf not capital to invest in all, and I do not like to risk vat little I haf in any von! So I say, 'My religion is moral principle—dat is my religion.'

"And it sound vell. And I hear many men say it! And I notice de saloons outside de gate thrive de more as men say dat is all de religion dey haf. And I t'ink de religion which haf only moral principle some vay does not make men so moral as de religions dat haf more. And I vonder vat is de religion dat begins somevere else, but makes moral principle.

"Vell, I stop reading ven spring comes, and I come out and entertain de birds. Oh, yes, it is so! You hear me vhistle? Dat is de robin. Now hear de lark! I interest de birds; dey t'ink I am von of dem, and dey vonder vy I do not fly! And de more I lif among de birds, and de more I look up at de trees and de sky, I say, 'Ah, God is goot!' And it does me goot dat I do not get ven I say, 'My religion is moral principle.' And I find de moral principle comes easier.

"Den I remember de olt church in de olt country, and vat my modder taught me, and I say, 'Yes, moral principle is goot, but dis is better.' And ven I suffer I find strength, and I say, 'Fourteen years is long, too long; I vonder vy I am blessed mit so much suffering? But God is goot; and if it is best, I vill stay 14 years more.'"

SHERIDAN AIDED HIM.

General Helped Young Commissioned Officer Select His Sword.

George Dunham of Boston believes himself to be the youngest commissioned officer who fought in a Massachusetts regiment in the civil war. He was a second lieutenant at 17 and a first lieutenant at 18.

Mr. Dunham was born in Fairhaven in 1846, and at the outbreak of the war was attending high school. In August, 1862, the federal mustering officer, in looking over the Third Massachusetts regiment, saw a mild-mannered, rosy-cheeked boy, whom he greeted abruptly with, "How old are you, kid?"

"Eighteen," was the reply.

"You're a ——" well, it amounted to a deliberate falsifier. But he enrolled 15-year-old George Dunham as a drummer.

The young drummer's impetuous nature did not agree with the inactive life of a musician. He was always playing, instead of two-four, two-forty time. He became a private in the ranks, seeing active service under Burnside in North Carolina, and participating in three engagements before the expiration of his nine months' enlistment period. One of these, at Plymouth, N. C., was particularly severe, 17 of Dunham's company being killed in as many minutes.

The 15-year-old soldier had been back in school at Fairhaven but a month when he reenlisted as sergeant in the Fifty-eighth Massachusetts regiment, made up entirely of veterans who had seen service in the previous nine months' call. Seven days from the time the Fifty-eighth's quota was complete in September, 1863, it was on the firing line in the Wilderness under Gen. Grant. From this time until the end of the war, young Dunham was not out of hearing of whistling bullets.

In November, 1864, at the age of 17, he was commissioned second lieutenant, and soon overcame the resentment of men under him who were old enough to be his father, by his skill in handling them and his courage in battle. With the rest of the Fifty-eighth—which is given a high rating in Cox's "300 fighting regiments"—Lieut. Dunham was in the thick of the war from the Wilderness to the taking of Petersburg. At Spotsylvania he had his only severe wound, a shattered hand which confined him for a short while in the West Philadelphia hospital, where he had a distinction probably never before or since enjoyed by a boy of 17. He voted for President Lincoln.

Lieut. Dunham fared much better than his comrades in battle. He was one of the Fifty-eighth's two commissioned officers to escape death when Cemetery Hill, at Petersburg was blown up. The union troops had undermined the confederate lines, but a premature blast left ailve only 60 men in the regiment. He had another narrow escape when his company was raiding the plantation of the confederate leader, McGuider. On one occasion when he went into the commissary at Alexandria to procure a new sword, an uncouth individual who aided him in selecting it turned out to be Gen. Phil Sheridan.

In June, 1865, he was breveted first lieutenant, then only 18 years old. After the mustering out of the troops in 1865, he lived in Cincinnati and Buffalo for several years. In Buffalo he was commander of G. A. R. post 208. On returning to Massachusetts he was appointed a state police officer, a position he held for 20 years.

Though now 60, he is younger than most of his comrades of the war, and expects to live many years yet.

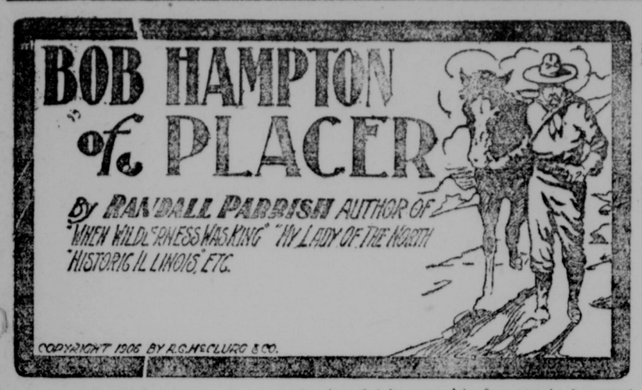
New York has 67,000,000,000 gallons of water stored away in its mountain reservoir.



CHAPTER V.

A New Proposition.

To one in the least inclined toward fastidiousness, the Miners' Home at Glencaid would scarcely appeal as a desirable place for long-continued residence. But such a one would have had small choice in the matter, as it chanced to be the only hotel there. The Miners' Home was unquestionably unique as regards architectural details, having been constructed by sections, in accordance with the rapid development of the camp, and enjoyed the further distinction—there being only two others equally stylish in town—of being built of sawn plank, although, greatly to the regret of its unfortunate occupants, lack of seasoning had resulted in wide cracks in both walls and stairway, while strict privacy within the chambers was long ago a mere reminiscence. Without the Miners' Home put up a good front, —and was in reality the most pretentious structure gracing the single cluttered street of Glencaid. Directly across the street, its front a perfect blaze of glass, stood invitingly the Occidental saloon, but the Widow Guffy, who operated the Miners' Home with a strong hand, possessed an antipathy to strong liquor, which successfully kept all suspicion of intoxicating drink absent from those sacredly guarded precincts, except as her transient guests imported it internally.

Mr. Hampton during the course of his somewhat erratic career had previously passed several eventful weeks in Glencaid. He was neither unknown nor unappreciated at the Miners' Home, and having on previous occasions established his reputation as a spender, experienced little difficulty now in procuring promptly the very best accommodation which the house afforded. That this arrangement was accomplished somewhat to the present discomfort of two vociferous eastern tourists did not greatly interfere with his pleasurable interest in the situation.

"Send those two fellows in here to argue it out," he said, languidly, after listening disgustedly to their loud lamentations in the hallway, and addressing his remarks to Mrs. Guffy, who had glanced into the room to be again assured regarding his comfort, and to express her deep regret over the unseemly racket. "The girl has fallen asleep, and I'm getting tired of hearing so much noise."

"No, be hivings, an' ye don't do nuthin' of thet sort, Bob," returned the widow, good-naturedly, busying herself with a dust-rag. "This is me own house, an' Oi've tended ter the loikes of them sort er fellers afore. There'll be no more bother this toime. Besoides, it's a paceful house Oi'm runnin', an' Oi know ye'r way of sittling them things. It's too strenurous ye are, Misther Hampton. And what did ye do wid the young lady, Oi make bould to ask?"

Hampton carelessly waved his hand toward the rear room, the door of which stood ajar, and blew a thick cloud of smoke into the air, his eyes continuing to gaze dreamily through the open window toward the distant hills.

"Who's running the game over at the Occidental?" he asked, professionally.

"Red Slavin, bad cess to him!" and her eyes regarded her questioner with renewed anxiety. "But sure now, Bob, ye mustn't think of playin' yit awhoile. Yer narves are in no fit shape, an' won't be fer a wake yit."

He made no direct reply, and she hung about, flapping the dust-rag uneasily.

"An' what did ye mane ter be doin' wid the young gyurl?" she questioned at last, in womanly curiosity.

Hampton wheeled about on the hard chair, and regarded her quizzingly. "Mrs. Guffy," he said, slowly, "you've been a mother to me, and it would certainly be unkind not to give you a straight tip. Do? Why, take care of her, of course. What else would you expect of one possessing my kindly disposition and well known motives of philanthropy? Can it be that I have resided with you, off and on, for ten years past without your ever realizing the fond yearnings of my heart? Mrs. Guffy, I shall make her the heiress to my millions; I shall marry her off to some eastern nabob, and thus attain to that high position in society I am so well fitted to adorn —sure, and what else were you expecting, Mrs. Guffy?"

"A loikely story," with a sniff of disbelief. "They tell me she's old Gillis' daughter over to Bethune."

"They tell you, do they?" a sudden gleam of anger darkening his gray eyes. "Who tell you?"

"Sure, Bob, an' thet's nuthin' ter git mad about, so fur as I kin see. The story is in iverybody's mouth. It wus thim sojers what brought ye in thet tould most ov it, but the lieutenant,—Brant of the Seventh cavalry, no less, —who took dinner here afore he wint back after the dead bodies, give me her name."

"Brant of the Seventh?" He faced her fairly now, his face again haggard and gray, all the slight gleam of fun gone out of it. "Was that the lad's name?"

"Sure, and didn't ye know him?"

"No; I noticed the '7' on his hat, of course, but never asked any questions, for his face was strange. I didn't know. The name, when you just spoke it, struck me rather queer. I—I used to know a Brant in the Seventh, but he was much older; it was not this man."

She answered something, lingering for a moment at the door, but he made no response, and she passed out silently, leaving him staring moodily through the open window, his eyes appearing glazed and sightless.

An hour later he was still sitting on the hard chair by the window, a cigar between his teeth, thinking. The lowering sun was pouring a perfect flood of gold across the rag carpet, but he remained utterly unconscious as to aught save the gloomy trend of his own awakened memories. Some one rapped upon the outer door.

"Come in," he exclaimed, carelessly, and barely glancing up. "Well, what is it this time, Mrs. Guffy?"

The landlady had never before seen this usually happy guest in his present mood, and she watched him curiously.

"A man wants ter see ye," she announced, shortly, her hand on the knob.

"Oh, I'm in no shape for play tonight; go back and tell him so."

"Sure, an' it's aisy 'nough ter see thet wid half an eye. But this un isn't thet koind of a man, an' he's so moighty perlite about it. Oi jist cudn't sind the loikes of him away. It's 'Missus Guffy, me dear madam, wud ye be koind enough to convey me compliments to Misther Robert Hampton, and requist him to grant me a few minutes of his toime on an important matter?' Sure, an' what do ye think of thet?"

"Huh! one of those fellows who had these rooms?" and Hampton rose to his feet with animation.

The landlady lowered her voice to an almost inaudible whisper.

"It's the Rev. Howard Wynkoop," she announced, impressively, dwelling upon the name. "The Rev. Howard Wynkoop, the Prasbytarian missionary —wouldn't thet cork ye?"

It evidently did, for Mr. Hampton stared at her for fully a minute in an amazement too profound for fit expression in words. Then he swallowed something in his throat.

"Show the gentleman up," he said, shortly, and sat down to wait.

The Rev. Howard Wynkoop was neither giant nor dwarf, but the very fortunate possessor of a countenance which at once awakened confidence in his character. He entered the room quietly, rather dreading this interview with one of Mr. Hampton's well-known proclivities, yet in this case feeling abundantly fortified in the righteousness of his cause. His brown eyes met the inquisitive gray ones frankly, and Hampton waved him silently toward a vacant chair.

"Our lines of labor in this vineyard being so entirely opposite," the latter said, coldly, but with intended politeness, "the honor of your unexpected call quite overwhelms me. I shall have to trouble you to speak somewhat softly in explanation of your present mission, so as not to disturb a young girl who chances to be sleeping in the room beyond."

"It was principally upon her account I ventured to call," Wynkoop explained in sudden confidence. "Might I see her?"

Hampton's watchful eyes swept the other's face suspiciously, and his hands clinched.

"Relative?" he asked gravely.

The preacher shook his head.

"Friend of the family, perhaps?"

"No, Mr. Hampton. My purpose in coming here is perfectly proper, yet the request was not advanced as a right, but merely as a special privilege."

A moment Hampton hesitated; then he arose and quietly crossed the room, holding open the door. Without a word being spoken the minister followed, and stood beside him. For several minutes the eyes of both men rested upon the girl's sleeping form and upturned face. Then Wynkoop drew silently back, and Hampton closed the door noiselessly.

"Well," he said, inquiringly, "what does all this mean?"

"Let us sit down again," said the minister, "and I will try to make my purpose sufficiently clear. I am not here to mince words, nor do I believe you to be the kind of a man who would respect me if I did. I may say something that will not sound pleasant, but in the cause of my Master I cannot hesitate. You are an older man than I, Mr. Hampton; your experience in life has doubtless been much broader than mine, and it may even be that in point of education you are likewise my superior. Nevertheless, as the only minister of the gospel residing in this community it is beyond question my plain duty to speak a few words to you in behalf of this young lady, and her probable future. I trust not to be offensive, yet cannot shirk the requirements of my sacred office."

The speaker paused, somewhat disconcerted perhaps by the hardening of the lines in Hampton's face.

"Go on," commanded Hampton, tersely, "only let the preacher part slide, and say just what you have to say as man to man."

"I prefer to do so," he continued. "It will render my unpleasant task much easier, and yield us both a more direct road to travel. I have been laboring on this field for nearly three years. When I first came here you were pointed out to me as a most dangerous man, and ever since then I have constantly been regaled by the stories of your exploits. I have known you merely through such unfriendly reports, and came here strongly prejudiced against you as a representative of every evil I war against. We have never met before, because there seemed to be nothing in common between us; because I had been led to suppose you to be an entirely different man from what I now believe you are."

Hampton stirred uneasily in his chair.

"Shall I paint in exceedingly plain words the picture given me of you?"

There was no response, but the speaker moistened his lips and proceeded firmly. "It was that of a professional gambler, utterly devoid of mercy toward his victims; a reckless fighter, who shot to kill upon the least provocation; a man without moral character, and from whom any good action was impossible. That was what was said about you. Is the tale true?"

Hampton laughed unpleasantly, his eyes grown hard and ugly.

"I presume it must be," he admitted, with a quick side glance toward the closed door, "for the girl out yonder thought about the same. A most excellent reputation to establish with only ten years of strict attendance to business."

Wynkoop's grave face expressed his disapproval.

"Well, in my present judgment that report was not altogether true," he went on clearly and with greater confidence. "I did suppose you exactly that sort of a man when I first came into this room. I have not believed so, however, for a single moment since. Nevertheless, the naked truth is certainly bad enough, without any necessity for our resorting to romance. You may deceive others by an assumption of recklessness, but I feel convinced your true nature is not evil. It has been warped through some cause which is none of my business. Let us deal alone with facts. You are a gambler, a professional gambler, with all that that implies; your life is, of necessity, passed among the most vicious and degrading elements of mining camps, and you do not hesitate even to take human life when in your judgment it seems necessary to preserve your own. Under this veneer of lawlessness you may, indeed, possess a warm heart, Mr. Hampton; you may be a good fellow, but you are certainly not a model character, even according to the liberal code of the border."

"Extremely kind of you to enter my rooms uninvited, and furnish me with this list of moral deficiencies," acknowledged the other with affected carelessness. "But thus far you have failed to tell me anything strikingly new. Am I to understand you have some particular object in this exchange of amenities?"

"I Have Shot Men for Less. Go, Before I Forget Your Cloth."

"Most assuredly. It is to ask if such a person as you practically confess yourself to be—homeless, associating only with the most despicable and vicious characters, and leading so uncertain and disreputable a life—can be fit to assume charge of a girl, almost a woman, and mould her future?"

For a long, breathless moment Hampton stared incredulously at his questioner, crushing his cigar between his teeth. Twice he started to speak, but literally choked back the bitter words burning his lips, while an uncontrollable admiration for the other's boldness began to overcome his first fierce anger.

"By God!" he exclaimed at last, rising to his feet and pointing toward the door. "I have shot men for less. Go, before I forget your cloth. You little impudent fool! See here—I saved that girl from death, or worse; I plucked her from the very mouth of hell; I like her; she's got sand; so far as I know there is not a single soul for her to turn to for help in all this wide world. And you, you miserable, snivelling hypocrite, you little creeping Presbyterian parson, you want me to shake her! What sort of a wild beast do you suppose I am?"

Wynkoop had taken one hasty step backward, impelled to it by the fierce anger blazing from those stern, gray eyes. But now he paused, and, for the only time on record, discovered the conventional language of polite society inadequate to express his needs.

"I think," he said, scarcely realizing his own words, "you are a damned fool."

Into Hampton's eyes there leaped a light upon which other men had looked before they died,—the strange mad gleam one sometimes sees in fighting animals, or amid the fierce charges of war. His hand swept instinctively backward, closing upon the butt of a revolver beneath his coat, and for one second he who had dared such utterance looked on death. Then the hard lines about the man's mouth softened, the fingers clutching the weapon relaxed, and Hampton laid one opened hand upon the minister's shrinking shoulder.

"Sit down," he said, his voice unsteady from so sudden a reaction. "Perhaps—perhaps I don't exactly understand."

For a full minute they sat thus looking at each other through the fast dimming light, like two prize-fighters meeting for the first time within the ring, and taking mental stock before beginning their physical argument. Hampton, with a touch of his old audacity of manner, was first to break the silence.

"So you think I am a damned fool. Well, we are in pretty fair accord as to that fact, although no one before has ever ventured to state it quite so clearly in my presence. Perhaps you will kindly explain?"

The preacher wet his dry lips with his tongue, forgetting himself when his thoughts began to crystallize into expression.

"I regret having spoken as I did," he began. "Such language is not my custom. I was irritated because of your haste in rejecting my advances before hearing the proposition I came to submit. I certainly respect your evident desire to be of assistance to this young woman, nor have I the slightest intention of interfering between you. Your act in preserving her life was truly a noble one, and your loyalty to her interests since is worthy of all Christian praise. But I believe I have a right to ask, what do you intend for the future? Keep her with you? Drag her about from camp to camp? Educate her among the contaminating poison of gambling holes and dance-halls? Is her home hereafter to be the saloon and the rough frontier hotel? Her ideal of manhood the quarrelsome gambler, and of womanhood a painted harlot? Mr. Hampton, you are evidently a man of education, of early refinement; you have known better things; and I have come to you seeking merely to aid you in deciding this helpless young woman's destiny. I thought, I prayed, you would be at once interested in that purpose, and would comprehend the reasonableness of my position."

Hampton sat silent, gazing out of the window, his eyes apparently on the lights now becoming dimly visible in the saloon opposite. For a considerable time he made no move, and the other straightened back in his chair watching him.

"Well!" he ventured at last, "what is your proposition?" The question was quietly asked, but a slight tremor in the low voice told of repressed feeling.

"That, for the present at least, you confide this girl into the care of some worthy woman."

"Have you any such in mind?"

"I have already discussed the matter briefly with Mrs. Herndon, wife of the superintendent of the Golden Rule mines. She is a refined Christian lady, beyond doubt the most proper person to assume such a charge in this camp."

Hampton flung his sodden cigar butt out of the window. "I'll talk it over to-morrow with—with Miss Gillis," he said, somewhat gruffly. "It may be this means a good deal more to me than you suppose, parson, but I'm bound to acknowledge there is considerable hard sense in what you have just said, and I'll talk it over with the girl."

Wynkoop held out his hand cordially and the firm grasp of the other closed over his fingers.

"I don't exactly know why I didn't kick you downstairs," the latter commented, as though still in wonder at himself. "Never remember being quite so considerate before, but I reckon you must have come at me in about the right way."

If Wynkoop answered, his words were indistinguishable, but Hampton remained standing in the open door watching the missionary go down the narrow stairs.

"Nervy little devil," he acknowledged slowly to himself. "And maybe, after all, that would be the best thing for the Kid."

CHAPTER VI.

"To Be or Not to Be."

They were seated rather close together upon the steep hillside, gazing silently down upon squalid Glencaid. At such considerable distance all the dull shabbiness of the mining town had disappeared, and it seemed almost ideal, viewed against the natural background of brown rocks and green trees. Everywhere was loneliness, no sound telling of the labor of man reached them, and the few scattered buildings far below resembling mere doll-houses.

They had conversed only upon the constantly changing beauty of the scene, or of incidents connected with their upward climb, while moving slowly along the trail through the fresh morning sunshine. Now they sat in silence, the young girl, with cheeks flushed and dreamy eyes aglow, gazed far off along the valley, the man watching her curiously, and wondering how best to approach his task.

Observing her now, sitting thus in total unconsciousness of his scrutiny, Hampton made no attempt to analyze the depth of his interest for this waif who had come drifting into his life.

Even to his somewhat prejudiced eyes she was not an attractive creature, for she possessed no clear conception of how to render apparent those few feminine charms she possessed. Negligence and total unconsciousness of self, coupled with lack of womanly companionship and guidance, had left her altogether in the rough. He marked now the coarse ragged shoes, the cheap patched skirt, the tousled auburn hair, the sunburnt cheeks with a suggestion of freckles plainly visible beneath the eyes, and some of the fastidiousness of early days caused him to shrug his shoulders. Yet underneath the tan there was the glow of perfect young health; the eyes were frank, brave, unflinching; while the rounded chin held a world of character in its firm contour. Somehow the sight of this brought back to him that abiding faith in her "dead gameness" which had first awakened his admiration.

"Kid," he ventured at last, "you were talking while we came up the trail about how we'd do this and that after awhile. You don't suppose I'm going to have any useless girl like you hanging around on to me, do you?"

She glanced quickly about at him, as though such unexpected expressions startled her from a pleasant reverie. "Why, I—I thought that was the way you planned it yesterday," she exclaimed, doubtfully.

"Oh, yesterday! Well, you see, yesterday I was sort of dreaming; to-day I am wide awake, and I've about decided, Kid, that for your own good, and my comfort, I've got to shake you."

A sudden gleam of fierce resentment leaped into the dark eyes, the unrestrained glow of a passion which had never known control. "Oh, you have, have you, Mr. Bob Hampton? You have about decided! Well, why don't you altogether decide? I don't think I'm down on my knees begging you for mercy. Good Lord! I reckon I can get along all right without you—I did before. Just what happened to give you such a change of heart?"

"I made the sudden discovery," he said, affecting a laziness he was far from feeling, "that you were too near being a young woman to go traipsing around the country with me, living at shacks, and having no company but gambling sharks, and that class of cattle."

"Oh, did you? What else?"

"Only that our tempers don't exactly seem to jibe, and the two of us can't be bosses in the same ranch."

"I Think You Are a Damned Fool."

She looked at him contemptuously, swinging her body farther around on the rock, and sitting stiffly, the color on her cheeks deepening through the sunburn. "Now see here, Mister Bob Hampton, you're a fraud, and you know it! Didn't I understand exactly who you was, and what was your business? Didn't I know you was a gambler, and a 'bad man?' Didn't I tell you plain enough out yonder"—and her voice faltered slightly—"just what I thought about you? Good Lord! I haven't been begging to stick with you, have I? I just didn't know which way to turn to, after dad was killed, and you sorter hung on to me, and I let it go the way I supposed you wanted it. But I'm not particularly stuck on your style, let me tell you, and I reckon there's plenty of ways for me to get along. Only first, I propose to understand what your little game is. You don't throw down your hand like that without some reason."

Hampton sat up, spurred into instant admiration by such independence of spirit. "You grow rather good-looking, Kid, when you get hot, but you go at things half-cocked, and you've got to get over it. That's the whole trouble—you've never been trained, and I wouldn't make much of a trainer for a high-strung filly like you. Ever remember your mother?"

"Mighty little; reckon she must have died when I was about five years old. That's her picture."

Hampton took in his hand the old-fashioned locket she held out toward him, the long chain still clasped about her throat, and pried open the stiff catch with his knife blade. She bent down to fasten her loosened shoe, and when her eyes were uplifted his gaze was riveted upon the face in the picture.

"Mighty pretty, wasn't she?" she asked, with a sudden girlish interest, bending forward to look, regardless of his strained attitude. "And she was prettier than that, even, the way I remember her best, with her hair all hanging down, coming to tuck me into bed at night. Someway that's how I always seem to see her."

The man drew a deep breath, and snapped shut the locket, yet still retained it in his hand. "Is—is she dead?" he questioned, and his voice trembled in spite of his steel nerves.

"Yes, in St. Louis; dad took me there with him two years ago, and I saw her grave."

"Dad? Do you mean old Gillis?"

She nodded, beginning dimly to wonder why he should speak so fiercely and stare at her in that odd way. He seemed to choke twice before he could ask the next question.

"Did he—old Gillis, I mean—claim to be your father, or her husband?"

"No, I don't reckon he ever did, but he gave me that picture, and told me she was my mother. I always lived with him, and called him dad. I reckon he liked it, and he was mighty good to me. We were at Randolph a long time, and since then he's been post-trader at Bethune. That's all I know about it, for dad never talked very much, and he used to get mad when I asked him questions."

Hampton dropped the locket from his grasp and arose to his feet. For several minutes he stood with his back toward her, apparently gazing down the valley, his jaw set, his dimmed eyes seeing nothing. Slowly the color came creeping into his face, and his hands unclinched. Then he wheeled about, and looked down upon her, completely restored to his old nature.

"Then it seems that it is just you and I, Kid, who have got to settle this little affair," he announced, firmly. "I'll have my say about it, and then you can uncork your feelings. I rather imagine I haven't very much legal right in the premises, but I've got a sort of moral grip on you by reason of having pulled you out alive from that canyon yonder, and I propose to play this game to the limit. You say your mother is dead, and the man who raised you is dead, and, so far as either of us know, there isn't a soul anywhere on earth who possesses any claim over you, or any desire to have. Then, naturally, the whole jack-pot is up to me, provided I've got the cards. Now, Kid, waving your prejudice aside, I ain't just exactly the best man in this world to bring up a girl like you and make a lady out of her. I thought yesterday that maybe we might manage to hitch along together for awhile, but I've got a different think coming to-day. There's no use disfiguring the truth. I'm a gambler, something of a fighter on the side, and folks don't say anything too pleasing about my peaceful disposition around these settlements; I haven't any home, and mighty few friends, and the few I have got are nothing to boast about. I reckon there's a cause for it all. So, considering everything, I'm about the poorest proposition ever was heard of to start a young ladies' seminary. The Lord knows, old Gillis was bad enough, but I'm a damned sight worse. Now, some woman has got to take you in hand, and I reckon I've found the right one."

"Goin' to get married, Bob?"

"Not this year; it's hardly become so serious as that; but I'm going to find you a good home here, and I'm going to put up plenty of stuff, so that they'll take care of you all right and proper."

The dark eyes never wavered as they looked steadily into the gray ones, but the chin quivered slightly.

"I reckon I'd rather try it alone," she announced stubbornly. "Maybe I might have stood it with you, Bob Hampton, but a woman is the limit."

"I expect it will go rather hard at first, Kid," he admitted craftily, "but I think you might try it a while just to sort of please me."

"Who—who is she?" doubtfully.

"Mrs. Herndon, wife of the superintendent of the 'Golden Rule' mine;" and he waved his hand toward the distant houses. "They tell me she's a mighty fine woman."

"Oh, they do? Then somebody's been stirring you up about me, have they? I thought that was about the way of it. Somebody wants to reform me, I reckon. Well, maybe I won't be reformed. Who was it, Bob?"

"The Presbyterian missionary," he confessed reluctantly, "a nervy little chap named Wynkoop; he came in to see me last night while you were asleep." He faced her open scorn unshrinkingly, his mind fully decided, and clinging to one thought with all the tenacity of his nature.

"A preacher!" her voice vibrant with derision, "a preacher! Well, of all things, Bob Hampton! You led around by the nose in that way! Did he want you to bring me to Sunday school? A

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. Among them is a stranger who introduces himself by the name of Hampton, also Gillis, the post trader, and his daughter. Gillis and a majority of the soldiers are killed during a three days' siege.

CHAPTER II.—Hampton offers assistance to the girl, and is at first spurned because he is known as a gambler.

CHAPTER III.—Hampton and the girl only escape from the Indians. They fall exhausted on the plains.

CHAPTER IV.—A company of the Seventh cavalry, Lieut. Brant in command, find Hampton and the girl on the plains, and restore them to consciousness. Hampton announces that he proposes to care for the girl.

Pulling Down a Pillar.

Hailing with satisfaction the "improvement" in our tariff policy that will result from wider latitude in undervaluation, the New York Evening Post remarks that "the abandonment of the old policy (that of attempting to enforce strict honesty in classification and appraisement of imports) is really to pull down one of the pillars of the protective system." Yes; we should say it might ultimately come to that. Correct valuation must of necessity be the chief support of a tariff system in which ad valorem duties are the chief element. Give the exporter consigning goods to himself the privilege of determining values, and you give him the power to determine what tariff he shall pay. The main pillar is pulled down.

IF NOT, WHY NOT?

There was a time when an independent Democrat in Maryland was a rarity, now they can be found by the thousands. The question recurs, are such men any the less Democrats because they are independent? Are they not still Democrats in principle? The independent Democrat will affirm that he is just as good a Democrat by voting according to the dictates of his conscience as are those who support the ticket when they know their party is in the wrong. But why independent Democrats any more than independent Republicans? For answer we have but to refer to the Democrats themselves. For many years prior to 1895 the Democratic party dominated the state, corruption was rampant and the ruling powers unscrupulous and arrogant. The people of the state determined there should be a change. The change came by the election of a Republican governor in the person of the late Lloyd Lowndes, who gave to the state one of the fairest, cleanest and most economical administrations the Commonweath ever had. The election of Gov. Lowndes was due to the independent Democratic vote. From that day to the present the independent Democrats have held the balance of power in the state. That power they will exercise, for the same reasons they exercised it in 1895, when they go in the polls at the state election in November. THE REPUBLICAN is pleased to note an editorial in Tuesday's Baltimore American along this line: "Are there no independent Republican!" says our esteemed contemporary. "If not, why not."

"One may accept this as a pertinent question in the political catechism. It is susceptiple of direct and simple answer. There are no independent Republicans, there is no need for such, and the fact of that negligibility as a class is the finest tribute that could be paid Republican efficiency. The independent is a by-product of bad party government. Like coal tar products, he has magnificent usefulness, but he is no more like the party from which he has been extracted than aniline dyes are like coal tar. If the Democratic party had not shamefully and repeated betrayed the public trust there would not now be the vast unaffiliated political section that sways the election when it has a mind. The existence of the independent Democrat is the keenest censure that could be passed upon the Democratic party, the finest tribute to the worth of the Republican. Were the Republican party like the Democratic, unfaithful to the interests of the people, the woods would be full of independent Republicans. It is folly to assert that their lack indicates the power of bosses over the party. There is any amount of independency in the Republican following; it is the independency bred from Democratic pollutions, but there are no independent Republicans because the Republican party is too efficient to create a shifting class of citizens who would seek to reduce it by voting the Democratic ticket. Shou'd the Republican party ever make the mistakes and be capable of the follies as the Democratic, there would arise hosts of independent Republicans. Their absence makes that party a magnet to which the best element of the people is strongly drawn. When, as in the present campaign, with the platform full of duplicity and trickery and a candidate who cannot command the highest respect the independents are compellingly drawn into the Republican ranks. Through all strata of society runs the cleavage of independent Democrats. These independents are all turning towards the party that has the sagacity to present a candidate like Mr. Gaither for their suffrage and the good sense to offer to the voter a set of principles that will revolutionize and elevate the state in political condition and industrial status. Unless the Democrats mend their ways there will not long be independent Democrats, even sentimentally to consider. They will all be straightout and avowed Republicans."

1895 OVER AGAIN.

The late John E. Hurst was known as a man of good business ability, absolute personal honesty and unimpeachable private character, but when he was nominated for Govenor of Maryland at the Democratic convention by a few politicians, or by one politican, to be more exact, the voters of this State rebelled and elected the late Lloyd Lowndes, Republican, who admittedly gave us one of the best administrations we have ever had. The conditions which existed in 1895 are duplicated today, except that there is a little more reason for independent Democrats to bolt Mr. Crothers than there was for the slaughter of Mr. Hurst. The latter had no political record to condemn him, while the Cecil countain has a record which is not at all what the people of Maryland consider as indicating a suitable candidate for Governor.

As to many of the damaging accusations recently made against Mr. Crothers, THE REPUBLICAN is not in a position to prove or to disprove them, and therefore, can not use them. But it is common knowledge that Mr. Crothers is a machine politician of the type which is so thoroughly exemplified in the Democratic boss of Baltimore county, neither better nor worse, and that is sufficient to condemn him as unfit for the office to which he aspires. But the manner of his nomination was an almost exact parallel to that of Mr. Hurst in 1895. The rank and file of the party had a candidate in 1895 in the person of Judge Fisher, but he was turned down for no other apparent reason than that he was of independent proclivities and could not be handled by the party managers, and Mr. Hurst, who had not been seriously mentioned in connection with the place, was nominated. This year Mr. Joseph D. Baker was put forth by the plain Democrats as the man they wanted, because he seemed most likely to give them an administration on the same lines followed by Governor Warfield, but he was not acceptable to the party managers, and a man almost unheard of as a Gubernatorial candidate was taken up at the close of the eleventh hour and selected as the standard bearer, not of the voters, but of the managers

The nomination of Mr. Gaither, on the other hand, was made in deference to the bestt seniment of both parties. An effort has been made by the machine Democratic advocates to show that similar influences in the Republican party were principally instrumental in the selection of the Republican candidate, but those who are at all familiar with facts know that this is mere nonsense. The fact is that the Republican leaders of the machine type are merely human, and other humans, they wish to win, and it was impressed upon them by independent Democrats that their chances in this regard would be tremendously improved by the nomination of a man whom those independents could support. That the machine politicians finally yielded to the best public sentiment and joined in the support of Mr. Gaither should not be permitted to discredit him, for surely the way of doing good should not be barred to any sinner.

BE FAIR ALL AROUND.

One thing that distinguishes President Roosevelt's attitude toward corporations from others is his intelligent appreciation of their utility and of their rights. He is not waging war against capital or legitimate business enterprises. What he is doing, is to say to the railroads, "You shall not discriminate." Secret rates to aid individuals or corporations in getting the advantage over their competitors, must cease. In the end such a policy will be to advantage of all responsible business concerns. Some are beginning to appreciate the difference between Roosevelt's methods and Bryanism and Hearstism. For example to force a two-cent rate on a Southern railroad when that road runs through a sparsely settled territory, and such a rate means an actual loss to the company, is just as reprehensible in the people as it is for the railroad to use its power to oppress. Speaking of the rate in Georgia, the Savannah Press says:

"The people of Georgia do not want cheap rates as much as they want fair rates. They do not care for good accommodations and schedules at the expense of the railroad companies. The spirit of fair play, so highly developed in our people is opposed to senseless attacks and uncalled-for legislation."

Only this week a Philadelphia Court decided that the two-cent rate law enacted by the Pennsylvania legislature is unreasonable and issued an injunction forbidding its enforcement.

Notice to Voters of Garrett County.

The Prohibition County Convention will be held in the old Auditorium, Mt. Lake Park, Saturday, September 21st, at 2.30 p. m. All voters interested in this reform movement are urged to be present and have a voice in nominating county ticket. All prohibition voters will have a voice in this convention.

Also, I desire to open correspondence with each prohibition voter before that date. Write me and let me know where you stand on this question.

H. N. CUPPETT,
County Chairman.

Harvest Home Picnic a Success.

A postal from Rev. J. B. Shoup, of Bittinger, mailed to this office from Highfield, Pa., states that "the Meadow Mountain Harvest Home picnic on Saturday last was a most gratifying success in every way. Weather was resplendent, roads good, attendance liberal and good-fellowship royal. Prof. Groves and his singers, with Miss Rhoades at the organ, did themselves proud. Revs. Wade, Bastian and George gave us admirable talks. The committee realized a nice sum in aid of church repairs and everybody is highly pleased. All in all, the best picnic of the season."

THE ALBAY NORMAL INSTITUTE

Mr. Charles E. Hoye's School In the Philippines.

The Albay Normal Institute closed July 31, completing a twenty days term. Enrollment by grades (old style) was as follows: 4th, 76 students; 5th, 54; 6th, 20; 7th, 6; total, 156 students, 106 of whom were males and 50 females.

No students were admitted who had not completed the primary course. Most of the 5th grade (new style) teachers will complete that grade during the present school year, and it is hoped that it will not be necessary to have a 5th grade in the next Normal.

In addition to the subjects usually taught special attention was given to Government of the Phillipines, the homestead and election laws. Instruction in music was confined to learning easy songs adapted to primary schools, such as "Papaya," "Rice Song," etc. Other features of the period for opening exercises were spelling, geography and arithmetic matches, short addresses, and instruction in manners and morals by means of stories and maxims.

The whole afternoon session of one hour and fifteen minutes was devoted to industrial classes. Classes in agriculture, carpentry, weaving, pottery, bamboo furniture making, sewing and busy work were organized, each in chafge of an American or Insular teacher; the province also employed a practical furniture maker, a hat weaver and a basket weaver to assist. All work was practical and articles of standard size were made. In the agriculture classes half of the time was devoted to theory and half to garden work. Every afternoon teachers and students dressed for work and showed a commendable disposition to learn and labor.

Every fair evening base ball games, track events or tennis games took place on the plaza. A series of base ball games was played between students from the five atlethic districts of the province. The championship was won by the 2nd district team, composed of the towns of Ligao, Guinobatan and Camalig. In track events the final score was Ligao, 26 points, High School, 18, Camalig, 15, and Libon, 3.

Students were very faithful in attendance, the percentage for the term being 99½.

The Bicol reputation for order and obedience was maintained in the Normal by excellent deportment; not one complaint was made to the principal by teachers or students.

The success of the Normal was due alike to the untiring and harmonious work of the teachers and to the faithfulness and application of the students.

The teachers were Mr. Hoye, Principal, Mr. and Mrs. McGregor, Mr. and Mrs. Baldridge, Miss Lladoc, Messrs. Cutler, Pickell, Stine, Martinos and Belsa. Messrs. Hall and Little of the High School, also taught carpentry and music, respectively.

C. E. HOYE.

Albay, P. I., July 7th.

FIKE.

The weather during the last week has been cool, although the rain has made the ground so wet that the farmers can scarcely get any plowing done for wheat.

The thrashing of grain is finished in this section and the largest yield was obtained by Mr. F. F. Fike who threshed 60 dozen of oats and received 80½ bushels.

Beulah Conner, daughter of Mr. Jonas Conner, died at Mr. F. T. Fike's Sept. 12, 1907. Interment was made the following day at Fearer, Md. The little girl's mother has been dead for some time and her father had put the little girl out to strangers at several different places. She was so badly treated that at last he took her with him to Mr. Fike's and called a doctor.

The teachers of this place have made their return from the Institute and they say the institute was very interesting and instructive.

The people of this vicinity are nearly all suffering with bad colds.

Miss Effie Guard has secured the school at this place.

Mr. Wm. H. Thomas and wife and Mrs. Wm. L. Thomas and daughter were callers at Mr. F. T. Fike one day last week.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

We are now having some of the good weather that was due in August.

Capt. and Mrs. J. A. Hayden were in Westernport, Md., Monday, returnhome in the evening accompanied by their grand-daughter Margaret Virginia Hayden. While in Westernport their son Grant's family was increased by the addition of a daughter.

Policeman May resigned the office to take effect Monday, and James Anderson was appointed to the position by the Annual Committee.

Dr. W. W. Davis will give an illustrated lecture Thursday evening, September 26th, in the Hall of Philosophy, for the benefit of Mr. Thomas Harris, who has been so afflicted as to be unable to work for many months. He is a very worthy citizen and should receive a substantial benefit. If you can't attend the lecture you can buy a ticket.

Miss Eleanor Davis left Saturday for Baltimore to enter school. She was accompanied by her father, Dr. W. W. Davis.

Mrs. Ada Lee, India Missionary, will preach in the M. E. church Sunday at 11 a. m. and the pastor will preach at 8 p. m. All invited and welcome.

Miss Sallie Harris was taken seriously ill Monday last. She is now much better but quite indisposed.

Most of our cottagers are still with us and also quite a number of boarders still linger on the mountain top.

Mrs. Squires is at Westernport for a few days.

Mr. Lou. Prevost will soon return to Washington to pursue his studies. He will receive a diploma next June as a veterinary surgeon.

Mrs. Dr. Laughlin returned Tuesday from a visit to friends in Grafton.

Mrs. McQuay, who has been so seriously ill for several weeks, is much improved but is still confined to her cottage.

Mr. and Mrs. Levi Echard left Wednesday morning to visit relatives and friends in Pennsylvania. Mr. Echard's health is much improved.

IF NOT, WHY NOT?

There was a time when an independent Democrat in Maryland was a rarity, now they can be found by the thousands. The question recurs, are such men any the less Democrats because they are independent? Are they not still Democrats in principle? The independent Democrat will affirm that he is just as good a Democrat by voting according to the dictates of his conscience as are those who support the ticket when they know their party is in the wrong. But why independent Democrats any more than independent Republicans? For answer we have but to refer to the Democrats themselves. For many years prior to 1895 the Democratic party dominated the state, corruption was rampant and the ruling powers unscrupulons and arrogant. The people of the state determined there should be a change. The change came by the election of a Republican governor in the person of the late Lloyd Lowndes, who gave to the state one of the fairest, cleanest and most economical administrations the Commonweath ever had. The election of Gov. Lowndes was due to the independent Democratic vote. From that day to the present the independent Democrats have held the balance of power in the state. That power they will exercise, for the same reasons they exercised it in 1895, when they go in the polls at the state election in November. THE REPUBLICAN is pleased to note an editorial in Tuesday's Baltimore American along this line: "Are there no independent Republican!" says our esteemed contemporary. "If not, why not."

"One may accept this as a pertinent question in the political catechism. It is susceptiple of direct and simple answer. There are no independent Republicans, there is no need for such, and the fact of that negligibility as a class is the finest tribute that could be paid Republican efficiency. The independent is a by-product of bad party government. Like coal tar products, he has magnificent usefulness, but he is no more like the party from which he has been extracted than aniline dyes are like coal tar. If the Democratic party had not shamefully and repeated betrayed the public trust there would not now be the vast unaffiliated political section that sways the election when it has a mind. The existence of the independent Democrat is the keenest censure that could be passed upon the Democratic party, the finest tribute to the worth of the Republican. Were the Republican party like the Democratic, unfaithful to the interests of the people, the woods would be full of independent Republicans. It is folly to assert that their lack indicates the power of bosses over the party. There is any amount of independency in the Republican following; it is the independency bred from Democratic pollutions, but there are no independent Republicans because the Republican party is too efficient to create a shifting class of citizens who would seek to reduce it by voting the Democratic ticket. Should the Republican party ever make the mistakes and be capable of the follies as the Democratic, there would arise hosts of independent Republicans. Their absence makes that party a magnet to which the best element of the people is strongly drawn. When, as in the present campaign, with the platform full of duplicity and trickery and a candidate who cannot command the highest respect the independents are compellingly drawn into the Republican ranks. Through all strata of society runs the cleavage of independent Democrats. These independents are all turning towards the party that has the sagacity to present a candidate like Mr. Gaither for their suffrage and the good sense to offer to the voter a set of principles that will revolutionize and elevate the state in political condition and industrial status. Unless the Democrats mend their ways there will not long be independent Democrats, even sentimentally to consider. They will all be straightout and avowed Republicans."

1895 OVER AGAIN.

The late John E. Hurst was known as a man of good business ability, absolute personal honesty and unimpeachable private character, but when he was nominated for Govenor of Maryland at the Democratic convention by a few politicians, or by one politican, to be more exact, the voters of this State rebelled and elected the late Lloyd Lowndes, Republican, who admittedly gave us one of the best administrations we have ever had. The conditions which existed in 1895 are duplicated today, except that there is a little more reason for independent Democrats to bolt Mr. Crothers than there was for the slaughter of Mr. Hurst. The latter had no political record to condemn him, while the Cecil countain has a record which is not at all what the people of Maryland consider as indicating a suitable candidate for Governor.

As to many of the damaging accusations recently made against Mr. Crothers, THE REPUBLICAN is not in a position to prove or to disprove them, and therefore, can not use them. But it is common knowledge that Mr. Crothers is a machine politician of the type which is so thoroughly exemplified in the Democratic boss of Baltimore county, neither better nor worse, and that is sufficient to condemn him as unfit for the office to which he aspires. But the manner of his nomination was an almost exact parallel to that of Mr. Hurst in 1895. The rank and file of the party had a candidate in 1895 in the person of Judge Fisher, but he was turned down for no other apparent reason than that he was of independent proclivities and could not be handled by the party managers, and Mr. Hurst, who had not been seriously mentioned in connection with the place, was nominated. This year Mr. Joseph D. Baker was put forth by the plain Democrats as the man they wanted, because he seemed most likely to give them an administration on the same lines followed by Governor Warfield, but he was not acceptable to the party managers, and a man almost unheard of as a Gubernatorial candidate was taken up at the close of the eleventh hour and selected as the standard bearer, not of the voters, but of the managers.

The nomination of Mr. Gaither, on the other hand, was made in deference to the bestt seniment of both parties. An effort has been made by the machine Democratic advocates to show that similar influences in the Republican party were principally instrumental in the selection of the Republican candidate, but those who are at all familiar with facts know that this is mere nonsense. The fact is that the Republican leaders of the machine type are merely human, and other humans, they wish to win, and it was impressed upon them by independent Democrats that their chances in this regard would be tremendously improved by the nomination of a man whom those independents could support. That the machine politicians finally yielded to the best public sentiment and joined in the support of Mr. Gaither should not be permitted to discredit him, for surely the way of doing good should not be barred to any sinner.

BE FAIR ALL AROUND.

One thing that distinguishes President Roosevelt's attitude toward corporations from others is his intelligent appreciation of their utility and of their rights. He is not waging war against capital or legitimate business enterprises. What he is doing, is to say to the railroads, "You shall not discriminate." Secret rates to aid individuals or corporations in getting the advantage over their competitors, must cease. In the end such a policy will be to advantage of all responsible business concerns. Some are beginning to appreciate the difference between Roosevelt's methods and Bryanism and Hearstism. For example to force a two-cent rate on a Southern railroad when that road runs through a sparsely settled territory, and such a rate means an actual loss to the company, is just as reprehensible in the people as it is for the railroad to use its power to oppress. Speaking of the rate in Georgia, the Savannah Press says:

"The people of Georgia do not want cheap rates as much as they want fair rates. They do not care for good accommodations and schedules at the expense of the railroad companies. The spirit of fair play, so highly developed in our people is opposed to senseless attacks and uncalled-for legislation."

Only this week a Philadelphia Court decided that the two-cent rate law enacted by the Pennsylvania legislature is unreasonable and issued an injunction forbidding its enforcement.

Notice to Voters of Garrett County.

The Prohibition County Convention will be held in the old Auditorium, Mt. Lake Park, Saturday, September 21st, at 2.30 p. m. All voters interested in this reform movement are urged to be present and have a voice in nominating county ticket. All prohibition voters will have a voice in this convention.

Also, I desire to open correspondence with each prohibition voter before that date. Write me and let me know where you stand on this question.

H. N. CUPPETT,
County Chairman.

Harvest Home Picnic a Success.

A postal from Rev. J. B. Shoup, of Bittinger, mailed to this office from Highfield, Pa., states that "the Meadow Mountain Harvest Home picnic on Saturday last was a most gratifying success in every way. Weather was resplendent, roads good, attendance liberal and good-fellowship royal. Prof. Groves and his singers, with Miss Rhoades at the organ, did themselves proud. Revs. Wade, Bastian and George gave us admirable talks. The committee realized a nice sum in aid of church repairs and everybody is highly pleased. All in all, the best picnic of the season."

THE ALBAY NORMAL INSTITUTE

Mr. Charles E. Hoye's School In the Philippines.

The Albay Normal Institute closed July 31, completing a twenty days term. Enrollment by grades (old style) was as follows: 4th, 76 students; 5th, 54; 6th, 20; 7th, 6; total, 156 students, 106 of whom were males and 50 females.

No students were admitted who had not completed the primary course. Most of the 5th grade (new style) teachers will complete that grade during the present school year, and it is hoped that it will not be necessary to have a 5th grade in the next Normal.

In addition to the subjects usually taught special attention was given to Government of the Phillipines, the homestead and election laws. Instruction in music was confined to learning easy songs adapted to primary schools, such as "Papaya," "Rice Song," etc. Other features of the period for opening exercises were spelling, geography and arithmetic matches, short addresses, and instruction in manners and morals by means of stories and maxims.

The whole afternoon session of one hour and fifteen minutes was devoted to industrial classes. Classes in agriculture, carpentry, weaving, pottery, bamboo furniture making, sewing and busy work were organized, each in chafge of an American or Insular teacher; the province also employed a practical furniture maker, a hat weaver and a basket weaver to assist. All work was practical and articles of standard size were made. In the agriculture classes half of the time was devoted to theory and half to garden work. Every afternoon teachers and students dressed for work and showed a commendable disposition to learn and labor.

Every fair evening base ball games, track events or tennis games took place on the plaza. A series of base ball games was played between students from the five atlethic districts of the province. The championship was won by the 2nd district team, composed of the towns of Ligao, Guinobatan and Camalig. In track events the final score was Ligao, 26 points, High School, 18, Camalig, 15, and Libon, 3.

Students were very faithful in attendance, the percentage for the term being 99½.

The Bicol reputation for order and obedience was maintained in the Normal by excellent deportment; not one complaint was made to the principal by teachers or students.

The success of the Normal was due alike to the untiring and harmonious work of the teachers and to the faithfulness and application of the students.

The teachers were Mr. Hoye, Principal, Mr. and Mrs. McGregor, Mr. and Mrs. Baldridge, Miss Lladoc, Messrs. Cutler, Pickell, Stine, Martinos and Belsa. Messrs. Hall and Little of the High School, also taught carpentry and music, respectively.

C. E. HOYE.

Albay, P. I., July 7th.

FIKE.

The weather during the last week has been cool, although the rain has made the ground so wet that the farmers can scarcely get any plowing done for wheat.

The thrashing of grain is finished in this section and the largest yield was obtained by Mr. F. F. Fike who threshed 60 dozen of oats and received 80½ bushels.

Beulah Conner, daughter of Mr. Jonas Conner, died at Mr. F. T. Fike's Sept. 12, 1907. Interment was made the following day at Fearer, Md. The little girl's mother has been dead for some time and her father had put the little girl out to strangers at several different places. She was so badly treated that at last he took her with him to Mr. Fike's and called a doctor.

The teachers of this place have made their return from the Institute and they say the institute was very interesting and instructive.

The people of this vicinity are nearly all suffering with bad colds.

Miss Effie Guard has secured the school at this place.

Mr. Wm. H. Thomas and wife and Mrs. Wm. L. Thomas and daughter were callers at Mr. F. T. Fike one day last week.

They state that they have enjoyed their vacation throughout and returned greatly refreshed and in splendid health.—Grafton Republican.

Work is a moral and physical uplifter; it is a panacea for sorrow; idleness brings moral decay and furnishes an incentive to crime. The avalanche of crime that is sweeping over our beautiful land is largely due to the fact that too many would rather steal than work. The life of duty, not the life of mere pleasure, is the kind of life which makes the great men and women. The first prize that life offers is the chance to work at work worth doing.

The Youghioghen Camping Club composed of Messrs. Gorden Mealy, Ralph Weber, Wilbur Davis, Will Lawton, "Teddy" Mason and Paul Naylor, of Oakland, and Charles Mealy and John Duncan, of Baltimore, after spending two weeks camping on the South Branch of the Potomac, returned to their homes last Saturday afternoon. The campers state that they had an unusually good time, even though the fishing was not what it was expected to be. This was due to too much rain.

OPENING OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Enrollment Very Gratifying to the Instructors and Good Work Expected.

The Oakland public and High Schools opened very auspiciously on Monday morning of this week with a large number of pupils enrolled in the grades and a good enrollment in the four classes of the High School.

In the grades the enrollment of pupils in numbers and the names of the teachers follows:

Primary department, 53 pupils—Miss Miller.

Secondary department, Second grade, 45 pupils—Miss Browning; Third grade, 48 pupils—Miss Loughridge.

Intermediate department, Fourth grade, 33 pupils—Miss Dunham; Fifth grade—Miss Leary.

Grammer department, Sixth grade, 24 pupils—Miss Hamill; Seventh grade, 18 pupils—Miss Hamill.

High School, Junior First, 26 pupils; Junior Second, 18 pupils; Senior First, 3 pupils; Senior Second, 3 pupils—Morris K. Turnerf Principal, and Leonard E. Bassett, Vice Principal.

The work in manual training under the supervision of H. A. Loraditch will be given to all the pupils in the school and will include water color work in the primary, secondary, and intermediate grades, perspective drawing in the grammer grades and mechanical drawing in the high school completes this work.

Students Return to School.

Many of the young men of Oakland, who have spent from one to three years at school in other portions of the country, have resumed their studies. Among those who have returned to school the following have been noted: Ernest Ashby and Philip Peddicord, to Western Maryland College, Westminster; Gordon Mealy, Ralph Thayer and Paul Naylor, to West Virginia University, Morgantown; Milton and Edward Sincell, to Gettysburg College, Gettysburg, Pa.; H. J. Hudson, to St. John's College, Annapolis. Mr. Harry McComas has entered Mercersburg Academy, at Mercersburg, Pa., and Miss Anna Gonder, St. Mary's College.

Lumber Company Organizes.

The Potomac Lumber Company, a coporation incorporated under the laws of Maryland organized Friday at Cumberland, by electing Mr. U. G Carl president; John E. Harvey, of Gorman, Garrett county, vice-president; Wm. A. Harvey, of the same place, secretary and treasurer, and Jacob F. Lee, general manager. The company will work timber lands in and about Gormania, W. Va.

The addition to Dr. M. C. Hinebaugh's residence, which he will use for hospital purposes, is nearing completion and when finished it will be fitted up in the most modern method with sanitary furnishings, etc., and be in charge of a skilled nurse. The building will accommodate a number of patients and will also have attached to it an operating room, baths, and other conveniences, making it a model hospital which will suffice for present needs.

Don't be afraid to do your duty because some on eridicules or opposes you. A man who has opinions of his own and the courage to advocate them will be sure to have opinions; but just keep right ahead if your cause is right and your conscience clear. Don't worry about what other people say; life is too short for that. Some will abuse you through envy, others for the want of principle and some because they honestly differ from you; but if you keep right on openly, manfully and intelligently, and with your proper dignity of character, honesty of purpose and self-respect those who differ from you will respect your opinions.

Talking of intemperance, did you ever notice that fathers of drinking boys are seldom found in the thick fight against whiskey? An overwhelming precent of the active agitators are men who have never personally experienced that awful havoc wrought in the family circle by dissipated sons. Ninety-nine per cent of those who drink from the habit before they are of legal age—when it is a crime to either sell or give them the stuff. If all men would resolve, at this critical period, that the man who put the bottle to their son's lips should suffer the consequences the result would be more gratifying. But so long as parents are indifferent present conditions will continue.

Rev. Dr. D. H. Lee, accompanied by his two intelligent little boys, and his niece, Miss Lee, of California, were visitors to Oakland on Saturday last. On next Friday Rev. and Mrs. Lee, their sons, and five young people, two gentlemen and three ladids, will leave for New York city, where on the 28th inst. they will embark for Liverpool, England. After a week spent in the British Islands they will re-embark for Calcutta, India, expecting to reach their destination via the Suez Canal sometime during the latter part of October. The young people accompanying Rev. and Mrs. Lee will become missionaries and will be attached to the Lee Memorial Mission at Calcutta.

NEARLY BLED TO DEATH.

After Severing Artery Thomas Roy Walked to Town and then Fainted.

Thomas Roy, who lives near the farm of Col. John E. Wood, cut his leg with an axe Tuesday morning severing a large artery near his knee. He bandaged the injury as well as he could and then walked to town, a distance of about three miles. Arriving here his condition was apparent owing to his weakened condition and he was helped into the office of Dr. John E Legge, where he fainted from the loss of blood.

As soon as possible the severed artery was picked up and closed by the doctor and restoratives administered. Mr. Roy regained consciousness in about half an hour and later he was taken to his home by Deputy Sheriff Oliver Lee.

GRANTSVILLE.

Our schools opened Monday with the same teachers as last year—Prof. King and Miss Rose Callahan. We are glad to have them back.

Prof. Edward Bender, who has been spending his vacation here, will leave for Juniata College, Huntington, Pa., this week. We wish him success in all of his undertakings.

Melven Broadwater has returned to school at Annapolis. Olin, his brother, has gone to Cumberland to school. We wish the boys well.

Dr. G. C. Keller and wife made a flying trip to Cumberland last week.

Mr. Chas. Bill is clerking in Bender's store since Mr. Bender's illness.

The sick in our town are still improving. We hope for their speedy recovery.

Joel Beachy wears a smile. It's a girl.

Mr. Josiah Durst and family and several others from this place attended Buffalo Bill's show at Cumberland last Friday.

Call for Your Letters.

Wm. B. Bassell, M. D., H R. Boyer, M. Edith Beidener, C. P. Grimes, Rebecca Hill, Mrs. Kate Hodgkins, Mrs Ada Lee, W. E. Orrell, Mamie Paten, Mrs. Lillie Sullivan, Wm. Blum, Gilbert Damon, Mrs. Isidor Fogelin (2), Hannah Greenwood, Rebecca Hill (card), Mahlon Railey (3), Mrs. G. Shrims.

Notice.

This is to give notice that the undersigned will not be responsible for any debts contracted by James Cooper, otherwise known as James Kelso, he having passed from under my control by mutual consent of parties interested.

NEW GERMANY.

We are glad to know our schools all have teachers for the year. They have been appointed as follows: Truman Bittinger, Jennings; Ross C. Durst Manadier; Clarance Bittinger, Fair View.

Miss Huldah Wiley was visiting friends here on Sunday.

Mrs. Ashford Warnick was stricken with paralysis one day last week and is in a critical condition.

Miss Dora Durst has returned home after spending a week with her brother at Oakland.

Ross Durst attended the Teacher's Institute at Oakland last week.

Messrs Meyers and Bittinger are in this section with their threshing machine.

Clarence Glotfelty was calling on friends at Bittinger last Saturday.

James M. Durst is building an additon to his house.

Rev. McCoy will preach his farewell sermon Sunday.

STRUCK IT RICH.

Col. McGraw Has Struck a Splendid Gasser.

Friday morning at ten o'clock, on the Hugh Evans farm near Prunytown in the McGraw Oil & Gas Company's field the finest gasser yet struck was drilled in. The well was down about 600 feet and had struck the Gordon sand only about six feet when the gas rushed forth in great volumue. The well is located about thirty-four hundred feet from the well on the Evans place, near the residence and word comes from the premises that the new well is a better producer than all the balance put together. There are now six wells in all in the McGraw field, all of them producers, and the one that was drilled in Friday guarantees a big flow of gas with which Grafton and adjoining territory may be supplied. Indeed, if the reports are correct, there is no reason why the McGraw Oil & Gas Company, cannot supply this whole section of country exclusively and at rates that would insure for the company nearly if not all of the business. Other wells will put down in that field, and it is the intention also of the promoters to shortly put down test wells in other parts of the county. Col. McGraw went into the oil business all by his lonesome, with a great deal to gain if successful, and every body is congratulating him.—Grafton Sentinel.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break it head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child. If there is feverishness, night or day, Heveth probably flies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggist giving you

Writes Some More Poetry For Friends Along the Route.

MRS. LEE STARTS HIM A-GOING

"The Tragedy of the Six Rail Fence; or, The Taking Off of J. William Hooper, the Cooper"—"The Tragedy of the Haystack," Etc.

[Copyright, 1907, by C. H. Sutcliffe.]

When I got along to Farmer Lee's the other day after being off my route for a month I found Mrs. Lee at the gate and gave her a cheery salute. Instead of replying she beckoned me to get down and follow her around the house. There she pointed to her daughter Hannah, who sat on the ground with her back to an apple tree and her attitude full of the deepest dejection, and said:

"Abe, isn't that enough to make a heart of stone ache?"

"But what's happened?" I asked.

"Come into the kitchen and get ready to write some poetry. We have been waiting for you for a whole week. If Hannah's life is to be saved at all it will be your poetry that will do it."

HIS HEAD WAS DOWN; HIS HEELS WERE UP.

Thereupon she gave me the particulars of a tragedy which I have here entitled "The Tragedy of the Six Rail Fence; or, The Taking Off of J. William Hooper, the Cooper."

Sweet Hannah Lee, with eyes so blue,
She loved J. William Hooper,
Who in the village 'neath the hill
Pursued the trade of cooper.

They'd loved each other for a year—
Their love was smoothly running—
And neither had the least idea
That death would come a-gunning.

'Twas midnight of a Sunday night.
The twain had been a-courting,
And squeezing hands, as lovers do,
And otherwise cavorting.

When William started for his home,
A fond "Good night" a-calling,
And as he called the soft winds sighed,
And dewlike tears was falling.

In climbing o'er a six rail fence
J. William struck a sliver.
The sliver caught his trousers, and—
A gasp, a shout, a shiver.

He called for help, but called in vain.
No one was near to hear him,
No friendly hand to boost him up,
No tongue to gladly cheer him.

His head was down. His heels were up
Alas, the sad position!
No lover e'er before was placed
In such a sad condition.

And thus J. William met his doom,
And thus his life was ended.
And thus they found his body cold,
From that 'ere fence suspended.

Oh, lovers, take a tip from me—
Keep off of six rail fences,
Look out for slivers as you climb
Or take the consequences.

Mother Wept Softly.

While I was reading the verses after writing them the mother wept softly, but a moment afterward brushed her tears away and said:

"Abe, you have saved Hannah. You can go along now, and I will go out and read them to her, one verse at a time. She will fall a-weeping, the same as I did, but by the time I have reached the last verse I'll bet you anything she stands up and asks for a glass of buttermilk from this morning's churning. May Heaven bless you to the last day of your life!"

I jogged along down to Farmer Carter's to find that something had also happened there. At least, Mrs. Carter had got news that a sister of hers out in Dakota was dead. When she had read me the letter and begged for a few verses to commemorate the occasion, I sat down and wrote "The Tragedy of the Haystack and the Pitchfork, Being a Sad Warning to Cavorting Schoolma'ams. To Be Sung Mostly in the Evening:"

It was out in far Dakota, where the prairie breezes blow,
And the prairie dog becometh chicken pie,
And the blizzards of the winter doth freeze the marrowbones,
And the heat of summer makes the marrow fry.

Sister Nettie, she was out there, a-teaching of a school—
Sister Nettie, with her spirits all so gay,
The scholars loved her dearly, and so did all the folks,
For our sister had a sweet and gentle way.

One afternoon in summer time—we never shall forget—
Our Nettie dear went wandering o'er the lea.
She culled the gentle daisy, she culled the vi-o-let,
She patted on the back the bumblebee.

By and by she reached a haystack, and in her loving way,
And not thinking any danger hided there,
She went climbing to the top, like a kitten up a tree,
And the picture she presented it was fair.

While sitting on the summit, all innocent of guile,
A hornet came along on lazy wing,
And he lifted our dear sister some forty inches high,
And the yell that she did utter it made the welkin ring.

Our sister, she was frightened and suffering with pain.
The same would been the case with you or me.
Down the stack she went a-rolling, and there was a tragedy,
And the trag was something awful for to see.

A pitchfork it was lurking to pierce her maiden heart—
One gasp our sister gave and was no more.
One little sigh of sadness, and then she sailed away
And went her way a-winging toward the golden shore.

Oh, sisters in Dakota or in any other land,
A warning let me give you ere I close:
Beware of lurking pitchforks. Beware of hornet stings.
Beware of turning frolics into woes.

"Abe," said the tearful Mrs. Carter as I read the above in my most pathetic voice, "there have been some touching and beautiful things written, but never anything to equal this. Those verses shall be framed and hung in the parlor, and I don't care if the frame costs all of 50 cents. Poor Nettie! She is looking down on you at this moment and whispering in my ear that when you come back this way you will find a two pound roll of butter ready for you to take along."

Aids the Johnsons.

I had one more brain storm to go through. At Farmer Johnson's I found the good wife in tears and the husband looking very serious. A nephew living in Ohio had been drowned in the Ohio river while fishing, and after I had drunk a glass of buttermilk and eaten the half of an apple pie I sat down and wrote the following touching tribute:

We mourn for Johnny Baker, who's lying 'neath the sod,
Who was the dearest nephew that we had.
His face was like an angel's, his age was over twelve,
And his nature didn't run at all to bad.

He went to Sunday school, and he always said his prayers,
And his mother cal-cu-lated by and by
That he should be a preacher and in the pulpit stand
And with the other preachers have a try.

But alas for human planning, alas for Johnny B.,
He wanted to go fishing t'other day.
He had dreamed of catching suckers and hauling in the bass
And of seeing the big catfish at their play.

He promised to be careful and to fish upon the land
And to keep the raging river rods away.
He would mind his loving mother and sit him in the grass
And all of her injunctions would obey.

But they found him in the river when the sun was going down—
The water it had choked him quite to death.
The doctor came and felt him, but said it was too late.
He'd died because a-losing of his breath.

Oh, Johnnies, and, oh, Jimmies—oh, Peters, and, oh, Sams,
Oh, boys who would go out with line and pole,
Do your fishing in the washtub or in the kitchen sink
And catch your giddy suckers in a roadside water hole.

M. QUAD.

He Had Inside Information.

She was the daughter of an aristocratic widow, and to the widow the young man went and demanded the daughter's hand.

The mother received him haughtily.

"Am I to understand," she coldly asked, "that you profess to be able to support my child in the style to which she is accustomed?"

The young man dared to smile.

"Oh, I know all about the accustomed style," he glibly said. "Your former cook is working for my mother."

He got the girl without any further delay.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

When Greek Meets Greek.

"Some are born great," began the tiresome quoter, "some achieve greatness"—

"Yes, that reminds me," interrupted Popley. "Our baby weighed twelve pounds when he was born, and the doctor said that— Hello! Going? What's your hurry?"—Catholic Standard and Times.

Not Him.

Little Boy—No. I doesn't read 'em, sur.—Punch.

After the Show.

Comedian—No; I think he gets more curtain lectures.—Chicago News.

Two Sides to It.

"He isn't in our social set any more."

"So I understand."

"Yes, he dropped out some time ago."

"Indeed? He gave me to understand he had climbed out."—Pick-Me-Up.

His Purpose.

Henry C. Frick, the steel man, was once a guest at a dinner when he was unexpectedly called upon to respond to a toast. Recovering somewhat from his surprise, Mr. Frick said that his situation reminded him of the case of a Pennsylvania man who fell into the water while fishing.

With no little difficulty he was rescued, and after he had regained his breath and was in a fairly comfortable condition his rescuer asked him how he came to fall into the water.

"I did not come to fall into the water," replied the unfortunate man. "I came to fish."—Harper's Weekly.

All She Saw of Him.

"And you are very lonely without your husband now?" asked the late Mrs. Mary Livermore of a young acquaintance whose other half had gone to Europe on business.

"Yes, a little lonely," was the qualified answer.

"But surely," said Mrs. Livermore, "you miss your husband very much now that he is away?"

The other laughed bitterly.

"Oh, no," she said. "At breakfast I just stand his newspaper up in front of his plate and half the time I forget that he isn't there."—Woman's Home Companion.

A Modest Wish.

"When he gets a chance to stand up and address an audience he seems to be perfectly happy."

"Not perfectly happy. He can't help wishing that he was part of the audience at the same time, so that he might applaud himself as he deserved."—Philadelphia Press.

"Oi am thot. Oi nearly raced mesilf to dith troyin' to ketch a Welsh rabbit. But yez finger is bladin'. Phwat is th' trouble, me bye?"

"Oh, Oi got bit by a mock turtle."—St. Louis Republic.

Social Distinction.

"You have very few social distinctions in this country," said the foreigner.

"Haven't, eh?" rejoined the New York man. "You just ought to hear a high priced soprano talk to a chorus woman."—Des Moines Register.

Not Charlie's Gum.

"Now, Charlie," said the sweet faced little woman, "before you come into Sunday school don't you think it would be nice to take your gum out of your mouth?"

"Yessum, but it ain't mine; it's my brudder's."—New York Press.

Not Too Grasping.

Mr. Severe—You dare to accost me? Don't you know that the ancients used to quarter beggars for begging on the public streets?

The Beggar—Quarter them? Gracious, mister, I'd be satisfied if you dimed me.—Houston Post.

Plenty of Motive Power.

"Do you believe that booster when he says he has invented a real airship?"

"Why not? He says he is going to propel it by means of hot air."—Baltimore American.

A Way of Wisdom

By Addie Dunham Huxford.

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

"So Dave Albrook has come back again from Colorado as poor as he went—dead broke, I hear. Well, I didn't think he'd make his fortune there, any more than he did in Australia; he isn't the kind that ever gets to the top of the heap."

Farmer Bowden's tone betrays rather more of satisfaction with his own perspicacity than of pity for the "poor devil" of whom he speaks. It is the way of the world, we all know, to "kick a man when he's down."

"He's been unfortunate, 'tis true." Widow Durrell's voice is a shade more compassionate, though she has a profound respect for the opinion of her neighbor and gossip, Farmer Bowden. "They say it's capital he's always lacked to make his plans successful; but he's willing enough to work, so he can't be altogether shiftless."

"He's been a rolling stone; no wonder he's gathered no moss," rejoins the farmer, oracularly. "I suppose he'll be glad to get work at anything now, for awhile, anyway," thoughts of sinewy Dave Albrook swinging the scythe in his "low meadows" running pleasantly through his practical mind.

"Why, haven't you heard?" in surprise just tinged with satisfaction. "Miss Genie's hired him on her place, to take charge of everything—working foreman, she calls it—you know, she oversees the farm herself. She's got to have some one in Ezra's place, since he's laid up with the rheumatism, and I'm quite sure that if Dave steadies down and sticks to the business, he'll get into a good, permanent position; for I've heard Miss Genie say that she intended to pension old Ezra off as soon as she could get a man in his place."

While thus her friends and neighbors gossip kindly about her, Genie Moray goes her way, serenely, fancy-free and independent, being a law unto herself. An only child, the broad lands and fine blooded stock comprising the prosperous dairy farm of which she is the wise and happy mistress, came to her from a careful father.

Nobody knows what bright, kindly memories of the old days when she went to school with blue-eyed Dave, rise up in Genie Moray's heart and move her to give him this good situation on her farm, second in authority only to herself; but she lives on simply in the old ways, neither seeking nor avoiding him, but seeing a good deal of him, naturally, and being unavoidably much in his company, as he makes one of the family now.

Her frequent jaunts about the farm are mostly with him, as a matter of course, but there is a general stare on the first Sunday when he accompanies her and her mother to church, sitting with them in the family pew. But it is done so quietly and simply there is no room for comment, and as for Dave himself, his conduct is simply irreproachable; the more Miss Genie gets to know him, so much the more she likes and trusts him and approves of his present course.

Till one day when he has been six months in her employ; in fact, she has just paid him his second quarter's salary, and he stands before her twisting the bills nervously together manifestly ill at ease, whereas light-hearted Dave's natural manner is debonair and well poised, without one trace of awkwardness. At last:

"I don't want to take this money, Miss Genie; it isn't quite fair, for I think perhaps—I shall be leaving—you—soon."

"Oh, Dave!" Miss Genie's tone is one of surprised remonstrance, with a slight shade of reproof. "You've only been here one-half year, and you are doing so well; are you dissatisfied in any way, or have you something better in view?"

"Neither, but," another embarrassed pause, then he bursts forth in a breathless sort of way: "Miss Genie, are you going to marry Mr. Roberts? Tell me truly, please!"

"Why, Dave!" Miss Genie's face flushes a little, and there is a fine reproach in her voice. "It is not like you to ask such a very singular question."

"I beg your pardon, but still, are you? I must know, because, if you are—"

He says no more then, but the eloquent blood rushes up all over his handsome, sun-browned face, crimsoning even the broad white forehead.

"If I am, you will leave me at short notice, I suppose," Miss Genie says at last, quietly, so quietly as to suggest some emotion strongly repressed. "Well, Dave, since you have asked, I will answer—no, I am not going to marry Mr. Roberts—for one thing, he has never asked me." She chooses to ignore the fact that she has several times staved off this gentleman in a way tantamount to a decided rejection, and that it is well known that he is her devoted admirer still. "And if he should ask, I would have to say no. That is all; your position is in no sort of danger. I am still likely to need a foreman, as far as I can see."

She smiles in a bright and friendly way, trying to turn it off so, but he will not let her.

"Oh, Miss Genie, you know I wasn't thinking of that at all, only I heard you were to marry him—and I couldn't stay where I'd have to see that—no I couldn't, for I love you myself. I love you dearly—dearly, Miss Genie, my darling—"

He catches her hand and tries to draw her close, but she swings off from him, throwing back her shoulders and looking up at him fearlessly, with a brave, bright smile, though her lips quiver and her eyes are dim with tears.

"Dave, Dave!" she cries, chidingly. "Not another word like that if you want to be friends. Why, you silly boy, don't you know I'm a year and a half, yes, nearly two years older than you are?"

"I know it, yes; but what of that? It is less than nothing between us two."

His eyes, dark and bright with intense feeling, dwell on hers eagerly. She finds this man not easy to manage, seeing he knows his own mind and means to push the question to an issue.

"To tell you the truth, Dave, I don't want to say 'no' to you, for I do like you very much indeed;" his eyes begin to kindle and his face to glow with pleasure, but with an effort she keeps down a rebellious blush or so, and goes on calmly: "Nor am I quite prepared to say 'yes' to your suit. In fact, you must wait, must give me time. I have known but little of you of late years. The case stands thus: My affections are disengaged, quite so. If, in the course of a year or two, I find that I can love you, and feel assured that your love for me is true and lasting, well, I think I could then be happier with you, perhaps, than living my life alone as I have done. Meanwhile, let everything be as if we had not spoken together of this today. Matters are very well just as they have been. We are not unhappily situated, either of us. I don't want to hear a word on this subject if you accept my terms. Are you willing?"

She holds out a gracious hand to him. He takes it in both his and stands a moment choking down a most miserable feeling of despair that clutches at his throat. Poor Dave! he is not used to women; he does not see that his cause is indeed already won. He feels her words mean only that he has quite failed as yet to touch her heart. Then she smiles upon him. It has the effect of sunshine on a very cloudy day.

So six months more pass, and again it is summer. Miss Genie walks alone over her thriving home fields, musing as she goes on the events of the past year, and how well her handsome lover is behaving. Surely he is doing all a man can do to prove the sincerity of his devotion. And yet—is she willing to reward him now? No matter, there is plenty of time; she need not decide yet; she is happy as she is. Has she not lover, brother and friend in one?

She climbs the stile into the "far pasture" and goes absently toward the river. A moment or two and a fearful snort and bellowing roar strike terror to her very heart. She faces round and stands still, to see the huge form of the dreaded "yellow bull" bearing swiftly down upon her, his wicked head lowered, and his curly red-gold locks waving in the wind.

Then she loses her head and starts to run in the wrong direction. That moment some one's strong arm clasps her, she is guided to the nearest fence and thrown bodily over it, just in time to save her from the furious charge the angry bull makes.

Dave Albrook springs over after her as quickly as may be, but not unhurt.

He staggers to her and stoops to lift her up, but his strength fails he sinks down beside her the blood pouring from a gaping wound in his side.

"I've always been willing to die for you Miss Genie darling," she hears him murmur. "I've often wished I could, of late. Don't cry, dear," as she, kneeling beside him, rains bitter tears on the death-white face she lifts to her bosom. "I'd truly rather have it so—like this—than live on as we were. I love—you so," and laying his lips against her tear-wet face, he faints dead away.

Then follow long, sad days when Miss Genie, with awakened heart, fears she must lose him just when life seems sweetest, but health and happiness prevail in his favor, he "heals him of his grievous wound," and in early autumn there is a quiet wedding that brings joy to two loving hearts that care not what "Mrs. Grundy" may say, and afterwards everything goes on just as before—it is Miss Genie's way and time only proves its wisdom.

TREMENDOUS GROWTH OF OUR FOREIGN TRADE FOR 1907.

Exports Are Close to $2,000,000,000, But Imports Are Increasing at a Much More Rapid Rate with a Corresponding Decrease of the Trade Balance.

A foreign trade for the fiscal year of 1907 of $3,315,000,000, or more than $500,000,000 if we take into account our trade with Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines, does not harmonize with the clamor for doors that should open wider for both exports and imports. Our exports are within $200,000,000 of the three-billion mark, or $1,880,851,024; an increase of more than $500,000,000 in the past six years. Our imports are $1,434,401,092, against $903,320,948 in 1902.

Compared with 1906 imports have increased $207,838,646, while the exports have increased $136,986,524.

We have been buying at a greater rate than we sold, and our trade balance is reduced from $517,302,054 in 1906, to $446,449,032 in 1907, a decrease of 70,852,122.

At this rate of piling up our purchases from foreigners we ought not to be accused of maintaining a Chinese wall tariff.

At this rate we shall find ourselves running in debt to foreigners before long, for practically every dollar of that favorable trade balance of $446,000,000 is needed to pay our freight bills to foreign steamship companies, the earnings on our stocks and securities owned abroad, the millions spent abroad by our tourists, and the other millions constantly being spent by prosperous American wage earners to needy relatives.

Out of our total imports of nearly a billion and a half more than $800,000,000 represent products that compete with American labor and industry.

Is not that enough?

Should we lower the tariff so as to increase that competition?

Should we rig up special trade dickers so as to make it easier for foreigners to break into our market with their goods?

Should we go ahead with tariff revision and other trade dickers, so that the present billion and a half of imports may be swelled to two billions or more?

These are questions which every business man, every wage payer, every wage earner should ask himself in connection with our present foreign trade of fully $3,500,000,000.

HAD NOT LEARNED THE NEW UNDERVALUATION ROPES.

United States Consul (to manufacturer who has not yet grasped the full purport of the undervaluation privilege in the German agreement)—Isn't there some mistake in this invoice?

Manufacturer—I think not, sir. That is the actual market price.

Consul—I don't doubt that in the least. But under the new deal you have the right to invoice at a lower price "for export only." Your competitors are taking advantage of that privilege and invoicing 15 to 25 per cent. below market price. You had better cancel this invoice and bring in a corrected one.

Manufacturer—Thank you, sir. I will do so.

A Suggestion.

The Brooklyn Standard-Union, remarking on the fact that the National Association of Manufacturers favors tariff revision and is raising $1,000,000 with which to carry on war against organized labor, suggests that if the tariff should be ripped to pieces labor would be reduced to such straits that there would be no need of the million dollars. This is worth considering. Why not use that million dollars in breaking down the tariff? That would be killing two birds with one stone. The tariff would be revised downward "at the earliest practicable moment," and so many wage earners would lose their jobs that unionism would go to pieces in the general scramble for work and wages. The brilliant statesmen who control the organized manufacturers may find herein an easy solution of a difficult problem.

A Step In the Wrong Direction.

Twenty-five years ago Daniel Manning, secretary of the treasury in President Cleveland's first administration, said in an official report, in substance that the treasury was being robbed at the rate of $40,000,000 a year in revenue through the fraudulent undervaluation of imports. Being a free trader and a hater of protection, Mr. Manning did not add, as he might truthfully have done, that domestic labor and industry were being robbed of far more than $40,000,000 by the unfair and dishonest competition. It is indeed a long step in the wrong direction when our government officially lends itself to the fraud and wrong of undervaluation.—American Economist.

Take State Jurisdiction Out of Federal Circuit Courts.

By HERBERT S. HADLEY, Attorney General of Missouri.

THE granting of injunctions by United States circuit and district judges against the enforcement of state laws by state officials recently has attracted much public attention and bids fair to become AN IMPORTANT QUESTION IN NATIONAL POLITICS. Its correct solution is necessary for the protection of the rights of the people and the right of property and also for the HARMONIOUS operation of our dual system of government. It does not, however, involve a question of state rights.

Under the directions of the supreme court of the United States the right of the United States circuit courts to enjoin a state officer specially charged with enforcement of a state law on proper showing that such law is a violation of the federal constitution is clearly established.

BUT THE RIGHT OF THE CIRCUIT COURTS TO ISSUE SUCH INJUNCTIONS EXISTS NOT BY VIRTUE OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION, BUT BY VIRTUE OF AN ACT OF CONGRESS.

The real question before the American people is whether or not they should modify the law so as to PROHIBIT United States circuit or district judges from enjoining a state officer from enforcing the law of the state.

I AM STRONGLY OF THE OPINION THAT THIS JURISDICTION SHOULD BE TAKEN AWAY FROM THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURTS. ITS EXISTENCE IS A CONSTANT CAUSE OF FRICTION IN THE OPERATION OF OUR SYSTEM OF DUAL SOVEREIGNTY, AND THE POWER HAS BEEN FREQUENTLY ABUSED BY CERTAIN JUDGES OF THESE COURTS.

Corporations Needed to Express National Energy.

By Judge PETER S. GROSSCUP of the United States Circuit Court.

NOT ONLY IS THE CORPORATION THE LEGAL INSTRUMENT THROUGH WHICH IS WIELDED ALMOST WHOLLY THE INDUSTRIAL ENERGY OF THIS GENERATION OF AMERICANS; IT IS THE BEST INSTRUMENT YET DISCOVERED BY WHICH THAT ENERGY CAN BE WIELDED.

Not only is the corporation the medium through which the wealth of the people works out this age's industrial triumphs—it is THE ONLY MEDIUM through which the people, while working out their triumphs as a whole, can also work out, each for himself, his separate individual instinct for a personal share in the triumphs achieved.

Indeed, what government is to mankind politically organized, the corporation has become to modern industry organized. And it is in the corporation, in this relation of INTERMEDIARY between those seeking to own and the property to be owned, that the destinies of the future are the most deeply bound up.

Between the corporation, when it once reaches its best estate, and the people there need be no gulf, for in the last analysis IT IS THE PEOPLE WHO ARE BUILDING UP THESE INDUSTRIAL TRIUMPHS, though in corporate form, that everywhere surround us—the people's accumulating wealth, the people's thinking heads, the people's busy hands, the people's throbbing, aspiring hearts, and the corporation, when it reaches its best estate, will come to be recognized and trusted only as the organized form through which these heads and hands and hearts and these accumulated savings accomplish their work.

AND WHEN THE DAYS OF THE CORPORATION'S BEST ESTATE HAVE COME IT WILL BE RECOGNIZED ALSO TO BE AS WICKED TO STRIKE AT AN ENTERPRISE MERELY BECAUSE THAT ENTERPRISE IS INCORPORATED AS IT IS WICKED NOW TO INCORPORATE CRIME MERELY BECAUSE BY SO DOING IT MAY BE PUT BEYOND THE REACH OF THE LAW.

Immigrants' Votes Dangerous to America.

By JOHN R. DOS PASSOS, New York Lawyer.

EXAMINING past history in a spirit of candor and independence, it seems to me that the last century of our political life has developed TWO DEFECTS IN THE WORKINGS OF OUR GOVERNMENT—first, those caused by the indiscriminate admission of foreigners to citizenship, WITH SUFFRAGE, and, secondly, the abnormal increase in the number of representatives in the lower houses of the federal and state assemblies.

No one can perhaps question the policy of the naturalization laws, but they were a distinct INNOVATION UPON THE TRUE CONCEPTION OF CITIZENSHIP in a democratic government. This manufactured or artificial citizenship, at first harmless if not beneficial, has now become POSITIVELY DANGEROUS to the nation. It has temporarily extinguished, if not destroyed, the prestige and nobility of the office. It is a privilege to be had by the mere asking. The naturalization laws are an open door to men who know nothing of our government and laws, who are not in sympathy with our home life in many instances, who know nothing of our policy, ambition or even language, to come into this country and enjoy the highest office or privilege which a government can grant, the right to participate in the making of laws.

HOWEVER NECESSARY—NAY, INEVITABLE—IN OUR EARLY NATIONAL LIFE, THE NATURALIZATION LAWS HAVE MORE THAN PERFORMED THEIR MISSION. THEY HAVE BECOME A DANGEROUS MENACE TO THE NATION. THE TIME HAS COME, IT SEEMS TO ME, WHEN THE GATES OF THE UNITED STATES SHOULD BE SHUT TO INDISCRIMINATE CITIZENSHIP, CARRYING WITH IT THE RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE. WE MUST BEGIN TO ESTABLISH A REAL AMERICAN UNION OF AMERICANS ONLY.

If immigration must be encouraged, and I do not touch that subject at all, INVEST THE IMMIGRANTS WITH CITIZENSHIP, BUT WITHOUT THE RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE. Citizenship without suffrage was well known in ancient times.

ANTIETAM'S GREAT AND BLOODY BATTLEFIELD.

Monuments Now Marks The Positions Occupied By Troops.

A MOST SANGUINARY BATTLE

The Greatest Single-Day Conflict of the Civil War—Individual States Have Erected Monuments Numbering Fifty.

Sharpsburg, Md., Sept. 14.—National and State co-operation with the veterans who participated in the battle of Antietam, the most sanguinary single-day encounter in the Civil War, has within the last several years resulted in making the battlefield near Sharpsburg one of the most elaborately adorned of any in the country.

Visitors to the field on Tuesday, the forty-fourth anniversary of the conflict will find there 50 monuments, not including markers; may read the story of the struggle upon 243 cast-iron tablets and while traveling along the excellent pikes for which the vicinity is famous or the avenues constructed by the national Government keep in the right direction by the aid of 130 cast-iron guide signs.

Pennsylvania leads in the number of monuments erected to her fallen sons—17 each surmounted by a statute in granite or bronze, the average cost of which was $2,500. Maryland, Massachusetts and New Jersey have handsome State monuments, and regimental monuments or markers. Ohio has a monument to William McKinley and nine regimental monuments to Gen. Joseph K. F. Mansfield and several regimental monuments. New York and Vermont are also well represented. Plans are under way for the erection of a State monument by New York, and it is expected that in a few years every State represented on either side in the battle will erect suitable memorials.

On every recent anniversary of the battle new monuments have been dedicated in the presence of survivors of the organizations in honor of which the memorial is raised and of distinguished persons. President McKinley attended the dedication of the Maryland monument in 1900 and President Roosevelt that of the New Jersey monument in 1903.

Mr. McKinley's presence at the former dedication was especially appropriate as the Maryland monument is to the memory of those who wore the gray as well as those who wore the blue, an emblem of the spirit of rennion that Ohio's most beloved statesman delighted to praise and to foster.

The battlefield is also visited by many tourists on every other day in the year. As yet it is not traversed by a trolley line, but it is a favorite attraction for automobilists from all parts of the country.

The visitor to the field will start at the northern end, if he wishes to skirt the battle front, and follow a sequence in line, coincident with that of the important movement of the battle.

Turning into Mansfield avenue eastward from the Hagerstown pike he will find himself at the place where Hooker's Corps, having swung around to the north, faced the Confederate left, and began the conflict about 5 o'clock on the morning of September 17, 1862. Along this avenue are found five of the Pennsylvania monuments. Those to the Seventh, Third, Fourth and Eighth Reserves, and to the Twelfth Pennsylvania Cavalry, all surmounted by a statue of a soldier.

The avenue makes a turn toward the south, and near its junction with the Smoketown road Connecticut has a tall pink granite shaft to General Mansfield, killed nearby after his corps had advanced to the relief of Hooker. This monument was erected in 1900. Running westward from the Smoketown road, several hundred yards south of this point in Cornfield avenue, an 80-foot wide Government road, along the ground which was named the Bloody Cornfield, after the Union and Confederate lines had surged backward and forward through its acres, leaving many dead among its stubbles. Here Col. Joseph W. Hawley, of the Twelfth Pennsylvania, was wounded and carried into the D. R. Miller farmhouse, which still stands as it was on the day of battle.

Upon the avenue are four mounted cannon marking the position held by Union artillery after the battle; the One Hundred and Thirty-eight Pennsylvania monuments, and the monument erected by Vermont to Companies E and H, of the Second Regiment, United States Sharpshooters. On one side of the avenue as it terminates at the Hagerstown pike is the New Jersey monumeut, on the other the Massachusetts monument. The former is a tall shaft, surmounted by a bronze figure of Captain Irish, of the Thirteenth New Jersey Regiment, with drawn sword, advancing, as he did, near by, to death and glory.

The New Jersey monument is erected to the First, Second, Third, Fourth and Thirteenth New Jersey Infantry Regiments and Hexamers' battery of artillery. The Massachusetts monument is a massive sarcophagus, with bronze tablets giving the names of the State regiments which participated in the battle, the Second, Seventh, Ninth, Tenth, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fifteenth, Eighteenth, Nineteenth, Twentieth, Twenty-first, Twenty-second, Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth, Thirty-second and Thirty-fifth Infantry, the First Cavalry, and First, Third and Fighth Batteries, the First and Second Companies of sharpshooters. On a tablet in the rear appears a complete map of the battlefield. This like many other monuments, is within a fenced inclosure.

After crossing the Hagerstown pike Cornfield avenue becomes known as Stark avenue, named in honor of Gen. William S. Stark, a Confederate officer, killed in the battle. To the right of the monument to the One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Pennsylvania Infantry, surmounted by a bronze statue of its colonel, Joseph W. Hawley.

Confederate avenue is next reached. It extends along the Confederate front as it was after the battle in what was then known as the West woods. It runs both north and south from the intersection with Stark avenue, but there are no monuments to the north.

Driving south the visitors finds on the east side of the avenue the memorial to the gallantry of the Fifteenth Massachusetts Regiment, which here made a desperate but futile charge into the Confederate lines. Seventy-five men were killed outright, 43 died of wounds, 20 were reported missing, and the total casualty list was 330. Well chosen for a testimonial to such desperate courage was the recumbent granite figure of a wounded lion that adorns the monument. Confederate avenue turns abruptly to the eastward several hundred yards below the Fifteenth Massachusetts monument, running toward the historic Dunkard Church. Along this part of the avenue are the One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Pennsylvania Infantry and the Thirty-fourth New York Infantry monuments, the latter in the form of an embattled tower.

The Dunkard Church is near the Hagerstown pike. It is today the same small, single-room brick building that it was in war time. Several holes made by cannon balls have been repaired, but orifices made by bullets are still to be seen. The rude benches of ante-bellum days are still used at the services held once a month. A precious relic here is a Bible taken from the church, after the battle, by Nathan Dykman, of Company H, One Hundred and Seventh New York Volunteers, and returned in 1903, 41 years later.

Across the pike at this point is the Maryland monument, a granite columned copula, unique in that it was probably the first monument erected to opposing forces. The organizations in whose honor this imposing memorial was built were: Union—Purnell Legion, infantry; Battalion B, First Maryland Light Artillery; Third Regiment, Maryland Infantry; Walcott's Battery A, First Maryland Artillery; Fifth Regiment, Maryland Infantry. Confederate—First Maryland Light Artillery; Baltimore Battalion, Light Artillery.

The are four bronzes showing battle scenes, eight bronze inscription tablets and eight bronze coats of arms on the octagonal structure. Its cost was $12,000, and in addition Maryland has a number of granite markers, capped by bronze coats of arms, at different points in the field.

Near the Maryland monument is a tall shaft erected to the memory of the Fifth, Seventh and Sixty-sixth Ohio Regiments.

On the west side of the pike, north of the Dunkard Church, is found the 10-acre Philadelphia Brigade Park, owned now by the city of Philadelphia.

Members of the Philadelphia Brigade Association were pioneers in the adornment of Antietam and raised $15,000 to obtain this reservation and erected within it a tall shaft in memory of the brigade, composed of the Sixty-ninth, Seventy-first, Seventy-second and the One Hundred and Sixth Pennsylvania Regiments, which lost 545 men in the engagement. A handsome iron gate has just been erected at the main entrance to this enclosure, on which are bronzes showing the State and city coats of arms. Governrrs Hastings and Lowndes attended the dedication of the monument, September 17, 1896, and Gen. Henry Kyd Douglas, in war times one of Stonewall Jackson's staff officers, was one of the orators.

Richardson avenue, named after Gen. Israel B. Richardson, runs eastward from the Hagerstown pike at a point not far south of the Dunkard Church, along the far-famed Bloody Lane, and thence takes an irregular course to the Boonsboro pike. It is replete with interesting features. Here the Confederates found a formidable line of defense behind the lane's stone fences, and it fell to the lot of French's and Richardson's divisions of Sumner's Corps to drive them back from the lane, after several repulses, during which the natural ramparts there found were augmented by the corpses of the slain.

Along Bloody Lane are brigade monuments erected by Vermont to the Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Regiments, the Fourteenth Connecticut monument, the Fifth Maryland, the One Hundred and Thirtieth Pennsylvania Infantry, the Eighth Ohio and the One Hundred and Thirty-second Pennsylvania. At the east end of the lane is a stone observation tower, 75 feet high, on which is a bronze coping informing the observer by arrows and inscriptions the distance and direction of the many points of interest within view.

Rodman avenue, named after Gen. Isaac P. Rodman, begins at the Boonsboro pike and runs south to the Burnside bridge road. It is adorned by the Fiftieth Pennsylvania monument surmounted by a bronze statue of Col. B. F. Christ. Turning eastward into the Burnside bridge road, the celebrated stone arch structure across the Antietam creek is reached by a half mile of road, winding among the hills that Lee's men stubbornly defended.

At this bridge the Confederate right levied heavy toll in human life before a crossing was made by the Union left, held by Burnside's Ninth Corps.

The Eleventh Connecticut Infantry made the first attempt to carry the bridge, supported by Crook's Brigade, but failed. Nagle's Brigade was likewise unsuccessful. At noon, however, Ferrara's Brigade, which consisted of the Fifty-first Pennsylvania, the Fifty-first New York, the Twenty-second and Thirty-fifth Massachusetts, forced the passage and caused the conflict to become as general at the south end of the field as it had been at the north.

Markers are at the four ends of the coping of this beautiful bridge, one erected by Lieut-Col. Albert A. Pope to his dead comrades of the Thirty-fifth Massachusetts; one, a large granite minie ball, by the Twenty-first Massachusetts Regimental Association to its fallen; one by the State of Maryland to the Second Maryland Infantry, and one by the survivors of the Fifty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers to the 27 members of that regiment killed and 84 wounded in making the successful charge.

Nearby the Fifty-first New York Regiment has made the latest addition to the battlefield monuments, which is to be dedicated on the anniversary of the battle this year. Along the burnside Bridge road are to be found the Eleventh Connecticut and McMullen's Battery (First Ohio) Monuments.

One of the regiments which followed Ferrara's Brigade was the Twenty-third Ohio, William McKinley being its commissary sergeant at the time. Toward the evening, withous orders, he took to his comrades who were behind the firing line a supply of coffee and rations and won promotion for this missionary work. On the spot where this occurred the State of Ohio has erected a fine shaft costing about $7,000, decorated by a bronze medallion showing McKinley as he was in 1862 and in 1901, above which rests a female figure in granite in the act of enwreathing the murdered President. Beneath is another bronze showing McKinley on the field with his welcome coffee pail. The Government has built a road leading to this monument at a cost, including improvements to the site, of $3,000.

The traveler must now retrace his way along the Burnside Bridge road to a point where Branch avenue, named after Gen. L. O'B. Branch, extends southward. There are to be seen along the avenue monuments erected by the Ftrty-fifth and One Hundredth Pennsylvania, the Thirty-sixth Ohio, the Twenty-eighth Ohio, the Twenty-third Ohio, the Thirtieth Ohio, the Fifty-first Pennsylvania and the Forty-eighth Pennsylvania, surmounted by a bronze statue of General Nagle, and Durell's Pennsylvania Battery. In the distance are the monuments of the Eleventh Ohio, Twelfth Ohio, Sixteenth Connecticut, Eighth Connecticut and Ninth New York Infantry (Hawkins' Zouaves). The twenty-third Ohio Regiment had the distinction of furnishing two Presidents of the United States—Hayes and McKinley.

The monuments to the Fourth New York Volanteers and Twentieth New York Volunteers (Turner Rifles) are within the Antietam National Cemetery. One erected by the State of Vermont to Company F, First Regiment of the United States Sharpshooters, is on the Boonsboro pike, about two miles from Sharpsburg, and distant from the route of which description has been made.

In addition to the other monuments on the battlefield are six inverted 12-pound cannon imbedded in rock which were placed by the Government on the spots where six general officers fell mortally wounded—three Union, Generals Rodman, Richardson and Mansfield, and three Confederates, Generals Branch, Anderson and Stark.

At the Norfolk and Western railroad station there is a monument erected by the railroad company with granite base and eight cannon furnished by the Government. The Government also built all the fences along the avenues which it owns, there being nearly 10 miles of avenues.

General Reno was killed at the battle of South Mountain, the engagement which enabled McClellan to cross the mountain and meet Lee at Antietam. In Fox's Gap, where Reno fell, there is a monument to him. In Crampton's Gap, the home of George Alfred Townsend, "Gath," the famous Civil War correspondent, stands the war correspondents' arch. These memorials are in the care of the superintendent of the Antietam battlefield, which, unlike other battlefields, is now under the supervision, not of a commission, but of the Quartermaster-General's Department.

The Antietam Battlefield Commission, organized under the Act of August 30, 1890, passed out of existence in 1898, after completing improvements which cost $78,031. It was composed at first of Col. John C. Stearns and Gen. Henry Heth, Confederate States Army, and was reorganized in 1894 with Major George B. Davis, General Heth and Gen. Ezra Ayres Carmen as its members. In 1895 Major George B. Davis was succeeded by Major George W. Davis. The most active member was General Carmen, now a member of the Chickamauga Battlefield Commission, who fought at Antietam as colonel of the Thirteenth New Jersey Regiment. He was the topographer and historian of the commission.

Work of improvement as well as of repair has been carried steadily forward under the management of Charles W. Adams, the superintendent of the field, with the aid of an annual appropriation by Congress of $3,000 and special appropriations for designated objects. Mr. Adams has replaced four wooden bridges over culverts with fine stone arch bridges and keeps the grass plots in the inclosures and the green sward along the roads as well cropped as a lawn. The drainage system is not unimportant, as the roads follow the natural contour of the country and steep declivites are numerous.

It was not the general Government which established Antietam National Cemetery. This was the work of an association organized under the laws of Maryland in Hagerstown in 1865 by A. A. Biggs, of Sharpsburg; Thomas A. Bouitt, of Hagerstown; Edward Shriver, of Frederick, and C. C. Fulton, of Baltimore, trustee named by the State. The Legislature made an initial appropriation of $5,000 and directed the apportionment of the expenses of the burial of the dead among the Northern States.

The cemetery was inclosed with a stone fence, the lodge house built and the fine soldiers' monuments therein, 47 feet high, costing $35,001, partially paid for by the Cemetery Association, which was composed of representatives of all the Northern States.

In 1877 the cemetery passed into the possession of the United States, which completed the work undertaken by volunteers and substituted for wooden markers at the head of each grave marble head-stones.

The whole number of bodies buried in this cemetery is 4,734, of which 1,865 are among "the unknown dead." Its present superintendent is Capt. J. V. Dalis, who has been a member of the United States Corps of Cemetery Superintendents for 36 years. He is one of 75 men employed by the Government in the care of national cemeteries. The soldiers' monument in the cemetery was unveiled in 1880.

After the acquisition of the cemetery the first step toward battlefield improvement was made when Representative Louis E. McComas, of Maryland (now Judge McComas, of the District of Columbia bench), obtained in 1892, an appropriation for making a road from the cemetery through the main street of Sharpsburg to the Norfolk and Western Railroad Station, a mile distant.

The splendid co-operation since that time of nation, States and individuals has effected a wonderful transformation in the vicinity of the old-fashioned town of Sharpsburg, around which the battlefield lies.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1907. NUMBER 30

NARROW ESCAPE FOR HUNDRED.

With Cliffs on One Side and Precipice on Other Track.

Passengers on train No. 4, northbound on the Western Maryland railroad Tuesday had a thrilling experience when the front end of the rear passenger coach left the trucks as the train ascended the Blackwater grade and hung suspended over a cliff 500 feet above the ravine.

Just at the point where the car was jarred loose from its tracks the right of way occupies a space scarcely wider than a single track, with high cliffs on one side and a gorge below, estimated to be fully 500 feet below the track, one of the most beautiful spots on the Western Maryland. When the passengers, mostly women, felt the car grating along the tracks they felt little concern until they saw the look of horror depicted on the countenance of several negro youths on the upper side of the track.

As the car careened and rocked back and forth threatening every minute to topple over and go plunging down into space, women and children screamed and moaned in horror.

Finally righting itself, the occupants were reassured of their safety by the train crew and transferred to another car. Had the train been running at any great speed fully 100 casualties would have resulted.

Letter to G. S. Hamill.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: We should like to print your opinion of this guarantee in this paper, where all your neighbors will see it:

We'll furnish the paint to paint half the house of any fair man on these terms: He shall paint the other half with whatever other paint he likes: same painter (any fair man) same way (the way of all fair painters, to make a good job). If our half doesn't take less gallons of paint by one-tenth to seven-tenths, we'll give him the paint. If our half doesn't take less labor by one-tenth to seven-tenths, we'll give him the paint. If our half isn't sounder three years hence, we'll give him the paint. If our half isn't sounder six years hence, we'll give him the paint. Any color.

We say one-tenth, because there are two or three paints with about that difference; we say seven—there are dozens of paints with about that difference—we say one to seven, because there's a hundred that waste one-third of the money paid for both paint and labor.

Is there a paint we haven't covered?

Yours truly

PROHIBITION COUNTY TICKET IN THE FIELD.

It Was Nominated Last Saturday at Convention Held at Mt. Lake Park.

REV. J. B WORKMAN CHAIRMAN.

Convention Was Attended By Representatives from a Majority of the County Districts—New Committee Elected—The Resolutions.

The Prohibitionists of Garrett county met in convention at Mt. Lake Park on last Saturday afternoon with representatives from nearly every district in the county present, the business calling them together being for the purpose of placing in nomination a county ticket to be voted for on November 4th next.

Rev. J. B. Workman, pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church, Oakland, was made chairman of the convention, and Mr. Edward M. Spedden, of Crellin, its secretary, when the following ticket was placed in nomination:

For Sheriff, Mr. W. F. Holman, of Friendsville.

For Members of the House of Delegates Mr. H.N. Cuppett, of Mt. Lake Park, and Mr. William E. Bishoff, of District No. 6.

For County Commissioner, Mr. E. M. Spedden, of Crellin.

Clerk to the Board of County Commissioners, Mr. James T. Moon, of District No. 8.

For County Treasurer, Mr. A. P. Enlow, of District No. 5.

For Judges of the Orphans' Court, Mr. William Haun, of District No. 8; Mr. Freeman DeWitt, of District No. 5, and Mr. N. B. Harvey, of District No. 8.

For Register of Wills, Mr. Samuel Bowman, of Crellin.

No nominations were made for either the State's Attorney or for County Surveyor.

A new county committee composed of Messrs. H. N. Cuppet, E. M. Spedden and Freeman DeWitt was elected to serve for two years.

Resolutions were adopted as follows:

"The prohibition party of Maryland acknowledges Almighty God as the source of all government, to whose moral law all human enactments should conform, reiterates its fealty to the principles of the national Prohibition party and declares as follows:

"We declare for the complete prohibition of the liquor traffic for the State of Maryland. The large proportion of 'dry' area which the Democrats and Republicans have failed to protect from outside nullification requires the total prohibition of the traffic throughout the entire state.

"We declare that Maryland, along with all others of the Union, is entitled, at the hands of the national Congress, to the passage of a proper interstate commerce act, whereby the people of the state may protect their 'dry' territory from the invasion of C. O. D. interstate shipment.

"We declare it a perversion of all rights retained by the states relating to this question for dealers in a license state to engage in the sale of liquor through interstate commerce to citizens of Maryland who are forbidden to engage in such practices.

"We oppose the sale of federal tax receipts to applicants who defy state prohibitory laws. It is an abhorrent thing that the federal government with an overflowing treasury, should add to its wealth by money gotten from the illegal pratices of those who defy the constitutional power of the various states. Congress receives full support of federal statutes on the part of Maryland and other states and the federal government should not disparage state liquor laws by encouragement of a class of liquor dealers who are bent on overthrowing state authority.

"Having in view the unification of all the people in common bonds of loyalty and the support of a harmonious civil government, we declare for a repeal of the internal revenue act 1862, so far as it related to taxation on alcholic liquors for beverage purposes, or taxation upon those engaging in the beverage liquor traffic passed purely as a war revenue measure. The reason which caused its enactment have long since ceased to exist and the act should be repealed.

"The proper use of alcohol as an industrial agency we favor.

"We declare for the election of United States Senator by popular vote."

The convention, after making the above nominations and adopting the resolutions was addressed by a number of delegates, after which it adjourned.

COMMUNICATED.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I notice in your paper of the 19th inst. a request from the State Central Committee for Garrett county for the qualified Republican voters to attend primaries to elect delegates to the County Convention at Oakland.

This request applies to every patriotic voter who has his country's interest at heart, and who is loyal enough to sacrifice a little time to attend primaries without compensation. It behooves us to register our sentiment at the primaries for right as we see it, and if justice is miscarried we have the consolation of knowing we did our duty as we saw it.

All the offices to be filled are attached with responsibility, and it is important that we send the best men. The time has come now when the people are to select another Legislature. They can select a good one if they go about it wisely. There is no reason why the several legislative districts should not exercise unusal diligence and caution in nominating legislative candidates. There is no citizen in the State too great or too good to serve in this important office, and the people should bear this fact in mind when they go to the primaries, and even before the primaries are held the citizens can act together to induce the best men to submit their names to the primaries. Unfortunately, public interest seems to be greatest where the offices carry the largest salaries. The office of Legislator is regarded by many as of little consquence because there is small pay in it. If it is a Congress to be chosen, the greatest interest is manifested, but the legislative office is frequently allowed to go by default.

And yet the legislature is of far greater consequence to the State than congressman. It is the power which must deal with questions affecting the every day life of the people. It can do more to promote the progress and prosperity of the State than any other agency.

While former legislatures enacted some good laws, much work was defective, and it was peculiarly susceptible at times to influences which were not in harmony with public sentiment.

Why, then, should the people not take an extraordinary interest in the selection of men to sit in a body endowed with powers so vital to the welfare and happiness of the State. It is no place for profit. It ought not to be made a political kindergarten. It ought not to be regarded as the training ground for future statesman. Its work should be the result of matured wisdom.

E. W. K.

GIVES UP NOMINATION.

Prohibitionist Says He Has Been a Candidate too Often.

One man, at least, in Maryland is big enough and bold enough to stand up fearlessly before a nomination for office and say, "Get thee behind me!" Mr William Gisriel, whom the Prohibitionists wished to make their chief standard bearer in this campaign, has declined that honor.

"I have been a candidate too often," he says. "I was a candidate for Governor before, for Mayor, for President of the Second Branch of the City Council, for Congress and for judge of the Orphans' Court. It is better for the party that they name a new man this time.

"I am as strong a Prohibitionist as ever: I couldn't be anything else. The party was never in better shape. People all over the country are beginning to see that the saloon is not only a moral evil, but an economic evil also. It's got to go. But the party ought to have a new man to lead it in this campaign."

So Mr. Gisriel has sent the following letter to the members of the notification committee:

September 24, 1907.

Messrs. Geo. R. Gorsuch, E. B. Fenly, James W. Frizzell, Ferd. Groshans, Edwin Higgins and Joshua Lovering:

Gentlemen—Thanking you and the members of the Prohibition Convention assembled at Mountian Lake for the great honor you have conferred upon me for the second time as your standard bearer for Governor of our State, after much prayer and careful thought I find it will be impossible for me to accept the nomination at this time. As I have been away from my business for the past six months, I find it will require all my attention for some time to come. Again thanking you for your confidence in me, and wishing you and our cause every success, I remain, respectfully yours,

WILLIAM GISRIEL.

The six months' absence from which Mr. Gisriel refers to was caused by a trip abroad, from which he has recently returned:

"We went to Egypt, Palestine, Constantinople, Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, Belgium and France," he said, "and had a great time, but I saw no country like the United States of America and no place I'd care to live in so much as Baltimore, Md."

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. ELENORA BOYER CUNNINGHAM.

A long and exemplary life closed at 2 o'clock a. m. on Thursday, September 19, 1907, when the messenger of death came into the home of Mrs. Sally Ralston, near the village of Bittinger, Garrett county, Maryland, and called Mrs. Elenora Boyer Cunningham to her final reward. Mrs. Elenord Boyer Cunningham was born at New Creek, Hampshire county, Virginia, at what is now known as Keyser, Minernl county, West Virginia, on January 5th, 1822, being at the time of her death 85 years, 8 months and 14 days of age. The Boyer family, of which the deceased was a member, was peculiary remarkable for longevity, she being one of a family of nine children all of whom lived to attain more than the alloted four-score years and retaining a most remarkable vigor in their advanced old age. Mrs. Cunningham came to Garrett county, Maryland, as the bride of Wm. Cunningham nearly three quarters of a century ago and lived to witness the development of that section of the county where her last days were spent. Her husband preceeded her to the grave about twelve years ago, since which time she has lived with her daughter, Mrs. Sally Ralston. The memory of this gentle, patient, motherly, christian neighbor and friend, will live long in the hearts of all who knew her, even when chiseled marble and storied urn shall crumble beneath the relentless touch of time and shall cease to mark the sacred spot where we lay our noble dead. The deeds of kindness their gentle hands once wrought, the holy thoughts and sunny smiles that their loving hearts gave out shall remain an unfading and eternal monument to their memory. The deceased leaves surviving her one brother, Mr. Oliver Boyer, of Salisbury, Pa., and two half sisters as well as three daughters: Mrs. Sally Ralston, of Bittinger, Md.; Mrs. Lizzie McRobie, of Oakland; and Mrs. Mary Mitchell, of Arkansas. The funeral and burial services were conducted by Rev. E. Manges, of Oakland, and the remains were laid to rest in the Luthern cemetery at Bittinger on Friday afternoon, September 20th, 1907, at 4 o'clock, in the presence of a large assembly of friends and neighbors. Much sympathy is extended the family in this hour of sadness and mourning.

A FRIEND.

A BRILLIANT GATHERING OF REPUBLICANS

Mr. Gaither Formally Notified of His Nomination for Governor.

CANDIDATE DISCUSSES ISSUES.

Logical Presentation of the Questions Involved in Present Campaign—Defines His Position On State Election Law and Other Public Matters.

BALTIMORE, Md., Sept. 23—George R. Gaither was formally notified of his nomination as the republican candidate for governor of Maryland at the Hotel Rennert tonight.

The event was shorn of the claptrap and bombastic features which characterized the Democratic notification meeting at the Lyric last week. Instead of red fire and music the features of the gathering was the speech of acceptance had put considerable time and thought on the preparation of the paper and those who heard it tonight declare it to be a masterly presentation of the real issues in the campaign.

The general interest in the address centered in the stand which Mr. Gaither took regarding control of public utilities. Mr. Gaither did not dodge the public utilities question, but made his position clear. His utterances on this subject proved satisfactory both to the corporate interests and to the private citizens. He did not set up propaganda savoring of Hearstism, as has been charged by the Democrats, but clearly and fearlessly declared his views, which at once stamp him as a man safe for both corporations and the people to support, each being assured by pledge of a square deal.

Mr. Gaither made fair elections the paramount issue in the campaign. He set forth in concise and lucid language the iniquities of the present law, under which tens of thousands of Marylanders are deprived of the right of suffrage, and showed how the will of the people is throttled by corrupt machine methods in the counting of the ballots.

Attention was called to the fact that, at the state election in 1903, there were registered 275,235 voters, and the returns showed that 208,686 votes were counted for the four gubernatorial candidates.

According to reports received from leaders throughout the state at that time not less than 240,000 went to the polls. It is apparent, therefore, that fully 32,000 legal voters in Maryland were disfranchised. As there were only 51,000 colored persons registered, fully 10,000 of whom did not go to the polls, it is easy to figure out that for every colored man disfranchised five white men lost their votes. Mr. Gaither also showed that under the operation of the Wilson law, elections in certain counties become travesties upon popular government and do not reflect the honest will of the voters.

The cry of negro domination, which was raised by Senator Rayner at the Democratic meeting last week also came in for a share of attention from Mr. Gaither. The Republican candidate clearly showed in his speech that the negro question in Maryland is really no issue at all. He demonstrated that the cry of "negro domination" is merely the trick of political demagogues, an appeal to race prejudice and race passion—a stuffed figure set up by the Democratic ringsters and pointed to with horror by party spellbinders to divert attention from the real issue of fair elections, which the Democrats fear to meet.

In short, the speech of acceptanee took up in detail the planks in the platform and set forth in most vigorous fashion the issue upon which the candidate will conduct his campaign. It was an example of the breadth of view which characterize the Republican nominee, and furnished cogent proof of Mr. Gaither's comprehensive grasp of governmental needs. It was a state paper in all respects and will strike a responsive chord in the minds of all independents and fire the Republicans with enthusiasm.

The following are the members of the committee who formally notified Mr. Gaither of his nomination last night:

Allegany county—Lloyd Lowndes.
Anne Arundel—Daniel R. Randall.
Baltimore City—First District, John Janetzke; Second district, Stephen R. Mason; Third district, W. D. Platt; Fourth district, Charles W. Jones.
Calvert—Philip A. Jones.
Caroline—Harry A. Roe.
Carroll—William J. Frizzell.
Cecil—F. E. Williams.
Charles—Dr. George O. Monroe.
Dorchester—Phillips Lee Goldsborough.
Frederick—Major John R. Rouzer.
Garrett—State Senator Brown.
Harford—William B. Baker.
Howard—George Dorsey Day.
Kent—W. H. Lambert, Jr.
Montgomery—B. H. Warner.
Prince Georges—G. B. Timanus.
St. Mary's—A. C. Hayden.
Somerset—L. E. P. Dennies.
Washington—Henry A. McComas.
Wicomico—Walter B. Miller.
Worcester—Edward S. Faubush.
Mr. Daniel R. Randall of Anne Arundel, delivered the notification address.

The Republican State Central Committee will now be in position to proceed in mapping out the campaign, including the selection of dates for meetings in the several counties. Mr. Gaither will make an important speech in Broadway Institute about October 1.

THE DEATH PENALTY IS STRONGLY CONDEMNED

Maryland Friends Are Against Capital Punishment.

NO REPARATION AFTER DEATH.

Nonresistant Sect Claims That The Legal Taking of Life Is Powerful Incentive to Crime, and Indorses a Strong Paper.

The Baltimore Quarterly Meeting of Friends took action on the question of capital punishment at the meeting held recently at Sandy Springs, Md. The meeting indorsed a paper written by Mr. Abram Adelman, which in part is as follows.

If it can be supposed that a capital crime has ever been committed with full premeditation of consequences, the very fact of its commission is proof that the threatened death penalty is not a deterrent. How foolish, then, to suppose that even the extreme penalty can lessen or prevent such offenses. Instead of deterring crime, it actually incites to crime. Nothing will ever make life and womanhood secure but a strong popular sense of their sacredness. This is the reason there are so few crimes among the Quakers, the Moravians and other nonresistant sects. But does the state cultivate among the people the idea of the sacredness of life when it kills the criminal? Would it foster respect for womanhood by reverting to the same barbarism? Manifestiy not. Wars, by fostering contempt for human life, are invariably followed in countries emerging from them by a long series of murders. When executions were public children who had witnessed them often known to torture and kill their pet animals thereafter, and even to torture one another. Such executions were sometimes followed by a carnival of crime in which there was usually at least one that resembled the offense that had just been capitally punished. There are many cases proving this fact in criminal annals. Nothing is stronger to the criminal mind than the power of suggestion. The brutalizing effects of public executions on the community came at length to be noticed. For this reason they have been abolished in civilized countries, and now the execution of the criminal is in most places strictly private. By this concession the advocates of capital punishment have impliedly abandoned the ground that the spectacle of the criminal's punishment is a deterrent, and have admitted it to be rather an incitement to crime. But the modern news facilities give to private executions all the demoralizing effects of public executions.

Many arguments against capital punishment are absolutely unanswerable. One of the chief of these is the fallibility of human judgment. The innocence of guiltless men charged with crime is sometimes discovered and due reparation may be made him when he lives. But what reparation can be made if we have killed him? One case is on record of the hanging of an innocent man who was actually embraced and consoled by the real murderers just before being lanched into eternity—he all the while vainly protesting his innocence. Is it not better that ninety-nine guilty men escape than that one innocent man be put to death?

Again, capital punishment is today very reluctantly imposed. It is, therefore, slow and uncertain. But noihing is better settled than that it is the certainty rather than the severity of punishment that deters men from crime. If we believed that we should positively die at a fixed, though distant day, all of us would worry about our approaching doom. Some of us would die long before our time from this very worry. All of us might reason that in the course of nature we should hardly live until that day, but, as it is, because the day of death is uncertain, we do not let the thought of it worry us. If it were a law of nature that upon committing a murder or an infamous assault the offender would drop dead immediately thereafter, as a certain consequence, just as one must surely die if he shoots himself in a vital spot or takes poison, then, indeed, might death be to some extent of crime. But under present conditions death by punishment is no more imminent to him who commits a murder or assault than is his natural death. It he reflects at all, he expects to escape. Even if caught he may be able to hire astute lawyers and go free through their efforts.

There is a still stronger force at work to make death as a punishment extremely uncertain. At the present age men are by nature refined and averse to cruelty. So, when a juror, who, before he was chosen, stated that he believed in capital punishment, gets into the jury after hearing the case and begins to feel his awful responsibility, he is loath to impose the death penalty. As a fact, he does not impose it in many cases where under the letter of the law he is bound to. Moreover, undue sympathy is often excited for the criminal, and in many cases convictions are not secured at all. A punishment less than death, such as imprisonment for life without power of pardon, can be much more easily enforced than the death penalty, as the statistics of the states that have abolished capital punishment prove. The death penalty is for this reason, if no other, bound to go in time. It will become a dead letter because of the reluctance of men to enforce it. And this reluctance will strengehen as they come to have better conceptions of the real causes of crime.

No advocate of capital punishment would today defend it on the basis of revenge. The sole defense of it at this dav is that it is a deterrent of crime. But the deterrent argument is being knocked away by hard facts, and the advocates away by hard facts, and the advocates of capital punishment find themselves driven back to the primeval theory of bloody revenge. With most of them this is really the instinctive basis of their belief in the gallows, although they usually deny it. But be their arguments and motives what they may, it is a confession of weakness to say that public security demands the death of any member of society.

The above arguments show the inexpediency of the death penalty as a means of protecting the state and its peaceable citizens. To those who believe, however, in abstract right, there may be adduced a further argument.

Society has no moral right to take human life. The state itself would deny the right to any organization within it, however large, to take the life of its own members in accordance with its own rules. Then how can it be supposed that adding enough other persons to make a state gives to this greater number that right to kill which a lesser number cannot claim? Mere numbers can never make a wrong thing right.

By the death penalty society violates one of the fundemental natural laws by which it governs the conduct of its individual members, namely, the natural law limiting the right of homicide in self defense. I may take a man's life only when I or another person is attacked by him and in imminent danger through that man's acts. Should he be advancing upon me with a deadly weapon and "murder in his eye," and I have no means of escape, the laws justify my killing him. But whatever the danger, if I overcome my adversary and have him lying prostrated at my feet or bound hand and foot—If I then kill him, society does not justify or excuse me. I am in such case guilty of murder. Is it not time, then to realize that when society has the criminal bound hand and foot, as it were, it violates its own law of self-defense if it kills him? Could I say to society, if I were charged with murder, "It is true I had my adversary 'down and out,' but I had to kill him because if I had not others as maliciously disposed to me as he would have assailed and killed me?" Of course not. But this is exactly the "baby act" which society pleads when it takes a convict's life.

The killing of a human being in hot blood is deplorable enough, but such an act cannot be compared in barbarity to the deliberate, cold blooded killing which capital punishment inflicts. It is a barbarity that must surely disappear from the earth and advancing civilization.

MASONS ARE VICTIMIZED.

Letters have been sent out from the national headquarters of the Masonic society warning members to be on the on the lookout for one of the boldest frauds which has ever been perpetuated with the ostensible backing of a frateral order. Some of these letters have been received in this section.

The fraud is being carried on under cover of the mailsby swindlers, who are collecting funds on a bogus subscription scheme for the erection of a monument to the late President McKinley. Members of the Masonic order have been selected as victims.

Thousands of Masons throughout the country have recently received letters sent out under the chain system. The letters purport to come from prominent Masons,and ask the receiver to contribute 10 cents toward a fund which is being raised for the erection of the monument.

In addition the receiver is asked to write three letters to brother Masons or friends, asking each to send 10 cents, and, in turn, write three letters to other friends. They are directed to send the money to Judge William R. Day at Canton, Ohio, one of the best known Masons in the United States. In each original letter there is enclosed a number of envelopes addressed to "W. R. Day, Esq., Canton, Ohio."

Through accomplices at Canton the letters have been intercepted by a simple ruse. The confederate of the swindlers called at the postoffice several days before replies were scheduled to arrive and asked for mail addressed to "W. R. Days." When the letters addressed in this manner did begin to come in the postal clerk, familiar with the man and his name, reserved them for him as Day's mail was seldom addressed in that way.

It is estimated that the amount secured by fraud will reach many thousand of dollars. Few who received the appeal neglected to respond.

In San Francisco the victims included practically every official of the local lodges. A dispatch from Judge Day to a California Mason states that he knows nothing of the chain letter scheme.

The United States Secret Service officials have taken the matter up and are searching for the swindlers. Thousands of letters at the Canton postoffice received since the swindlers took fright and ceased calling for their mail are being returned to the senders.

Not An Easy Task.

To make oneself beloved, says an old French proverb, this is after all the best way to be useful. The truth is, says Arthur C. Benson, commenting on the proverb, most of us who have any ambitions at all do not start in life with the hope of being useful, but rather with the intention of being ornamental. We want to be rich, impressive, beautiful, influential, admired, envied and then as we move forward the visions fade.

THE NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS ACT.

They Want An Investigation of Paper Manufacturers.

OPPOSED TO TARIFF ON PAPER.

Wood Pulp and Other Printing Material—Attention of President Called to Condition—Printers Becoming Aroused Over Cost of Paper.

New York, Sept. 24.—At a special meeting here today the American Newspaper Publishers' Association instructed the committee on paper to bring to the attention of the President and the Department of Justice information concerning an allaged unlawful combine of paper manufacturers that has resulted, it was claimed, in an artificial stimulation of prices in newspaper stock. The association also went on record as in favor of the immediate repeal of the tariff on printing paper and wood pulp imported from Canada. This sentiment was expressed in resolutions which further provided for an assessment upon the members to defray the expense incurred by the association in assisting the government in any prosecution of a combine that may be undertaken.

The adoption of the resolutions followed several hours' discussion of a report submitted by Don C. Seitz, of the New York World; John Norris, of the New York Times, and Conde Hamlin, formerly of the St. Paul Pioneer-Press, who consistute the committee on paper.

The resolutions follow:

"In view of the information submitted to the American Newspaper Publishers' Association by its committee on paper, indicating that unfawful combinations of paper makers have been organized recently; that artificial stimulation of prices has been accomplished, and that judicial prohibition of such efforts has been disobeyed.

"The American Newspaper Publishers' Association hereby instructs its committee on paper to invite the attention of President and Department of Justice to these movements, which we regard as conspiricies in restraint of trade, and we give these instructions to the committee in order.

"First—That the authority of the existing statutes for repression of trade combinations may be invoked.

"Second—That the defiance of recent judicial action prohibiting participation in such combination by certain western mills may be punished.

"And that the President (of the United States) may be put in possession of information which shall equip him to advise Congress of the abuse of tariff powers by papermakers."

After the applause that greeted the adoption of the foregoing had subsided the following was introduced and passed:

"Resolved, That the membership of association pledge themselves to an adequate assistance for legal counsel and other expenses in assisting the government in any prosecution that may be undertaken and that the executive committee be instructed to gather information and raise such funds as may be required by assessment according to tonnage or linotype machines, as the committee may elect."

By another resolution President Ridder was empowered to increase the committee on paper from three persons to nine.

On the tariff, as it affects the cost of newspaper, the association declared:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that the duty on printing paper, wood pulp and all material entering into the manufacture of printing paper be immediately repealed.

The association adopted another resolution thanking the International Typographical Union for its support and asking for its continuance and that of labor organizations.

Today's meeting was called by the president, Herman Ridder, publisher of the New York States Zeitung, and it was said that should the paper situation become acute in the near future another special meeting might be called.

SEEKING THE POLE IN AN AIRSHIP.

The Latest Venture of This Kind Not Successful.

So much diffculty is experienced by explorers who try to reach the North Pole by old fashioned methods that more than one person has thought that the use of an airship would be an improvement. Twelve years ago a daring Swede, Andree embarked in an ordinary ballon, with the hope that the prevailing winds would carry him from his starting point in the Spitzbergen Islands to his destination. He was never seen again, and it is probable that he met with disaster. There seemed to be a better chance of accomplishing the object when machinery was added to airships for propelling them. The first man to adopt the improved means of flight for this purpose is Walter Wellman. After having a particularly big and fine vehicle built in Paris he went to the same archipelago that Andree had employed for his preparations.

Wellman planned to made his final departure for the Pole in 1906 but his airship was not satisfactory and he abandoned the attempt temporarily. During last winter he had the gas bag lengthened sixteen feet, so as to secure more buoyancy, ordered a new car and added a more powerful engine than he had previously. When the summer of 1907 had advanced far enough to enable him to reach Spitzbergen again he sailed from Northern Norway. During July and August the wind bothered him in various ways and discourged any effort. About September 1 he saw that his opportunity was nearly lost. He must start soon or not at all if he did anything this year. The cold increases and the day light diminishes in the early autumn. Accordingly he made a desperate attempt, lasting three and one-half hours. So vigorous with the breeze that he was unable to cope with it. As the direction of the wind was unfavorable and as the gale itself made the airshipalmost unmanageable, the only thing to do was descend and save the lives of the men in his party. A few days later he returned to the coast of Norway, and he is now on the way to Germany.

Until more is known about his failure, doubts must be entertained about a repetition of the venture. Besides, as the money for his expedition was supplied by the publishers of a Western newspaper, it will be for some one else, and not Wellman, to say whether the necessary support will be given for a third campaign.

From short cable dispatches it would appear that while Wellman wasin the air his ship faced a breeze blowing fifteen miles an hour without falling back. If the story is true then his airship in a calm ought to travel at about that rate. Such a speed (nearly, or quite 360 miles a day) would enable the explorer to reach the pole in two days and to return in two days under the most favorable circumstances. Still, Wellman has apparently counted on no such luck. He has planned to carry food enough for a week or ten days, and has claimed that he had more than enough gasolene for the journey on board.

Some experts believe that the art of aerial navigation has not yet been carried so for as to make a safe journey of 1,200 miles possible. If the idea is not feasible today, however, it may be ten or fifteen years hence. If by that time the Pole has not been conquered by other means, it is pretty sure to surrender to a man who possesses the qualities of an aeronaut as well as those of an explorer. Failure now may lead to success then by revealing what improvements are yet essential.

LINCOLN'S LOVE FOR SON "TAD"

Close Companionship Between Martyred President and Favorite Boy.

Many stories are told of Tad's mischievous pranks, and of his father's close companionship with his favorite boy. Tinker record that on one occasion Lincoln ca into the telegraph office chuckling to himself over a fairy story book that some one had given to Tad, who was holding his father's hand as he entered the room. He thereupon repeated the story to the cipher operators. It told how a mother hen tried to raise a brood of chickens, but was much disturbed over the conduct of a sly old fox who ate several of the youngests while still professing to be an honest fox; so the anxious mother had a serious talk with the old reynard about his wickedness. "Well, what was the result?" asked one of us when it appeared that Lincoln did not intend to continuehis narrative.

"The fox reformed," said Lincoln, his eyes twinkling, "and became a highly respectable paymaster in the army, and now I am wondering which one he is." The significance of this reference is in the fact that about that time there were rumors of fraud in the paymaster's department.

Much has been said about Lincoln being influenced by his dreams. For instance, it has been stated by good authorities, including members of his Cabinet, that before each of the great battles of the war, and also before the occurrence of some of other specially notable event in his life, he had a vivid dream which led him to look forward at such a time with great anxiety for the announcement of some disaster, or other incident, of a particularly important character. It is related that on the night before his assassination he had an unsually exciting dream, which he thought was a portent impending danger of some sort. That did have this habit of being deeply affected and influenced by these visions of the night, is clearly shown by the following telegram:

Washington, D. C. June 9, 1892.
Mrs. A. Lincoln, Philadelphia:
Think you had better put Tad's pistol away. I had an ugly dream about him.

A. LINCOLN

August 31, 1865.
Mrs A. Lincoln, Manchester, Vt.:
All reasonably well. Bob not here yet. How is dear Tad?

A. LINCOLN

Mrs. A. Lincoln, Manchester, Vt.:
All well, including Tad's pony and the goats A. LINCOLN.
* * * Tell dear Tad dear poor Nanny goat is lost. * * * The day you left Nanny was found resting herself and chewing her little cud on the middle of Tad's bed, but now she's gone.

A. LINCOLN.

The President's affection for his youngest boy was such that they were together much of the time, even while the father was receiving callers or attending to officia business in the White House, ar nearly always when visiting tl army at the front or in the defense around Washington. They came to the War Department hand in hand many times.

Lincoln went to City Point in March, 1865. As usual, Tad went with him, and remained with his father after Mrs Lincoln returned to Washington a week later. Tad became a great get among the officers and men. Each afternoon during their two weeks' stay, the headquarters' marched up to the open space near the Presid tent and played popular airs for an hour or so. Tad enjoyed the music of the brass band very greatly, and was on the lookout each afternoon when the appointed hour approached. As soon as he heard the strains of music in the distance, he would jump up and down and shout: "There comes our band! There comes our band!"—Century Magazine.

KODAK SAFETY FILM

preacher! And I suppose the fellow expects to turn me over to one of his flock for religious instruction. He'll have you studying theology inside of a year. A preacher! Oh, Lord, and you agreed! Well, I won't go; so there!"

"As I understand the affair," Hampton continued, as she paused for breath, "it was Lieut. Brant who suggested the idea of his coming to me. Brant knew Gillis, and remembered you, and realizing your unpleasant situation, thought such an arrangement would be for your benefit."

"Brant!" she burst forth in renewed anger; "he did, did he! The putty-faced dandy! I used to see him at Bethune, and you can bet he never bothered his head about me then. No, and he didn't even know me out yonder, until after the sergeant spoke up. What business has that fellow got planning what I shall do?"

Hampton made no attempt to answer. It was better to let her indignation die out naturally, and so he asked a question. "What is this Brant doing at Bethune? There is no cavalry stationed there."

"Good Lord! I Haven't Been Begging to Stick with You, Have I?"

She glanced up quickly, interested by the sudden change in his voice. "I heard dad say he was kept there on some special detail. His regiment is stationed at Fort Lincoln, somewhere farther north. He used to come down and talk with dad evenings, because daddy saw service in the Seventh when it was first organized after the war."

"Did you—did you ever hear either of them say anything about Maj. Alfred Brant? He must have been this lad's father."

"No, I never heard much they said. Did you know him?"

"The father, yes, but that was years ago. Come, Kid, all this is only ancient history, and just as well forgotten. Now, you are a sensible girl, when your temper don't get away with you, and I am simply going to leave this matter to your better judgment. Will you go to Mrs. Herndon's, and find out how you like it? You needn't stop there an hour if she isn't good to you, but you ought not to want to remain with me, and grow up like a rough boy."

"You—you really want me to go, don't you?"

"Yes, I want you to go. It's a chance for you, Kid, and there isn't a bit of a show in the kind of a life I lead. I never have been in love with myself, and only took to it in the first place because the devil happened to drive me that way. The Lord knows I don't want to lead any one else through such a muck. So it is a try?"

The look of defiance faded slowly out of her face as she stood gravely regarding him. The man was in deadly earnest, and she felt the quiet insistence of his manner.

"You bet, if you put it that way," she consented simply, "but I reckon that Mrs. Herndon is likely to wish I hadn't."

Together, yet scarcely exchanging another word, the two retraced their steps slowly down the steep trail leading toward the little town in the valley.

CHAPTER VII.
"I've Come Here to Live."

Widely as these two companions differed in temperament and experience, it would be impossible to decide which felt the greater uneasiness at the prospect immediately before them. The girl openly rebellious, the man extremely doubtful, with reluctant steps they approached that tall, homely, yellow house—outwardly the most pretentious in Glencaid.

They were so completely opposite, these two, that more than one chance passer-by glanced curiously toward them as they picked their way onward through the red dust. Hampton, slender yet firmly knit, his body held erect as though trained to the profession of arms, his features finely chiselled, with threads of gray hair beginning to show conspicuously about the temples. His attire of fashionable cut black cloth, and his immaculate linen, while neat and unobtrusive, yet appeared extremely unusual in that careless land of clay-baked overalls and dingy woolens. Beside him, in vivid contrast, the girl trudged in her heavy shoes and bedraggled skirts, her sullen eyes fastened doggedly on the road, her hair showing ragged and disreputable in the brilliant sunshine. Hampton himself could not remain altogether indifferent to the contrast.

"You look a little rough, Kid, for a society call," he said. "If there was any shebang in this mud-hole of a town that kept any women's things on sale fit to look at, I'd be tempted to fix you up a bit."

"Well, I'm glad of it," she responded, grimly. "I hope I look so blame tough that woman won't say a civil word to us. You can bet I ain't going to strain myself to please the likes of her."

"You certainly exhibit no symptoms of doing so," he admitted, frankly. "But you might, at least, have washed your face and fixed your hair."

She flashed one angry glance at him, stopping in the middle of the road, her head flung back as though ready for battle. Then, as if by some swift magic of emotion, her expression changed. "And so you're ashamed of me, are you?" she asked, her voice sharp but unsteady. "Ashamed to be seen walking with me? I know you are! But I tell you, Mr. Bob Hampton, you won't be the next time. And what's more, you just don't need to traipse along another step with me now. I don't want you. I reckon I ain't very much afraid of tackling this Presbyterian woman all alone."

She swung off fiercely, and the man chuckled softly as he followed, watchfully, through the circling, red dust cloud created by her hasty feet. The truth is, Mr. Hampton possessed troubles and scruples of his own in connection with this contemplated call. He had never met the lady, but he retained some memory of the husband as having been associated with a strenuous poker game at Placer, in which he also held a prominent place, and it would seem scarcely possible that the wife did not know whose bullet had turned her for some weeks into a sick nurse. A cordial reception could hardly be anticipated, and Hampton mentally braced himself for the worst.

It was a cheerless looking house, painted a garish yellow, having staring windows, and devoid of a front porch, or slightest attempt at shade to render its uncomely front less unattractive. Had the matter been left at that moment to his own decision, this glimpse of the house would have turned them both back, but the girl unhesitatingly pressed forward and turned defiantly in through the gateless opening. He followed in silence along the narrow foot-path bordered by weeds, and stood back while she stepped boldly up on the rude stone slab and rapped sharply against the warped and sagging door. A moment they stood thus waiting with no response from within. Once she glanced suspiciously around at him, only to wheel back instantly and once more apply her knuckles to the wood. Before he had conjured up something worth saying the door was partially opened, and a rounded dumpling of a woman, having rosy cheeks, her hair iron-gray, her blue eyes half smiling in uncertain welcome, looked out upon them questioningly.

"I've come to live here," announced the girl, sullenly. "That is, if I like it."

The woman continued to gaze at her as if tempted to laugh outright, then the pleasant blue eyes hardened as their vision swept beyond toward Hampton.

"It is extremely kind of you, I'm sure," she said at last. "Why is it I am to be thus honored?"

The girl backed partially off the doorstep, her hair flapping in the wind, her cheeks flushed.

"Oh, you needn't put on so much style about it," she blurted out. "You're Mrs. Herndon, ain't you? Well, then, this is the place where I was sent; but I reckon you ain't no more particular about it than I am. There's others."

"Who sent you to me?" and Mrs. Herndon came forth into the sunshine.

"The preacher."

"Oh, Mr. Wynkoop; then you must be the homeless girl whom Lieut. Brant brought in the other day. Why did you not say so at first? You may come in, my child."

There was a sympathetic tenderness apparent now in the tones of her voice, which the girl was swift to perceive and respond to, yet she held back, her independence unshaken. With the quick intuition of a woman, Mrs. Herndon bent down, placing one hand on the defiant shoulder.

"I did not understand, at first, my dear," she said, soothingly, "or I should never have spoken as I did. Some very strange callers come here. But you are truly welcome. I had a daughter once; she must have been nearly your age when God took her. Won't you come in?"

While thus speaking she never once glanced toward the man standing in silence beyond, yet as the two passed through the doorway together he followed, unasked. Once within the plainly furnished room, and with her arm about the girl's waist, the lines about her mouth hardened. "I do not recall extending my invitation to you," she said, coldly.

He remained standing, hat in hand, his face shadowed, his eyes picturing deep perplexity.

"For the intrusion I offer my apology," he replied, humbly; "but you see I—I feel responsible for this young woman. She—sort of fell to my care when none of her own people were left to look after her. I only came to show her the way, and to say that I stand ready to pay you well to see to her a bit, and show her how to get hold of the right things."

"Indeed!" and Mrs. Herndon's voice was not altogether pleasant. "I understood she was entirely alone and friendless. Are you that man who brought her out of the canyon?"

Hampton bowed as though half ashamed of acknowledging the act.

"Oh! then I know who you are," she continued, unhesitatingly. "You are a gambler and a bar-room rough. I won't touch a penny of your money. I told Mr. Wynkoop that I shouldn't, but that I would endeavor to do my Christian duty by this poor girl. He was to bring her here himself, and keep you away."

The man smiled slightly, not in the least disconcerted by her plain speech. "Probably we departed from the hotel somewhat earlier than the minister anticipated," he explained, quietly, his old ease of manner returning in face of such open opposition. "I greatly regret your evident prejudice, madam, and can only say that I have more confidence in you than you appear to have in me. I shall certainly discover some means by which I may do my part in shaping this girl's future, but in the meanwhile will relieve you of my undesired presence."

He stepped without into the glare of the sunlight, feeling utterly careless as to the woman who had affronted him, yet somewhat hurt on seeing that the girl had not once lifted her downcast eyes to his face. Yet he had scarcely taken three steps toward the road before she was beside him, her hand upon his sleeve.

"I won't stay!" she exclaimed, fiercely, "I won't, Bob Hampton. I'd rather go with you than be good."

His sensitive face flushed with delight, but he looked gravely down into her indignant eyes. "Oh, yes, you will, Kid," and his hand touched her roughened hair caressingly. "She's a good, kind woman, all right, and I don't blame her for not liking my style."

"Do—do you really want me to stick it out here, Bob?"

It was no small struggle for him to say so, for he was beginning to comprehend just what this separation meant. She was more to him than he had ever supposed, more to him than she had even been an hour before, and now he understood clearly that from this moment they must ever run farther apart—her life tending upward, his down. Yet there was but one decision possible. Then he answered, "This is your best chance, little girl, and I want you to stay and fight it out."

Their eyes met, each dimly realizing, although in a totally different way, that here was a moment of important decision. Mrs. Herndon darkened the doorway and stood looking out.

"Well, Mr. Bob Hampton," she questioned, plainly, "what is this going to be?"

He glanced toward her, slightly lifting his hat, and promptly releasing the girl's clinging hand.

"Miss Gillis consents to remain," he announced shortly, and, denying himself so much as another glance at his companion, strode down the narrow path to the road. A moment the girl's eyes followed him through the dust cloud, a single tear stealing down her cheek. Only a short week ago she had utterly despised this man, now he had become truly more to her than any one else in the wide, wide world. Then Mrs. Herndon came forth quietly and led the girl, now sobbing bitterly, within the cool shadows of the house.

CHAPTER VIII.
A Last Revolt.

It proved a restless day, and a sufficiently unpleasant one, for Mr. Hampton. For a number of years he had been diligently training himself in the school of cynicism, endeavoring to persuade himself that he did not in the least care what others thought, nor how his own career ended; impelling himself to constant recklessness in life and thought. He had thus successfully built up a wall between the present and that past which long haunted his lonely moments, and had finally decided that it was hermetically sealed. Yet now, this odd chit of a girl, this waif whom he had plucked from the jaws of death, had overturned this carefully constructed barrier as if it had been originally built of mere cardboard, and he was compelled again to see himself, loathe himself, just as he had in those past years.

One thing he grasped clearly,—the girl should be given her chance nothing in his life must ever again soil her or lower her ideals. Mrs. Herndon was right, and he realized it; neither his presence nor his money were fit to influence her future. He swore between his clinched teeth, his face grown haggard. The sun's rays bridged the slowly darkening valley with cords of red gold, and the man pulled himself to his feet by gripping the root of a tree. He realized that he had been sitting there for hours, and that he was hungry.

Down beneath, amid the fast awakening noise and bustle of early evening, the long discipline of the gambler reasserted itself—he got back his nerve. It was Bob Hampton, cool, resourceful, sarcastic of speech, quick of temper, who greeted the loungers about the hotel, and who sat, with his back to the wall, in the little dining-room, watchful of all others present. And it was Bob Hampton who strolled carelessly out upon the darkened porch an hour later, leaving a roar of laughter behind him, and an enemy as well. Little he cared for that, however, in his present mood, and he stood there, amid the black shadows, looking contemptuously down upon the stream of ceaseless humanity trooping past on pleasure bent, the blue smoke circling his head, his gray eyes glowing half angrily. Suddenly he leaned forward, clutching the rail in quick surprise.

"Kid," he exclaimed, harshly, "what does this mean? What are you doing alone here?"

She stopped instantly and glanced up, her face flushing in the light streaming forth from the open door of the Occidental.

"I reckon I'm alone here because I want to be," she returned, defiantly. "I ain't no slave. How do you get up there?"

He extended his hand, and drew her up beside him into the shaded corner. "Well," he said, "tell me the truth."

"I've quit, that's all, Bob. I just couldn't stand reform any longer, and so I've come back here to you."

The man drew a deep breath. "Didn't you like Mrs. Herndon?"

"Oh, she's all right enough, so far as that goes. 'T ain't that; only I just didn't like some things she said and did."

"Kid," and Hampton straightened up, his voice growing stern. "I've got to know the straight of this. You say you like Mrs. Herndon well enough, but not some other things. What were they?"

The girl hesitated, drawing back a little from him until the light from the saloon fell directly across her face. "Well," she declared, slowly, "you see it had to be either her or—or you, Bob, and I'd rather it would be you."

"You mean she said you would have to cut me out entirely if you stayed there with her?"

She nodded, her eyes filled with entreaty. "Yes, that was about it. I wasn't ever to have anything more to do with you, not even to speak to you if we met—and after you'd saved my life, too."

"Never mind about that little affair, Kid," and Hampton rested his hand gently on her shoulder. "That was all in the day's work, and hardly counts for much anyhow. Was that all she said?"

"She called you a low-down gambler, a gun-fighter, a—a miserable barroom thug, a—a murderer. She—she said that if I ever dared to speak to you again, Bob Hampton, that I could leave her house. I just couldn't stand for that, so I came away."

Hampton never stirred, his teeth set deep into his cigar, his hands clinched about the railing. "The fool!" he muttered half aloud, then caught his breath quickly. "Now see here, Kid," and he turned her about so that he might look down into her eyes, "I'm mighty glad you like me well enough to put up a kick, but if all this is true about me, why shouldn't she say it? Do you believe that sort of a fellow would prove a very good kind to look after a young lady?"

"Kid, What Does This Mean and What Are You Doing Here Alone?"

"I ain't a young lady!"

"No; well, you're going to be if I have my way, and I don't believe the sort of a gent described would be very apt to help you much in getting there."

"You ain't all that."

"Well, perhaps not. Like an amateur artist, madam may have laid the colors on a little thick. But I am no winged angel, Kid, nor exactly a model for you to copy after. I reckon you better stick to the woman and cut me."

She did not answer, yet he read an unchanged purpose in her eyes, and his own decision strengthened. Some instinct led him to do the right thing; he drew forth the locket from beneath the folds of her dress, holding it open to the light. He noticed now a name engraven on the gold case, and bent lower to decipher the delicate lettering.

"Was her name Naida?" he questioned, sharply. "It is an uncommon word."

"Yes."

Their eyes met, and those of both had perceptibly softened.

"Naida," his lips dwelt upon the peculiar name as though he loved the sound. "I want you to listen to me, child. I sincerely wish I might keep you here with me, but I can't. You are more to me than you dream, but it would not be right for me thus deliberately to sacrifice your whole future to my pleasure. I possess nothing to offer you,—no home, no friends, no reputation. Practically I am an outlaw, existing by my wits, disreputable in the eyes of those who are worthy to live in the world. She, who was your mother, would never wish you to remain with me. She would say I did right in giving you up into the care of a good woman. Naida, look on that face in the locket, your mother's face. It is sweet, pure, beautiful, the face of a good, true woman. Living or dead, it must be the prayer of those lips that you become a good woman also. She should lead you, not I, for I am unworthy. For her sake, and in her name, I ask you to go back to Mrs. Herndon."

He could perceive the gathering tears in her eyes, and his hand closed tightly about her own. It was not one soul alone that struggled.

"You will go?"

"O Bob, I wish you wasn't a gambler!"

A moment he remained silent. "But unfortunately I am," he admitted, soberly, "and it is best for you to go back. Won't you?"

Her gaze was fastened upon the open locket, the fair face pictured there smiling up at her as though in pleading also.

"You truly think she would wish it?"

"I know she would."

The girl gave utterance to a quick, startled breath, as if the vision frightened her. "Then I will go," she said, her voice a mere whisper, "I will go."

He led her down the steps, out into the jostling crowd below, as if she had been some fairy princess. Her locket hung dangling, and he slipped it back into its place and drew her slender form yet closer against his own, as they stepped forth into the black, deserted road. Half-way up the gloomy ravine they met a man and woman coming along the narrow path. Hampton drew her aside out of their way, then spoke coldly.

"Mrs. Herndon, were you seeking your lost charge? I have her here."

The two passing figures halted, peering through the darkness.

"I was not seeking her," she returned, icily. "I have no desire to cultivate the particular friends of Mr. Hampton."

"So I have understood, and consequently relinquish here and now all claims upon Miss Gillis. She has informed me of your flattering opinion regarding me, and I have indorsed it as being mainly true to life. Do I state this fairly, Naida?"

"I have come back," she faltered, fingering the chain at her throat, "I have come back."

"Without Bob Hampton?"

The girl glanced uneasily toward him, but he stood motionless in the gloom.

"Yes—I—I suppose I must."

Hampton rested his hand softly upon her shoulder, his fingers trembling, although his voice remained coldly deliberate.

"I trust this is entirely satisfactory, Mrs. Herndon," he said. "I can assure you I know absolutely nothing regarding her purpose of coming to me tonight. I realize quite clearly my own deficiencies, and pledge myself here after not to interfere with you in any way. You accept the trust, I believe?"

She gave utterance to a deep sigh of resignation. "It comes to me clearly as a Christian duty," she acknowledged, doubtfully, "and I suppose I must take up my cross; but—"

"But you have doubts," he interrupted. "Well, I have none, for I have greater faith in the girl, and—perhaps in God. Good-night, Naida."

He bowed above the hand the girl gave him in the darkness, and ever after she believed he bent lower, and pressed his lips upon it. The next moment the black night had closed him out, and she stood there, half frightened at she knew not what, on the threshold of her new life.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. Among them is a stranger who introduces himself by the name of Hampton, also Gillis, the post trader, and his daughter. Gillis and a majority of the soldiers are killed during a three days' siege.

CHAPTER II.—Hampton offers assistance to the girl, and is at first spurned because he is known as a gambler.

CHAPTER III.—Hampton and the girl only escape from the Indians. They fall exhausted on the plains.

CHAPTER IV.—A company of the Seventh cavalry, Lieut. Brant in command, find Hampton and the girl on the plains, and restore them to consciousness. Hampton announces that he proposes to care for the girl.

CHAPTER V.—Hampton and the girl stop at the Miners' Home in Glencaid, Mrs. Duffy, proprietess. Rev. Howard Wynkoop proposes that Hampton place Miss Gillis in care of Mrs. Herndon. He consents to think it over.

CHAPTER VI.—Hampton talks the future over with Miss Gillis—the Kid. She shows him her mother's picture and tells him what she can of her parentage and life. They decide she shall live with Mrs. Herndon.

The Acrobat.

The Democracy of the north has already repudiated Bryan and Bryanism. The south is becoming suspicious. Either the western meteor is losing its dazzling brilliance or the political star gazers are realizing that they have been looking upon a false light.

There is something of humor in the spectacle of political gymnastics presented by the one time idol. Government railroad ownership having been so emphatically repudiated, we have had the theory of "ultimate" ownership, with pronounced regulation in the meantime.

This theory, too, having failed to rally the disintegrating factions, we have had from Mr. Bryan the theory of the initiative and referendum, based upon the apparent success in the cantons of Switzerland. But all except the socialistic element of the party has laughed in the face of the "peerless leader." To-day he stands high and dry on the lone mount, as one who has climbed to unstable heights of theory and cannot find a way to retrace his steps.

The Old Calfskin Shoe Lace.

The modern boot lace is anything but a luxury. It is nearly always just too long or a little too short, and although made flat, it soon becomes curled with a little wear. In the old days laces were made of calfskin, and nearly every farmer was an expert. He would cut a disk of leather three or four inches in diameter, stick the point of a sharp knife blade in a board, place the thumb nail the thickness of a match from it and quickly draw the string through the opening, the perimeter being reduced to the thickness of a match at every measure of the circumference. Then the square string was rolled between the sole of the shoe and the floor till perfectly round, after which it was greased with tallow. Such a lace would last for months. Round laces are now made of fiber, but their shine soon wears off, giving them a much worn appearance.

How Dolls Are Made.

Many big things are needed to make a small doll. She has her beginning in a great trough, where workmen knead up into a dingy paste from old cardboard, even old gloves, old rags and gum tragacanth. They are great brawny fellows, these men, naked to the waist, wearing leathern apons. In an adjoining room the paste is poured into molds for the busts, the arms, the legs of dolls innumerable. There is a special machine for stamping out the hands. I should not like to confess how long I stood in front of it, fascinated by the steady stream of queer little hands that fell ceaselessly from the iron monster. It was awful, uncanny, hypnotizing. Indeed, the whole sight was grim and monstrous. The low factory rooms were misty with steam and lit by strange, red glowing fires. Always great steel machines pulsed and changed, and through the mist sweaty giants of men went to and fro with heaps of little greenish arms and legs until you began to think that some new Herod had killed all the little people in the world.—Everybody's.

Napoleon Trusted His Omens.

Napoleon always had an unlimited trust in his presentiments. When the news came to him that one of the Nile river boats, the name of which was L'Italie, had been wrecked and the crew put to death he gave up all hope of ever completing his conquest of Italy by annexation. Napoleon believed that the stars exercise an occult influence over human destinies. When General Rapp, at one time his aid-de-camp, returned from the siege of Dantsic he found the emperor gazing with concentrated attention at the heavens. "Look there!" shouted the emperor. "It is my star! The fiery red one, almost as large as the moon! It is before you now, and, ah, how brilliant! It has never abandoned me for a single instant. I see it on all great occasions. It commands me to go forward; it is my sign of good fortune, and where it leads I will follow."

Are Only Hungry.

The children of Altoona, Pa., have had an equipmic of dyspepsia and the parents have come to the conclusion that it is because they go long with nothing to eat, so a lunchroom has been established. Many children go to school in the mornings having eaten very little, and if they could have something to appease hunger teachers might have less trouble with cross and peevish children.

A MAATTER OF BUSINESS.

That the welfare of the whole State of Maryland is bound up with that of Baltimore city is a saying as trite as it is true. The city comprises half the population and wealth of the State, and it is the market for the products of nearly all the rural portion. Its taxes, too, form an important item in the State treasury and should be seriously considered by the counties, as, taken altogether, the counties get a pretty good slice of the money paid in by the residents of the city.

Now, Baltimore city is in a pretty tight place just at present. It is prosperous in a business way, but it has undertaken great improvements, which, because they will greatly benefit Baltimore city, will benefit the whole State. But the money market has slumped, and the wise men who sit in the high seats of the city government are at their wits' ends to find the cash to keep these improvement plans going. The city has over $4,000,000 from the proceeds of the Western Maryland Railroad sale, but this was loaned out some years ago to certain bankers with the provision that it must be paid back when needed to pay off the Western Maryland bonds, and it is believed that the contract so made is binding and that the municipality can not, without a breach of good faith, at least, demand payment until the time specified in the contracts. Authority has been given for the sale of bonds and the bonds have been beautifully printed, but the financiers of the city needs their money for other purposes or can make more out of it in other ways, and the bond sales have been slow. There are other problems to be met, and altogether it is going to take the nicest sort of management to keep the affair of the city going right. Some legislation will doubtless be needed at the hands of the legislature next winter, and it is necessary that in this and in the making of appointments the best interests of the city be consulted.

All legislation will be subject to the approval of the Governor and all appointments of police commissioners, liquor license commissioners, police justices and many other officials whose duties pertain exclusively to the city government must be made by him. There are two candidates for Governor. One of these is an Eastern Shoreman, who has been trained in the school of political hostilty to the city, and whose county has shown a disposition to lean much more strongly toward Philadelphia than Baltimore in business affairs. He is a man whose political creed has taught him to believe in public office as a reward for valiant henchmen, and to pay but little regard to the interests of the people whose servant the official should be. The other candidate is a resident of the city, although born and bred a country man, and has earned for himself a splendid reputation as a city official of wisdom and integrity—one who has the best interests of the municipality at heart and is thoroughly posted on its needs. He is known as an advocate of the merit system, and he holds the view that public officers are the servants of the people and should be selected for their especial fitness and ability. He is also a broad-minded man, whose early training and judicial disposition will enable him to do what is right and best for the entire State. Under all circumstances, for which should the citizen who has the welfare of Maryland at heart cast his ballot?

MR. GAITHER'S SPEECH

In his speech Monday night accepting the Republican nomination for governor, Mr. Gaither placed in the forefront the question of our election law. He made a strong and vigorous plea for the re-enactment of the Reform League law passed by the Legislature of 1896, a law which was radically altered in the extra session of 1901. On the subject of the party column as against the alphabetical arrangement of the names of candidates, there is room for honest difference of opinion. But whatever may be thought of the question of going back to the party column and the party emblem, there is among right-minded men no difference of opinion and no difference of sentiment on the subject of trick ballots or on the subject of the wholesale rejection of honestly cast ballots for trivial reasons. Both these things have, ever since 1901, been a reproach to our State. And we are entirely confident that if Mr. Gaither is elected Governor he will have no difficulty in securing, with the backing of an overwhelming public opinion, the abolition of both these things, whichever party may prove to have a majority in the Legislature.

As Mr. Gaither begins his discussion of the issue with the question of the election law, so he closes it with some strong and timely remarks on the subject of disfranchisement. In expressing his surprise at the policy adopted by the Democratic managers of "once more promoting and bringing forward the scheme of disfranchisement of many thousands of voters of this State which was buried under an adverse majority of 34,000 only two years ago," Mr. Gaither might have pointed to the extremely sensible utterance of Mr. John P. Poe, made only four months ago, as confirmation of his view. That gentleman, while expressing himself in favor of a renewed attempt to frame a disfranchising amendment, a reasonable interval of time to pass after so crushing an experience as that which had befallen the Poe amendment, and declared his opinion that the Legislature of 1910 was the earliest that could be expected to take up the subject. The everlasting agitation of the suffrage question is a nuisance, and a great stumbling block in our political and general development. Underlying it all the time is the desire to make Maryland a one-party State, and Mr. Gaither is on the most solid and indisputable ground when he declares that "all our progress in government has been brought about by tha free competition of two strong and virile political parties." The spirit that would foster a revival of the old political slavery—the possession of practically unchallenged power by a single party—is a spirit that means the degradation of our entire public life.

On questions of administration and government, Mr. Gaither gave expressions to a number of specific views. On the subject of the control of corporations—the leading public question of the day—Mr. Gaither's views are in line with the best thought and the most hopeful experience of recent years. Nor are these views made on the spot; they have long been entertained by Mr. Gaither, and relate to a class of things in which he has shown the greatest interest both as a matter of personal thought and as a matter of official business. In his active and most highly useful connection with the city government nothing more constantly engaged his attention than the various questions pertaining to the relations of the municipality to public-service corporations. In regard to the taxation of easements, Mr. Gaither declares himself strongly in favor of an explicit Legislative enactment fixing the method; and, if elected Governor, he would unquestionably give his most earnest attention to the securing of laws which, in this important matter and in others pertaining to taxation would safeguard the just claims of the community. On the subject of a primary election law and of a corrupt-practices act, Mr. Gaither speaks with emphasis and force.

The claim that Mr. Gaither makes for the Republican party that "it was due to the efficient administration of the State's finances by a Republican Treasurer and our Republican Comptrollers that the finances of our State were placed upon a business-like basis" is simply the statement of a plain matter of fact. In Governor Lowndes' administration, a new spirit was introduced into the whole management of the State's fiscal affairs, and the most that can be said of succeeding administrations in this regard is that they have followed the precedent then set. If Mr. Gaither is elected Governor, it is a perfectly safe prediction from his whole career that his ambition and his public spirit alike will impel him to set the mark of the efficiency and usefulness of the Governor's office a notch higher. This is a time of notable Governors, in many parts of the country; men who, with an appreciative and non-partisam public sentiment behind them, have been doing important constructive work for their States. This is the kind of thing we can expect for Maryland if Mr. Gaither is elected. He will not be content with mere blamelessness; he will strive for definite progress. And in whatever he undertakes to do for the common good, he will have the ungrudging support of all good Marylanders, no matter which way they may have voted at the election.

PARAMOUNT ISSUE.

At the coming state election the voters of Maryland should for all time settle the question of disfranchisement which the Democratic party has for years been making the main issue, notwithstanding the fact that the people of the state have emphatically repudiated any such unfair and unconstitutional discrimination. The suffrage question is again the paramount issue, because if the Democratic party carries the state this fall they will again attempt legislation looking to the disfranchisement of the illiterate vote. The question is one that should receive the serious consideration of all classes of citizens. "Four Maryland voters out of every five," says the Baltimore News, "are oposed to the methods which every year result in the disfranchisement of thousands of white men, many of whom are neither stupid nor corrupt; yet the Democratic State platform holds out not one promise, however vague, that our present election system shall be anywise reformed. A comparison of the total vote counted at the election conducted under the Act of 1896 with the vote which has been counted at the elections since the extra session of 1901 leads irresistibly to to conclusion that ever since 1901 from 20,000 to 30,000 voters in Baltimore city have been virtually disfranchised. At least three-forths of these are white men and no living man is as much responsible for the extra session as is Ex-Gov. John Walter Smith. No living man is as much identified with the maintenance of the system of elections then inaugurated. A vote for Judge Crothers, his nominee for Governor, is a vote of approval for that election system. It is a vote to continue practices which every other year, or thereabouts, compel or induce thousands of the best Democrats in the State to vote for Republican candidates. In Maryland, Democratic State candidates can be elected without crooked and dishonest methods. If no attempt were made by men calling themselves Democrats, and who have the power to control the organization of their party to arrange the election laws so that they elect their candidntes, whether the people want them or not, there would very seldom be any doubt in this State of the success of the Democratic nominees.

"True, if the people, and not the Election Supervisors, determined the result of the election, it would not be safe to nominate for Governor some one whose very name is unfamilliar to nine-tenths of the voters of the State merely because his selection would enable one politicial leader to work his vengeance on others. The Democratic party in Maryland as distinguished from some Democratic politicians has nothing to lose and much to gain from a system under which the people select the candidates. The very fact that the large majority of the cultivated classess of the State are Democrats gives it in this respect a great advantage over its rival. But for the very reason that the party does contain so large a proportion of the culture, intelligence and patriotism of the State there are always thousands of Democrats in Maryland who will not stand for their party unless their party stand for what they believe to be right. These thousands know that crooked election methods are wrong and not right. Every Democrat who has at heart the permanent interest of his party in this State wants to relieve it of any responsibility for dishonest election methods. Every citizen of Maryland, whether a Democrat or not, who has at heart the best interest of his state and of the people of the state wants to put an end once and for all to an election system of which tricks and cheats are a part.

"As the issue and condidates of this campaign are made up, the best way to advance the cause of fair elections in the future—the best way to promote the good of the state—is to vote for Mr. Gaither for Governor."

LAWS WILL BE ENFORCED.

Opposition to Republican administration takes shape mainly in charges of attempts to defy the Constitution and efforts to destroy the courts. The Constitution appears to be given a rest just at present. Even the vindictive assailants may perceive the absurdity of attempt to overthrow the Constitution, when the Supreme Court is created for the express purpose of vindicating that instrument, and is ready at all times to perform its function. The imaginary attacks on the courts are more logical and plausible. It is easy to fling dirt, and by energy and perseverence a little of it may be made to stick. The only real attack which has been made on the courts was made by the Democratic party under Mr. Bryan's leadership. That party and its platform squarely denounced the action of the courts, and pledged itself to reform the judicial procedure. The expression of disappointment because a court has rendered a decision different from what was expected is not an attack on the courts. In this country people have the right to criticise. Even the President can do so without incurring the pains and penalties of impeachment.

The fact is, these charges of unconstitutionality and a design against the courts are the work of a small but very powerful part of the people, who believe their interests are menaced by an equal enforcement of the law. These charges are really complimentary to the administration, because they indicate that the party is doing precisely what it promised to do, and is doing it in an efficient manner. The interests of this bristling opposition can no more be injured by the enforcement of the law than any other interests in the country, provided there have been and are no violations of the law. Laws are framed to prevent violation, and they are absolutely innocuous where no violations occur.

For a lot of irresponsible parties to declare a law unconstitutional does not make it so. The Constitution has wisely established a means for testing the constitutionality of all statutes, and when a law is once passed by Congress it is presumed to be Constitutional until the proper authorities have decided otherwise, nor is there any reason for supposing that the recent laws passed by Congress are uncontitutional. They may be so.

It is not certain what view learned jurists will take of a question which seems simple to the average mind, but the administration's duty is pain. The duty of enforcing the law was placed upon the administration by the people; not of administering the law so as to benefit one class at the expense of another, not to pervert the machinery of government so as to aid certain interests to the detriment of the general welfare, but to administer the laws equally, so that each citizen shall have the opportunities and privileges extended to all. This we take to be the conception of duty which the present administration has in view, because that is the way in which it is administering the government. Under the circumstances, ridiculous charges, no matter how bitter, how fierce, or now ingeniously devised, are more likely to injury the assailants than the target at which they aim.

SPENDERS AND SAVERS.

Volumes have been written, sermons have been preached and even songs have been sung from time immemorial regarding the different classes into which the human race is divided, but after all, there are only two classes between whom there is a real and distinct dividing line: the spenders and the savers.

The accomplishment of the great workers of any age—the building of the houses, the mills, the bridges, the railroads, the ships, everything that has furthered man's advancement and happiness has been done by the savers. The spenders carried up the bricks for the savers who built the house.

The one who never had a dollar laid away for the proverbial "rainy day," or in readiness for opportunity's knock is a slave. He cannot help being a slave, for he is in constant peril of falling under the bondage of those others who have money.

The first step toward freedom and independence is economy. Economy means the avoidance of all extravagance and the application of money to the best advantage. The starting point of economy is the first nickle, dime or dollar that is saved as a nucleus around which the whole future may be built.

The trouble with most men is that they are not willing to climb the road to wealth by industry, temperance, frugality and honesty, but spend all their time looking for the royal road that will enable them to attain the desired goal without sacrifice or effort on their part. Consequently, they go through life dragging after them a load of debt and obligations that cripples their independence and makes of them servile, cringing creatures who cannot stand up boldly and look the world in the face because they have not a dollar in their pockets and the independence that goes with it.

It does not require superior courage or virtue to be economical. Economy is satisfied with the ordinary energy and effort of the ordinary mind. Economy means to do without some little thing today, so that we may have something greater and better in the future.

Let us look back for ten years over the life of the spender. How easily he could have saved a dollar each week, without depriving himself of one single effort or pleasure. Had he done so, his bank account would now amount to $520 plus the interest. No matter how small the income, a portion of it should be religiously saved.

To the spender we say: Begin now—today, at once—purchase independence and throw off the yoke of slavery by starting a bank account. If you cannot spare five dollars, start it with one dollar. If you cannot spare a whole dollar begin it with ten cents and before another year rolls around you will know how good it feels to have a real bank account.

His friends in Oakland hope for a speedy and permanent recovery.

People who write things which they would like to see printed in a newspaper, should bear in mind that what they write as their personal opinion should be fathered by them, and when they write stuff that is not fit for them to attach their names to it should never be printed. Remember, the rule of all decent newspapers and you will never have occasion to put on the shoe. This is the rule which we give in all kindness. Never ask a newspaper to do anything you are ashamed to do yourself.

It is said that three of the stingiest men in the state were in town yesterday. One of them will not drink as much water as he wants unless it be from another man's well. The second forbids any of his family from writing anything but a "small hand" as it is a waste of ink to make large letters. The third stops his clock at night in order to save wear on the machinery. All of them decline to take their county paper on the ground that it is a terrible strain on their spectacles to read newspapers, even in the day time.

Mrs. Frank Carney, of Washington, who visited her mother, Mrs. Lowenstein during the summer returned to her home yesterday morning.

GOING BACK TO INDIA.

Rev. and Mrs. D. H. Lee Soon to Return to Missionary Work.

Reverend D. H. and Mrs. Ada Lee, managers of the Memorial Bengali Mission, Calcutta, India, will leave Mountain Lake Park on September 28 for Iadia to resume their mission work. They expect to leave New York by a steamer of the Anchor Line for Glasgow on October 5 and sail from London on the Caledonia October 19 direct to Calcutta.

Mr. and Mrs. Lee have been in the United States nearly a year. In a letter to some friends they wrote:

"We reioice with you all in the temporal prosperity which on every side marks our dear home land. We could wish that equal spiritual progress had been made in all parts of the church. We do earnestly praise God for the degree of spiritual life which is found in many of the churches. We find a growing missionary interest in many of the churches, and espeaially in those where the spiritual life of the people runs high. One—a church of 80 members—which we had the pleasure of visiting is sending out one of their number to be a missionary with us and is taking the honor of her entire financial support.

"We are calling for 1,000 intercessory missionaries, both among individuals and churches, who will be able not only to give of their means, but to support the work every day at the altar of prayer.

"Let me ask all who will respond to this call to pray erpecially for Mrs Lee and myself and for the five excellent young people who have given themselves to God's work and who are going out with us to reinforce the work in our field.

"Please place the names of these young people on your prayer list: Howard G. Hastings. of Taylor University; Oren W. Hankins, of Ada University; Miss Lillie Lee, of Los Angeles (my niece); Miss Martha O. Wilson, of the Chicago Training School, and Miss Katherine Kinzly, of Lockport, N. Y. We should be glad to have you add also the names of our two little boys—Frank, now 8 years old, who was a babe in arms when our six children were killed in the Darjeeling landslide disaster, September, 1899, and also little Albert, who two years after came to cheer our hearts and home. Also please remember the faithful company of workers in Calcutta in the field, who have so loyally held the work together during our absence, often doing double work."

Valuable Property to Be Sold.

Mr. William E. Walsh, of Cumberland, mortgagee, advertises in this paper today the sale of the Bradley Farm, adjoining Oakland, which contains quite a large acreage. The land is suitable located for dairy or stock raising purposes. A portion of the land has been laid off into town lots through which streets have been located. The sale will take place on the premises on October 22nd, at eleven o'clock a. m. A plat of the property may be seen at the office of Mr. John T. Mitchell in Oakland or at the office of Mr. Walsh in Cumberland.

Mrs. Annie Wolf-Slabaugh, of Pittsburg, is here visiting her parents. Mr. and Mrs. John A. Wolf.

Mr. William R. Stull went to Pittsburg this morning for a few days' business visit.

Mr. Louis Bush, of Eglon, who will remove to Oakland with his family some time during the month of October, will sell at public auction at his farm near Eglon on October 16th, furniture, live stock, farm machinery, etc., besides grain, hay and other farm products. Mr. Bush will occupy the property in Oakland which he purchased some months ago from Mr. Percy Procter.

We noticed in the Postmaster General's report a suggestion that people writing letters should sign their full names and addresses to their letters, and there would never be a letter but what could be returned if it failed to reach the person it was intended for. The report suggests a better way than that, too, but one which is a little more expensive. That is to have a small card printed on the corner of the envelope. This will cost only a trifle, and if the letter cannot be delivered to the address, or the address should be wrong, the letter would come back in the course of five or seven days, instead of going through the dead letter office, and finally being returned to the writer after a lapse of two weeks or more. The latter suggestion is much the best, and can be adopted at a very small expense.

Rally Day Services at Swanton.

The M. E. Sunday school will have a Rally Day service on next Sunday at 10 a. m. There will be addresses, select readings, and recitations. The singing will be in charge of Prof. Ira S. Groves. Everybody invited to attend. A special invitation is given all persons who have ever been members of the school; also it is hoped that every member of the school who can possibly do so will be present. Everybody will be given a cordial welcome.

A. F. GEORGE, Sup't.

COMMUNICATED.

To the Editor of The Republican:

It is with great pleasure that I note the candidacy of Mr. Julius C. Renninger for the office of State's Attorney for Garrett county. Mr. Renninger has been actively engaged in practice law of the law in Garrett county for the past twelve or thirteen years and is fully qualified for the position to which he aspires. He is a man of unusual ability, of high integrity, and if he receives the nomination for this office and is elected I feel confident in voicing the expression that he will discharge the duties of the office in his usual strong, forceful, unprejudiced and fearless manner, and to the satisfaction of the people.

Mr. Renninger has been an active party worker, a staunch Republican, and has contributed generously of his time and talents to the cause of the Republican party.

From reports current throughont the county I am convinced that the people are calling Mr. Renninger to this office. I trust that the Republican convention which meets on Tuesday next will answer the demand of the people by placing him in nomination for the office of State's Attorney, and if elected the Republican party will have an officer of whom they may well be proud, and the people of Garrett county at large will have a man who will represent them in said office in a fearless, impartial, and conscientious manner.

REPUBLICAN OF DISTRICT NO. 7.

Church Services.

MT. LAKE AND DEER PARK M. E. CHARGE.

Services next Sunday as follows:

Deer Park—Preaching at 11 a. m., in the M. E. church. It will be old people's day, also services at 2:30 p. m.

Mt. Lake Park—Preaching at 7:30 p. m.

E. J. WESTFALL, Pastor.

M. E. CIRCUIT—FRIENDSVILLE

Services for Sunday will be preaching at 10:30 at Selbysport; at Friendsville, 7:30, and Blooming Rose at 7:30 Saturday evening. Baptism of infants and adults and reception of probationers will be part of the exercises at Selbysport; our last visit to this point before conference, also at Blooming Rose. We are glad to note the increase of the congregations and the good condition our societies are in. Last Sunday was a great day at Hoyes and Elder, when the gospel had its desired effect upon the large congregations at each of these places. Our last visit to these points before conference will be Oct. 6th.

All are welcome.

W. M. LISTER, Pastor.

ST. MARK'S LUTHERAN.

Services next Sabbath as follows:

Sunday school at 9.30 a. m.

Preaching morning and evening, subject at 10.30 a. m., "The Honey Bee." Children especially invited to be present.

Luther League every Wednesday at 7.30 p. m.

Everybody welcome.

E. MANGES, Pastor.

Festival.

A festival will be held in Assembly Hall at Mt. Lake Park on Wednesday, October 2nd, the proceeds to be used to start a school library for the public school at the Park. A glorious time is promised everyone who can attend and everybody is cordially invited.

Refreshments will be served during the evening and you should not miss the big cake walk. A good time is insured for the entire evening. Come and bring all your friends and neighbors.

Lumbermen Elect Officers.

At the annual meeting of the West Virginia Saw Association, representing virtually all the saw mill operators in West Virginia, held at Elkins on Friday night, the following officers were elected: E. E. Wheeler, of the Wheeler Lumber Company, Glady, president; P. T. Brown, of Elkins and Durbin, first vice president; M. M. Brown, of Brown & Hill, Montes, second vice president; M. N. Wilson, of the Wilson Lumber Company, secretary and treasurer.

The board of directors include W. O. Howard, of Burner; Mr. Bittner, of the Curry-Bittner Company; Junius Radeker, R. F. Cliffo,d, of Hambleton, and C. H. Williams, of Hazelwood.

The mills are again threatened with a car shortage, and a railroad committee has again been appointed to take this matter under consideration.

Uncle Josh PerKins.

"Uncle Josh Perkins," the New England rural comedy-drama, comes to Oakland on October 2nd. It unfolds a story filled with sweet naturalness and possesses enough real life to make of it a big success with all who go to see it. The company this season is said by our exchange to be stronger than ever and the play as laudable and as entertaining as anything produced in many a day. It is one of those creations that sends its audience home in a better frame of mind and on better terms with oneself, after having sat through the entertainment. The cast is said to be a finely blended one and the specialties introduced are declared to be specially high class. Novel settings for every scene depicted are carried complete by the company.

Picnic at Gortner.

There will be a picnic and festival at the Swan Meadow school house at Gortner, Saturday, October 5th, 1907. All proceeds are to be used for the benefit of the new Lutheran church at Red House. There will be vocal and instrumental music, and speaking by some able talkers. A game of base ball and other amusements during the day. Plenty of refreshments of all kinds will be served on the grounds. Come all for a good time.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child. If there is feverishness, night or day, Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Nordine's Nurse

... By ...
Marshall Cromwell.

Copyright, 1907, by Homer Sprague.

Helen Paget started through the open door of the stateroom with increasing wonder. The single occupant of the apartment lay with his head back against the cushions, his face twisted into the most horrible grimaces. Occasionally he would move his head weakly from side to side, only to return again to his facial contortions.

At last she could stand it no longer, and, leaving her section, she crossed to the door of the stateroom. If the man was subject to such attacks his nurse should not have left him alone, yet she had seen the attendant slip forward to where she knew the cafe car to be.

"Can I be of any service?" she called as she stood uncertainly in the doorway. The man looked up, with a wan smile.

"Please don't laugh," he said as she approached, "but there is a fly on my nose, and I've been trying for the last ten minutes to dislodge it. I can't use my hands, you see," with a glance at his bandaged arms, "and I can't wrinkle my nose enough to scare him off."

Gravely Helen drove off the offending insect with the absurd little square of cambric that she called a handkerchief, and the man smiled gratefully into her sympathetic eyes.

"It must seem absurd," he said, "but that fly was driving me crazy. I told my nurse that he could go forward and have a smoke if he wanted to. I am just recovering from an accident."

"I thought you were having—a—fit," she explained, with a delicious little laugh. "I have the section just outside of the door, and I sat and watched you until I became afraid that something serious might happen."

"I should have been a gibbering idiot in another minute," he declared. "I never felt so helpless in my life."

"I can understand," she said sympathetically. "It must be awful to be so helpless."

"I am very much obliged to you," he said warmly. "It was very good of you to come to my relief."

"I am glad to have been of service," she said simply. "I shall keep an eye on you. If you need anything before your attendant gets back, just call me."

She went back to her section and took up her book again, but her thoughts were not on the printed page. She was thinking of the man in the stateroom. He was a man to appeal to women; a strong, manly fellow with frank eyes and an honest mouth. His very suggestion of strength seemed to render his helplessness the more pitiful.

The nurse seemed an inexcusable time returning, and once or twice she went to the door to ask if there was anything that she might do. The second time he asked that she send forward for his nurse, and she summoned the porter.

That functionary presently returned with a doleful face. "Ah doan' fin' him," he reported. "He ain't in the cafe car."

Nordine asked that search be continued, but at the next stop the mystery was solved. The nurse had been left behind at the last station when he stepped out for a breath of air. He wired that he would follow on the next train. Nordine looked dismayed.

"I guess I shall have to wire ahead for a nurse," he said. "Titus won't catch up with me until we reach Chicago, and in the meantime I shall be helpless."

"Will it delay your trip seriously?" asked Helen, noting the look of disappointment that came to his face.

"My sister is to be married tomorrow night," he explained. "Unless I can get a nurse by wire I shall not get there in time. I am in no shape to make train changes alone."

Helen picked up the message that the porter had written and glanced at it.

"Are you Albert Nordine?" she asked. The man nodded.

"I am Helen Paget," she explained. "I am to be your sister's maid of honor. I came from London, and the boat was late. I was afraid that I should not be able to get there in time. Why can't I be your nurse, Mr. Nordine? The porter will help. It will be better than getting some unknown person, even if you are able to arrange the matter by wire."

Nordine looked at her gratefully.

"I wish you could see how much like an angel from heaven you look to me," he said earnestly. Helen glanced in the mirror and laughed.

"I hope I'm not growing wings," she said. "It would entirely spoil the fit of my dress, and Bertha and I should both be disconsolate. I think I'd rather be just a plain mortal."

"You could not be a plain mortal," he said with an emphasis on the adjective as he glanced into the pretty face. She colored at the compliment and assumed a professional air to cover her embarrassment.

"You must not flirt with your nurse," she ordered.

She sank into the seat beside him that he might not see the pity in her eyes. She knew now the reason for the bandages, for she had read the story of how he had rescued a tiny nephew from the blazing summer home on the Hudson.

To Nordine the world had suddenly grown bright again. He was not able to read and he had been utterly miserable in the solitude of the stateroom, shut off from his fellow travelers in the Pullman. Now, with Helen to talk to, he even forgot the smart of his wounds.

He was a capital talker, and long before the call for dinner came they were fast friends.

He had the meal brought into the stateroom and she fed him with pretty solicitude for his comfort. He wondered if such meals of nectar and ambrosia were ever served upon Olympus, and he was sorry when the waiter at last came to take the tray.

He was still more regretful when the porter came to put him to bed, but sleep came quickly to his contented mind, and in his dreams Helen was with him again.

She came to him in the morning as soon as the stateroom had been made up, and the day passed all too rapidly. He was sorry when at last the long strings of freight cars announced their approach to Chicago, and she left him to get her things together.

His brother-in-law to be met him at one of the suburban stations and rode into the city with them. With his help the transfer to a carriage was easily accomplished. His sister was delighted at the story they told, and that evening as she stood in her bridal finery she whispered to Helen her wish that the girl would be the next of their acquaintances to wear the veil and orange blossoms. Helen blushed and declared the impossibility of such an occurrence, but later in the evening as she stood on the steps watching the departure of the bridal pair Nordine came up to her.

"You'll have to throw my share of the rice, too," he said, with a smile. "Do you suppose, Nell, that some day you could learn to care so much for me that we can drive off together with the rice and the old shoes and the good wishes following in our wake?"

"Perhaps I might learn," she said as her eyes were veiled behind the long lashes to hide how much she already cared. "I think I had my first lesson on the train."

Other guests came near them, and she made a gesture of warning. "Do you know," he said, trying to make his tones careless, "I am going to give Titus double pay because he got lost."

"I think he deserved it," she agreed, with a smile so illuminating Nordine could scarcely refrain from kissing her in the presence of them all, for in the soft brown eyes he read the message and knew that Nell had already learned.

Vanished Animals.

In the latter part of the mesozoic age there was a great inland ocean, spreading over a large part of the present continent. The lands then above water were covered with a flora peculiar to the times and were inhabited by some of the animals which later distinguished the cenozoic age. In the seas were reptiles, fishes and turtles of gigantic proportions, armed for offense or defense. There were also oysterlike bivalves, with enormous shells, three or four feet in diameter, the meat of which would have fed many people. In time this great ocean, swarming with vigorous life, disappeared. Mountain ranges and plains gradually arose, casting forth the waters and leaving the monsters to die and bleach in tertiary suns. As the waters remaining divided into smaller tracts they gradually lost their saline stability. The stronger monsters gorged on the weaker tribes until they, too, stranded on rising sand bars, lost vitality and perished as the waters freshened. In imagination we can picture the strongest, bereft of their food supply, at last floundering in the shallow pools until all remaining mired or starved.

Looking After Number One.

The seedy actor shuffled his feet and looked into his hat apologetically. He laughed conscientiously at the joke the manager made, but it was a hollow laugh.

In fact, Mr. Perkins, otherwise Claude Cremorne, juvenile lead, felt hollow generally, particularly in the part which should have contained his dinner.

"A sovereign on account of my salary would be of inestimable service to me just now," he murmured to the manager. "You can deduct it at the end of the week, you know."

"Ah, yes, dear old darling fellow,' said the manager benignantly, "that's all very well, don't you know. But the difficulty comes in here. Most likely I shan't be able to pay any salaries at all at the end of the week, and if I give you a sovereign now where should I be then? No, be sensible, dear boy." —London Answers.

IT HAS ITS DRAWBACKS.

Why Soap Is Not the Best Thing For Disguising the Breath.

"Say," he said to the man in the street car on his right, "you sometimes stay out late nights, don't you?"

"Well, I don't always get home at 9 o'clock."

"And when you do your wife insists on smelling your breath, eh?"

"I believe she has on a few occasions."

"Then lemme give you a tip. It would be one of the best things in the world but for a few drawbacks. If you'll eat soap going home it will take the smell of whisky all away."

"Yes, I think so," said the other after a moment's thought, "but what are the drawbacks?"

"Why, your wife will probably do as mine does. She takes one sniff of my breath and turns away with:

"'If you have called here to do the washing you are mistaken in the house. Get right out with you!'"—Chicago Daily News.

A Vast Difference.

There was never any haste at Aunt Euphemia's table; consequently Dorothy, the youngest of all the nieces and nephews who gathered at Poplar Hill in the summer, had learned what to expect. Everything was served by Aunt Euphemia, and age had strict precedence.

There came a day, however, when Dorothy, returning to the family dining room after a season spent in her room with a sore throat, found at her place a delectable apple pie, so small that it seemed as if it must be meant for her alone. Nevertheless she determined to be cautious.

"Am I"—she looked anxiously toward the head of the table, where sat the awe inspiring relative—"am I to be aunty for this pie, or is it all mine, Aunt Euphemia?"—Youth's Companion.

Financial Genius.

"Some men quickly think of schemes for making money that would never occur to others."

"Yes. There's old man Miggs, for instance. He has the money making instinct all right. They simply can't beat him. When his daughter began accepting attentions from young Bramley what did the old man do but pretend to strenuously object."

"What had that to do with money making? Bramley's rich. One would naturally think the old chap would have been glad to get him into the family."

"Oh, he was; but by making it necessary for them to elope he figured that he would save the expense of a wedding."—Chicago Record-Herald.

The Laziest Man.

One of the contractors in Panama was much annoyed by the exceeding laziness of the sixty native workmen under him. He resolved to try to make them ashamed of their indolence, so one day he lined them up and said:

"Now, I've got a nice easy job for the laziest man in this company. Will the laziest man please step forward?"

Fifty-nine of them stepped forward. The contractor turned to the other, who stood still, looking almost too indolent to stand, and said:

"Why didn't you come forward with the others?"

And the answer came in a weary voice:

"I'm too lazy."—Judge's Library.

Want to Know.

Not long ago a Boston municipal official who is a stickler for the use of good English had occasion to consult a physician new to the community.

After the examination the doctor said, "All you need, sir, is a tonic in the shape of fresh air."

"Would you mind telling me," asked the purist sarcastically, "what is the shape of fresh air?"—Harper's Weekly.

On the Same Old Lines.

"Pa," said the daughter of the house anxiously, "what did you do when dear Willie called on you today to tell you I wanted to marry him?"

"What did I do?" answered her father, with a gleam of wrath in his eye. "Exactly what I do with the rest of your silly bargains—I footed your Bill."—Baltimore American.

"Yes," replied the editor coldly, "but we prefer good ones."—New York Life.

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

NEW ITALIAN CHURCH.

Fine Structure Erected in New York Among This People.

The Methodist Episcopal church, through the medium of its Church Extension and Missionary society, is doing valuable and aggressive work for the Italian population of New York. This work was begun in 1888 and since that time, says Record of Christian Work, has been carried forward with varying success.

NEW ITALIAN M. E. CHURCH.

In November, 1906, the contracts were signed for a church and parish house in East One Hundred and Fourteenth street. The work in this district was undertaken a dozen years ago in a colony of Italians which has increased with the years until their number is estimated at from 35,000 to 50,000. A simple, dignified style of architecture, Italian in feeling, has been chosen.

The basement in every part is fully utilized; a large room for meetings in front, a gymnasium, locker rooms, baths and toilet rooms in rear, besides heating apparatus and coal vault; a fireproof passageway with fireproof doors, etc., extending from front basement entrance to a stairway in the extreme rear of the building, the stairway giving direct access to the roof garden over auditorium, without the necessity of passing through the various departments of the building; this passageway will also serve as an emergency exit from the auditorium, should it be necessary.

This first story has the main auditorium in rear and a large room in front that may be used, if required, for weddings or funerals.

The auditorium is reached by a broad passageway, having fireproof partitions and floor, direct from street. The main stairway leads from this hall to the top of the building, the stairs, partitions and doors in them being fireproof. Space for an electric elevator has also been provided, conveniently planned to carry passengers to the rooms in the upper part of the building.

The second floor will contain the main Sunday school rooms; this and the gallery in the auditorium are arranged to be thrown together if desired.

The third floor is arranged for social rooms that may be sub-divided into smaller rooms or thrown into one large one if desired. A kitchen and other conveniences are provided also in connection with them. The rear of this story over the auditorium becomes the roof garden, or, a place where open-air meetings may be held in hot weather, if desired.

The fourth story is arranged for the pastor's family, the windows in the rooms on the north side getting abundance of light and air overlooking roof garden, the front rooms overlooking street.

The fifth floor will be floored over and left unfinished for the present, but can be arranged to give accommodations for settlement workers.

ODDS AND ENDS.

Manorambai, the accomplished daughter of the famous Pundita Ramabai, founder of the Mukti mission at Poona, India, is now actively engaged in spiritual work in the same field. She writes us thanking the friends who have contributed to the mission.

At Detroit, Mich., a Young Men's Hebrew association has been permanently organized.

One of the most eloquent preachers in Wales is the Rev. J. Baulston Jones. He has been blind since he was two years old, but was graduated with high honors at the University of Glasgow.

Mrs. Valentine Gonnering of Freedom, Wis., probably holds the record as the mother of religious, in that state, if not the whole United States. She is the mother of ten children, all of whom will devote their lives to religion.

The celebration of Pope Pius X.'s golden jubilee as a priest will begin September 18 next, and continue throughout the next 12 months, concluding on September 18, 1908, the actual anniversary. The holy father has expressed the wish that no money be wasted on costly entertainments, receptions, and the like.

New Catechism for Schools.

Some three years ago, by invitation of the Church of Scotland, representatives of the other Reformed churches met with delegates from that body to consider the matter of religious instruction in the public schools of Scotland. A subcommittee appointed by the conference to prepare a simple catechism for use in the schools where children of the various churches are taught together, has now reported. Though the revised book contains nearly as many questions and answers as the historic Shorter Catechism, it has been greatly simplified in language, and statements bearing upon doctrinal differences between the denominations have been omitted. There is, of course, no purpose to supplant the Shorter Catechism in the Sunday schools and churches.

AROUND THE CAMP FIRE

A BRAVE CHARGE.

Story of American Cavalry Which Outdid the Famous "Light Brigade."

In a recent address Col. W. G. Bentley, who served in the Ninth New York cavalry, compared the charge of the Eighth Pennsylvania at Chancellorsville with the famous charge of the Light-Brigade, immortalized by Tennyson. The English command, said the speaker, in which everybody knew that "some one had blundered," numbered, officers and men, 637. It lost killed, 113; wounded, 134; total, 247, or 36.7 per cent.

"Gallant and brave as this charge was," Col. Bentley declared, "it was Forward They Sprang.

tame beside the charge of the Eighth Pennsylvania cavalry at Chancellorsville, led by Maj. Keenan, where never a man returned. Our right had been turned by Stonewall Jackson, and at the critical moment, Keenan charged to check the advancing column, in order to gain time to enable our artillery to be put in place. It was certain death; no blunder or mistake, but duty, and it was bravely done."

George Parsons Lathrop described this great charge, and although the splendor of the action can not be matched in words, his tribute gives a most vivid picture of an event awful and sublime in its devotion to duty. It follows:

But suddenly rode a form
Calmly in front of the human storm,
With a stern, commanding shout:
"Aliign those guns!"
(We knew it was Pleasanton's.)
The cannoneers bent to obey,
And worked with a will at his word:
And the black guns moved as if they had heard.
But ah! the dread delay!

"To wait is crime;
O God, for ten minutes' time!"
The general looked around.
There Keenan sat like a stone,
With his three hundred horse alone—
Less shaken than the ground.

"Major, your men—?"
"Are soldiers, general." "Then
Charge, major! Do your best;
Hold the enemy back at all cost,
Till my guns are placed—else the army is lost.
You die to save the rest!"

By the shrouded gleam of the western skies,
Brave Keenan looked into Pleasanton's eyes
For an instant, clear, and cool and still;
Then, with a smile, he said: "I will."
"Cavalry, charge!" Not a man of them shrank.
Their sharp, full cheer from rank to rank
Rose joyously, with a willing breath—
Rose like a greeting hail to death.

Then forward they sprang, and spurred and clashed,
Shouted the officers, crimson sashed;
Rode well the men, each brave as his fellow
In their faded coats, of blue and yellow;
And above in the air, with an instinct true,
Like a bird of war their pennon flew.

With clank of scabbards and thunder of steeds,
And blades that shine like sunlit reeds;
And strong, brown faces, bravely pale
For fear their proud attempt should fail,
Three hundred Pennsylvanians close
On twice ten thousand gallant foes.

Line after line the troopers came
To the edge of the wood that was ringed with flame;
Rode in and sabered and shot—and fell;
Nor came one back his wounds to tell.
But over them, lying there, shattered and mute,
What deep echo rolls? 'Tis a death salute
From the cannon in place; for, heroes, you braved
Your fate not in vain; the army is saved!

Why He Sent for Her.

"How does it happen that Crockett sent for his wife to come home from the seashore and stay with him two weeks?" they queried. "I thought he was having such a bang-up time without her?"

"He was," they replied. "He was having too bang-up a time, in fact. He got dead 'broke. His wife has the money, you know. That was why."

Placing the Blame.

Recently published reminiscences of Carl Schurz put severe blame on Gen. O. O. Howard for the union defeat at Chancellorsville. Gen. Howard makes a gallant and clever reply. The whole blame, he says, for that defeat rests upon Gen. "Stonewall" Jackson, the confederate commander.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

DRINKING IN INDIA.

Use of Alcoholic Beverages Said to Be on the Increase.

In a recent issue of the London Temperance Chronicle it is stated that drinking in India is decidedly on the increase, and that this increased consumption is largely due to greater indulgence in intoxicants by the native population. It is shown from recent returns that the revenue from intoxicating liquors consumed in India has risen from £5,476,000 in 1903, to £6,510,000 in 1906. Of the entire population of 294,361,000, the European element is estimated as 190,000, and of this number 70,000 are soldiers of the European army who must, in view of climatic and other conditions, be considered of generally sober habits. Exempting 25,000 more as the wives and daughters of soldiers and civilians who may fairly be considered to use but little alcohol, there remains in all about 100,000 Europeans, who are chiefly engaged in conducting civic affairs of the empire, and who are persons of education, and little prone to excess, which in that country involves its own swift and complete retribution. The Royal Army Temperance association branch in India has a membership of 29,300, or nearly three-sevenths of the whole European army. The 62,500,000 Mussulmans spread over the land are, of course, strict abstainers, and contribute nothing to the drink bill.

In view of these facts it is concluded that it is the native population who are most nearly concerned in the increased consumption of alcohol. In a recent public address, Surgeon General Evatt made notable reference to the increased use of intoxicants among native races, and pointed a warning of the danger of allowing this traffic to proceed further among a people so markedly excitable as the native population of India.

The subject thus raised has been taken into consideration by the Native Race committee, an organization which has effected some extremely beneficial measures in regard to Africa in this respect. It is expected that the extension of the operations of this body to the eastern empire will shortly take place and effectually check the progress of an evil so damaging to the best interests of the native race of this part of the empire.

Result of Temperance Wave.

The temperance wave which is passing over western Europe has been the principal cause of the difficulties which now beset the French growers. We must go back to 1875 to find a crop that equaled in abundance that of 1906. Wine, as a result, became so cheap that the railways demanded more for carrying a ton, say, from Benziers or Perpignan to Bordeaux, than it would sell for in the last-named town. To make matters worse, the consumption has decreased in most European countries. In France itself, the greatest wine-drinking country in the world, the use of mineral waters has grown enormously within the last few years. It is now freely admitted that these beverages are serious competitors with home-grown wines. Again, a large number of artificial wines have recently been placed upon the market, and they have hit the public taste, although they are not nearly so wholesome or nutritious as the genuine juice of the wine. All these things have combined to injure the grower, and to bring distress upon him in the midst of plenty.

The Canteen Question.

As the question of the canteen in the United States army is likely to be resurrected during the coming winter, the clear, unbiased presentation of the problem by as distinguished a military leader as Brig. Gen. A. S. Daggett, is opportune. Gen. Daggett is a soldier of wide experience, having fought in the civil war, the Spanish-American war and in the Philippines. His long intimacy with soldier life fits him to speak authoritatively on this subject, and the pamphlet which the Hartford reform bureau purpose publishing under his signature will be a valuable aid in the campaign against the reinstatement of the canteen.

Progress in Florida.

Gov. Broward, of the state of Florida, is noted as an advocate of state prohibition of the liquor traffic. A Prohibition amendment was narrowly defeated in the state legislature recently, being favored by 35 out of the 42 votes necessary for the enactment. The vigorous campaign carried on by temperance forces of this state has placed it in the forefront of the states enacting against the drink traffic. County local option has been secured in 27 out of the 45 counties of the state.

Drink Taxation in Great Britain.

According to a recent statement of the chancellor of the exchequer, the average taxation per head in Great Britain for alcoholic drink and licenses is approximately 17s 7d on an estimated population of 43,643,00. The alcoholic strength of beer and wine varies considerably and there are no statistics, at present, of the quantities at each degree of strength which would admit of the number of gallons of proof spirit being given with accuracy.

GROCODILE AND TIGER BATTLE.

A Thrilling Combat Witnessed by Lionel Smith, an African Explorer.

The crocodile had drawn nearer till his head had passed within a couple of yards of the tiger, says Lionel Smith, in Macmillan's Magazine. Why had he not seized him? Had he thought better of it, and sheered off? Not he! For a moment he lay still; then the surface of the water was violently broken, and the powerful tail struck the tiger a tremendous blow on the head and shoulders. With a roar that shook the woods, the tiger threw up his head, but before he could leap back two great gaping jaws were thrust above the water, and clashed together where the tiger's nose had been a moment before. The crocodile had missed his aim, but his great teeth closed upon the tiger's left cheek and on the tough hide of his neck and held him as in a vise. Then followed a terrible struggle; the crocodile trying to drag the tiger into the river, and the tiger, with his claws thrust deep into the sandy bank, resisting with all his might. With all his weight, and with forward sweeps of his powerful tail, the crocodile dragged at the agonized brute, whose roars of rage and pain were terrible to hear. My nerves quivered and my rifle shook in my hand, though my experience with big game had not been devoid of thrilling moments; but the battle was so near, and so terrific.

The unequal struggle had moved me, and I found myself eagerly watching to give aid; but a shot to be effective must be planted behind the shoulder, and that was under water. I could only bide my time and watch the tug-of-war. Sometimes one beast, sometimes the other, lagged in his efforts. Slowly, inch by inch, the tiger was dragged from his haunches; then realizing his danger a herculean effort would throw him back in his former position. Then the crocodile would dark and tear and sweep his great tail, and the unlucky victim, torn and mutilated, would growl his agony with terrifying intensity. Several of these bouts came, and still the tiger held his ground. But now his foe, impatient for the end changed his tactics, and to secure a better hold he for a moment relaxed his grip. In one instant the tiger had wrenched his torn cheek from the loosened jaws, and in another his fangs crunched with maddened force through the bony jaw and out-spread tongue of the reptile, whose swirling tail told its own tale. The biter was bit and the struggle was now more equal. The tiger could drag at his enemy without being flayed alive, and drag he did. Despite his loss of blood, at one tremendous lift he gained a foot, then drawing back, first one paw and then the other he repeated the process, and foot by foot the struggling, snorting reptile was drawn over the edge of the slope. Now my chance came. As he thrust forward his short forelegs the white of his shoulder showed, and in quick succession I fired twice at the unguarded spot. The effort was instantaneous; the tail whirled in the air, the front paws lost their holt, and the brute lay an inert mass, which the tiger dragged still further up the slope. Then he stoped and relaxed his hold; for a moment he held himself rigid and ready, then he dropped his muzzle down to that of his prostrate foe, sniffed at him once, twice, and then with a low growl—perhaps of wonder, perhaps of defiance—he turned and vanished like a shadow into the jungle grass. I willingly let him go.

TIMBER FAMINE ON.

Statement by Secretary Wilson After Inspecting Forests.

Washington, Sept. 22.—"The timber famine is upon the United States already," said James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, who returned recently from a six weeks' inspection of the private and national forests of the Pacific Coast.

"Lumber costs twice as much to-day as it did ten years ago. The price is steadily advancing and the supply of available timber is decreasing. The Puget Sound section is shipping daily hundreds of carloods of lumber to the East. This is used throughout the Mississippi Valley, and some of it comes as far East as Boston. The mines throughout the country use great quatities of it. The single small section of the Cœur d'Alene district consumes twenty carloads a day.

"The mines will be the first place where the scarcity will pinch. This is due to the fact that large timbers are used in the mines, and this class of timber will be the first to be exhausted and the hardest to produce again. The call of the East upon the Pacific Coast will be shut off temporarily by an added $3 a thousand which the railroads are contemplating putting on the transportation charge. When the Panama Canal is completed, however, cheap transportation will be again established to the East, and the demand will reappear.

"The difficulty of getting timber will increase gradually but surely, and in the face of the present demand it would be hard to say how severe the conditions will be ten, twenty or thirty years hence.

"Vast quantities of timber are being wantonly destroyed every year. This destruction takes place on lands which are privately owned, and is due in large part to the fact that when the big timber is cut the branches are left to dry and become a fire trap. Then when a fire is started it devastates great stretches of land, killing all the young timber, and in many instances leaving an absolute desert behind it. Large lumber companies which formerly did the same thing in Michigan have gone West and bought great tracts of land, and when the big timber has been harvesting they have taken no further interest in the lands, and have allowed the fires to destroy the forests of the future. These lands are privately owned, and there is no way of restraining a man from doing as he pleases with his own property.

"All that I can see that promises timber for the future is that section that is protected by the national forest reserve. On these lands certain mature timber is allowed to be cut, and all waste is disposed of in such a manner as to prevent fire. There will be certain amounts of timber maturing every year which may be cut, and this will go on indefinitely. Fire destroyed only $76,000 worth of timber on the whole of the forest reserves last year, while the figures of the lumber people show that more than $350,000 damage was done by fire in the State of Washington alone.

"Congress has refused to allow the President to put more lands in the reserve, and the position of the department is merely that of protecting the timber it already has under its care."

Secretary Wilson is greatly impressed with the remarkable prosperity throughout the West. He says that all the people have an abundance of money, and that crops are good. Wall Street, he adds, is too far removed from the West for its influence to be felt in money matters. He believes that the West is loaning money to the East, and that it will continue to do so. He says there are enemies of the administration in the matter of forest reserves, but many more friends, and that the West will demand a man in thorough sympathy with the Roosevelt policies for the next Republican Presidential candidate.

When You Need Printing Done

You want it to be of the very best kind. As you expect your printed matter to make business it is necessary it should do the talking for you. Poor or indifferent printing cannot do this as it lacks the strong points required to gain and hold the interest of the patron.

¶ In this particular line of work we excel, for several reasons, viz: 1st; we have the largest and best variety of up-to-date type to be found in the western part of the state. 2nd; we carry only the very best grades of papers; and 3rd; the know-how with which to create original and attractive tye display.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, D. C., Sept 24, 1907.

Herbert Knox Smith, Commissioner of Corporations, has just returned from his vacation, which he spent in Connecticut, and is prepared to begin his winter campaign against illegal trusts and in the interests of legitimate corporations. "We intend to take up eight branches of investigation," said Mr. Smith to your correspondent. "These will be steel, lumber, waterways, coastwise and the canal and inland waterways, tobacco, cotton exchanges, farm implements, that is the International Harvester Company, and patents on agricultural implements." The investigations which have been conducted by the Bureau of Corporations have resulted in the prosecution of the Beef Trust, which, through a legal technicality, fell short of conviction, but which, it is hoped, has proved a warning to the packers; and the conviction of the Standard Oil Company and its sentence to pay a fine of $29,000,000 or just a little less than three-fourths of its profits for last year. The Bureau of Corporations does not conduct prosecutions, as that branch of the work belongs to the Department of Justice, but it makes very thorough investigations and when it discovers violations of the law it reports them to the Department of Justice which is Uncle Sam's firm of lawyers, so to speak.

There is no division of the Government more cordially hated than the Bureau of Corporations. It is hated by the Standard people, by the Beef Trust, and the Lumber Trust, by the International Harvesy Company, and all other institutions and corporations which object to being prosecuted when they violate the anti-trust and the anti-rebate laws. It is so cordially hated that J. P. Morgan's daily paper devotes at least one editorial a week to making fun of the Bureau and the Commissioner and to condemning its work and methods. There are other peopie in the United States, the great army of consumers, for instance, who love the Bureau for the enemies it has made and they are not likely to take much stock in the editorials and garbed news stories attacking its work. James R. Garfield was the first Commissioner of Corporations, and then Mr. Smith was his assistant. When Mr. Garfield became Secretary of the Interior, after having demonstrated his great ability to the President and all unprejudiced observers in the former position, the President promoted Mr. Smith to the head of the Bureau because he regarded its work too important to be entrusted to a tyro, and Mr. Smith has shown marked ability under Mr. Garfield. And Herbert Knox Smith has made good, to use the President's own words.

A similar instance of misrepresentation attends the disposal of the New Foundland fisheries question. Practically all of the London papers are giving the full credit to Sir Robert Bond, the New Foundland premier, for the decision to send the controversy to the Hague for adjudication. The fact is that the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, the American Ambassador at London, first suggested the idea of arbitration to Secretary Root when Mr. Reid was in Washington last winter. Secretary Root thought well of the idea and upon its receiving the hearty approval of the President, Mr. Reid returned to London to endeavor, by every proper diplomatic method, to bring it about. Diplomacy in London is somewhat peculiar affair, and Mr. Reid employed all the methods known to the most skilled. His entertainments were the most lavish, his wines of the finest. He entertained the nobility and even royalty, and finally he established his position as "such a good fellow" that it was practically impossible for "the powers that be" to refuse his request. Now Sir Robert Bond, who well knows that there is little equity in the contentions of New Foundland, sought by every possible means to prevent the case being tried at the Hague, and Mr. Reid's skillful diplomacy defeated him. Now that Sir Robert has been signally defeated, he is going around saying that he was responsible for the whole thing in a manner which reminds one of a certain once popular picture of a Thomas cat, who, having been almost annihilated in a fight with a rival, remarks, "Did you see me get the best of him?"

When it had been finally agreed to send the controversy to the Hague, it became necessary to complete a modus vivendi to control the taking of fish until the Hague Tribunal shall have rendered its decision, that is an agreement on the points in dispute to cover only the intervening period. Sir Robert insisted that the Americans should not use purse seines, that they should not take fish on Sunday, and that they should not employ New Foundlanders as members of their crews. Mr. Reid conceded the first two of these points and Great Britian agreed that the American skippers might employ New Foundland, provided they took them on board outside of the three mile limit which is as far to sea as New Foundland's authority goes, under the terms of international law. Now Sir Robert is engaged in denouncing the modus and has even threatened that New Foundland will not observe its provisions. The situation is strikingly like that of the San Francisco authorities who threatened to disregard the terms of the treatly between the United States and Japan. However, the San Franciscans were brought round to see the situation from a reasonable standpoint, and presumably Great Britain will be able to subdue her recalcitrant child.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

An addition of two rooms has been added to Dr. Davis' cottage. Mr. Wm. Smouse did the work.

A back porch and other improvements are being made to the McConnell cottage by Mr. Wiley Weiling.

Miss Jennie Lee, daughter of Rev. Lee, left for school at the Woman's College, Baltimore, Monday last.

Rev. Hart moved into the Loch Lynn Hotel this week.

Mr. Adolph Rambeau has been offered a position with an engineer corps in Western Pennsylvania.

Mr. Erwin Sperry, son of Mr. A. R. Sperry, is at home for a vacation of a week or ten days. He is now ticket agent in Norfolk.

Mr. Hanson Lewis has been appointed a lumber inspector for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company.

Sunday evening next Rev. E. J. Westfall will preach his last sermon here before the meeting of the conference. The past year has been the most successful in the history of this appointment. Mr. Westfall's return is desired by the congregation.

Mrs. Spitzer, who has been a resident of the Park for about twenty years, left Wednesday night with her sister, Mrs. Blue, for Ohio, with whom she will make her home in the future.

Politics is at high tide in this district at present; there are quite a number of candidates in the field, others trying to get in and still others "willing to make a sacrifice in the interests of the party." Mr. C. J. Rathbun for the House of Delegates and Mr. E. E. Friend for Register of Wills, are the most prominent names mentioned.

The Prohibitionists held their county convention here last Saturday afternoon and placed in nomination a county ticket. The old auditorium, where the convention was held, was not crowded.

Mrs. Elenora Cunninghan died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. George Ralson, at this place on Sept. 19th, after a brief illness, at the advanced age of 85 years, 8 months, and 14 days. The funeral took place last Friday.

Frank Brenneman, a young farmer residing near this village, was thrown from a wagon last Friday afternoon had considerably hurt about the head and shoulders.

F. M. Bittinger is opening a new coal mine near his old one and will soon be ready to supply the public with coal in any quantity.

The public school is in session here with W. L. Thomas and Miss Bessie Wiley in charge and from present indications we will have an effective school this year.

Misses Fannie and Myrtle Wiley went down to Meyersdale, Pa., last Monday to visit their brother S. O. Wiley of that city, and to take a look as the Fair which will be held there this week.

Beaston Boman, McHenry, was seen in this village last Monday.

Master Edwar Hayward, of Bond, is attending school at this place and is pleasantly quartered at Oliver Buckle's home.

C. C. Frederick, of Friendsville, passed through this village last week.

CHILDISH RIVALRY.

Close Race at First, but Johnnie Wins on the Homestretch.

Johnnie, aged eight, has been in the house for a week in consequence of a header from his "bike." In this time he and Percy, aged six, have exhausted all their usual themes for disputes. Yesterday this was overheard in the nursery:

"Mamma, did Percy ever have whooping cough?"

"Yes, dear."

"Well, then, did he have it as bad as I did?"

"No, not quite."

"There, Percy!"

"Well, anyhow" (this from another voice), "I had measules worsen'r you, and I had it first too."

"You didn't!"

"I did too!"

"Mamma! Mamma! Did Percy have measules before I did?"

"Yes, he had it first, and you took it from him?"

Percy now triumphed audibly and vociferously. Then Johnnie rallied and crushed him:

"Well, anyhow, I broke my collar bone, and it cost $25."

Percy had no more to say. It is expected as soon as the rain stops he will go straight out and break his collar bone.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

An Impression.

"The public doesn't want Shakespeare," said the egotistic player.

A Letter From Dad.

Dear wife, I cannot tell you how
I've missed you since you went away—
The home is very lonesome now.
Where did you put my suit of gray?

With none to greet me at the door,
With heavy heart I tread the blocks
That homeward lead; I miss you more,
But, say, where did you hide my socks?

How still and dull the house appears!
I miss the sunlight of your eyes.
The weeks you've been away seem years.
What has become of all my ties?

I hope you will enjoy yourself,
But do not mingle with the flirts.
I've hunted every closet shelf—
Wherever do you keep my shirts?

And now I've told you all the news,
There's nothing more for me to write,
Except, where did you hide my shoes?
They are not anywhere in sight.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1907. NUMBER 31

THE COUNTY HARVEST AND ITS GREAT CROPS

A Most Wonderful Crop of Hay The Present Year.

THE HISTORIC LITTLE MEADOWS

Old Stone Mansion Over One Hundred Years Old—Old Houses Good. An Interesting Story of a Great County

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

The harvest season in Garrett county is now about over. It can be safely said crops of all kinds are good, certainly an average, especially the hay and oats, The hay is now mostly put away in a safe condition and the oats will soon be ready for the machine. The largest hay crop producer in our two upper counties is D. F. Kuykendall, of Cumberland, upon his magnificent farm at the Little Meadows, of over 1200 acres, much of which is meadow lands. His product this season is about 175 tons of fne hay for which there will be a ready market at high prices. He does not much engage in grain production, tho' his many cultivated acres are capable of such products.

He is now about to erect a silo. This is a new method of manufacturing provender for horses, calves and cattle. The method is to erect a tall, narrow building and fill it at the proper time with unripe corn, cut up in short bits and stored away, and in the winter season to be fed mostly to cattle. They relish it and do well upon eating it. It is also good food for horses. This will certainly be a great addition to the provender crop, as most of the corn stalks were a waste. It is said quite a number of farmers between Grantsville and Salisbury have started in this business.

Mr. Ralph Engle was the first at the enterprise on the Maryland side.

Now, a word or two about the historic Little Meadows. It received its name from Washington himself in his first journey across the Alleghenies. It is an estate of about 1200 acres and has belonged to Mr. Kuykendall and wife for about 15 years. It has always been a charming summer resort for the owners and their friends. But this season they have not much used it. The property itself is in a fine condition and repair in every way. The old stone mansion of nearly a century in age is as solid as when erected in good old honest times, with but slight changes, but a number of modern appendages are to be seen. There is one fact palpable to the eyes of old acquaintances. Sixty years or more ago there were not less than ten inhabited dwellings on this large estate, but for many years not one of them are visible. Only the old mansion with the necessary outbuildings. This was once a gay place, one of the most prominent points on the old national road, between Cumberland and Brownsville. Had its postoffice—the third in the county, a store, hotel, shops, many buildings, really a village. But when the old pike became denationalized, to use a new term, by the flanking railroads, north and south of it, the life of the property as a hotel was ended; this was in the early eighteen fifties. Since then it has been mostly private property. It is now greatly appreciated and enjoyed by the respected owners.

OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

Little Meadows, Sept. 17, 1907.

STATE EXHIBIT AT JAMESTOWN.

Senator Brown Tells of Garrett County Apples and Vegetables There.

To the Editor of the Republican:

Having just returned from Jamestown, where I went to take part in the exercises of the Summer Meeting of the Maryland State Horticultural Society, I have thought that a short description of our State Exhibit might be of interest to your readers.

The Maryland Exhibit, of fruits and vegetables has been one of the best, and has attracted much attention. It has not been as large in quantity, at any one time, as some of the others, but it has been varied from time to time and the exhibits have been first class.

The space occupied is very tastefully arranged: within the railing are six large tables in front, and occupying one of the most prominent places was the fine exhibit of Garrett county cauliflowers, sent by The H. Weber & Sons Company, which are admired by everybody.

Upon other tables were many varieties of apples, peaches, plums and grapes.

In the line of vegetables, several dozen large matermelons were conspicuous, as also potatoes of large and even size.

The canning industry, which is so large in the State, was represented by a pyranid of cans containing the various products of the canneries.

Upon the wall are hung pictures of scenes in Maryland, both of the mountains and on the bay, and the whole effect is most attractive and does credit to our State.

Immediately after the Maryland meeting, the National Horticultural Society was in session and it made a special exhibition of fruit, much of which was of extra fine quality and was much admired.

As a whole the Exposition is well worth a visit, and the bay, the battle ships and Fortress Monroe add to the interest of the visit.

State's Attorney, Mr. Julius C. Renninger, of Oakland.

Sheriff, Mr. Austin Brown, of Oakland.

Members of the House of Delegates, Mr. Jacob S. Myers, of Friendsville, and Mr. Lawrence F. Green, of Grantsville.

County Commissioner, Mr. Otho Fike, of Avilton.

Clerk to the County Commissioners, Mr. Albert G. Ross of Oakland.

County Treasurer, Mr. Wm. E. Hollinger, of Friendsville.

Judges of the Orphans' Court, Mr. John L. Fitzwater, of Swanton, Mr. Henry Kamp, Jr., of Accident, and Mr. J. Thomas Moon, of Deer Park.

Register of Wills, Mr. Edwin E. Friend, of Mountain Lake Park.

County Surveyor, Mr. James A. Sincell, of Oakland.

The members of the convention from the various districts in the county began to arrive in Oakland on Monday morning and with each succeeding hour their number was added to until the hour set for the assembling of the representatives of the people in convention at the court house at noon on Tuesday, every district of the fourteen sub-divisions of the county had full representations present.

A caucus of the members of the convention was scheduled to be held at ten o'clock, but at that hour less than half a dozen delegations went to the court house where the convention was held, the balance remaining on the streets assembled in groups of from three to a dozen, making propositions to other delegations for a trade of votes for their various favorites who were seeking to be placed on the ticket. As a result of this seeming unwillingness on the part of a majority of the delegates to enter the caucus the hour of meeting for this purpose was postponed until 11.30 o'clock, when all assembled in the court room where matters soon adjusted themselves with the result that the ticket above was agreed upon.

The convention was called to order by Mr. A. F. George, one of the members of the County Central Committee. Mr. N. U. Bond was unanimously chosen as its chairman and Mr. Patrick E. Finzel, was elected secretary.

The committee on credentials, composed of one member from each of the fourteen districts, certified to the convention that the following named persons were entitled to seats in the convention.

District No. 1, Herman Steiding, A. F. George, John L. Fitzwater, Jacob Condron and John Smith.

District No. 2, J. B. Thomas, B. F. Friend, George D. Browning, W. E. Hollinger and N. R. Selby.

District No. 3, Lawrence F. Green, Ralph Engle, C. H. Younkin, C. C. Durst and H. H. Baker.

District No. 4, Grant Hershberger, H. M. Kemp, Stephen G. Ashby, James Harris, N. U. Bond.

District No. 5, J. A. Beeghly, H. J. Speicher, D. O. DeWitt, Silas Teats, Jonas Platter.

District No. 6, Jonas Glotfelty, Marshal Frankhouser, W. A. Smith, S. G. Savage, J. Alvin Friend.

District No. 7, C. J. Rathbun, James A. Hayden, W. S. Friend, W. O. Cleveland, R. K. Maroney.

District No. 8, Burt Wilson, C. O. Rogers, E. C. Harvey, C. E. Hilleary, Scott Harvey.

District No. 9, P. E. Finzel, T. H. Layman, Henry Blocher, Albert Bolden, F. A. Werner.

District No. 10, E. W. Kelso, F. L. Warnick, George Fitzwater, Charles A. Ashby, John Uphold.

District No. 11, Otho S. Fike, John Merrill, Jonas Wampler, Jacob Strickland, W. S. Jackson.

District No. 12, Henry Beitzell, F. M. Bittinger, Dennis Deiterick, G. W. Engle, Jonas Bittinger.

District No. 13, A. C. Smith, Daniel Wilson, J. E. Chappell, H. L. Price, L. C. Bray.

District No. 14, Henry K. Friend, Samuel Lawton, Edward J. Frantz, George Geissman and Austin Brown.

There was no contest from any of the districts.

The committee on resolutions, which was also composed of one member from each district, reported the following rssolutions, which were unanimously adopted, much applause and enthusiasm being manifested during their reading:

Be it resolved, by the Republicans of Garrett county in convention assembled, that—

We heartily indorse the Republican nominees for State offices and commend them not only to the Republican voters, but to every voter within the confines of the county who regards character above party and who desires our State government to be in the hands of honorable, patriotic men who will serve the people rather than party bosses. In Hon George R. Gaither the Republican State convention has given the people an opportunity to elect a Governor who will be "no man's man," and on whose life and public record no sign of suspicion or stain can be found. His name is an absolute guarantee of honesty and safety in the administration of the affairs of the people, irrespective of party, factions or interests, and his election will reflect credit on the intelligence of the voters of the Commonwealth.

We appeal to the intelligence of the people of this county and the State at large to place the true meaning on the action of the Democratic bosses in "heartily and sincerely indorsing" the administration of Governor Warfield, and at the same time emphatically turning him down for renomination, although he was the overwhelming popular choice of his party; and we ask whether it is the desire of the people to place men of sterling character and integrity in high office, or whether they want men subservient to professional politicians and party tricksters.

We stand unequivocally for the repeal of our present ballot law and the reenactment of the Reform League Election Law, passed during the administration of our recently deceased patriotic Governor Lloyd Lowndes. The present law was conceived wholly for the sake of gaining partisan advantage, but which has in its operation disfranchised thousands of intelligent voters of both political parties—Republican and Democratic alike. As a means of eliminating the negro vote it has signally failed. Notwithstanding the fact that there are but twenty-six registered colored voters in Garrett county, and that most of them are able to properly mark their ballots, there are over three hundred ballots rejected each year, while the total vote is nearly 1200 less each year than was cast in 1899, the last year under the operation of the old, or Reform League Election Law, which undoubtedly indicates that hundreds of our voters, among them being some of the heaviest tax payers, and leading, law abiding citizens, stay away from the polls rather than be humiliated because of their physical defects and perhaps cast their votes contrary to their honest convictions and intentions. The law as at present on the statute books we condemn in no uncertain way—it is outrageous, iniquitous and contrary to the principles of a free and untrammeled expression of the will of the people.

With the elimination of donations from the State Treasury to private institutions which have for years fed at the public expense; more efficient, broader and elevated public school laws with local officials of sufficient mental qualities and education to enforce them, our public institutions of learning would soon be placed on a higher plane of efficiency and not handled as a piece of merchandise or as a reward for party fealty.

We distinctly pronounce in favor of a "Corrupt Practices" act which will more effectually prevent the bribery of voters, but we recognize the fact that no change of laws can in itself bring about pure elections; and therefore now offer and agree to meet the officials and representatives of the Democratic party in this county with the object in view of taking such united action as will prevent the correct expenditure of money in the county during the present campaign, without which votes can neither be bought nor sold.

We pledge our nominees for the Legislature to the principles above set forth, and if they are the choice of the majority of the voters at the election to be held on November 5th next, we shall expect of them a true allegiance to the same.

That the candidates for the House of Delegates nominated here today are hereby pledged to see to it that no change be made in the existing law which would curtail the right or prohibit any one from writing deeds or mortgages.

That the candidates for the House of Delegates nominated by this convention are pledged to use their best endeavors to give the people of our county a legalized primary election law.

That the land lying in the disputed territory in Election Districts Numbers Four, Nine and Eleven, comprising over thirty-eight hundred acres should be assessed on the tax books of Garrett county and that the people of our county insist upon the County Commissioners carrying our claims to the higher courts, as the land belongs to Garrett county in all justice, equity and fairness.

An additional resolution providiug for the filling of vacancies on the ticket, should any occur, by the members of the County Committee, was also adopted.

The ticket as a whole is a splendid one. Every man named thereon is conscientious, sincere and will be true to the trust imposed in him by the representatives of the people.

Mr. Renninger, nominee for State's Attorney, has been practicing at the Garrett county bar for upward of fourteen years. He has made a success of his profession and will make an exceptionally strong candidate and an efficent officer.

Mr. Brown, for Sheriff, is no stranger to the office. He served one term as such, being succeeded by Mr. Edward J. Frantz four years ago. His record as an officer compares very favorably with his predecessors. He is well known in every section of the county. At present he is engaged in a lumbering enterprise near Lonaconing, but has his residence in Oakland.

Mr. Myers and Mr. Green, for the House of Delegates, are both aggressive Republicans of ability. At present Mr. Myers is engaged in farming near Friendsville; he served several years as a public official in the capacity of Clerk to the County Commissioners and gave excellent satisfaction. His colleague on the tickat, Mr. Green is a resident of District No. 3. He is engaged in teaching the Compton school, having followed this profession for several years. He is an excellent conversationlist and an able speaker, well educated, genial and resourceful.

Mr. Fike, for County Commissioner, is a farmer; a business man of more than ordinary executive ability who will bring with him to the office for which he has been nominated excellent judgment in matters of public concern.

Mr. Ross, the present efficient Clerk to the Board of County Commissioners, was nominated for the position which he now holds. His nomination by the convention for the office to which he was appointed by the Commissioners, is his best recommendation. He has been faithful, painstaking and obliging.

Mr. Hollinger, of Friendsville, for

DRILLING AT THE HARNED FARM RESUMED FRIDAY

Well Being Put Down by the Yough River Oil and Gas Company To Be

BORED TO A DEPTH OF 4000 FEET

Delay in Receiving New Cable from the Manufacturers Has Retarded The Work, but It Will Now Be Pushed As Fast As Possible.

Boring in the well on the Harned farm, five miles west of Oakland, in which the Yough River Oil and Gas Company, composed of many local business, and professional men, hope to discover oil or gas in paying quantities, was resumed on last Friday noon after an indleness of several weeks owing the delay in the manufacturers shipping the new steel cable which was made necessary after the 3,000 foot depth had been reached by the original cable made of hemp.

The new cable arrived on Wednesday of last week and the following day it was hauled to the well and placed on reel. It weighs more than a ton, is four thousand feet long and seven-eights of an inch in thickness.

The contractor informs The Republican that hefound the well practically clear of obstructions, aside from about thirty feet of mud which has accumulated, and that he hopes to be able to complete the well before cold weather.

The directors and stockholders in the company are very much encouraged over the prospect of finding oil or gas, every indication pointing to the fact that the well is withing the bearing field.

Should the hopes of the projectors of the enterprise be fulfilled this immediate section of Garrett county would be benefitted to the extent of many thousands of dollars, and as nearly every one in the community is more or less financially interested in the well all would reap the benefit directly.

Indian Mound Discovered.

Mr. James Yantz and Henry Finzel discovered a well built mound on the summit of Savage Mountain above Frostburg near the camping grounds of the Allewegi Indains, and it is the opinion of people that it is the tomb of part of the tribe of Indains, because the oldest inhabitant cannot recall when there was a mound built on Savage mountain. The mound contains a stone engraved with Indain symbols.

Messrs. D. E. Offutt and Gilmor S. Hamill left Oakland Tuesday for a fortnight's visit to the Jamestown Exposition.

LIQUOR WILL BE AN ISSUE.

Alleged That Saloon Interests Have Raised Big Sum.

That the brewing and distilling interests of the city and State are raising a large fund to defeat all Legislative candidates who favor temperance legislation, and that already $50,000 has been subscribed is the charge made today by Mr. William H. Anderson, secretary of the Maryland Anti-Saloon League.

"This evidence of opposition we believe will help us," said Anderson today, "for it will serve to crystallize public sentiment on the anti-saloon question, which is bound to occupy a prominent position during the approaching campaign."

Mr. Omer F. Hershey of the law firm of Crain & Hershey, counsel to the brewing interests of the city, said today, when apprised of Mr. Anderson's statement: "This is news to me. I know of no such fund, and if such a movement was on foot I would in all probability know about it."

A dispatch from Pittsburg, Pa., yesterday stated that the Pennsylvania Federation of Liquor Dealers, alarmed at the spread of local option in Ohio, is preparing to raise a fund of $1500,000 to defeat any local option law at the next session of the Legislature of that State. In Maryland ten of the 23 counties are "dry," and in two more there are saloons in only one place in each county. In Washington county both parties are pledged to local option, and there is a strong movement on foot in Worcester county against wet goods.

The League purposes to mail a list of questions to all Legislative candidates about a month before the election, asking their views regarding the laws in which the League is interested, and their replies will be made public. Asked if similar inquiries would be directed to the Gubernatorial candidates, Mr. Anderson said:

"That is not definitely settled. It is within the range of possibility, for the statement of Mr. J. D. Baker, published this morning, practically puts the question up to both candidates."

The temperance movement has made tremendous advances throughout the country recently, and is likely to figure more prominently than ever before in Maryland in the approaching campaign. The League wants primarily a law which will allow the people of any county, or part of a county, or any portion of Baltimore city, residential districts especially, to close saloons by mandatory direct majority vote, and this will be among the questions to be put to the candidates. The League intends, when their replies are received and announced, to activity enter the campaign and work against those candidates whose views are unfavorable to the legislation it desires. Committees will be appointed in every church congregation to get around among the voters, and it is also purposed to hold public meetings.

The League may also question all candidates for the United States Senatorships, as the National Anti-Saloon League is endeavoriug to secure the passage by Congress of the Littlefield inter-state liquor-shipment law, which is designed to prevent local prohibition laws being broken under the guise of inter-State commerce.

The Anti-Saloon League has, of course, no connection with the Prohibitionists, the League being entirely non-partisan and directing its efforts to obtain temperance legislation by the various candidates of the two great parties. The Prohibitionists, on the other hand, make their own nominations, and this year they will put a full Legislative ticket in the field. The Prohibition vote for Comptroller in 1905 was 4317.

MULLEN PROVES TROUBLESOME

Wife Buries Him When Samuel Comes Back Home Alive Three Years After Interment.

Newburg, W. Va., Sept 27.—Samuel Mullen, known as "Pot" Mullen, of Lonaconing, was killed on the Baltimore & Ohio railroad at Newburg in June, 1904. His wife resided at Lonacaning and he also had some sisters in this section. The body was shipped to Lonaconing but was delayed at Piedmont until $18 charges was paid on it.

It was then taken to Gilmore, Md., by a sister of Mr. Mullen, but in the next day the wife of the dead man secured a writ of replevin and removed the body to the mining hamlet of Harpersville. On the next day the body was taken to Frostburg the home of MrsMullen. On June 19, 1904, the body was interred in Old Coney cemetery at Lonaconing.

Nothwithstanding that the body was passed around very freely and that all of his relatives and scores of friends viewed it, no one doubted it was the body of Samuel Mullen. There are people in Lonaconing who would take oath to the belief that Samuel Mullen was in Lonaconing one day this week. They saw him and are positive. He did not stay long, but left as soon as he heard that he was dead and buried in old Coney. Some think the man killed over three years ago was not Samuel Mullen, that the identity was wrong.

FROCK TAKEN FROM BRIDE.

Magistrate Orders Princess Gown Restored To Mother.

Mrs. Berlin is a dressmaker with a reputation and is up-to-date in every respect. During the recent craze for the princess frock she evolved several creations that made the neighbors and her clients stare. The cream of these was a white crepe de chine over pink silk. As this was made just before her son's marriage, she conceived the idea of shirring it at the waist to fit the slender Becky, her daughter and assistant, who might thus attend the wedding in a costume worthy the occasion.

Becky was a dream on that auspicious evening, rivaling the lovely bride. After that she gazed at the gown with longing tenderness every time she saw it adorning a wooden lady for the benefit of her mother's customers, while she fingured out some domestic crisis great enough to restore it to her permanently.

Becky was a good girl, but she couldn't help falling in love. Her last flame was Marvin Nichols, a sergeant in Uncle Sam's army, whom she said to her mother she would marry, Mrs. Berlin objected in some things to the sergeant, but the soldier continued to court Becky around the corner and on street cars.

When Becky was absent last Wednesday, supposedly at work, a customer came for a princess gown. Mrs. Berlin sought her famous model and found it missing. She put two and two together. Becky had taken the princess to be married in. On the street she met her daughter's dearest friend and taxed her with it till she confessed that she had "stood up" with her chum. But when Becky, with her soldier in tow, presented herself for her clothes her mother replied: "When I will have my princess, you will have all that you own." Threats failed to move her, and the case got into the Morrisania Police Court. Judge Steinert ordered all Becky's belongings and the disputed princess to be brought before him. Modest policemen shook out the choicest samples of a trunkful of the bride's apparel, while two others with manly simplicity carefully exhibited the princess upside down, With the judgment of Solomon, the Court awarded Becky all but her dearest treasuer, and Mrs. Berlin carried home her model.—N. Y. World.

MR. BAKER UPON HIS OPPOSITION.

Democratic Candidate for Nomination for Governor Talks Liquor Interests.

Mr. Joseph D. Baker, of Frederick, who was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Governor and whose candidacy is said to have been opposed by the "liquor interests," published yesterday at length a discussion of the part played politics by the liquor interests and the political aspects of the saloon question generally. Mr. Baker takes as a text an editorial in the Baltimore Sun praising him highly and stating that the opposition to him was based upon "matters affecting expediency solely." From this and other political history which he quotes, he draws the conclusion that the "Sun's position is wrong and its teachings harmful—harmful, because it has a tendency to encourage men to have regard for expediency rather than principales; because it is likely to give young men just starting upon their career the idea that to carry elections is the chief object in politics, and that with that object in mind conditions should be studied, not with a view to righting what is wrong." Mr. Baker says also that it emphasizes and and exaggerates the power of the "liquor interests" in politics and encourages political leaders and candidates to turn a deaf ear to arguments of the citizens who are advocating any policy which the "liquor interests" may oppose. Mr. Baker ends by discussing the home-rule policy on the liquor question and recommends voters to oppose legislative candidates who will not take a stand in favor of "self-government on the saloon question."

ADVERTISING PAID.

The writer was talking to one of the Monessen merchants the other day who is an advertiser in the Independent and he said that about three months ago he commenced to advertise a certain line of goods in the Independent and watched results and that during the first month the advertising was run he sold more goods of that line than he had sold for eleven months previous, which proves that advertising pays a big percentage. This merchant knows from actual experience that it means more business to the man who advertises —Monessen Independent.

Coal Famine This Winter.

The coal famine in mid-winter this year is the dire prediction of Eastern coal operators according to word just received here. The scarcity of miners in many sections, especially in the West Virginia fields, has greatly andicapped the operators. Big industrial concerns of this section are now storing up a reserve supply of fuel in view of the possible famine. The price of coal is beginning to rise, and higher prices are looked for during the winter.

The conditions in West Virginia, it is hoped, will be some better as the result of the meeting at Charleston next Thursday of coal operators and mine officials, in response to a call for a special meeting issued by Governor William O. Dawson, who has been impressed with the seriousness of the situation. Replies received by those sending out invitations to the meeting indicate that there will be a big gathering. This will be the first time that such a meeting is to be held in the history of the state.

Working conditions, miners claim, is the cause of the scarcity of men in other fields, but this is not the case in this state. In the state mines there have been great improvements made of late.

In the West Virginia fields, the operators have large bookings from western railroads which they are unable to fill. The orders now on hand would keep them on the go all winter even if not a single new order was received.

It is expected that the demand this winter will far exceed all previous demands and the operators will be unable to cope with the situation unless more help is secured. The fact that western railroads are buying high-priced coal in the east and are paying the freight on it, is an indication that they doubt the ability of western operators to fill their orders.

Practically all of the railroads are now making heavy storage for coal for the winter months. From every section they are securing as much fuel as possible before the price of it, which has already gone up considerable during the past months, reaches the skyward point.

The industrial plants are busy making more yard room for themselves where they can store coal. Several of these, the Wheeling Steel and Iron Works and La Belle Iron Works and La Belle Tin Works, in this locality, for example, have re-opened their own mines and are laying in a surplus stock of fuel.—Wheeling News.

Will Purify Refrigerator.

A good thing to have about the refrigerator is a saucer of charcoal or several saucers, for that matter. Place one on the shelf where the milk is kept and also where the butter is kept. This will keep the refrigerator very sweet, and is an easy prevention of germs.

ACID OF APPLE.

Considered From Medicinal Points is One of the Finest Fruits Grown.

Chemically, the apple is composed of vegetable fibre, albumen, sugar, rum, chlorophyll, malic acid, gallic acid, lime and much water. Furthermore the German analysists say that the apple contains a larger percentage of phosphorus than any other fruit or vegetable. The phosphorus is admirably adapted for renewing essential nervous matter, lethicin of the brain and spinal cord. It is perhaps, for the same reason rudely understood, that old Scandinavian traditions represent the apple as the food of the gods, who when they felt themselves growing old and feeble and infirm, resorted to this fruit for renewing their powers of mind and body. Also, the acids of the apple are of signal use for men of sedentary habits, whose livers are sluggish in action, those acids serviug to eliminate from the body noxious matters, which, if retained, would make the brain heavy and dull, or bring about jaundice or skin eruptions and other allied troubles.

Some such an experience must have led to the custom of taking apple sauce with rich pork, rich goose and like dishes. The malic acid of ripe apples, either raw or cooked, will neutralize any excess of chalky matter engendered by eating too much meat. It is also the fact that such fresh fruits as the apple, the pear and the plum, when taken ripe and without sugar, diminish acidity in the stomach rather than provoke it. Their vegetable salts and juices are converted into allaline cardonates, which tend to counteract acidity.

A good, ripe, raw apple is one of the easiest of vegetable substances for the stomach to deal with, the whole process of its digestion being completed in eighty-five minutes.

The Republican for Job Printing.

The Acrobat.

The Democracy of the north has already repudiated Bryan and Bryanism. The south is becoming suspicious. Either the western meteor is losing its dazzling brilliance or the political star gazers are realizing that they have been looking upon a false light.

There is something of humor in the spectacle of political gymnastics presented by the one time idol. Government railroad ownership having been so emphatically repudiated, we have had the theory of "ultimate" ownership, with pronounced regulation in the meantime.

This theory, too, having failed to rally the disintegrating factions, we have had from Mr. Bryan the theory of the initiative and referendum, based upon the apparent success in the cantons of Switzerland. But all except the socialistic element of the party has laughed in the face of the "peerless leader." To-day he stands high and dry on the lone mount, as one who has climbed to unstable heights of theory and cannot find a way to retrace his steps.

In a Sailboat

By M. A. Keeler.

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

Shelter Island is a feast for the eyes at all seasons of the year, but in the month of May it is the fairest spot on Long Island; then it is in the first glory of its brilliant verdure, and the soft blue sky above and its blue reflection in the water below presents a picture of such exquisite beauty and repose that few brushes could do it justice on canvas. At Prospect, facing the bay, stands a Queen Anne cottage with many hanging balconies, and standing on the most eerie one are two young women, of the nineteenth century ultra-fashionable type; the smart cut of their cloth frocks suggests Redfern, and their fine bearing and conscious worth the thoroughbred. It is about ten o'clock.

"It's all very lovely and peaceful and serene, Lily," says the younger of the two girls, with a little weary sigh. "But I like it better in August, when the bay is thick with yachts and rowboats; in fact, to be sincere with you, it has about as festive an appearance now as the Desert of Sahara, and I think we were downright daft to leave town so early this season."

"I am really sorry for you, Bertha," replies the other, with an amused look in her fine eyes. "Let us give the 'Pixie' her first sail this season; she will help to liven up the bay for you."

The grieved look in Bertha's eyes gives way to radiant delight at her sister's proposition, and in gay spirits they leave the balcony and are soon on the pier in their white flannel yachting suits and tarpaulin hats of the jaunty sailor cut.

Lilly is the skipper, and Bertha the deck hand—as her sister calls her—her duty aboard ship being to tend the center-board, hold the sheet rope when occasion demands, shift the ballast, and make herself generally useful.

There is scarcely a ripple on the bay, and the half dozen filmy clouds have now lost themselves in the blue ether.

The breeze is steady and gentle; the girls keep up a rattling chatter at first, but the utter peace and quiet seems to have a subdued effect, and soon the only sound heard is that of the water as the "Pixie's" sharp bow softly cuts through it.

They sail on, but it is not long before the sail trembles and the eddy that closes behind the boat is hardly perceptible. "Bertha," says Lily, at last, "we are going to be becalmed; there is scarcely a breath of air." She moistens her forefinger and holds it aloft after the manner of sailors.

"Don't mention anything so monstrous!" cried Bertha, dropping the book she had been reading and now fully alive to the situation. "We shall simply broil standing still in this hot sun. Why, there's Robins island; cannot we make it before the wind goes altogether?"

"Not unless we row; and even then I am sure you will not care to land there."

"We may as well row to the island, after all," says Lily, presently, looking wistfully at the trees. "There are probably no men there as early as this, and we can rest in the shade until the wind comes up."

So they took the brass-tipped oars and rowed toward the shore. It looks very cool and inviting; occasionally the sweet strains of a bird's song reach the rowers as they paddle through the mirror-like water. It is slow and tiresome work, and after much trouble they effect a passable landing, and climbing the bank they sit exhausted under the spreading bough of a large tree. There is a high and heavy undergrowth behind them toward the interior of the island.

Robins island is owned by a club of New York men, and is a hunting ground, there being on it fine preserves of quail, etc.

"This is almost an adventure," pants Bertha, as she removes her hat and brushes her damp bang off her forehead.

"Hush!" suddenly cries Bertha, holding up a warning finger to her sister, who sits some distance from her, with her head leaning against the trunk of a tree. She listens intently, turning her head partly on one side like a bird, and then says, in a stage whisper: "Would not it be too unutterably terrible, if there should be any men here, Lily? I am sure I heard something like footsteps way back in the woods."

"Your imagination is too active for comfort, Bertha; if you did hear anything, it was probably a rabbit; these tall bushes are an effective screen for us, even if any genus homo should be abroad, which is unlikely. Now please do not speak to me for ten minutes; I am too tired to even think;" she closes her eyes and Bertha creeps over to her and rests her head in her lap.

There is a crashing in the bushes not far from the girls, who have been rudely startled from their short nap, and they look with blanched faces in the direction of the sound. Then a deep voice suddenly calls out:

"Hello! Effingham; oh, I say, come here!"

There is another crash in the bushes, then another voice exclaims in tones of astonishment:

"By Jove! it's the 'Pixie;' it must have drifted down. It belongs to the Berkley girls, you know; they have a place at Shelter island; tip-top, swagger people; but how in the name of all that's—why, it's anchored!" he concludes, with a long whistle, and starts down the bank on a run to the boat.

At the sound of the first voice the girls had seemed paralyzed, and could only stare hopelessly at each other.

At this instant there is a sharp report and the shot rattles through the bushes like hail. Without a cry Lily sinks to the ground and Bertha lies at her side in a dead faint.

A tall, broad-shouldered, florid-faced young man dashes through the underbrush with an eager, huntsman-like look on his handsome face, but his expression changes in a flash to one of horror when he sees the kind of game he has brought down. He takes in the situation at a glance, and with a now ashen face he rushes down the embankment.

"Effingham!" he calls, in a husky voice, as he nears the boat. "The Berkleys," he stops short and chokes.

"For heaven's sake, my lord, what has happened? You are shaking like a leaf."

"The Berkleys; your friend, Effingham. God help me! I have killed them both!"

He buried his face in his hands, while Mr. Effingham gazes in bewilderment at the Pixie and then at him.

"You see," he continued, raising his head, "they were on the other side of the brush; I heard a rustling, thought it a rabbit, you know, and—fired. When I saw what I had done I lost my head. I never was so knocked out before in my life; instead of waiting to see what damage I had caused I rushed to you; but they are badly hit; they got the whole charge at short range."

Look with Blanched Faces in the Direction of the Sound.

"They may not be dead; cheer up, the first thing to do is to go back and see. Get some water in your hat."

Bertha had recovered consciousness, and as the two men dash up the bank she is sobbing over Lily's prostrate form.

It will take the doctor many hours to pick the shot out of Bertha's shoulder, but she does not heed the sting and smart; her agony at Lily's badly wounded hand and wrist makes her oblivious to her own pain. The shot, fortunately, did not touch either of the girls' faces, but it will be many weeks before Lily can again sail the Pixey.

When Bertha sees Mr. Effingham she jumps up and runs to him, trying hysterically to explain their presence on the island.

Lord Bertie Dudley kneels beside the unconscious Lily, and with trembling hand nervously spatters her sweet face with salt water. He binds her wrist with his handkerchief, he is deft and gentle, and it is pathetic to watch his quivering lip and the great effort he puts forth to appear calm.

"I feel as if I could shoot myself for this, Effingham," he says, bitterly, when Lily has been taken to the boat and made as comfortable as possible.

The south wind has sprung up, and the Pixie is once more under sail, but Mr. Effingham is the skipper, and Bertha supports Lily's drooping head on her shoulder. Poor Lord Dudley watches the boat out of sight from the shore, and then flings his gun as far out into Peconic bay as his strong arm can send it. With downcast head he walks moodily back to the club house.

About three weeks after the foregoing episode there are half a dozen or so people sitting on the veranda of the Berkley cottage at Shelter island. Among them are Lord Bertie Dudley and Mr. Effingham, and Lily is as beautiful and dainty as ever; to be sure her wrist is still bandaged.

It is now two months later, and the bay is as thick with yachts and row boats as Bertha likes to see it, and Lord Bertie Dudley's steam yacht is a fixture in the inlet between Manhansett and Prospect. Lily has lately promised to be Lady Dudley in October, and they are going to England on his yacht.

She has told Bertha many times that she had a presentiment when she stepped on board the Pixie that fate had something in store for her on that May morning.

Perhaps in time the Koreans will feel as grateful to Japan as the Cubans and the Filipinos do to the United States.

CHAPTER IX.
At the Occidental.

Hampton slowly picked his way back through the darkness down the silent road, his only guide those dim yellow lights flickering in the distance.

It was Saturday night, and the mining town was already alive. The one long, irregular street was jammed with constantly moving figures, the numerous saloons ablaze, the pianos sounding noisily, the shuffling of feet in the crowded dance-halls incessant.

Riot reigned unchecked, while the quiet, sleepy town of the afternoon blossomed under the flickering lights into a saturnalia of unlicensed pleasure, wherein the wages of sin were death.

Hampton pushed his way through the noisy throng with eyes ever watchful for the faces. His every motion was that of a man who had fully decided upon his course. He swung up the broad wooden steps of the Occidental and entered the barroom, which was crowded by jostling figures, the ever-moving mass as yet good-natured, for the night was young. At the lower end of the long, sloppy bar he stopped for a moment to nod to the fellow behind.

"Anything going on to-night worth while, Jim?" he questioned, quietly.

"Rather stiff game, they tell me, just started in the back room," was the genial reply. "Two eastern suckers, with Red Slavin sitting in."

The gambler passed on, pushing rather unceremoniously through the throng of perspiring humanity. The large front room upstairs was ablaze with lights, every game in full operation and surrounded by crowds of devotees. He walked directly toward the rear of the room. A thick, dingy red curtain hung there; he held back its heavy folds and stepped within the smaller apartment beyond.

Three men sat at the single table, cards in hand, and Hampton involuntarily whistled softly behind his teeth at the first glimpse of the money openly displayed before them. This was apparently not so bad for a starter, and his waning interest revived. A red-bearded giant, sitting so as to face the doorway, glanced up quickly at his entrance, his coarse mouth instantly taking on the semblance of a smile.

"Ah, Bob," he exclaimed, with an evident effort at cordiality; "been wondering if you wouldn't show up before the night was over. You're the very fellow to make this a four-handed affair, provided you carry sufficient stuff."

Hampton came easily forward into the full glow of the swinging oil lamp, his manner coolly deliberate, his face expressionless. "I feel no desire to intrude," he explained, quietly, watching the uplifted faces. "I believe I have never before met these gentlemen."

Slavin laughed, his great white fingers drumming the table.

"It is an acquaintance easily made," he said, "provided one can afford to trot in their class, for it is money that talks at this table to-night. Mr. Hampton, permit me to present Judge Hawes, of Denver, and Mr. Edgar Willis, president of the T. P. & R. I have no idea what they are doing in this hell-hole of a town, but they are dead-game sports, and I have been trying my best to amuse them while they're here."

Hampton bowed, instantly recognizing the names.

"Glad to assist," he murmured, sinking into a vacant chair. "What limit?"

"We have had no occasion to discuss that matter as yet," volunteered Hawes, sneeringly. "However, if you have scruples we might settle upon something within reason."

Hampton ran the undealt pack carelessly through his fingers, his lips smiling pleasantly. "Oh, never mind, if it chances to go above my pile I'll drop out. Meanwhile, I hardly believe there is any cause for you to be modest on my account."

The play opened quietly and with some restraint, the faces of the men remaining impassive, their watchful glances evidencing nothing either of success or failure. Hampton played with extreme caution for some time, his eyes studying keenly the others about the table, seeking some deeper understanding of the nature of his opponents, their strong and weak points, and whether or not there existed any prior arrangement between them. He was there for a purpose, a clearly defined purpose, and he felt no inclination to accept unnecessary chances with the fickle Goddess of Fortune. To one trained in the calm observation of small things, and long accustomed to weigh his adversaries with care, it was not extremely difficult to class the two strangers, and Hampton smiled softly on observing the size of the rolls rather ostentatiously exhibited by them. His satisfaction was in noways lessened by the sound of their voices, when incautiously raised in anger over some unfortunate play. He immediately recognized them as the identical individuals who had loudly and vainly protested over his occupancy of the best rooms at the hotel. He chuckled grimly.

But what bothered him particularly was Slavin. The cool, gray eyes, glancing with such apparent negligence across the cards in his hands, noted every slight movement of the red-bearded gambler, in expectation of detecting some sign of trickery, or some evidence that he had been selected by this precious trio for the purpose of easy plucking. Knavery was Slavin's style, but apparently he was now playing a straight game, no doubt realizing clearly, behind his impassive mask of a face, the utter futility of seeking to outwit one of Hampton's enviable reputation.

It was, unquestionably, a fairly fought four-handed battle, and at last, thoroughly convinced of this, Hampton settled quietly down, prepared to play out his game. The stakes grew steadily larger. Several times drinks were served, but Hampton contented himself with a gulp of water, always gripping an unlighted cigar between his teeth. He was playing now with apparent recklessness, never hesitating over a card, his eye as watchful as that of a hawk, his betting quick, confident, audacious. The contagion of his spirit seemed to affect the others, to force them into desperate wagers. The perspiration was beading Slavin's forehead, and now and then an oath burst unrestrained from his hairy lips. Hawes and Willis sat white-faced, bent forward anxiously over the table, their fingers shaking as they handled the fateful cards, but Hampton played without perceptible tremor, his utterances few and monosyllabic, his calm face betraying not the faintest emotion.

And he was steadily winning. Occasionally some other hand drew in the growing stock of gold and bank notes, but not often enough to offset those continued gains that began to heap up in such an alluring pile upon his portion of the table. The lookers-on who had come in began to observe this, and gathered more closely about his chair, fascinated by the luck with which the cards came floating into his hands, the cool judgment of his critical plays, the reckless abandon with which he forced success. Suddenly he forced the fight to a finish. The opportunity came in a jack-pot which Hawes had opened. The betting began with a cool thousand. Then Hampton's turn came. Without drawing, his cards yet lying downward before him on the board, his calm features as immovable as the Sphinx, he quietly pushed his whole accumulated pile to the center, named the sum, and leaned back in his chair, his eyes cold, impassive. Hawes threw down his hand, wiping his streaming face with his handkerchief; Willis counted his remaining roll, hesitated, looked again at the faces of his cards, flung aside two, drawing to fill, and called loudly for a show-down, his eyes protruding. Slavin, cursing fiercely under his red beard, having drawn one card, his perplexed face instantly brightening as he glanced at it, went back into his hip pocket for every cent he had, and added his profane demand for a chance at the money.

A fortune rested on the table, a fortune the ownership of which was to be decided in a single moment, and by the movement of a hand. Willis was gasping, his whole body quivering; Slavin was watching Hampton's hands as a cat does a mouse, his thick lips parted, his fingers twitching nervously. The latter smiled grimly, his motion deliberate, his eyes never wavering. Slowly, one by one, he turned up his cards, never even deigning to glance downward, his entire manner that of unstudied indifference. One—two—three. Willis uttered a snarl like a stricken wild beastt, and sank back in his chair, his eyes closed, his cheeks ghastly. Four. Slavin brought down his great clenched first with a crash on the table, a string of oaths bursting unrestrained from his lips. Five. Hampton, never stirring a muscle, sat there like a statue, watching. His right hand kept hidden beneath the table, with his left he quietly drew in the stack of bills and coin, pushing the stuff heedlessly into the side pocket of his coat, his gaze never once wandering from those stricken faces fronting him. Then he softly pushed back his chair and stood erect. Willis never moved, but Slavin rose unsteadily to his feet, gripping the table fiercely with both hands.

"Gentlemen," said Hampton, gravely, his clear voice sounding like the sudden peal of a bell, "I can only thank you for your courtesy in this matter, and bid you all good-night. However, before I go it may be of some interest for me to say that I have played my last game."

Somebody laughed sarcastically, a harsh, hateful laugh. The speaker whirled, took one step forward; there was the flash of an extended arm, a dull crunch, and Red Slavin went crashing backward against the wall. As he gazed up, dazed and bewildered, from the floor, the lights glimmered along a blue-steel barrel.

"Not a move, you red brute," and Hampton spurned him contemptuously with his heel. "This is no variety show, and your laughter was in poor taste. However, if you feel particularly hilarious to-night I'll give you another chance. I said this was my last game; I'll repeat it—this was my last game! Now, damn you! if you feel like it, laugh!"

He swept the circle of excited faces, his eyes glowing like two diamonds, his thin lips compressed into a single straight line.

"Mr. Slavin appears to have lost his previous sense of humor," he remarked, calmly. "I will now make my statement for the third time—this was my last game. Perhaps some of you gentlemen also may discover this to be amusing."

The heavy, strained breathing of the motionless crowd was his only answer, and a half smile of bitter contempt curled Hampton's lips, as he swept over them a last defiant glance.

"Not quite so humorous as it seemed to be at first, I reckon," he commented, dryly. "Slavin," and he prodded the red giant once more with his foot, "I'm going out; if you make any attempt to leave this room within the next five minutes I'll kill you in your tracks, as I would a mad dog. You stacked cards twice to-night, but the last time I beat you fairly at your own game."

He held aside the heavy curtains with his left hand and backed slowly out facing them, the deadly revolver shining ominously in the other. Not a man moved Slavin glowered at him from the floor, an impotent curse upon his lips. Then the red drapery fell.

While the shadows of the long night still hung over the valley, Naida, tossing restlessly upon her strange bed within the humble yellow house at the fork of the trails, was aroused to wakefulness by the pounding of a horse's hoofs on the plank bridge spanning the creek. She drew aside the curtain and looked out, shading her eyes to see clearer through the poor glass. All she perceived was a somewhat deeper smudge when the rider swept rapidly past, horse and man a shapeless shadow. Three hours later she awoke again, this time to the full glare of day, and to the remembrance that she was now facing a new life. As she lay there thinking, her eyes troubled but fearless, far away on the sun-kissed uplands Hampton was spurring forward his horse, already beginning to exhibit signs of weariness.

CHAPTER X.
The Arrival of Miss Spencer.

Miss Phoebe Spencer, the pioneer school teacher of Glencaid, came direct from the far east, her starting point some little junction place back in Vermont, although she proudly named Boston as her home, having once visited in that metropolis for three delicious weeks. She was of an ardent, impressionable nature. Her mind was nutured upon eastern conceptions of our common country, her imagination aglow with weird tales of the frontier, and her bright eyes perceived the vivid coloring of romance in each prosaic object west of the tawny Missouri. All appeared so different from that established life to which she had grown accustomed,—the people, the country, the picturesque language,—while her brain so teemed with lurid pictures of border experiences and heroes as to reveal romantic possibilities everywhere. As her eager eyes traced the serrated peaks of a snow-clad mountain range, her heart throbbed with anticipation of wonders yet to come. Homesickness was a thing undreamed of; her active brain responded to each new impression.

She sat comfortably ensconced in the back seat of the old, battered red coach, surrounded by cushions for protection from continual bouncing, as the Jehu in charge urged his restive mules down the desolate valley of the Bear Water. Her cheeks were flushed, her wide-open eyes filled with questioning, her pale fluffy hair frolicking with the breeze, as pretty a picture of young womanhood as any one could wish to see. Nor was she unaware of this fact. During the final stage of her journey she had found two congenial souls, sufficiently picturesque to harmonize with her ideas of wild western romance.

"Now, Damn You! If You Feel Like It, Laugh."

These two men were lolling in the less comfortable seat opposite, secretly longing for a quiet smoke outside, yet neither willing to desert this eastern divinity to his rival. The big fellow, his arm run carelessly through the leather sling, his bare head projecting half out of the open window, was Jack Moffat, half-owner of the "Golden Rule," and enjoying a well-earned reputation as the most ornate and artistic liar in the territory. For two hours he had been exercising his talent to the full, and merely paused now in search of some fresh inspiration, holding in supreme and silent contempt the rather feeble imitations of his less-gifted companion.

The fly in the ointment of this long day's ride, the third party, whose undesirable presence and personal knowledge of Mr. Moffat's past career rather seriously interfered with the latter's flights of imagination, was William McNeil, foreman of the "Bar V" ranch over on Sinsiniwa creek. McNeil was not much of a talker, having an impediment in his speech, and being a trifle bashful in the presence of a lady. But he caught the eye,—a slenderly built, reckless fellow, smoothly shaven, with a strong chin and bright laughing eyes,—and as he lolled carelessly back in his bearskin "chaps" and wide-brimmed sombrero, occasionally throwing in some cool, insinuating comment regarding Moffat's recitals, the latter experienced a strong inclination to heave him overboard. The slight hardening of McNeil's eyes at such moments had thus far served, however, as sufficient restraint, while the unobservant Miss Spencer, unaware of the silent duel thus being conducted in her very presence, divided her undisguised admiration, playing havoc with the susceptible heart of each, and all unconsciously laying the foundations for future trouble.

"Why, how truly remarkable!" she exclaimed, her cheeks glowing. "It's all so different from the east; heroism seems to be in the very air of this country, and your adventure was so very unusual. Don't you think so, Mr. McNeil?"

The silent foreman hitched himself suddenly upright, his face unusually solemn. "Why—eh—yes, miss—you might—eh—say that. He," with a flip of his hand toward the other, "eh—reminds me—of—eh—an old friend."

"Indeed? How extremely interesting!" eagerly scenting a new story. "Please tell me who it was, Mr. McNeil."

"Oh—eh—knew him when I was a boy—eh—Munchausen."

Mr. Moffat drew in his head violently, with an exclamation nearly profane, yet before he could speak Miss Spencer intervened.

"Munchausen! Why, Mr. McNeil, you surely do not intend to question the truth of Mr. Moffat's narrative?"

The foreman's eyes twinkled humorously, but the lines of his face remained calmly impassive. "My—eh—reference," he explained, gravely, "was—eh—entirely to the—eh—local color, the—eh—expert touches."

"Oh!"

"Yes, miss. It's—eh—bad taste out here to—eh—doubt anybody's word—eh—publicly."

Moffat stirred uneasily, his hand flung behind him, but McNeil was gazing into the lady's fair face, apparently unconscious of any other presence.

"But all this time you have not favored me with any of your own adventures, Mr. McNeil. I am very sure you must have had hundreds out on these wide plains."

The somewhat embarrassed foreman shook his head discouragingly.

"Oh, but I just know you have, only you are so modest about recounting them. Now, that scar just under your hair—really it is not at all unbecoming—surely that reveals a story. Was it caused by an Indian arrow?"

McNeil crossed his legs, and wiped his damp forehead with the back of his hand. "Hoof of a damn pack-mule," he explained, forgetting himself. "The—eh—cuss lifted me ten feet."

Moffat laughed hoarsely, but as the foreman straightened up quickly, the amazed girl joined happily in, and his own face instantly exhibited the contagion.

"Ain't much—eh—ever happens out on a ranch," he said, doubtfully, "except dodgin' steers, and—eh—bustin' broncoes."

Moffat had his head craned out of the window once more, in an apparent determination to ignore all further frivolous remarks. Suddenly he pointed directly ahead.

"There's Glencaid now, Miss Spencer," he said, cheerfully. "That's the spire of the new Presbyterian church sticking up above the ridge."

"Oh, indeed! How glad I am to be here safe at last!"

"How—eh—did you happen to—eh—recognize the church?" asked Mr. McNeil with evident admiration. "You—eh—can't see it from the saloon."

Moffat disdained reply, and the lurching stage rolled rapidly down the valley, the mules now lashed into a wild gallop to the noisy accompaniment of the driver's whip.

The hoofs clattered across the narrow bridge, and, with a sudden swing, all came to a sharp stand, amid a cloud of dust before a naked yellow house.

"Here's where you get out, miss," announced the Jehu, leaning down from his seat to peer within. "This yere is the Herndon shebang."

The gentlemen inside assisted Miss Spencer to descend in safety to the weed-bordered walk, where she stood shaking her ruffled plumage into shape, and giving directions regarding her luggage. Then the two gentlemen emerged, Moffat bearing a grip-case, a handbox, and a basket, while McNeil supported a shawl-strap and a small trunk. Thus decorated they meekly followed her lead up the narrow path toward the front door. The latter opened suddenly, and Mrs. Herndon bounced forth with vociferous welcome.

"Why, Phoebe Spencer, and have you really come! I didn't expect you'd get along before next week. Oh, this seems too nice to see you again; almost as good as going home to Vermont. You must be completely tired out."

"Dear Aunt Lydia; of course I'm glad to be here. But I'm not in the least tired. I've had such a delightful trip." She glanced around smilingly upon her perspiring cavaliers. "Oh, put those things down, gentlemen—anywhere there on the grass; they can be carried in later. It was so kind of you both."

"Hey, there!" sang out the driver, growing impatient, "if you two gents are aimin' to go down town with this outfit, you'd better be pilin' in lively, for I can't stay here all day."

Moffat glanced furtively aside at McNeil, only to discover that individual quietly seated on the trunk. He promptly dropped his own grip.

"Drive on with your butcher's cart," he called out spitefully. "I reckon it's no special honor to ride to town."

The pleasantly smiling young woman glanced from one to the other, her eyes fairly dancing, as the lumbering coach disappeared through the red dust.

"How very nice of you to remain," she exclaimed. "Aunt Lydia, I am so anxious for you to meet my friends, Mr. Moffat and Mr. McNeil. They have been so thoughtful and entertaining all the way up the Bear Water, and they explained so many things that I did not understand."

She swept impulsively down toward them, both hands extended, the bright glances of her eyes bestowed impartially.

"I cannot invite you to come into the house now," she exclaimed, sweetly, "for I am almost like a stranger here myself, but I do hope you will both of you call. I shall be so very lonely at first, and you are my earliest acquaintances. You will promise, won't you?"

McNeil bowed, painfully clearing his throat, but Moffat succeeded in expressing his pleasure with a well-rounded sentence.

"I felt sure you would. But now I must really say good-by for this time and go in with Aunt Lydia. I know I must be getting horribly burned out here in this hot sun. I shall always be so grateful to you both."

And the two radiant knights walked together toward the road, neither uttering a word.

CHAPTER XI.
Becoming Acquainted.

Once within the cool shadows of the living-room, Mrs. Herndon again bethought herself to kiss her niece in a fresh glow of welcomé, while the latter sank into a convenient rocker and began enthusiastically expressing her unbounded enjoyment of the west, and of the impressions gathered during her journey. Suddenly the elder woman glanced about and exclaimed, laughingly, "Why, I had completely forgotten. You have not yet met your room-mate. Come out here, Naida; this is my niece, Phoebe Spencer."

The girl thus addressed advanced, a slender, graceful figure dressed in white, and extended her hand shyly. Miss Spencer clasped it warmly, her eyes upon the flushed, winsome face.

"And is this Naida Gillis!" she cried. "I am so delighted that you are still here, and that we are to be together. Aunt Lydia has written so much about you that I feel as if we must have known each other for years. Why, how pretty you are!"

Naida's cheeks were burning, and her eyes fell, but she had never yet succeeded in conquering the blunt independence of her speech. "Nobody else ever says so," she said, uneasily. "Perhaps it's the light."

Miss Spencer turned her about so as to face the window. "Well, you are," she announced, decisively. "I guess I know; you've got magnificent hair, and your eyes are perfectly wonderful. You just don't fix yourself up right; Aunt Lydia never did have any taste in such things, but I'll make a new girl out of you. Let's go upstairs; I'm simply dying to see our room, and get some of my dresses unpacked. They must look perfect frights by this time."

They came down perhaps an hour later, hand in hand, and chattering like old friends. The shades of early evening were already falling across the valley. Herndon had returned home from his day's work, and had brought with him Rev. Howard Wynkoop for supper. Miss Spencer viewed the young man with approval, and immediately became more than usually vivacious in recounting the incidents of her long journey, together with her early impressions of the western country. Mr. Wynkoop responded with an interest far from being assumed.

"I have found it all so strange, so unique, Mr. Wynkoop," she explained. "The country is like a new world to me, and the people do not seem at all like those of the east. They lead such a wild, untrammeled life. Everything about seems to exhale the spirit of romance; don't you find it so?"

He smiled at her enthusiasm, his glance of undisguised admiration on her face. "I certainly recall some such earlier conception," he admitted. "Those just arriving from the environment of an older civilization perceive merely the picturesque elements; but my later experiences have been decidedly prosaic."

"Why, Mr. Wynkoop! how could they be? Your work is heroic. It is perfectly grand! Why, the very men I met seem to yield me a broader conception of life and duty; they are so brave, so modest, so active. Is—is Mr. Moffat a member of your church?"

The minister cleared his throat, his cheeks reddening. "Mr. Moffat? Ah, no; not exactly. Do you mean the mine-owner, Jack Moffat?"

"Yes, I think so; he told me he owned a mine—the Golden Rule the name was; the very choice in words would seem to indicate his religious nature. You have the only church in Glencaid, I understand, and I wonder greatly he has never joined you. But perhaps he may be prejudiced against your denomination. There is so much narrowness in religion. But I left every prejudice east of the Missouri," she declared, laughingly, "every one, social and religious. I'm going to be a true westerner, from the top of my head to the toe of my shoe. Is Mr. McNeil in your church?"

The minister hesitated. "I really do not recall the name," he confessed at last, reluctantly. "I scarcely think I can have ever met the gentleman."

"Oh, you ought to; he is so intensely original, and his face is full of character. He reminds me of some old paladin of the Middle Ages. You would be interested in him at once. He is the foreman of the 'Bar V' ranch, somewhere near here."

"Do you mean Billy McNeil, over on Sinsiniwa creek?" broke in Herndon.

"I think quite likely, uncle; wouldn't he make a splendid addition to Mr. Wynkoop's church?"

Herndon choked, his entire body shaking with ill-suppressed enjoyment. "I should imagine yes," he admitted finally. "Billy McNeil—oh, Lord! There's certainly a fine opening for you to do some missionary work, Phoebe."

"Well, and I'm going to," announced the young lady, firmly. "I guess I can read men's characters, and I know all Mr. McNeil needs is to have some one show an interest in him. Have you a large church, Mr. Wynkoop?"

"Not large if judged from an eastern standpoint," he confessed, with some regret. "Our present membership is composed of eight women and three men, but the congregational attendance is quite good, and constantly increasing."

"Only eight women and three men!" breathlessly. "And you have been laboring upon this field for five years! How could it be so small?"

Wynkoop pushed back his chair, anxious to redeem himself in the estimation of this fair stranger.

"Miss Spencer," he explained, "my parish comprises this entire mining region, and I am upon horseback among the foothills and up in the ranges for fully a third of my time. The spirit of the mining population, as well as of the cattlemen, while not actually hostile, is one of indifference to religious thought. For three long years I worked here without even a church organization or a building; and apparently without the faintest encouragement. Now that we have a nucleus gathered, a comfortable building erected and paid for, with an increasing congregation, I begin to feel that those seemingly barren five years were not without spiritual value."

She quickly extended her hands. "Oh, it is so heroic, so self-sacrificing! I am going to help you, Mr. Wynkoop, in every way I possible can—I shall certainly speak to both Mr. Moffat and Mr. McNeil the very first opportunity. I feel almost sure that they will join."

The unavoidable exigencies of a choir practice compelled Mr. Wynkoop to retire early, nor was it yet late when the family circle also dissolved, and the two girls were themselves alone.

The light was finally extinguished; the silvery moonlight streamed across the foot of the bed; and the regular breathing of the girls evidenced slumber.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. Among them is a stranger who introduces himself by the name of Hampton, also Gillis, the post trader, and his daughter. Gillis and a majority of the soldiers are killed during a three days' siege.

CHAPTER II.—Hampton offers assistance to the girl, and is at first spurned because he is known as a gambler.

CHAPTER III.—Hampton and the girl only escape from the Indians. They fall exhausted on the plains.

CHAPTER IV.—A company of the Seventh cavalry, Lieut. Brant in command, find Hampton and the girl on the plains, and restore them to consciousness. Hampton announces that he proposes to care for the girl.

CHAPTER V.—Hampton and the girl stop at the Miners' Home in Glencaid, Mrs. Duffy, proprietess. Rev. Howard Wynkoop proposes that Hampton place Miss Gillis in care of Mrs. Herndon. He consents to think it over.

CHAPTER VI.—Hampton talks the future over with Miss Gillis—the Kid. She shows him her mother's picture and tells him what she can of her parentage and life. They decide she shall live with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VII.—The Kid takes up her residence with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VIII.—Naida—the Kid—runs away from Mrs. Herndon's and rejoins Hampton. He induces her to go back, and to have nothing more to do with him.

THE COUNTY TICKET.

At the head of this column today we publish the ticket nominated at the convention held in Oakland on Tuesday.

The gentlemen composing the ticket are all men of excellent ability and the Republicans of the county are to be congratulated upon the splendid work done in the convention in thus selecting a ticket which every Republican can support without apology.

---

NINE thousand and fifty members of the Grand Army of the Republic have died within the last twelve months. These figures are shown in reports made to the national gathering in session at Saratoga, N. Y., this week. The high water mark in membership was reached in 1890, when 409,488 were enrolled. On June 30th, 1906, the membdrship was 222,748, showing a decrease in sixteen years of 186,751. This brings forth the sad fact that within a few short years the army will have passed forever from earth and into the great bivouac of the deed. At its every annual session the Army shows a lessening in numbers and a weakening in the ranks of those who gather to march to martial music. The veterans cannot stand the review marches any more, there are many who can no more enter the ranks and must stand on the curbing and see their comrades marching by. The thought is a sad and depressing one. All honor and glory to the Grand Army members who still live; all glory and honor and peace to those of the massive army who have passed to their eternal reward. May the remaining years of the old veterans be years of happiness and plenty, and as they pass so swiftly from the active scenes of life may the United States Government continue to show appreciation of their service in past years by giving them every care, every comfort, every credit that is so justly due them.

WHY REJECT THE DEMOCRATS!

Mr. Gorman in his recent speech had the effrontery to revive the ancient device of the political pleader of asking why the party in power should be turned down. "Had it not given the state good administration," and much to like effect made up the substance of his address. It is puerile to take seriously remarks along this line, especially when the speaker was seeking to make capital out of the administration of a governor who has been fought by himself at every point of his creditable conduct of the affairs of the state. But the public should be told, if it has not already become thoroughly familiar with the derelictions of the Democrats, the story of their conspiracy against the ballot. This was contained in the columns of The American yesterday. The account of the partially thwarred efforts of the Democrats to rob the citizen of his rights should arouse the voters to vigilance.

A three-part plot to destroy the efficacy of the ballot had long been in contemplation. In the foreground was the disfranchisement amendment and along with it the special session and the Wilson election laws and a strangled bit of political duplicity that sought to destroy the system of bipartism election judges. Each of these measures was born in the party counsels and brought forward with the plausibility and appearance of good purpose that only the sharpest tricksters could command. The history of the disfranchisement effort is well known. The production of the Poe Amendment, the storm it created in the Democratic ranks, its ignominous labeling by Governor Warfield, the legal contest that was precipitated, its final rejection by the voters in overwhelming numbers—this is all recent political history that rocks with the spirit of the present-day Democracy. The circumstances of the hasty summoning of the extraordinary session of the legislature for the putting through of the new election law that caused the validity of a vote to be destroyed upon puerile grounds and the later passage of the Wilson Bill, operative in eleven counties, that opened the way for trick ballots and fake candidates, is also fresh in the public mind. But the most nauseating dose that was prepared for the people never got to the point of publicity where it would reach the nostrils with its bad savor.

It is the purpose of Democrats, however, to perpetrate this political offense as soon after election as posible, in case of their success at the polls. Republican influence in the state must be destroyed at all hazards; this is the cry all along the organization line. What do Mr. Gorman, Mr. Taibott, Mr. Smith, E. E. Jackson or anyone of the inner group of party leaders care about the true interests of the state in comparison with the interest of the party? They, with the characteristic habit of mind of the Bourbon and after the manner of their training, identify the two things as the same. Party success with them always means the supremacy of their ruling principles. The public have but to inquire what the ruling principles in this campaign are. They are several in form; they are one in intention. This is to intrench the Democratic party in power so strongly that it can never be overthrown. The astute Democrats know very well that the disfranchisement amendment is but one spoke in the wheel of their juggernaut car of political tyranny, and they are not going to let the public prematurely see the entire device. They realize that even if the people could be tricked into giving sanction to this iniquity against the class of voters at whom it is ostensibly aimed and the foriegn-born Republican voters whom it would almost as seriously effect, they would only be bartering their future for a brief period of power. They know full well that one taste of such duplicity would thereafter range the decent voters upon the side of the Republican party with practical unanimity.

The plotters desire more than this; they desire to tamper with the election machinery so as to enlarge their present ability to annul Republican ballots. By reviving the old system of having the majority of election judges drawn from the dominant party they would snap their fingures in the faces of the people, as they did in the old days before the righteous unheaval that routed them in confusion. This arrangement would constitute the Democratic judges the deciders of the right of any citizen to vote his sentiments. Only the firm and unalterable opposition of Governor Warfield prevented the engressed bill that was introduced by Senator Wilson, whose name is linked to one attack upon the suffrage, from being urged. He emphatically declare he would not sign such a bill if passed. That bill has been retained, and it will be the principal bill before the next legislature should that body be Democratic.

Republican Meeting

OAKLAND OPERA HOUSE

Tuesday, Oct. 15, 1907

At 7:30 O'Clock.

The Meeting will be addressed by the Republican State Candidates:

HON. GEORGE R. GAITHER,
Candidate for Governor,

HON. JAMES A. BAKER,
Candidate for Comptroller of the Treasury,

HON. HAMMOND URNER,
Candidate for Attorney-General,

HON. THOMAS PARRAN,
Candidate for Clerk of the Court of Appeals, and other prominent Speakers.

The Deer Park Brass Band

WILL FURNISH MUSIC.

Everybody Invited to Be Present.

A PARTISAN OUTRAGE

That the Democratic party has some realization of its desperate straights in the coming election and is prepared to use all means to win if possible is evidenced by the letter of ex-Governor Brown to the Democratic judges of election who are officers of registration in Baltimore, directlng them to seek the aid of the police in ascertaining whether persons whose names appear upon the police census but not upon the poll books are Democrats, in order that, if they are Democrats, they may be induced to register. This effort to make the Police Department an instrument of partism politics has aroused just indignation in all quarters. President George R. Willis, of the Police Board, is emphatic in his statement that the board at its next meeting will take up the matter and issue positive orders that the police are not to give, seek or voluntarily discover information of the kind desired by the Democratic judges. The Independent voters of Baltimore and of the whole State by their ballots should administer to the Democratic machine, for this manifest effort to make of the Police Department a partisan detective agency, a rebuke that will never be forgotten.

Culvert Being Repaired.

Employes of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad company have been engaged for two or three weeks making repairs to the culvert under the tracks, east of the station here, through which the waters of Wilson creek pass.

A short time ago Track Foreman Morrison noticed that one of the tracks over the culvert indicated that it was gradually sinking and upon making an investigation it was found that several of the large rocks forming the top of the culvert had fallen down into the stream. The discovery of the bad condition of the culvert was a timely one as a serious accident would have in all probabitity followed within a short time.

Begin Weighing Mail.

Beginning Monday night at 12 o'clock the task of weighing all the mail that passes over the various divisions of the railroads in the United States was started. The weighing will continue for a period of 30 days and is for the purpose of ascertaining the exact amount of mail matter handled by the railroads.

Picnic at Gortner.

There will be a picnic and festival at the Swan Meadow school house at Gortner, Saturday, October 5th, 1907. All proceeds are to be used for the benefit of the new Lutheran church at Red House. There will be vocal and instrumental music, and speaking by some able talkers. A game of base ball and other amusements during the day. Plenty of refreshments of all kinds will be served on the grounds. Come all for a good time.

BLOOMINGTON AGAIN IN THE LIMELIGHT.

She Sustains Her Reputation As a Tough Town, Says One of Her Residents.

When the town of Bloomington, this county, which is located on the banks of the River Potomac, one and a-half miles west of Piedmont, West, Va., is not before the public with a murder, fire, burglary or some lesser crime, there is something radically wrong. Recently a mystertous murder accurred there, the body of the victim not being found for several days after the commission of the crime, when it was discovered hidden in some over-hanging bushes along the river bank by two boys who were chasing rabbits through the undergrowth with dogs. The unfortunate victim was a harmless old man, who did gardening for persons about the town and is supposed to have accumulated a considerable amount of money which he carried about on his person. As soon as the commission of the crime was discovered the matter was investigated by the State's officers and a reward was offered by the County Commissioners, but up to the present time nothing has been uncovered that would implicate anyone having a hand in the murder.

The last thing that has claimed the attention of the people of Bloomington was a shooting-buglary which took place there on last Saturday night, the following account of which appeared in the columns of the Piedmont Independent last Friday, being written by a well known professional man who is a resident of Bloomington:

"Bloomington again sustains her reputation for being a tough town. Last Saturday night was a double header in her record of crimes committed. A shooting affrir and a burglary between dark and daylight would certainly put a bigger town than this to shame. Between 8 and 9 o'clock Saturday evening, Adam Pritts, a boy about 15 years old and an old fashioned shot gun took a walk along the main street of the town. It is reported that some of his acquaintances guyed him on his cowboy appearance and he prepared to resent it. He crossed to the opposite side of the street, in front of Mr. G. C. Pattison's residence where he planted his battery and opened fire on a crowd of young folks gathered on the corner. Two volleys were fired. The first shot did little damage; the second one, aimed with more precision, came very near being a serious affair. Young Robert Moorehead was punctured in about a dozen places, mostly in the back. Otho Barnard got one in the face, while several others received shots about the body. Of course, there was some little excitement, but a shooting affair or a murder don't bother us much now as we have about gotton used to such things.

"Later on the same night the store of Mr. John Miller was broken into through the rear door and quite a number of pairs of shoes and a quantity of underclothing carried off. No clue to the robbers. We never think of looking for a thief. If we catch him in the act, God help him—but when he gets away with the booty—we set up the drinks. It is one on us."

SWANTON.

The singing class in the Methodist Episcopal church is making rapid progress, under Prof. I. F. Groves.

Rev. Engle preached his farewell sermon before Conference last Sunday.

McComas George is employed by the B. & O. R. R. Co., at Cumberland.

Our school is progressing nicely under the management of Miss Margaret Keirns as teacher.

The order of Red Men, which was recently organized here, is rapidly increasing in membership.

The Sunday school Rally Day services at the Methodist Episcopal church on last Sunday were impressed and successful. The program consisted of solos, duets, and choruses by the choir, select readings by the pupils of the school, addresses by Rev. Engle, Mr. Sweet, and Hon. A. F. George, superintendent. Prof. I. F. Groves had charge of the music. The juvenile class, in charge of Mrs. Fairall won the banner for the year.

Misses Nellie Conaway and Sallie Beckman and Mr. G. H. Rodeheaver, three of Garrett county's popular school teachers, were hospitably entertained at the home of Mr. J. M McCrobie's on last Sunday.

THE McKINLEY MAUSOLEUM.

Description of Monument Dedicated At Canton, Ohio, Monday.

The McKinley mausoleum, which was dedicated at Canton, O., Monday, stands on an eminence to which has been given the name Monument hill, about two miles west of the McKinley home. It is not an ornate affair, but its simplicity is relieved by sufficient artistic embellishment to make it an object of beauty, as well as one of massive proportions and breadth of design.

Four States have contributed a share of the material which has been used in the building of the monument. The granites used in the approaches and the mausoleum proper are from the quarries of Milford, Mass. Tennessee has furnished the gray marble for the interior of the tomb, while the sarcophagi, which now hold the bronze caskets in which lie the bodies of President and Mrs. McKinley, are of dark green granite from Windsor, Vt. The base upon which the sarcophagi rest is black granite from Berlin, Wis.

From the first step of the approach to the monument to the actual top of the structure is 163 feet 6 inches, the mausoleum itself being 98 feet 6 inches high above the summit of the mound. The top of the dome has an oculus 15 feet in diameter, through which comes a softened light, which adds greatly to the beauty of the interior.

The mausoleum is 78 feet 9 inches in diameter. In the centre of the floor beneath the dome stand the sarcophagi containing the bodies of the President and Mrs. McKinley, and in niches on the north side of the dome are the caskets containing those of the two daughters—Ida and Mary—who died in infancy. Huge Doric columns are placed around the interior in such a manner as to appear half buried in the sides of the building. The floor is of mosaic marble having been brought from many states for the purpose.

Half-way down from the top of the 125 granite steps that lead up to the main entrance on the south side of the mausoleum stands a heroic bronze figure of President McKinley, representing him in the attitude usually taken when speaking, his left hand holding a roll of manuscript and the right hand in the trousers pocket. Behind the figure is a bronze chair encircled with a wreath and draped with the flag of the United States. The bronze figure, which is 9 feet high, stands on a pedestal 18 feet from the base to the feet of the figure.

Twenty-six acres of ground were purchased by the Monument commission, and the utmost art of the landscape gardener has been lavished upon the grounds. Natural streams flow past the base of the mound, and trees and flower beds have been arranged with an eye to the greatest artistic beauty. From the entrance to the grounds on the south to the foot of the mound is 590 feet, and along this distance a double driveway 175 feet in width has been constructed. Between the two sides of the driveway is a lagoon, which is constantly filled with fresh water. Long rows of trees flank the lagoon and the driveways.

FOOT CRUSHED OFF.

Mr. J. J. Flaherty, of Hutton, Met With Unfortunate Accident.

Mr. John J. (Number) Flaherty, of Hutton, freight conductor on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, running between Cumberland and Grafton, met with an unfortunate accident Monday night at Hardman's, a small station a few miles east of Grafton, whereby he lost his right foot.

His train, which was westbound, had orders to take the siding at Hardman's to allow a passenger train to pass and after seeing that the switches were closed Mr. Flaherty attempted to jump on the caboose of his train, which was still moving, but making a miscalculation in the darkness, his foot went under the wheels of the car, injuring it so badly that amputation was necessary, the operation being performed in the Grafton hospital the same night. Reports state that he rallied from the shock and is in no immediate danger.

Mr. Flaherty was unmarried and lived at Hutton with his mother, an aged lady who is highly respected.

Mrs. Scott's millinery opening on Tuesday was attended by many ladies from Oakland, Mt. Lake Park and Deer Park. The display of hats at this very popular store was upon a larger scale than in years past and the decorations were beautiful and tastily arranged.

The Pittsburg-Wheeling passenger train No. 14 was wrecked at Bellaire, Ohio, Saturday afternoon and fifteen people killed, eight fatally and many others more or less injured. The cause of the accident was a misplaced switch which caused the passenger train to collide with a freight train.

Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Rathbun, of Piedmont, W. Va., in which latter town the former is superinteudent of the public schools, were in Oakland last Saturday calling upon friends. They spent Sunday at the home of Mr. Rathbun's parents at Mt. Lake Park, returning to Piedmont Sunday night.

Messrs. Henry Kemp, Jr., and Silas Teats, of Accident, were callers at this office Monday evening. Silas said he came to town to make some purchases to adorn his person and had intended before reaching his headgear to stop, but a new hat was insisted upon by his companion and he was consequently bedecked with it.

County Surveyor Franklin P. Green, of District No. 11, was in Oakland on Tuesday attending the County Convention in the capacity of a non-delegate, saying he was bound to come to the county capital at least once a year and that the time of the holding of the convention suited him better than at any time before or after.

Lawrence Sterne wrote: "The Lord tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." The sentiment is pious and pretty, but some have been so irreverent as to suggest that man has arranged the shearing season so as to coincide with the tempering of the wind. But human agency had nothing to do with the arrangement which has given us a beautiful and late fall to correspond with and compensate for the backward spring. Probably no one has ever seen vegetation more luxuriant at this season of the year.

YOUGHIOGHENY LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY.

Subscription Books Open and Stock Will Soon Be On Sale.

The incorporators and directors of the Youghiogheny Light and Power Company met in Oakland on Sept. 26th, and organized by electing Alfred G. Sturgiss, president; Truman West, first vice president; Peter A. Chisholm, second vice president; James D. Hamill, treasuror; Hiram P. Tasker, general manager, and Bowie Johnson, secretary. Subscription books will soon be opened and 1,000 shares of $10 each will be offered to the public at par and the proceeds applied to making hydraulic surveys of the "head" in each of the three falls and the average flow of water per minute, securing land for plant and the right of way to lay pipes from the plant to "heads" of the Swallow Falls in the Youghiogheny river, the Deep Creek falls on the east, and Muddy Creek falls on the west, and the purchase of suitable pipes to carry the water directly to the impulse wheels at the plant without any expense for dams. The capital stock will probably soon be increased to $10,000, which, it is believed, will cover the entire cost of erecting the plant and equipping it with the most modern machinery and starting the impulse wheels, etc, into motion. The average head will be over 200 feet and the minimum horse power 5,000 to 10,000 according to location of plant. If each horse power brings a rental of $20 per year the income will be at least $100,000 or enough to cover the entire cost of the plant and equipment each year.

This is certainly the safest and most profitable investment ever offered to the public. The general manager has already received scores of letters from financiers in all sections of the country asking "will any of your stock be offered to the public?" In reply I will state that local investors will be given the first chance to subscribe, and if the $10,000 is not speedy taken the capital stock will be increased and both bonds and stock placed in financial centres for sale.

Respectfully,
HIRAM P. TASKER,
General Manager.

Were each nation to divide its cash among its own people each human being in France would have $35, or $10 more than each person in our country under simular circumstances. Meanwhile, the divided cash of Great Britan would give each Briton only $18; in Germany the cash per capital would amount to only $17; Russia $8, and Japan $3, while in Cuba each person would get a two-dollar bill.

Rev. D. H. Lee and Mrs. Ada Lee, his wife, accompanied by Miss Lillie L. Lee, of Los Angeles, Cal., Mr. Oren F. Hankins, of Ada, Ohio, and Mr. Howard G. Hastings, of Taylor University, Ind., left Mountain Lake Park on last Saturday morning for New York, where they will take passage tomorrow for Calcutta, India, the seat of Rev. Lee's labors in the missionary field. In New York, the party will be joined by two other ladies who go as missionaries to India. Mrs. Fanny L. Sperry, of Mountain Lake Park, Md., Home Secretary, accompanied the party to New York.

A caboose and one freight car became detached from the west bound way freight at Bond Station, on the Seventeen Mile Grade, on last Thursday morning and ran away down the grade. The cars gathered speed as they went and at Bloomington collided with the engine of a freight train which was going west. The engineman and fireman of the freight engine saw the cars in time to escape the crash by jumping from the locomotive. Quite a lot of wreckage was strewn about and the track remained blocked until the afternoon. No one was hurt.

Mrs. Thos. A. Deveney and family have arrived in the city from Mt. Lake Park, Md., where they summered, and are now arranging to occupy the McGraw property on Main street, near the Daily Republican Office, recently vacated by A. E. Jackson, the plumber, who removes to the Leamon property on Wilford street. Grafton will be glad to welcome the Deveney family back again. It was their intention some time ago to return to Fairmont for the winter, but they later decided to relocate in the better city of Grafton.—Grafton Republican.

Last Saturday the Board of Supervisors of Election met and issued to the various boards of district registrars for the county the resistration books and other paraphernalia appertaining to the registry of voters. The registration officers who were here to receive the the same include William Hamill and Thomas McRobie, of District No. 1; Jasper Guard and William W. Frazee, of District No. 2; Daniel W. Dorsey and Gideon J. Gnagey, of District No. 3; William J. and Henry Barnard, of District No. 4; S. K. Schlossnagle and Conrad Spiker, of District No. 5; Nathan C. Browning and Nathan H. Casteel, of District No. 6; James W. Mason and Jonas Yutzy, of District No. 8; Michael Cunningham and Richard McKinzie, of District No. 9; Sebastian Hinebaugh and F. L. Warnick, of District No. 10; David Warnick and James Merrill, of District No. 11; James Bowser and Andrew J. Oester, of District No. 12, and Lewis C. Hamill and D. F. Feichtner, of District No. 13.

A canvas covered wagon built upon the lines of the prairie schooner and the vehicles which used to pass by the hundreds over the old National Road in this county, was the center of attraction at the First National Bank corner last Friday afternoon. The wagon was drawn by two horses and the driver of the animals had his family consisting of his wife and three children, his furniture, lumberman's outfit and dog loaded into the vehicle. He stated he was on his way to the Potomac Valley from away back in Webster county, W. Va., where he had recently completed a lumbering contract.

The season of 1907 at the Deer Park hotel, terminated on Sept. 30th. It was the most successful of any season it has experienced and this may be attributed to the untiring energy and zeal of W. E. Burwell, its manager. Nearly every state in the country was represented in its list of visitors, and the cities of St. Louis, Washington, D. C., Cumberland, Fairmont and Parkersburg, W. Va., Baltimore, Pittsburg and Chicago, were represented in its cottage constituency. Every visitor departed with a feeling that the healthfulness of the Garrett county climate could not be surpassed.

WANTED AT ONCE—Twelve good men to do general farm work. Apply at our gardens between Oakland and Mt. Lake Park. The H. Weber & Sons Co.

Many of the dollar-a-year weekly newspapers in this immediate section of the country have announced an advance in the rate to one dollar and a-half, which will become effective on January 1st. Others advanced the rate to $1.25 per year. The advance is due mainly to the increased cost of the white paper, which up to six months ago could be purchased delivered for $50 per ton. To-day the price is from $60 to $65 per ton at the mills, which, with the freight added makes the paper cost the printer nearly or quite $70 per ton at the office of publication—a net increase of more than 33 per cent.

The entertainment given in the opera house last Friday evening by the school children in aid of the school piano fund, was well patronized and without exception the little folks having parts in the program acquitted themselves with honor, due to the training they received from Miss Anna Manges, under whose direction the affair was given. Miss Manges, so this paper is informed, will shortly open a class in elocution here. She has splendid ability in this line, as the entertainment on Friday evening attested, and her class will be well patronized there is little doubt.

There is too little brightness in the lives of women in the country. They have too little help in their domestic occupations. The "nurse" in a house where there is a baby to care for ought to be set down as one of the regular expenses as much as the potatoes for the family. A mother's health, both of body and mind, is worth more than additional acres of land, or fine live stock. The heart should not be allowed to grow old. Life should not have lost its charm, the heart its spirit, and the body its eleasticity at 40 years. And yet how many women are faded and wan, and shattered in mind and health, long before they are forty. All the joy of life is not in youth's morning. It we so will it, we can, to the last moment of life, be at least negatively happy.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Of Some Use In the World.

By HOWARD FIELDING.

Copyright, 1907, by C. W. Hooke.

EDGAR SHENSTONE was one of those lesser captains of finance and moderately swollen multimillionaires whose names have not become household words. In fact he was so quiet and unobtrusive in his ways that when our Wall street man came to me with a tip on Shenstone he began by asking if I knew him.

The city editor of a newspaper is expected to know everybody, so that question will serve to indicate how inconspicuous Shenstone was. I responded that I had never had the pleasure of meeting that particular pirate, but I had heard of his works.

"He is the active agent in a big speculative pool that is being organized," continued Miles, the Wall street man. "The operations will probably be sensational enough to call for a front page story."

Upon this hint I looked up Shenstone in the "morgue," as we call the great collection of clippings arranged in envelopes and carefully catalogued that every important newspaper keeps for reference. There was an envelope marked "Shenstone, Edgar, Broker," but its contents were disappointing. I was particularly grieved to learn that we had no portrait, and after various unsuccessful attempts to procure one I sent a photographer to snapshot Mr. Shenstone, but he failed.

In the course of that week a writer named Milner Colbert called to see me and asked for work. He was a reporter in his way, but entirely unused to a newspaper. His vocation was literature, and he had written some very good stuff that had been printed in the best magazines, but he had no money sense, no push and no aptitude for ende-to-date poverty.

I don't know how it happened, but somehow in the course of breaking to Sidney the sad news that he must continue to starve because neither the Daily Record nor any other human institution had any use for him I mentioned the unsuccessful search for Shenstone's portrait. Thereupon Sidney fell into deep thought. The furrows by which his handsome countenance was wrecked and riven became positively painful to behold, and he maintained so long a silence that I began to think of ways to be rid of him. Suddenly he said:

"I can get you a likeness of Mr. Shenstone." And then with earnestness, "If I give you my word that I will not fail will you—or—could you"—

"Well?"

"I suppose," he said in stupid desperation, "that you wouldn't be willing to pay as much as $5 for the portrait, could"—

"Oh, Sidney," said I, "why don't you be a business manager? Five dollars is"—

"Is it too much?"

I laughed aloud.

"Leave an order for ten," said I. "Bring me a good picture before 6 o'clock tomorrow afternoon and I'll give you fifteen more. If you had only sense you could get fifty out of me."

"HERE'S AN EXPENSE ORDER FOR TEN," SAID I.

But this was lost upon Sidney. The whole machinery of his intelligence, that great and delicate and wonderful structure, was busy with a bit of paper which bore the printed heading, "Petty Expense Account."

"Thank you," said he.

And he fled away to the cashier.

That evening in a restaurant I saw him entertaining a very pretty girl at dinner. He beckoned me to join them, and I passed an hour in their company. Though the conversation avoided personal topics, I learned in other ways than by the spoken word that he was very much in love with her and she with him. She was a fine example of the pure blond type now hurrying to its extinction, and he was racially and individually suitable to be her mate, but neither was in the smallest degree fit for the battle of life today.

On the following afternoon Sidney brought me a photograph, not executed in the highest style of the art, but clearly printed and easy of reproduction. The pictured face startled me.

"Great Scott!" I cried. "Is Shenstone a brother of yours? I should think you had sat for this yourself!"

"Mr. Shenstone is distantly related to me," he replied. "We have a common ancestor."

"But is this good of Shenstone?" I demanded, tapping the photograph. "I never saw him."

"You might ask Mr. Miles," said he.

I summoned Miles and showed the picture.

"Fine!" he exclaimed. "Couldn't be better!"

"Did you ask Shenstone for this?" said I to Sidney. He nodded.

"Ever meet him before?" Sidney shook his head.

"Was he surprised at the sight of you?"

"He certainly was and amused too. The resemblance is so close as to be really ridiculous, considering the difference in our circumstances."

I paid Sidney the additional $15, and though I subsequently learned that he himself had posed for the picture I never regretted the bargain.

About two months later a somewhat mysterious stranger called upon me to inquire for Sidney Colbert's address. Suspecting this man to be a collector, I declined to give the desired information. On the following day a lawyer from the Wall street district came with the same request. He assured me that he was acting in my friend's interest. I told him that Sidney was just recovering from an illness and was in miserable circumstances and that I would make it warm for any one who annoyed him. Then I gave the address.

I was not altogether easy in my mind, however, and consequently I called at Sidney's lodgings one evening in the latter part of that week. He was not at home, and nobody had seen him for two days. Much disturbed, I went to see Miss Dean in the studio building, where she dwelt in girl bachelor fashion.

Miss Dean was quaking with nervousness, though she tried to conceal it. I was sure that she had been pacing the floor, which was littered with all the evening newspapers. She began by telling me that she did not know where Sidney was, but when I smiled upon her sadly she abandoned that deception and admitted that she did know, but was pledged not to tell.

"He has been so ill!" she cried, clinching her hands distractedly. "He ought to be in the country, where he could be quiet and have pure air to breathe."

"Is he in any sort of trouble?" I asked, and she said no, except that he was very weak from illness and needed rest.

"Is he at work?"

"Yes."

"Then he will soon have some money and can go out of town," said I.

"Twenty dollars a week!" she responded with withering scorn.

That was all I learned about Sidney, but Miss Dean consented to speak more freely of herself. I thought it my duty to inquire, because for all I knew she might be penniless. It appeared, however, that she was a fairly good manager, and, though the allowance upon which she lived was barely sufficient for her support, she had never gone in debt. Indeed she had for a time preserved some small savings, but these she had spent for Sidney during his illness. Sidney did not know this, of course. It would never occur to him that little expenses for a sick man's delicate provender could have any considerable total.

I saw Sylvia quite frequently after that, but did not see Sidney nor could I get track of him, though I made various endeavors. A hint from Sylvia gave me the impression that the mysterious work in which Sidney was engaged might not be viewed with approval by a stern moralist, and this led me to believe that he was employed by Shenstone. It was possible, however, that he might be serving Shenstone's enemies. Could it be possible that his resemblance to the speculator was being used in some wild scheme of personation? Sidney would never consent to such dishonesty, but in the hands of the shrewd and reckless men who were fighting Shenstone's pool my friend would be a mere child. It would be no trouble at all for them to make Sidney believe that black was white.

Sylvia was as careless as most women are of the ethics of business. Her sole anxiety in this matter was for Sidney's health. I made out that she had either very meager reports of him or none at all.

"I should not be surprised any day to hear that he was dead," said she to me, with black foreboding written on her face.

I think it was not twenty-four hours afterward that I was going through the regular daily report from one of the city news bureaus and came upon this paragraph typewritten upon the thin, dirty yellow paper that they use:

"Sidney Colbert, a writer, was taken to St. Margaret's hospital late last night suffering with ulcer of the stomach. An immediate operation will be necessary. In this disease surgery is not resorted to until the ulcer penetrates the wall of the organ, and the chances are always against the patient. Doctors at the hospital declined to discuss the case."

As soon as I could get away from the office I went to see Sylvia. She was not in. Presumably she was at St. Margaret's. There, however, I could get no word of her, nor was I able, with all my "pull," either to see Sidney or to send him a message. I obtained the information that the operation had been performed and that the patient's condition was fairly good. On the following day I learned that he was dead.

As Sidney had no near relatives I joined with some other men who had known him, and we claimed his body. The funeral was held in the chapel adjoining the hospital, and we gathered quite a company of mourners. But Sylvia was not present, and I could not find her. My anxiety was extreme, for I knew that she had loved Sidney with all her heart, but before I had taken any steps to trace her through the usual public machinery I received a rather curt message that she had gone to her old home in Maine. About three weeks later, however, I met her on the street.

It was near the place where she had lived, and I accompanied her there.

"Sylvia," said I when we stood in her little sitting room, "you say you have just got back to town. I don't believe you've ever been away."

"I haven't," she admitted.

I took her by the arm.

"You are happy," said I, "feverishly happy. What does this mean? Not very long ago I stood by the grave of a man I thought you loved"—

I RECOILED AS FROM A BLOW AND STARED AT HER.

"You didn't!" she whispered. "He isn't dead!"

I recoiled as from a blow and stared at her.

"I have felt this in my bones," said I slowly. "I have dreamed it at night. We buried Shenstone!"

"Swear to me," she cried, "that you will not tell!"

"Give me the story," said I. "You have my word."

"Mr. Shenstone was taken ill," said she, "just at the beginning of a great fight. I don't fully understand"—

"I know all about that. He was managing a mighty big pool."

"It was thought that if the news of his serious illness got about," she continued, "the enterprise would fail."

"The speculative public would have swamped it in one day."

"Yes; that's it. Now, Sidney had been to see Mr. Shenstone for you to ask him for a photograph of himself, which Mr. Shenstone refused. So they knew how much he looked like Mr. Shenstone. Really the resemblance was very close, and as both men had been ill the deception was made easier. They offered Sidney $20 a week merely to go to Mr. Shenstone's office every day and sit in the private room, but, of course, they didn't let anybody in who knew Mr. Shenstone well. And Sidney has been living in Mr. Shenstone's house. They were both there together until Mr. Shenstone became so ill that it was seen he must die. Then he was secretly smuggled into the hospital as Sidney Colbert. They begged me to go to the funeral, but I could not. I should have died at the sight of him."

"You wouldn't have seen him," said I. "The coffin was sealed."

"They don't want Sidney any more," she resumed after a shuddering pause. "It will be announced that Mr. Shenstone is going abroad. And his wife is going secretly to Dakota, where she will get a divorce for abandonment. And he is dead! Won't it be dreadful?"

"And Sidney?"

"He and I shall be married very quietly, and we shall go to Italy. They are to give him a thousand dollars."

"What!"

"A thousand dollars."

"My dear young friend," said I, "if this story comes out it will drive those men up the tallest tree in the United States. They'll have to run for their lives. A thousand dollars, indeed! Just let me drop a hint in certain quarters, merely a hint, and you'll see what will happen. You don't understand the fraud and trickery of which Sidney has been the mainstay. To you his act even savored of virtue. It seemed unjust that Mr. Shenstone's enemies should triumph over him merely because he was ill, and Sidney seemed to be doing no harm in taking his place. But there's been more in this game than Beelzebub himself could keep track of. Let me talk to those fellows."

At first she wouldn't listen, but I finally showed her that those sharks were merely laughing at Sidney at playing him for a fool, and, with her womanly resentment aroused, she agreed at least to tell them what she thought of them. She nearly frightened them to death. They executed contortions of apology and performed miracles of explanation, and the result was that Sidney got a life pension of $5,000 a year, upon which well earned income he and she are living in the most delicious content by the blue Mediterranean, and Sidney is writing a book, which will make his name famous. No; not his name, for that is on a tombstone, as I know, because I paid the bill for the carving. Perhaps the book will be by Edgar Shenstone.

The Country Road.

Down through the hollows it wobbles along,
Fringed with the sumac and bordered with song.
Winding away it leads up to the mill,
Skirting the creek with its gurgle and rill.
Now it is lost in the heart of the wood,
Lazing along as a country road should.

Shaggy hocked horses are plodding its way,
Nipping the plumes of the goldenrod, gay.
Cattle with orbs like the brown daisy's eye,
Languidly gaze at its dust drifting by.
Bowing, it touches a haven of rest
Set with a cottage, the home of the blest.

Onward it goes with a turbulent grade—
Never disheartened and never afraid.
Rag-weed and clover turned now to the seed,
Strive to encompass its way with their greed.
Thrusting them back to the margin, it goes
Over the bridge where the soft zephyr blows.

Now up the long, sloping hill to the west,
Onward! Aye, onward! it winds with a zest!
On to'rd the sky that is purple and red,
Straight to the sun in its great golden bed.
Lilting, it winds in the wine-colored haze;
Faint as a ribbon 'tis lost to the gaze.

Ah, we can see it in mind groping still
Over the brow of the rosy tipped hill,
Running forever through woodland and vale,
Spurning the elements, taunting the gale;
Dodging the cities, it hurries along,
Breathing the incense of nectar and song!

Old country road, I am lonely for thee.
Lonely to laze with thee, happy and free,
Off where the daisy is nodding its head,
Off to the hills where the sunset is red—
I would loaf on with you, glad in your play,
Now and forever and ever—alway!

Side Remarks.

The reason a man likes to put his feet in the street car seat opposite is because there are so many times that he does not get one seat, he loves to play even and occupy two when opportunity presents itself!

When a young fellow is riding in a street car and sitting alongside of a pretty girl, he never objects to the street car conductor yelling, "Sit closer, please!" And why should he? I was young myself once.

Little white lies—watch 'em grow!

A Lanky Black Feline.

At midnight when the clouds are casting silhouetted shadows from the trees, when all is weird and ghostly in the suburbs, if a lone, lanky, black feline suddenly darts out of the bushes ahead of you and persists in crossing the street, it is a sign that the cat wants to get to the other side of the thoroughfare.

Did you think
This was poetry?

CATHOLICS IN PHILIPPINES.

Archbishop Harty of Diocese of Manila Says They Number 7,000,000.

The religious situation in the Philippines, from the Catholic viewpoint, has been pictured for American readers by Archbishop Harty, now in this country on a visit. The Most Rev. J. J. Harty was appointed archbishop of Manila three years ago, and during his incumbency he has administered 300,000 confirmations in his diocese. This large number, it is explained in The Catholic Mirror, is perhaps due to the fact that confirmations had not been administered in the country districts for many years prior to his arrival. By means of the ecclesiastical census instituted by the old Spanish missionaries it is ascertained that there are now 7,000,000 Christians in the archipelago. Some other facts concerning the Catholic church in the Philippines are given in The Mirror as follows:

ARCHBISHOP HARTY.

"The idea that the church in the Philippines is rich is pure fiction. The church had been rich in lands, and these lands were productive and gave results, but for ten years no revenue has been received from any of them, and the result is poverty on the part of the church. Under the old regime the Spanish government paid for the support of the clergy. This, of course, has been withdrawn, and the clergy are dependent on the voluntary contributions of the people. The people had not been accustomed to support the clergy directly; they supported them indirectly through the taxation system. The direct contributions are now a hardship to them, the support which they give to the church is very meager, and the priests are in extreme poverty.

"There are 400 priests in the diocese of Manila; 120 priests in the diocese of Jaro; 110 in the diocese of Vigan; 250 in the diocese of Cebu, and 160 in the diocese of Nueva Caceres. In the United States we have 14,000,000 Catholics, with 14 archbishops, 90 bishops and 15,000 priests. In the Philippine islands we have 7,000,000 Catholics, just 50 per cent. of those in America, and we have 1 archbishop, 5 bishops and 1,040 priests. The striking contrast in these figures shows without comment how much remains to be done."

ONWARD AND UPWARD.

The general plans for the establishment of a great Presbyterian rallying place at Montreat, in North Carolina, have been published in the church papers. It is proposed to make Montreat far more than a mere summer resort. It is to be a rallying place for Presbyterians of the south.

Charles Carroll Brooks, the founder of "The Very Small Library," is planting libraries in various mountain communities. He is a mountain boy and was brought up in the Blue Ridge, near Harper's Ferry, W. Va.

Education is going on apace in Uganda, in Central Africa, and there is no separation between it and religious teaching. A C. M. S. missionary writes: "The boys and girls are being brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord, because they first learn that the beginning of wisdom is to know God and Jesus Christ whom he has sent."

"What makes you women so different from us?" a Mohammedan woman in Persia asked of Miss McLean, of the Presbyterian mission. "Is it what you eat? Won't you make me a dress just like yours, so that I may look like you?" Miss McLean made her the dress, and she confesses that the woman was not a pretty picture when arrayed in it. "I haven't got the look yet," she said, as she came back, disappointed. "There is something in your eyes that isn't in ours." What made the difference was the light of Christ shining within.

Robert E. Lewis, general secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in central China, writes that the evangelistic meetings in Korea, during the recent visit of John R. Mott, were of remarkable power. A three days' campaign was held at Seoul. At one meeting over 200 men rose and stood as evidence of their desire to accept Jesus Christ.

Prof. Marcus Dods Honored.

Prof. Marcus Dods has been chosen by the United Free Church Assembly of Scotland to succeed the late Dr. Rainy as principal of New college, Edinburgh, one of the theological schools of the United Free church. Dr. Dods' promotion from the professorship of New Testament theology is especially remarkable from the fact that he is 73 years old. For ten years after leaving the theological school he sought in vain for a pastorate, but he has ripened late, increasing his influence till his greatest advancement has come when he is past threescore and ten.

Led All to Christ.

A Sunday school teacher said not long ago: "I have 14 young women in my class, and I have had the joy of leading every one of them to Jesus."

BEWARE OF STIMULANTS.

They Prove a Dangerous and Deceptive Beverage for Human System.

Why should any man endowed with sense give way to the craving for alcoholic stimulants?

Nutritious food, exercise and sleep are the best stimulants; you do not need any others. Half an hour's hard work every day with dumb-bells or Indian clubs or a punching bag will put you in a physical and mental condition in which you can in the long run outstrip any man in the world that lives on stimulants.

Stimulants are a broken-kneed horse; they are likely to throw you at any time.

You can set it down as an absolute fact that there is no amount of extra work that you may be called upon to do and no extra strain you may have to undergo that you cannot endure a great deal better without stimulants than with them.

For every degree of extra energy produced by alcoholic stimulants, declares the New York Weekly, there are ten degrees of lassitude when the reaction comes.

Besides, it is perfectly well known that all stimulants lose in time their exhilarating effect. Larger and larger doses are required, until the sodden brain refuses any longer to respond, and the man becomes a mere battered, depressed wreck.

The wise man has no use for these things; drinks harmless beverages, eats his well-cooked food, sleeps with his window open, exercises every day, and leaves all the stimulant users so far behind in the race that, looking back, he cannot even see the poor little dust they kick up.

ANOTHER INDICTMENT.

Alcohol Shown to Be a Menace to the Public Health.

The recently published report of Dr. William S. Cook, medical health officer for the town of Greenock, Scotland, contains some notable references to alcohol as affecting the public health. Dr. Cook embodied in his report a poster and handbill which had been issued in accordance with the instructions of the local public health committee. This circular made reference to the enormous amount of damage done directly and indirectly to men and women in every town by the abuse of alcohol, and attention was drawn to this as one of the chief causes in lowering the health of the citizens and rendering them easily susceptible to many diseases. Commenting on the notably high infantile mortality rate shown in his report, Dr. Cook stated: "It is said by those competent to judge that drinking amongst women of the working class is on the increase in the United Kingdom—in any case, it is unfortunately too common amongst a class that can least afford it. There is no single factor so pernicious in its influence as this, whether it be administered to the child or taken by the parent. Alcohol is one of the most dangerous menaces to the health and longevity of a community."

Unique Class of Total Abstainers.

A recent issue of the New York Craftsman contains an interesting account of a unique class of total abstainers existing in Arizona, called the Hopi Community of Cliff-dwellers. These strange aborigines were discovered by white men four centuries ago, and have only recently been rediscovered. The Hopis are a tribe of Indians, and are "a people without jails, hospitals, asylums, or policemen, and crime is almost an unknown thing among them." The feasts which end their religious celebrations are never marred by drunkenness. So far as Mr. Monsen, the writer, is aware the Hopis are the only aboriginal race which has never invented an intoxicating drink, and to this day all the better Hopi element refuse the white man's whisky "because it takes away their brains."

Bar to Drunken Persons.

The Pennsylvania railroad lines have recently adopted a rule not to sell tickets to drunken persons. Murders have resulted on several trains from their presence, and in some cases companies have been assessed heavy damages for assaults committed by drunkards in passenger cars. For this reason the Pennsylvania system has barred them out of her trains. It is understood that the Big Four, the Lake Erie & Western, and probably the New York Central lines are considering the adoption of the same rule. If the new edict goes forth, no one who is not sober will be allowed upon a passenger train. Conductors will receive instructions to eject at first stop all who indulge in intoxicating liquors on the trains.

Feared Whisky.

A friend once said to Croker: "Dick I don't believe there is any fear in you. Is there anything in the world you are afraid of?" "I am not afraid of any man or animal on earth," replied the Tammany chieftain, "but there is one thing I'm afraid of, and very much afraid of." "What's that?" "Whisky." He was never known to drink a drop.

What Life Insurance Has Gained Recently.

By DARWIN P. KINGSLEY, President of the New York Life Insurance Company.

Copyright by Alman.

FOR people interested in life insurance, whether as policy holders or as life insurance men, THE EVENTS OF THE LAST TWO YEARS HAVE MANY LESSONS. The first HASTY judgment might be that the lessons belong entirely to life insurance men. This would be a mistaken conclusion. The life insurance man has learned his lesson. There is no doubt about that. All trustees have learned what some have always known—namely, that they are PUBLIC SERVANTS.

However, with all that he has suffered and all that he has lost, WHAT HAS THE POLICY HOLDER LEARNED, what has he gained from the events of the last two years? The policy holders have been told many things in two years. They have been confused and alarmed. Some degree of alarm was certainly warranted. But the confusion is passing. The alarm is subsiding. Confidence is returning. The irrevocable past, with its BITTER lessons, with its justice and its cruel injustice, stands as a silent monitor over all future administration. With truer vision, with better knowledge and with saner judgments, these facts at least are clear to the policy holders:

First.—That their contracts are SAFE and their companies sound.

Second.—That their life insurance protection rests on an idea which is national and even international in its scope and cannot therefore perform its best service if UNREASONABLY BURDENED and restricted by local politics or local interests.

Third.—That payment of premiums does not complete a man's obligation to his company, just as voting doesn't fulfill a man's duty to society. The good citizen supports good government and condemns bad administration in a thousand ways. So must the policy holder do.

WE HAVE ALL LEARNED OUR LESSON. WE HAVE A CLEARER GRIP ON WHAT LIFE INSURANCE IS AND OUGHT TO BE. WE KNOW THAT LIFE INSURANCE WILL GO ON TO THE FULFILLMENT OF ITS HIGH PURPOSE. LEGISLATURES MAY HINDER IT. TAXATION MAY BURDEN IT. DEMAGOGUES MAY USE IT FOR UNWORTHY PURPOSES. INDIFFERENT AND EVEN BAD ADMINISTRATION MAY NOW AND THEN PUT IT TO SHAME. BUT IT WILL GO ON, BECAUSE THE PUBLIC INTEREST DEMANDS IT.

America a Disappointment To the Immigrant.

By Dr. DAVID BLAUSTEIN, Former Superintendent of the Educational Alliance, New York City.

THE IMMIGRANT IS VERY MUCH DISAPPOINTED IN WHAT HE FINDS IN AMERICA WHEN HE GETS HERE. THE MORAL AND SPIRITUAL SIDE OF AMERICA IS DISAPPOINTING TO HIM. HE HAS DREAMT OF FREE EDUCATION. HE FINDS HIMSELF IMPOSED UPON BY FAKES, SHYSTER LAWYERS, FAKE DOCTORS, FAKE PASTORS.

He dreamed of the free press, and he finds a yellow press. He finds you cannot trust the printed word. He has dreamed of free speech, and he finds the demogogue. He first becomes pessimistic and loses his faith in man; then he loses his faith in God.

America is a country of great opportunities, and THAT IS SOMETIMES A CURSE to the newly arrived immigrant. The same child who a month ago in the old country was dependent on its parents here goes to work independently and becomes a boarder in its own family.

Another sad fact is the working out of EQUAL RIGHTS AND OPPORTUNITIES FOR THE WOMAN in America. Many of the immigrants come from the towns and villages instead of the big cities. The girl here becomes a wage earner in factory and office and in the school. Why should she learn how to cook and sew? she feels. Why be bothered with domestic duties? She goes to the department store, to the restaurant.

Free education is another American blessing that has brought sadness to the homes of immigrants. The child here must go to school. In a few months he learns to speak English. The parents cannot. After a year or two THE CHILD AND HIS PARENTS LIVE IN DIFFERENT WORLDS.

Government Ownership Abroad and Here.

By Representative WILLIAM P. HEPBURN of Iowa.

THE DIFFERENCE IN SIZE AND CONDITIONS between America and countries where various governmental experiments are being made is constantly forgotten. For example, in New Zealand, where the success of socialistic ideas is so constantly quoted, the statistics show that the governmentally controlled railroads LOST IN ONE YEAR ONE MILLION AND A HALF DOLLARS. Well, to the American mind that is not a very great deficit, but you must remember that New Zealand has only eight hundred miles of railroad, while America, with over two hundred thousand miles, on the same proportion would have a deficit of over four hundred millions of dollars annually if the government controlled the railroads. However, I don't think there is any likelihood of the people insisting on governmental ownership to any extent.

IF THE UNITED STATES OWNED AND OPERATED THE PUBLIC UTILITIES LIKE THE RAILROADS AND TELEGRAPHS, IT WOULD MEAN THAT OVER A MILLION AND A HALF EMPLOYEES WOULD BE DIRECTLY UNDER CONTROL OF ONE OR AT MOST A FEW MINDS. A GOVERNMENT STARTING SUCH AN INNOVATION WITH SUCH ENORMOUS PATRONAGE WOULD EASILY BE ABLE TO PERPETUATE ITSELF.

TICKET OF STRENGTH NOMINATED TUESDAY

County Treasurer, is well known and highly esteemed for his strict business integrity among the people with whom he has come in contact in the county. He has been successfully engaged in the lumber business near Friendsville for a number of years and comes before the people with an excellent record as a reliable gentleman.

Messrs. Kamp, Fitzwater and Moon, for Orphans' Court Judges, are all successful farmers in their respective districts; safe, reliable and men of mature judgment.

In the Register of Wills, the convention showed its good judgment by rewarding work well done by renominating Mr. Edwin E. Friend for the position he has so acceptably filled for a number of years.

Mr. James A. Sincell, for County Surveyor, was born and reared in Oakland. He has been engaged for several years past as a civil engineer and for a number of months has been deputy county surveyor.

After making the nominations a vote of thanks was tendered the presiding officer and secretary, when the convention adjourned sine die.

FIKE.

The farmers are digging potatoes in this section and nearly one half of them have rotted. The threshing of buckwheat is the order of the day also, and there is a bountiful yield expected.

The public school at this place opened under the management of Mifs Effie Guard and an enrollment of thirteen pupils was obtained the first day.

Mr. Isaac Frazee and Miss Kate Fearer went to Uniontown, Pa., to attend a show and on their return home Isaac changed his boarding place and Miss Kate changed her name. We wish them happiness through life.

Jasper Thomas is sick at this writing.

Mr. L. K. Fike, the public school teacher at the McCabe school, spent last Saturday and Sunday at his home.

Mrs. Ida B. Marshall, of Uniontown, Pa., is visiting friends and relatives in this vicinity.

Mr. J. A. Fike has contracted with Mr. Walter Hoff to have his house finished.

Mr. Geo. Savage, postmaster and merchant at Fearer, had a public sale and Mr. Thomas Hinebaugh will take Mr. Savage's place as merchant and postmaster at that place.

Mr. Wm. H. Thomas was at Bittinger a short time ago and stopped at the house on the corner. He say's the people of that place have surely learned the art of giving pleasant entertainment to those who stay with them.

Mr. Wm. L. Fike's horse ran away with the buggy, breaking one wheel of the buggy to pieces and it is thought Mr. Fike's shoulder was dislocated. The doctor was summoned at once.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

"Joe" says somebody lied.

"And the light went out" when the Mrs. Squires returned from a visit to Westernport, Md.

Mr. Henry May is working at carpentering in Keyser, W. Va.

electric light plant closed down for the season Tuesday morning at 6 o'clock.

About a dozen of our summer cottagers are still with us and they will soon take their departure for their winter homes.

Rev. E. J. Westfall left Monday to visit friends in West Virginia before attending the M. E. Conference. He will be absent over two Sundays. He will be returned to us for another year.

Miss Erma Squires expects soon to visit relatives in Cincinnati, Ohio, and Louisville, Kentucky.

The benefit given Mr. Thomas Harris last Thursday evening netted nearly one hundred dollars, and the returns are not all in, as money is still coming from many directions. Mr. Harris is worthy of all he will receive.

John D. Hayden and John Callis have a contract to wire a number of houses for electric light in Rowlesburg, W. Va.

Mr. Samuel Lee left for Baltimore a few days ago to continue the study of medicine in the University of Maryland.

The daughter and son of Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Wortman are rapidly convalescing from an attack of typhoid fever.

A festival was held in Assembly Hall Wednesday evening in the interest of the public school library.

BLOOMINGTON.

The remains of John Miller, the 15 year old boy of Mr. and Mrs. George Miller, of this place, who died at the Hoffman Hospital at Keyser on last Friday morning after an operation for appendicitis, was brought here and buried in the Bloomington grave yard on last Sunday afternoon at two o'clock. His death was quite a shock to his friends, as on Saturday before he was seen on the streets in his usual good health. His funeral took place from the M. E. church, Rev. Snedegar, the pastor, officiated. It was largely attended by friends and relatives of the deceased.

Mr. Elood Bonner, of Pennsboro, W. Va., was a guest of relatives over Sunday.

Mrs. Maggie Collins, accompanied by her two children, who has been visiting relatives in Baltimore for the past two or three weeks, returned home on Monday evening.

Mr. Edward Ponrod and wife, of Atlantic City, have been the guests of Mr. and Mrs. William Tibbets for the past two weeks.

Mr. Thos. Conelly, aged 38 years, one of the best known men of this region, is dead at his home in this place. Three years ago while working in the Buxton mine, he was caught under a fall of rock and slate and had his back broken. Without delay he was taken to the Hospital of Physicians and Surgeons in Baltimore, and an operation performed. The sergeons found that three vertebrae had been mashed and the spinal cord almost totally severed. His condition was so critical than the physicians prognosed death in a few days. His grit and vitality pulled him through however and although paralyzed from the hips down, unable to walk or move his legs, he grew in strength until he was able at times to be wheeled about the town in an invalid chair. He died from exhaustion on Tuesday night at 12 o'clock superinduced by a severe attack of cholera morbus. His funeral will take place Thursday afternoon.

BITTINGER.

The first frost of the season struck this sectionlast week and did some damage to corn and other tender vegetation.

G. W. Engle spent most of last week about here cutting political props.

Joel Orendorf was visiting his daughter, Mrs. Lewis Maust, over in Somerset county last week.

J. Turner Lohr went to Michigan last Thursday to attend the funeral of his sister, Mrs. C. Stemple, who died of typhoid fever after a very brief illness.

Mr. and Mrs. Elias Orendorf left last Sunday morning for a visit with relatives in Indiana.

C. E. Ellithorp left last week for a protracted visit among the scenes of his childhood in Minnesota.

Earl Stark, aged about ten years, was thrown from a horse last Monday afternoon and had his arm broken. The accident occurred near his home and Dr. Boyer was called to set the fracture and the lad is reported to be resting easy.

Harry Wiley spent last week viewing the sights at the Meyersdale fair.

Rev. J. B. Shoup, who has been absent from his home here for some days, is reported to be ill at the home of Rev. H. H. Flick at Manchester, Md.

FARMERS LEAVING STATE.

West Virginia Crop Failures Encourage Emigration.

Climatic conditions prevailing in Central West Virginia throughout the summer have resulted in a state of affairs bordering on a calamity because of the effect the unusual and unnatural weather has had upon crops.

Figuratively speaking, there are no crops and with winter coming on the farmers of Randolph, Barbour, Pocahontas, Greenbrier, Webster and many other counties are confronted with the problem of living through the season with nothing laid by, either in provisions or money. So disastrous has been the failure of crops through incessant rains and floods that millions of dollars have been lost in this State in crops alone during the summer of 1907, the worst experienced in years.

So disheartening have the crop failures proved, lasting through two summers, that farmers from the mountain districts are emigrating to New Mexico, Arizona and Indian Territory, and the encouraging reports from that section of the country are robbing the State of even more of its population. Agents of Western railroads touring the State at this time have also been instrumental in their missionary work in inducing farmers to leave West Virginia. One train going West a few days ago took 30 farmers from Webster county to their new homes in the West.

Destruction of the forests of West Virginia has been advanced as one of the causes of so much moisture and rain. Unless there is some change in climatic conditions within the next year, hundreds of acres of farm land will be deserted or sold for a song.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1907. NUMBER 32

DEMOCRATS NAME THEIR LOCAL COUNTY TICKET

Ticket is Headed by Messrs. Richard T. Browning and William Miller For House of Delegates.

D. E. OFFUTT FOR COMMISSIONER.

Mr. G. S. Hamill for State's Attorney and Lesser Lights for Other Offices —Resolutions Endorse Administration of Governor Warfield.

The semi-annual convention of the local county Democracy for the purpose of nominating a county ticket, was held in Oakland Monday afternoon, with delegates present from each of the Election Districts save numbers 8, 9, and 13.

The delegations present fraternalized freely, although it is an open secret that if the opportunity had presented itself the hunting knife would have been unsheated and the political scalps of more than one of those nominated would have been lifted. Everything, however, on the surface at least, was harmonious and the following ticket was placed in the field:

For House of Delegates, Messrs Richard T. Browning, of District No. 7, and William Miller, of District No. 5.

For State's Attorney, Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill, of Oakland.

For Sheriff, Mr. Wallace W. Schlossnagle, of Friendsville.

For County Treasurer, Mr. Wade H. Lohr, of Swanton.

For County Commissioner, Mr. Daniel E. Offutt, of Oakland.

For Clerk to the County Commissioners, Mr. James P. Treacy, of Oakland.

For Orphans' Court Judges, Mr. Theodore Beckman, of Swanton; Mr. John Custer, of Grantsville, and Mr. William J. Bowman, of Sang Run.

For Register of Wills, Mr. Harper W. Bartlett, of Oakland.

For County Surveyor, Mr. Roy H. Hamill, of Oakland.

Prior to the adjournment of the convention, which was presided over by ex-Senator Browning, and had as its secretary Mr. Charles A. Deffinbaugh, of Oakland, the following resolutions were adopted:

We, the Democrats of Garrett county, in convention assembled, do hereby heartily endorse the present platform adopted by the late Democratic State convention, as well as all the State candidates.

This convention pledges its Legislative candieates to the passage of such legislation as will better the public roads of Garrett county.

We further pledge our Legislative candidates to the passage of a primary election law for Garrett county.

We heartily endorse the administration of Governor Edwin Warfield in all the departments of the State government.

CLOSING OF THE CONFERENCE YEAR.

Interesting Meeting Held In St. Paul's Church Sunday Evening.

A very interesting meeting, especially to the membership, was held in the M. E. church in Oakland Sunday evening, October the 6th. It was the last meeting of the Conference year, and the close of the third year of Rev. J. B. Workman's pastorate. In a short but very appropriate address he thanked the members of the church and the citizens of the town generally for the uniform kindness and courtesy shown him while among us. He stated that all apportionments to this charge had been paid in full, that he would carry to the Conference with him the best report that was ever taken from this church.

He made over one thousand pastoral visits during the year.

He also referred to the splendid work done during the year by the Ladies' Aid Society.

The official board then made its annual financial report, showing that there had been something near $1,800 collected and disbursed in payment of the pastor's salary and current expenses in addition to about four hundred dollars collected and paid out on account of repairs to the church property.

Accounts have been accurately kept by the treasurer, Dr. E. J. M. Button, and secretary, Mr. J. C. Peddicord, and the report read was carefully prepared by the treasurer and exhibited in detail every cent of the money paid into the treasury by the members and friends of the church during the year, and for what purposes it had been expended.

It had the endorsement of the auditing committee that the books had been examined and found correct in every respect.

The reportalso showed that the church is in a healthy financial condition, with enough money promised, and which will shortly be paid in, to discharge every financial obligation.

The Presiding Elder, Rev. Ward, being present, in a few well chosen remarks congratulated the church upon its splendid showing and gave a brief resume of his work throughout the district, after which E. H. Sincell, Esq., a representative of the official board very appropiately, but briefly, thanked the membership of the church for the loyal support it had given the official board and also extended thanks to the choir for their services during the year, and in closing on behalf of the official board presented to Miss Lottie Loar, the organist, a handsome leather chair. Miss Loar briefly responded and Mr. Naylor, the choir leader, requested Rev. J. M. Davis to respond on behalf of the choir, which he did in his usual happy and cheery manner.

The choir, assisted by Prof Turner, furnished some most excellent and special music for the occasion.

THE CORNER STONE WILL BE LAID NEXT TUESDAY

Masonic Fraternity of Oakland, Assisted By Other Lodges, Will Have Charge.

SENATOR WELLINGTON, ORATOR.

Arrangements For The Work Were Only Completed Yesterday Morning, Hence Notice of the Event Is Short But Ceremonies Will Be Carried Out in Detail.

The date for the laying of the corner stone at the new court house in Oakland was determined upon late yesterday and has been fixed for Tuesday afternoon next at two o'clock, when the ceremonies will be in charge of Oakland Lodge No. 192, A., F. and A. M., assisted by members of lodges from Westernport, Cumberland, Terra Alta and other neighboring towns.

The delay in laying the stone has been occasioned by the non arrival of the coping, which was shipped more than three weeks ago from the quarries in Indiana and which was received here on Monday by the contractor.

The program for the ceremonies on Tuesday afternoonhas been arranged by the local lodge of Masons, and will be carried out in their entirety. The ritualistic portion of the program contains many impressive features and will be used on Tuesday for the first time in this section of the country.

Senator George L. Wellington will deliver the oration. His abillty as a speaker is recognized nationally and his presence insures a large attendance at the ceremonies.

His Honor Judge Boyd was in communication with members of the lodge in Oakland yersterday morning. He was to have delivered an address also but his presence at the Court of Appeals in Annapolis on Tuesday is necessary and he expressed his regret at not being able to be here.

The members of the lodge are urged to be at the lodge room not later than 1.30 o'clock Tuesday afternoon when the lodge will be convened in regular session.

HAVE INSTALLED AERIAL TRAMWAY.

Hamill Coal Company Will Shortly Begin Operations Near Blaine.

The Hamill Coal company is one of the new enterprises for Garrett county. The officers are R. M. McMillan, president; F. G. Trout, vice president; R. A. Smith, Secretary and treasurer, and J. R. Browning, manager. This company is capitalized at $100,000, and owns 850 acres of coal lands on the Maryland side of the river, one-half mile east of Blaine underlaid with the Kittanning 6-foot vein, a splendid steam coal. Already an opening into the coal seam has been made and a siding put in along the W. M. railroad. The coal will be conveyed from the mine to the dump at the railroad on an aerial tramway. Two 2-inch steel cables will be suspended high in the air for a distance of 850 feet. These will have a capacity of 10,000 tons. This is a new method to be employed in that section and is attracting much interest. The company hopes to begin shipping coal by January first.

A party of Pennsylvania capitalists have purchased valuable coal rights at Bayard and are getting ready for extensive operations. Among the tracts included in the deal are the Hendrickson, Job and Jacob Aronhalt, Wood, Day and others, altogether near a thousand acres of coal lands underlaid with the Upper Freeport and Lower Freeport seams. The company will make an opening on the Hendrickson lands at the old Sly saw-mill and use the tannery siding. Already a store has been opened in the Barndollar store building.

How a Mule Drowned.

Chas. Wilson, a well known business man of Blaine, W. Va., lost a valuable mule a few days ago under extraordinary circumstances. The animal was in the North Branch drinking in shallow water, when it struck at a fly on its ear with one of its fore feet The shoe on the foot caught in the bridle and its head was dragged under the water, and it was drowned before it could be released though a number of men were at hand and made a desperate effort to save it.

NEGRO'S BODY WAS RIDDLED WITH BULLETS.

Summary Justice Dealt Out to Murderer Who Killed Policeman Baker In Cumberland

POLES USED FOR BATTERING RAM

And Jail Entered by Lynchers.—Killing Had Been Fully Arranged and Executed Before Authorities Interfered.

Early Sunday morning at Cumberland summary justice was given William Burns, the negro who killed Policemen Baker, who was executed so quietly that comparatively few knew of it until daylight when the news spread rapidly. Thousands viewed the body perforated with bullets. It was the first lynching in Cumberland and was not anticipated by the authorities although threats had been heard.

The crowd at the jail numbered less than 100. Even the police did not credit the rumor that summary justice was to be dealt out to the negro at midnight and they were on their beats until hastily summoned.

The plans for the lynching party were well laid and put into effect without confusion. When all was ready Deputy Sheriff Henley was summoned by a knock on the door which that official refused to open. Men then brought a teleghone pole and commanded, "Open, or we will break the door in."

Hendley replied: "Help yourself, gentlemen. I'm here to do my duty and will shoot the first man who comes in." There was a crash against the door with the pole, quickly followed by another, which sent the doors off their hinges. Deputy Hendley was covered with two revolvers. Mrs. Hendley, fearful that her husband might be shot implored him to let the men have their way. The mob disarmed the deputy and obtained his keys. Burns was found crouching behind the end of his cot in the rear of his cell. His captors dragged him into the street, where they riddled his body with bullets.

About this time Chief Judge A. Hunter Boyd and the police, who with others had been notified by telephone by Deputy Hendley, appeared on the scene. Respect was shown to Judge Boyd when he stepped in the midst of the throng and the cries of "burn the body" were suddenly hushed. Judge Boyd quietly directed that all law abiding citizens return to their homes. His words were cheered and in a short time the crowd of fully 500 dwindled to less than 50. An inquest was held yesterday and Judge Boyd in his charge to the grand jury Monday said:

"Here in a city of over twenty thousand persons a mob Sunday morning took a prisoner from our county jail, dragged him up and down the stairs and out into the street, where they killed him in a brutal and cowardly manner. Not being even than satisfied, they filled his lifeless body with bullets. The question is usually asked, "What crime, if any, are the persons who are a part of such a mob guilty of?" I would, without any hesitancy, state that they and each one of them are guilty of murder. For the law says that anyone who unlawfully kills another is guilty of murder, and if anyone says that the action of the mob Sunday morning was lawful, they certainly are not good law-abiding citizens. I know there are times and circumstance when actions may be excused by good citizens, if not the law; such cases as the killing of the assailant of a near relative or the crimes against women. I say while in some cases good citizens might say the victim got his dues, yet it is unlawful. But there was no need for the action of Sunday morning, no excuse at all. The people knew that Officer Baker died Saturday morning, the grand jury was to meet this morning, that a speedy action would have been taken in his case, and I do not doubt but that an indictment would have been found and a conviction would have followed within five minutes after the evidence was heard. So there was no excuse in this case. It was an outrageous violation of the laws of God and man, and our county has suffered great mortification. Think what the good Officer Baker did. Had he shot down the negro when he was shot, he would have been entirely justified but did that good officer do that? No, he knew that if it was not necessary to kill a prisoner, he should not do so, and even when his suffering was and must have been intense, he refrained from doing what he could have lawfully done, and turned his assailant over to the other officers that the law might take its course. Those who took part in the mortifying action cannot think it was in behalf of Officer Baker, for it was and in a thing that is a dishonor to the memory of the good officer, for he by his action plainly showed that he would rather die himself than commit what he must have thought would have been murder. The guilty persons should be apprehended, indictdd, tried and given the full penalty of the law, and this grand jury should use all the time they deem necessary in hunting down the guilty ones.

"It is highly gratifyed to learn that the Catholic societies as early as Sunday passed resolutions disapproving the mob's action. In connection with what I have just said I call the attention of the jury to the laws relative to carrying concealed weapons. Had the negro been without a revolver the good officer would now be living, and many other crimes would be avoid if persons would not carry weapons. Another law I feel is in connection with this crime of Sunday, the liquor law. There are dives in this city which should be closed. This grand jury should look into these places and take such actions as the law allows you. You have the power to recommend the suppression of the license, and in this connection I would say the good citizens of this county should call the attention of the court to all applications for licenses where it is known it will not be a proper manner. The court cannot refuse a license unless someone remonstrates and follows it up with evidence. I am informed that at least six saloons are in the neighborhood of the place where Officer Baker received his wound. All the unlawful carrying of weapons and the existence of these awful dives are responsible direct for the crime and the awful consequences which follow. Heretofore I have always advised the grand jury to be as expeditious as theo can. I would here advise you to take as much time as you deem necessary to find out all the violations of the law, those who took part in the mob violence, all who are guilty of carrying concealed weapons, all who are running the dives and low saloons and any other places of trouble and unlawfulness."

Married.

JOHNSON—GRANT—At the rectory of Emmanuel Protestant Epiacopal church in Cumberland on Sunday morning, by Rev. Cleveland H. Hicks, Miss Annie Morrison Grant and Mr. Charles Bowie Johnson, both of Oakland. These two young people are prime favorites with the residents of Oakland and their marriage came as a great surprise to their friends, only a few intimates being made acquainted with their plans a few hours before the event took place. Very pretty cards were sent out Monday announcing the wedding. From Cumberland the couple went east on a wedding tour. The bride is the eldest daughter of Mr. John A. Grant and the groom is the only surviving son of Mrs. Virginia Johnson. THE REPUBLICAN extends its best wishes.

MR. OFFUTT WITHDREW FROM DEMOCRATIC TICKET

Mr. John O. Thayer, of Thayerville, Named in His Stead for County Commissioner.

VACANCY ALMOST GOES BEGGING

A Number of Gentlemen Asked to Accept the Place, But All Refused Except Mr. Thayer, Who Reluctiantly Consented.

The personnel of the Democratic ticket, published elsewhere in this paper today has been changed by the substitution of the name of Mr. John O. Thayer, of Thayerville, for County Commissioner, instead of Mr. Daniel E. Offutt, of Oakland, who withdrew from the ticket Tuesday evening in a letter to the Democratic County Committee, in which is set forth the reasons for his action.

Mr. Offutt's withdrawal from the ticket robs it of its strongest candidate. Many Republicans in Oakland and other sections of the county were somewhat worked up over his nomination, fearing that his strong personality would weaken the Republican candidate for Commissioner and work to his detriment.

As soon as Mr. Offutt's withdrawal was in the hands of the committee a meeting of that body was held and the nomination was tendered first to Mr. D. M. Mason, of Oakland, who absolutely refused to consider the proposition. It was then tendered Mr. Thayer, who at first refused but later accepted.

Attention, Red Men.

All Red Men are requested to meet at No. 151 Wigwam at Mountain Lake Park on Saturday's sleep next, October 12, at 7 run, 30 breath sharp. Business of importance to be considered. By order of Sachem, a visit from the Great Chiefs.

GAITHER PROVED IT BY FIGURES

Republicans When in Power Placed This State on a Business Basis.

PEOPLES' CONFIDENCE DESERVED.

Collected Debts Overdue and Reduced the Taxes.

Mr. George R. Gaither, the Republican candidate for governor, discussed at length on Monday last the attempt which has been made to impeach the statement in his speech of acceptance to the effect that the Republicans had placed the finances of the state on a business-like basis, and, further, that they had inaugurated the policy of disposing of the assets of the State which were held in its treasury. Mr. Gaither's statement goes into details, but it is interesting reading. He says:

The Sun, in a long editorial discussing a paragraph of my speech of acceptance, which reads as follows:

"It was due to the efficient administration of the State's finances by a Republican treasurer and our Republican comptrollers that the finances of our State were placed upon a business-like basis, and the policy inaugurated and sanctioned by the legislative act of 1896, of disposing of the assets of the State which were held in its treasury, and thereby reducing its public debt and decreasing the burdens the people;"— mainly confined its discussion to the sinking fund and the reduction of the debt, etc.—things which were not referred to by me. It concludes its discussion with the statement that "We find no single fact to sustain the claim made by Mr. Gaither in his speech."

Let us see whether there are not a few "facts" easily ascertainable from the public records of our State which the Sun over looked in making this statement to its readers.

Was the Republican administration of the finances of our State from 1895 to 1899 efficient, and did it place the finances of our State on a business-like basis? In support of this contention I submit to the intelligent people of Maryland four "facts."

First—It is usually considered business-like to collect promptly the debts due to the business. Let me quote the exact words of Comptroller Goldsborough written in 1899, when every fact was before him, on this point:

An examination of the tax accounts of the comptroller's office shows that during the term of my Republican predecessor, Hon. Robert P. Graham, and myself, overdue or delinquent taxas to the amount of $413,029.34 were collected and turned into the treasury by our administrations. Not one cent of these taxes matured during either the administration of Mr. Graham or myself. It was all overdue prior to Mr. Graham's accession to office in January, 1896. Some of it had been due for more than 10 years, and a large amount was collected by suit and presistent effort on the part of the Treasury officials. Some of it was forced from collectors whose terms of office had expired for more than five or six years and yet had neven paid one cent of the taxes charged against them.

In addition to this there were tax bills against four railroad companies in this State on their gross receipts, amounting to thousands of dollars, and running back to 1891, which the State had not made any effort to collect. These bills were placed in process of collection by a Republican comptroller, and were finally decided by the courts in favor of the State, resulting in the collection of $140,000 in taxes from this source, and in establishing a liability under which these same railroads pay annually to the State many thousands of dollars without question.

Second—The Republicon treasure and comptrollers established an improved system of accounting whereby every dollar of expenditure and receipt could be completely accounted for and easily ascertained.

Third—General Shryock, as treasurer, initiated and successfully carried through a funding of the debt of the State carring 6 per cent. interest into a bond at 3 per cent., thereby enabling the administration to reduce the State taxes from 17¾ cents to 16 cents, although 2 cents more than ever before were added to the tax rate of the State for the purpose of furnishing free school books to the children and promoting the cause of education.

Fourth—Our comptrollers not only carried out the policy of requiring interest on the State deposits to be paid to the State, which policy had only been begun by their predecessor in 1893, and which had only yielded $11,000, as against $33,000 under them, but when Mr. Goldsborough found out that certain State collectors, notoriously the clerks of the court of common pleas were receiving interest on State funds and applying it to their own use as a perquisit of the office, he broke up that improper practice and required this interest to be paid over to the State. He even went further and instituted suits against former officials in these positions who had appropriated funds from this source and collected considerable sums of money from the late I. Freeman Rasin for interests received by him when clerk of the court of common pleas. I submit that although these circumstances may not have been considered or discovered by the Sun in its search for "facts," they may fairly be considered by the public in determining whether I was justified in saying that the administration of our Republican treasurer and comptrollers was "efficient" and business-like."

Now, as to the question of whether the Republican administration inaugurated the policy of disposing of the assets of the State held in its treasury, thereby reducing its public debt and decreasing the burdens of the people. If there was any treasurer of the State of Maryland who explained and advocated that policy until General Shryock did so when he was treasurer, from 1896 to 1900, it is very proper for the Sun to enlighten us on that point. Certain it is that the Republican treasurer did so most clearly and forcibly, especially showing that by disposing of the annuity of $90,000 a year by the Northern Central Railway Company on a 3 per cent. basis (which could probably have been obtained at that time) $3,000,000 could be realized and the entire debt of the State paid off. Moreover, by the act of 1896 the board of public works was expressly authorized to sell the fifty-five hundred shares of the Washington Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad" (the sale of which had been prohibited by the act of 1892), the sale of which stock by Governor Warfield and the legislature of 1906 was the sole reason for the reduction of our State tax rate from 23½ cents to 17 cents at the present time. The reason it could not be sold at the time of the passage of the act of 1896 and for several years afterward at a proper price was the impending financial troubles of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and its reorganization under a receivership.

The Sun, in order to minimize the effect of this act of 1896, states that this act was believed to be defective, and it was deemed necessary to pass a new law." Any student of the law would know that this was not the reason for the passage of the act of 1906. The act of 1896 gave the authority to the board of public works to make the sale of this stock when it deemed it expedient. When the legislature itself undertook to deal directly with the sale, authorizing a private sale for $2,000,000, it naturally required a Legislative act to make this direct sale effective, even though theoretically made by the board of public works in order to conform to the Constitution.

As to the payments made by the Republican administration to the sinking fund, the Sun states that the payments were only $250,000 a year. The facts, as stated by Comptroller Goldsborough, are:

"At the close of the fiscal year of 1895 the net debt of the State was $3,005,253.13, while at the close of the fiscal year 1899, September 30, it was $2,597,042.95, and therefore a decrease in four years of $408.210,18, notwithstanding the fact that the legislatures of 1896 and 1898 increased the same $1,200,000, which sum, added to the above amount, will make an actual reduction in four years of $1608,210.18, or a per annum reduction of $402,052.54½.

During the years 1892, 1893, 1894 and 1895 the Democratic officials carried to these funds the sum of $974,282.35. being the actual cash transferred from money collected from State taxes, although a further sum of $248,-333.32 was credited to the funds, being realized from the general government sale of State property and collections on the bond of an ex-State official, and which, therefore, cannot be included in this comparison. While during the years of 1896, 1897, 1898 and 1899 there was carried to the said funds the sum of $1,-139,051, or a gain of $164,769.65. But bear in mind that this increase in favor of the Republican administration has been brought about by a tax rate dedicated to such funds of 2 cents less on each $100; or in other words, the tax rate available under Democratic administration was 7¼ cents, while under Republican administration it was reduced to 5¼ cents, almost a 28 per cent. reduction; the other 2 cents being set aside for the purchase of free school books, and for such books the State has paid during the last four years the sum of $600,000. But had the levy remained the same as during the last four years of Democratic administration, there could and would have been carried in actual cash the same sum of $600,000, which added to the gain of $164,769.65, above mentioned, would make an actual gain or difference of $764,769.65 over Democratic rule of four years."

The increase of the sinking funds since the administration of Governor Lowndes should not have been referred to by the Sun as an argument against the Republican party. That increase is automatic, and is due entirely to the great increase of the taxable basis of the State. This enormous increase in the assessed value of our State is due to two causes—the unparalled prosperity of our country and the new assessment law of 1896. The Republicans of our State can claim some credit for these contributing causes, both nationally and locally.

The Acrobat.

The Democracy of the north has already repudiated Bryan and Bryanism. The south is becoming suspicious. Either the western meteor is losing its dazzling brilliance or the political star gazers are realizing that they have been looking upon a false light.

There is something of humor in the spectacle of political gymnastics presented by the one time idol. Government railroad ownership having been so emphatically repudiated, we have had the theory of "ultimate" ownership, with pronounced regulation in the meantime.

This theory, too, having failed to rally the disintegrating factions, we have had from Mr. Bryan the theory of the initiative and referendum, based upon the apparent success in the cantons of Switzerland. But all except the socialistic element of the party has laughed in the face of the "peerless leader." To-day he stands high and dry on the luna naunt, as one who has climbed to unstable heights of theory and cannot find a way to retrace his steps.

WASHINGTON MAY GO "DRY."

Anti-Saloon League Will Try To Carry Congress By Assault.

A dry Washington looms before the helpless people of the Capitol. The Prohibitionists of the country are girding up their loins for an assault on Congress at the forthcoming session to compel it to enact a statue forbidding the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia.

The girding has been going on for a long time, but the people of Washington have only become aware of the fact within the last ten days. The Prohibitionists are waving the big stick.

A prohibition bill would have been reported from the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic last winter but for the firmness of Speaker Cannon, who also swung the big stick and intimidated the members of that Committee. But now the prohibition folks have things in such sharp that that the Speaker cannot hope to be successful again with such tactics. Their national organization, the Anti-Saloon League, has got things so that it can threaten political death to members whose activity blocks the path of the bill.

The people of Washington have no say on the subject. They can deliver no votes anywhere. Ninety-nine per cent. of the members of the House heretofore have meekly done the bidding of the League because the League has shown in a number of instance sthat it controls the balance of power between the two parties. It converted a Republican majority of 225,000 in Ohio in 1904 to a Democratic majority of 40,000.

There is probably more drinking among the members of the fair sex in Washington than in any other city in the country. The influence of society is all in favor of the drinking, the members of the Diplomatic Corps and the foriegners generally, being of the higher classes, setting the example. The members of the League and the W. C. T. U. have taken note of the fact that resorts in and around Washington where no liquors are sold have died lingering deaths, while resorts where liquor is sold have flourished.

It is believed that President Roosevelt would veto a plain prohibition bill, while he probably would sign an appropriation bill on which there was a prohibtion rider. It is in the form of a rider to an appropriation bill that the matter is likely to come before them.

Representative Craig of Selma, Ala., one of the new class of politicians in that old State, has announced that he will introduce a prohibition bill. Congressmen from the cities are about the only ones who will dare vote against the Craig bill.

STRAW BALLOTS TAFT'S.

Republicans Of Five States, Including Maryland, Want Him.

The Chicago Tribune's secret straw ballot, taken among Republican leaders in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, West Virginia and Delaware, to disclose the consensus of choice for the Presidential nomination, reveals Taft far in the lead, with Knox second and Hughes third.

The vote for President in the five States for the leading candidate is as follows: Cannon, 14; Fairbanks, 20; Hughes, 46; Knox, 141, and Taft, 210.

The renomination of President Roosevelt is favored by 88. Root received 144 votes, La Follette 3, Cortelyou 7, Foraker 4, Elkins of West Virginia 3, Judge Landis 3, Hanly of Indiana 2, Stokes of New Jersey 2, and Gray of Delaware and Griggs of New Jersey one each.

A member of the Republican State Central Committee of Maryland, who says he has no Federal office and wants none writes:

"I favor insisting upon Roosevelt accepting the nomination."

Another Marylander, who says that Taft is his only choice, insists that the people of whom he is one, "want no crawfish successor." But it is the editor of a good Repudlican paper in the same State who declared for Hughes first of all mentioned because he wants as a successor of the President "a man of conservative views, decidedly one without a big stick and less trumpeting."

From Baltimore one Republican member sums up the candidates in the following extraordinary table: "Cannon too old. Fairbanks—ugh! Hughes too new; practically untried. Knox too close to big trusts. Taft or Judge Landis or Taft and Landis."

In a Sailboat

By M. A. Keeler.

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

Shelter Island is a feast for the eyes at all seasons of the year, but in the month of May it is the fairest spot on Long Island; then it is in the first glory of its brilliant verdure, and the soft blue sky above and its blue reflection in the water below presents a picture of such exquisite beauty and repose that few brushes could do it justice on canvas. At Prospect, facing the bay, stands a Queen Anne cottage with many hanging balconies, and standing on the most eerie one are two young women, of the nineteenth century ultra-fashionable type; the smart cut of their cloth frocks suggests Redfern, and their fine bearing and conscious worth the thoroughbred. It is about ten o'clock.

"It's all very lovely and peaceful and serene, Lily," says the younger of the two girls, with a little weary sigh. "But I like it better in August, when the bay is thick with yachts and rowboats; in fact, to be sincere with you, it has about as festive an appearance now as the Desert of Sahara, and I think we were downright daft to leave town so early this season."

"I am really sorry for you, Bertha," replies the other, with an amused look in her fine eyes. "Let us give the 'Pixie' her first sail this season; she will help to liven up the bay for you."

The grieved look in Bertha's eyes gives way to radiant delight at her sister's proposition, and in gay spirits they leave the balcony and are soon on the pier in their white flannel yachting suits and tarpaulin hats of the jaunty sailor cut.

Lilly is the skipper, and Bertha the deck hand—as her sister calls her—her duty aboard ship being to tend the center-board, hold the sheet rope when occasion demands, shift the ballast, and make herself generally useful.

There is scarcely a ripple on the bay, and the half dozen filmy clouds have now lost themselves in the blue ether.

The breeze is steady and gentle; the girls keep up a rattling chatter at first, but the utter peace and quiet seems to have a subdued effect, and soon the only sound heard is that of the water as the "Pixie's" sharp bow softly cuts through it.

They sail on, but it is not long before the sail trembles and the eddy that closes behind the boat is hardly perceptible. "Bertha," says Lily, at last, "we are going to be becalmed; there is scarcely a breath of air." She moistens her forefinger and holds it aloft after the manner of sailors.

"Don't mention anything so monstrous!" cried Bertha, dropping the book she had been reading and now fully alive to the situation. "We shall simply broil standing still in this hot sun. Why, there's Robins Island; cannot we make it before the wind goes altogether?"

"Not unless we row; and even then I am sure you will not care to land there."

"We may as well row to the island, after all," says Lily, presently, looking wistfully at the trees. "There are probably no men there as early as this, and we can rest in the shade until the wind comes up."

So they took the brass-tipped oars and rowed toward the shore. It looks very cool and inviting; occasionally the sweet strains of a bird's song reach the rowers as they paddle through the mirror-like water. It is slow and tiresome work, and after much trouble they effect a passable landing, and climbing the bank they sit exhausted under the spreading bough of a large tree. There is a high and heavy undergrowth behind them toward the interior of the island.

Robins Island is owned by a club of New York men, and is a hunting ground, there being on it fine preserves of quail, etc.

"This is almost an adventure," pants Bertha, as she removes her hat and brushes her damp bang off her forehead.

"Hush!" suddenly cries Bertha, holding up a warning finger to her sister, who sits some distance from her, with her head leaning against the trunk of a tree. She listens intently, turning her head partly on one side like a bird, and then says, in a stage whisper: "Would not it be too unutterably terrible, if there should be any men here, Lily? I am sure I heard something like footsteps way back in the woods."

"Your imagination is too active for comfort, Bertha; if you did hear anything, it was probably a rabbit; these tall bushes are an effective screen for us, even if any genus homo should be abroad, which is unlikely. Now please do not speak to me for ten minutes; I am too tired to even think;" she closes her eyes and Bertha creeps over to her and rests her head in her lap.

There is a crashing in the bushes not far from the girls, who have been rudely startled from their short nap, and they look with blanched faces in the direction of the sound. Then a deep voice suddenly calls out:

"Hello! Effingham; oh, I say, come here!"

There is another crash in the bushes, then another voice exclaims in tones of astonishment:

"By Jove! it's the 'Pixie;' it must have drifted down. It belongs to the Berkley girls, you know; they have a place at Shelter island; tip-top, swagger people; but how in the name of all that's—why, it's anchored!" he concludes, with a long whistle, and starts down the bank on a run to the boat.

At the sound of the first voice the girls had seemed paralyzed, and could only stare hopelessly at each other.

At this instant there is a sharp report and the shot rattles through the bushes like hail. Without a cry Lily sinks to the ground and Bertha lies at her side in a dead faint.

A tall, broad-shouldered, florid-faced young man dashes through the underbrush with an eager, huntsman-like look on his handsome face, but his expression changes in a flash to one of horror when he sees the kind of game he has brought down. He takes in the situation at a glance, and with a now ashen face he rushes down the embankment.

"Effingham!" he calls, in a husky voice, as he nears the boat. "The Berkleys," he stops short and chokes.

"For heaven's sake, my lord, what has happened? You are shaking like a leaf."

"The Berkleys; your friend, Effingham. God help me! I have killed them both!"

He buried his face in his hands, while Mr. Effingham gazes in bewilderment at the Pixie and then at him.

"You see," he continued, raising his head, "they were on the other side of the brush; I heard a rustling, thought it a rabbit, you know, and—fired. When I saw what I had done I lost my head. I never was so knocked out before in my life; instead of waiting to see what damage I had caused I rushed to you; but they are badly hit; they got the whole charge at short range."

Look with Blanched Faces in the Direction of the Sound.

"They may not be dead; cheer up, the first thing to do is to go back and see. Get some water in your hat."

Bertha had recovered consciousness, and as the two men dash up the bank she is sobbing over Lily's prostrate form.

It will take the doctor many hours to pick the shot out of Bertha's shoulder, but she does not heed the sting and smart; her agony at Lily's badly wounded hand and wrist makes her oblivious to her own pain. The shot, fortunately, did not touch either of the girls' faces, but it will be many weeks before Lily can again sail the Pixey.

When Bertha sees Mr. Effingham she jumps up and runs to him, trying hysterically to explain their presence on the island.

Lord Bertie Dudley kneels beside the unconscious Lily, and with trembling hand nervously spatters her sweet face with salt water. He binds her wrist with his handkerchief, he is deft and gentle, and it is pathetic to watch his quivering lip and the great effort he puts forth to appear calm.

"I feel as if I could shoot myself for this, Effingham," he says, bitterly, when Lily has been taken to the boat and made as comfortable as possible.

The south wind has sprung up, and the Pixie is once more under sail, but Mr. Effingham is the skipper, and Bertha supports Lily's drooping head on her shoulder. Poor Lord Dudley watches the boat out of sight from the shore, and then flings his gun as far out into Peconic bay as his strong arm can send it. With downcast head he walks moodily back to the club house.

About three weeks after the foregoing episode there are half a dozen or so people sitting on the veranda of the Berkley cottage at Shelter island. Among them are Lord Bertie Dudley and Mr. Effingham, and Lily is as beautiful and dainty as ever; to be sure her wrist is still bandaged.

It is now two months later, and the bay is as thick with yachts and rowboats as Bertha likes to see it, and Lord Bertie Dudley's steam yacht is a fixture in the inlet between Manhansett and Prospect. Lily has lately promised to be Lady Dudley in October, and they are going to England on his yacht.

She has told Bertha many times that she had a presentiment when she stepped on board the Pixie that fate had something in store for her on that May morning.

Perhaps in time the Koreans will feel as grateful to Japan as the Cubans and the Filipinos do to the United States.

CHAPTER XII.

Under Orders.

It was no pleasant assignment to duty which greeted First Lieut. Donald Brant, commanding Troop N, Seventh cavalry, when that regiment came once more within the environs of civilization, from its summer exercises in the field. Bethune had developed into a somewhat important post, socially as well as from a strictly military standpoint, and numerous, indeed, were the attractions offered there to any young officer whose duty called him to serve the colors on those bleak Dakota prairies. Brant frowned at the innocent words, reading them over again with gloomy eyes and an exclamation of unmitigated disgust, yet there was no escaping their plain meaning. Trouble was undoubtedly brewing among the Sioux, trouble in which the Cheyennes, and probably others also, were becoming involved Every soldier patroling that long northern border recognized the approach of some dire development, some early coup of savagery.

"You Must Be an Odd Sort of a Girl," He Commented, Soberly.

Brant was not blind to all this, nor to the necessity of having in readiness selected bodies of seasoned troops, yet it was not in soldier nature to refrain from grumbling when the earliest detail chanced to fall to him. But orders were orders in that country, and although he crushed the innocent paper passionately beneath his heel, five hours later he was in saddle, riding steadily westward, his depleted troop of horsemen clattering at his heels.

Up the valley of the Bear Water, slightly above Glencaid,—far enough beyond the saloon radius to protect his men from possible corruption, yet within easy reach of the military telegraph,—they made camp in the early morning upon a wooded terrace overlooking the stage road, and settled quietly down as one of those numerous posts with which the army chiefs sought to hem in the dissatisfied redmen, and learn early the extent of their hostile plans.

Brant was now in a humor considerably happier than when he first rode forth from Bethune. He watched the men of his troop while with quip and song they made comfortable camp, and then strolled slowly up the valley, his own affairs soon completely forgotten in the beauty of near-by hills beneath the golden glory of the morning sun. Once he paused and looked back upon ugly Glencaid, dingy and forlorn even at that distance; then he crossed the narrow stream by means of a convenient log, and clambered up the somewhat steep bank. A heavy fringe of low bushes clung close along the edge of the summit, but a plainly defined path led among their intricacies. He pressed his way through, coming into a glade where sunshine flickered through the overarching branches of great trees, and the grass was green and short, like that of a well-kept lawn.

As Brant emerged from the underbrush he suddenly beheld a fair vision of young womanhood resting on the grassy bank just before him. She was partially reclining, as if startled by his unannounced approach, her face turned toward him, one hand grasping an open book, the other shading her eyes from the glare of the sun. Something in the graceful poise, the piquant, uplifted face, the dark gloss of heavy hair, and the unfrightened gaze held him speechless until the picture had been impressed forever upon his memory. He beheld a girl on the verge of womanhood, fair of skin, the red glow of health flushing her cheeks, the lips parted in surprise, the sleeve fallen back from one white, rounded arm, the eyes honest, sincere, mysterious. She recognized him with a glance, and her lips closed as she remembered how and when they had met before. But there was no answering recollection within his eyes, only admiration—nothing clung about this Naida to remind him of a neglected waif of the garrison. She read all this in his face, and the lines about her mouth changed quickly into a slightly quizzical smile, her eyes brightening

"You should at least have knocked, sir," she ventured, sitting up on the grassy bank, the better to confront him, "before intruding thus uninvited."

He lifted his somewhat dingy scouting hat and bowed humbly.

"I perceived no door giving warning that I approached such presence, and the first shock of surprise was perhaps as great to me as to you. Yet, now that I have blundered thus far, I beseech that I be permitted to venture upon yet another step."

She sat looking at him, a trim, soldierly figure, his face young and pleasant to gaze upon, and her dark eyes sensibly softened.

"What step?"

"To tarry for a moment beside the divinity of this wilderness."

She laughed with open frankness, her white teeth sparkling behind the red, parted lips.

"Perhaps you may, if you will first consent to be sensible," she said, with returning gravity; "and I reserve the right to turn you away whenever you begin to talk or act foolish. If you accept these conditions, you may sit down."

He seated himself upon the soft grass ledge, retaining the hat in his hands. "You must be an odd sort of a girl," he commented, soberly, "not to welcome an honest expression of admiration."

"Oh, was that it? Then I duly bow my acknowledgment. I took your words for one of those silly compliments by which men believe they honor women. I am not a baby, nor am I seeking amusement."

He glanced curiously at her book. "And yet you condescend to read love stories," he said, smiling. "I expected to discover a treatise on philosophy."

"I read whatever I chance to get my hands on, here in Glencaid," she retorted, "just as I converse with whoever comes along. I am hopeful of some day discovering a rare gem hidden in the midst of the trash. I am yet young."

"You are indeed young," he said, quietly, "and with some of life's lessons still to learn. One is that frankness is not necessarily flippancy, nor honesty harshness. However, if you will offer me a topic worthy the occasion, in either philosophy, science, or literature, I will endeavor to feed your mind."

She uplifted her innocent eyes demurely to his face. "You are so kind. I am deeply interested just now in the Japanese conception of the transmigration of souls."

"How extremely fortunate! It chances to be my favorite theme, but my mental processes are peculiar, and you must permit me to work up toward it somewhat gradually. For instance, as a question leading that way, how, in the incarnation of this world, do you manage to exist in such a hole of a place?—that is, provided you really reside here."

"Why, I consider this a most delightful nook."

"My reference was to Glencaid."

"Oh! Why, I live from within, not without. Mind and heart, not environment, make life, and my time is occupied most congenially. I am being faithfully nutured on the Presbyterian catechism, and also trained in the graces of earthly society. These alternate, thus preparing me for whatever may happen in this world or the next."

His face pictured bewilderment, but also a determination to persevere. "An interesting combination, I admit. But from your appearance this cannot always have been your home?"

"Oh, thank you. I believe not always; but I wonder at your being able to discern my superiority to these surroundings. And do you know your questioning is becoming quite personal? Does that yield me an equal privilege?"

He bowed, perhaps relieved at thus permitting her to assume the initiative, and rested lazily back upon the grass, his eyes intently studying her face.

"I suppose from your clothes you must be a soldier. What is that figure 7 on your hat for?"

"The number of my regiment, the Seventh cavalry."

Her glance was a bit disdainful as she coolly surveyed him from head to foot. "I should imagine that a strong, capable appearing fellow like you might do much better than that. There is so much work in the world worth doing, and so much better pay."

"What do you mean? Isn't a soldier's life a worthy one?"

"Oh, yes, of course, in a way. We have to have soldiers, I suppose; but if I were a man I'd hate to waste all my life tramping around at $16 a month."

He smothered what sounded like a rough ejaculation, gazing into her demure eyes as if he strongly suspected a joke hid in their depths. "Do—do you mistake me for an enlisted man?"

"Oh, I didn't know; you said you were a soldier, and that's what I always heard they got. I am so glad if they give you more. I was only going to say that I believed I could get you a good place in McCarthy's store if you wanted it. He pays $65 and his clerk has just left."

Brant stared at her with open mouth, totally unable for the moment to decide whether or not that innocent, sympathetic face masked mischief. Before he succeeded in regaining confidence and speech, she had risen to her feet, holding back her skirt with one hand.

"Really, I must go," she announced calmly, drawing back toward the slight opening between the bushes. "No doubt you have done fully as well as you could, considering your position in life; but this has proved another disappointment. You have fallen, far, very far, below my ideal. Good-by."

He sprang instantly erect, his cheeks flushed. "Please don't go without a further word. We seem predestined to misunderstand. I am even willing to confess myself a fool in the hope of some time being able to convince you otherwise. You have not even told me that you live here; nor do I know your name."

She shook her head positively, repressed merriment darkening her eyes and wrinkling the corners of her mouth. "It would be highly improper to introduce myself to a stranger—we Presbyterians never do that."

"But do you feel no curiosity as to who I may be?"

"Why, not in the least; the thought is ridiculous. How very conceited you must be to imagine such a thing!"

He was not a man easily daunted, nor did he recall any previous embarrassment in the presence of a young woman. But now he confronted something utterly unique; those quiet eyes seemed to look straight through him. His voice faltered sadly, yet succeeded in asking: "Are we, then, never to meet again? Am I to understand this to be your wish?"

She laughed. "Really, sir, I am not aware that I have the slightest desire in the matter. I have given it no thought, but I presume the possibility of our meeting again depends largely upon yourself, and the sort of society you keep. Surely you cannot expect that I would seek such an opportunity?"

He bowed humbly. "You mistake my purpose. I merely meant to ask if there was not some possibility of our again coming together socially—in the presence of mutual friends."

"Oh, I scarcely think so; I do not remember ever having met any soldiers at the social functions here—excepting officers. We are extremely exclusive in Glencaid," she dropped him a mocking courtesy, "and I have always moved in the most exclusive set."

Piqued by her tantalizing manner, he asked, "What particular social functions are about to occur that may possibly open a passage into your guarded presence?"

She seemed immersed in thought, her face turned partially aside. "Unfortunately, I have not my list of engagements here," and she glanced about at him shyly. "I can recall only one at present, and I am not even certain—that is, I do not promise—to attend that. However, I may do so. The Miners' Bachelor club gives a reception and ball to-morrow evening in honor of the new schoolmistress."

"What is her name?" with responsive eagerness.

She hesitated, as if doubtful of the strict propriety of mentioning it to a stranger.

"Miss Phoebe Spencer," she said, her eyes cast demurely down.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, in open triumph; "and have I, then, at last made fair capture of your secret? You are Miss Phoebe Spencer."

She drew back still farther within the recesses of the bushes, at his single victorious step forward.

"I? Why certainly not. I am merely Miss Spencer's 'star' pupil, so you may easily judge something of what her superior attainments must necessarily be. But I am really going now, and I sincerely trust you will be able to secure a ticket for to-morrow night; for if you once meet this Miss Spencer you will never yield another single thought to me, Mr.—Mr.—" her eyes dancing with laughter—"First Lieut. Donald Brant."

CHAPTER XIII.

Silent Murphy.

Brant sprang forward, all doubt regarding this young woman instantly dissipated by those final words of mischievous mockery. She had been playing with him as unconcernedly as if he were a mere toy sent for her amusement and his pride was stung.

But pursuit proved useless. Like a phantom she had slipped away amid the underbrush, leaving him to flounder blindly in the labyrinth. His incautious foot slipped along the steep edge of the shelving bank, and he went down, half stumbling, half sliding, until he came to a sudden pause on the brink of the little stream. The chase was ended, and he sat up, confused for the moment, and half questioning the evidence of his own eyes.

A small tent, dirty and patched, stood with its back against the slope of earth down which he had plunged. Its flap flung aside revealed within a pile of disarranged blankets, together with some scattered articles of wearing apparel, while just before the opening, his back pressed against the supporting pole, an inverted pipe between his yellow, irregular teeth, sat a hideous looking man. He was a withered, dried-up fellow, whose age was not to be guessed, having a skin as yellow as parchment, drawn in tight to the bones like that of a mummy, his eyes deep sunken like wells, and his head totally devoid of hair, although about his lean throat there was a copious fringe of iron-gray beard, untrimmed and scraggy. Down the entire side of one cheek ran a livid scar, while his nose was turned awry.

He sat staring at the newcomer, unwinking, his facial expression devoid of interest, but his fingers opening and closing in apparent nervousness. Twice his lips opened, but nothing except a peculiar gurgle sound issued from the throat, and Brant, who by this time had attained his feet and his self-possession, ventured to address him.

"Nice quiet spot for a camp," he remarked, pleasantly, "but a bad place for a tumble."

The sunken eyes expressed nothing, but the throat gurgled again painfully and finally the parted lips dropped a detached word or two. "Blame—pretty girl—that."

The lieutenant wondered how much of their conversation this old mummy had overheard, but he hesitated to question him. One inquiry, however, sprang to his surprised lips. "Do you know her?"

"Damn sight—better—than any one around here—know her—real name."

Brant stared incredulously. "Do you mean to insinuate that that young woman is living in this community under an assumed one? Why, she is scarcely more than a child! What do you mean, man?"

The soldier's hat still rested on the grass where it had fallen, its military insignia hidden.

"I guess—I know—what I—know," the fellow muttered. "What's—your—regiment?"

"Seventh cavalry."

The man stiffened up as if an electric shock had swept through his limp frame. "The hell!—and—did—she—call you—Brant?"

The young officer's face exhibited his disgust. Beyond doubt that sequestered nook was a favorite lounging spot for the girl, and this disreputable creature had been watching her for some sinister purpose.

"So you have been eavesdropping, have you?" said Brant, gravely. "And now you want to try a turn at defaming a woman? Well, you have come to a poor market for the sale of such goods. I am half inclined to throw you bodily into the creek. I believe you are nothing but a common liar, but I'll give you one chance—you say you know her real name. What is it?"

The eyes of the mummy had become spiteful. "It's—none of—your damn—business. I'm—not under—your orders."

"Under my orders! Of course not; but what do you mean by that? Who and what are you?"

The fellow stood up, slightly humpbacked but broad of shoulder, his arms long, his legs short and somewhat bowed, his chin protruding impudently, and Brant noticed an oddly shaped black scar, as if burned there by powder, on the back of his right hand.

"Who—am I?" he said, angrily. "I'm—Silent—Murphy."

An expression of bewilderment swept across the lieutenant's face. "Silent Murphy! Do you claim to be Custer's scout?"

The fellow nodded. "Heard—of me—maybe?"

Brant stood staring at him, his mind occupied with vague garrison rumors

"It's—None of—Your Damn—Business. I'm—Not Under—Your Orders."

connected with this odd personality. The name had long been a familiar one, and he had often had the man pictured out before him. There could remain no reasonable doubt of his identity, but what was he doing there?

"Yes, I've heard of you,"—and his crisp tone instinctively became that of terse military command,—"although we have never met, for I have been upon detached service ever since my assignment to the regiment. I have a troop in camp below," he pointed down the stream, "and am in command here."

The scout nodded carelessly.

"Why did you not come down there and report your presence in this neighborhood to me?"

Murphy grinned unpleasantly. "Rather be—alone—no report—been over—Black Range—telegraphed—wait orders."

"Do you mean you are in direct communication with headquarters, with Custer?"

The man answered, with a wide sweep of his long arm toward the northwest. "Goin' to—be hell—out there—damn soon."

"How? Are things developing into a truly serious affair—a real campaign?"

"Every buck—in the—Sioux nation—is makin'—fer the—bad lands," and he laughed noiselessly, his nervous fingers gesticulating. "—guess that—means—business."

Brant hesitated. Should he attempt to learn more about the young girl? Instinctively he appreciated the futility of endeavoring to extract information from Murphy, and he experienced a degree of shame at thus seeking to penetrate her secret. He glanced about, seeking some way of recrossing the stream.

"If you require any new equipment," he said tersely, "we can probably supply you at the camp. How do you manage to get across here?"

Murphy, walking stiffly, led the way down the steep slope, and silently pointed out a log bridging the narrow stream. He stood watching while the officer picked his steps across, but made no responsive motion when the other waved his hand from the opposite shore, his sallow face looking grim and unpleasant.

The young officer marched down the road, his mind busied with the peculiar happenings of the morning, and that prospect for early active service hinted at in the brief utterances of the old scout. Brant was a thorough soldier, born into the service and deeply enamored of its dangers; yet beyond this he remained a man, a young man, swayed by those emotions which when at full tide sweep aside all else appertaining to life.

His had been a lonely life since leaving West Point and joining his regiment—a life passed largely among rough men and upon the desolate plains. For months at a time he had known nothing of refinement, nor enjoyed social intercourse with the opposite sex. Yet, beneath his mask of impassibility, the heart continued to beat with fierce desire, biding the time when it should enjoy its own sweet way. Perhaps that hour had already dawned; certainly something new, something inspiring, had now come to awaken an interest unfelt before, and leave him idly dreaming of shadowed eyes and flushed, rounded cheeks.

He was in this mood when he overtook the Rev. Howard Wynkoop and marked the thoughtful look upon his pale face.

"I called at your camp," explained Wynkoop, after the first words of greeting had been exchanged, "as soon as I learned you were here in command, but only to discover your absence. The sergeant, however, was very courteous, and assured me there would be no difficulty in arranging a religious service for the men, unless sudden orders should arrive. No doubt I may rely on your cooperation."

"Most certainly," was the cordial response, "and I shall also permit those desiring to attend your regular Sunday services so long as we are stationed here. How is your work prospering?"

"There is much to encourage me, but spiritual progress is slow, and there are times when my faith falters and I feel unworthy of the service in which I am engaged."

"A mining camp is so intensely material seven days of the week that it must present a difficult field for the awakening of any religious sentiment," confessed Brant sympathetically. "I have often wondered how you consented to bury your talents in such a place."

The other smiled, but with a trace of sadness in his eyes. "I firmly believe that every minister should devote a portion of his life to the doing of such a work as this. It is both a religious and a patriotic duty, and there is a rare joy connected with it."

"Yet it was surely not joy I saw pictured within your face when we met; you were certainly troubled over some problem."

Wynkoop glanced up quickly, a slight flush rising in his pale cheeks. "Perplexing questions which must be decided off-hand are constantly arising. And just now I scarcely know what action to take regarding certain applications for church membership."

Brant laughed. "I hardly consider myself a competent adviser in matters of church policy," he admitted, "yet I have always been informed that all so desiring are to be made welcome in religious fellowship."

"Theoretically, yes." And the minister stopped still in the road, facing his companion. "But this special case presents certain peculiarities. The applicants, as I learn from others, are not leading lives above reproach. So far as I know, they have never even attended church service until last Sunday, and I have some reason to suspect an ulterior motive. I am anxious to put nothing in the way of any honestly seeking soul, yet I confess that in these cases I hesitate."

"But your elders? Do not they share the responsibility of passing upon such applications?"

The flush on Mr. Wynkoop's cheeks deepened, and his eyes fell. "Ordinarily, yes; but in this case I fear they may prove unduly harsh. I—I feel—that these applications came through the special intercession of a certain young lady, and I am anxious not to hurt her feelings in any way, or to discourage her enthusiasm."

"Oh, I see! Would you mind telling me the names of the two gentlemen?"

"Mr. John Moffat and Mr. William McNeil. Unfortunately, I know neither personally."

"And the young lady?"

"A Miss Phoebe Spencer; she has but lately arrived from the east to take charge of our new school—a most interesting and charming young woman, and she is proving of great assistance to me in church work."

The lieutenant cleared his throat and emitted a sigh of suddenly awakened memory. "I fear I can offer you no advice, for if, as I begin to suspect,—though she sought most bravely to avoid the issue and dispatch me upon a false trail,—she prove to be that same fascinating young person I met this morning, my entire sympathies are with the gentlemen concerned. I might even be strongly tempted to do likewise at her solicitation."

"You? Why, you arrived only this morning, and do you mean to say you have met already?"

"I at least suspect as much, for there can scarcely exist two in this town who will fill the description. My memory holds the vision of a fair young face, vivacious, ever changing in its expression, yet constantly both piquant and innocent; a perfect wealth of hair, a pair of serious eyes hiding mysteries within their depths, and lips which seem made to kiss. Tell me, is not this a fairly drawn portrait of your Miss Spencer?"

The minister gripped his hands nervously together. "Your description is not unjust; indeed, it is quite accurate from a mere outer point of view, yet beneath her vivacious manner I have found her thoughtful, and possessed of deep spiritual yearnings. In the east she was a communicant of the Episcopal church."

Brant did not answer him at once. He was studying the minister's downcast face; but when the latter finally turned to depart, he inquired, "Do you expect to attend the reception to-morrow evening?"

Wynkoop stammered slightly. "I—I could hardly refuse under the circumstances; the committee sent me an especially urgent invitation, and I understand there is to be no dancing until late. One cannot be too straightlaced out here."

"Oh, never mind apologizing. I see no reason why you need hesitate to attend. I merely wondered if you could procure me an invitation."

"Did she tell you about it?"

"Well, she delicately hinted at it, and, you know, things are pretty slow here in a social way. She merely suggested that I might possibly meet her again there."

"Of course; it is given in her honor."

"So I understood, although she sought to deceive me into the belief that she was not the lady. We met purely by accident, you understand, and I am desirous of a more formal presentation."

The minister drew in his breath sharply, but the clasp of his extended hand was not devoid of warmth. "I will have a card of invitation sent you at the camp. The committee will be very glad of your presence; only I warn you frankly regarding the lady, that competition will be strong."

"Oh, so far as that is concerned I have not yet entered the running," laughed Brant, in affected carelessness, "although I must confess my sporting proclivities are somewhat aroused."

He watched the minister walking rapidly away, a short, erect figure, appearing slender in his severely cut black cloth. "Poor little chap," he muttered, regretfully. "He's hard hit. Still, they say all's fair in love and war."

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. Among them is a stranger who introduces himself by the name of Hampton, also Gillis, the post trader, and his daughter. Gillis and a majority of the soldiers are killed during a three days' siege.

CHAPTER II.—Hampton offers assistance to the girl, and is at first spurned because he is known as a gambler.

CHAPTER III.—Hampton and the girl only escape from the Indians. They fall exhausted on the plains.

CHAPTER IV.—A company of the Seventh cavalry, Lieut. Brant in command, find Hampton and the girl on the plains, and restore them to consciousness. Hampton announces that he proposes to care for the girl.

CHAPTER V.—Hampton and the girl stop at the Miners' Home in Glencaid, Mrs. Duffy, proprietess. Rev. Howard Wynkoop proposes that Hampton place Miss Gillis in care of Mrs. Herndon. He consents to think it over.

CHAPTER VI.—Hampton talks the future over with Miss Gillis—the Kid. She shows him her mother's picture and tells him what she can of her parentage and life. They decide she shall live with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VII.—The Kid takes up her residence with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VIII.—Naida—the Kid—runs away from Mrs. Herndon's and rejoins Hampton. He induces her to go back, and to have nothing more to do with him.

CHAPTER IX.—Hampton plays his last game of cards. He announces to Red Slavin that he has quit, and then leaves Glencaid.

CHAPTER X.—Miss Phoebe Spencer arrives in Glencaid to teach its first school.

CHAPTER XI.—Miss Spencer meets Naida, Rev. Wynkoop, etc. She boards at Mrs. Herndon's.

THE USE OF WHISKY AT ELECTIONS

The proposed anti-bribery compact between the committees of the two parties in Frederick county is not only to prevent vote buying with money, but to prohibit the use of liquor near the polls or elsewhere on election day; and we believe the same promise is embodied in the anti-bribery compacts already made in other counties. This feature of the agreement is one that is especially commended by the moral sense of the people. In point of fact, the use of liquor on election day is one of the worst and most demoralizing forms of political corruption in the State and has largely nullified one of the wisest and most salutary laws on the statute books. In former years election day was a time of riot and lawlessness, when timid people and women usually kept to their homes. The disorders and election riots were in almost every instance traced directly to the excessive use of liquor. On the very day when it was most important that the judgment of men should be clear and that the public peace should be most completely preserved many persons gave orders to serve whisky free to all comers, and it was a time of unbridled license. In consequence of these disorders the law was enacted prohibiting the sale of liquor and requiring every saloon in the State to close its doors on election day. That is one of the most beneficent of all the laws safeguarding the elections and the free expression of the popular will. The practice of serving free whisky in the vicinity of the polls largely nullifies that excellent law, and it is condemned by every principal and consideration of public decency, as well as being repugnant to the law of the State. The section of the Code, Section 29 of Article 27, imposes fine and imprisonment as the penalty. The fine may be as high as $500 and the imprisonment as long as six months. In many of the election districts in this State a jug of whisky has been considered an essential item of the election equipment. Why it has been so considered is not easy to tell, for it is inconceivable that a vote was ever gained by so cheap and mean a bribe as a drink of whisky. Years ago, "in the good old time," the practice of "cooping" voters was occasionally practiced. This was to ply voters of the opposite party with whisky on the night before election, get them drunk and then lock them in a remote room until the election was over. The law against the sale by liquor dealers of intoxicants on election day also makes it a crime for dealers to give it away on that day.

Dr. Charles W. Conley, the chairman of the Democratic committee of Frederick, in discussing the anti-bribery compact which is proposed in that county, speaks most earnestly against the use of whisky at the polling places. "There is a law against the practice," he says, "but for some reason it is not enforced. I think that every candidate should be pledged not to buy liquor at saloons prior to the election for distribution to those who may ask for it. This practice is in vogue, as is well known, and it should be stopped." It certainly should be stopped. There is no day in the year when it is more important for citizens to be sober and orderly, with clear judgment, so that they can use their ballots with discrimination and to honest and conscientious purpose. Let the good work of purifying the elections go on. This year, we believe, has seen a greater advance in that direction in this State than ever before. A few more years of honest and persistent effort by the advocates of pure elections and a public sentiment will be established which will not tolerate vote buying or the employment of whisky at elections.

THE CUMBERLAND LYNCHING.

There have been few lynchings in the State for which there appeared less excuse than that in Cumberland on Saturday night, a lynching which, from all accounts, would not have occurred had not the police been derelict in their duty. There was no chance that the murderer might fail to pay the penalty of his crime if the law had been allowed to take its course, and the crime, wanton and horrible as it was, was not such as to drive men to frenzy, as is sometimes the case, explaining—if it does not excuse—their taking the law into their own hands. But, brutal as was the lynching, wonder at it is almost lost in surprise at the scenes enacted in Cumberland Sunday, when, we are told, the remains of the negro were viewed by 10,000 people, Sunday-school children among them. The whole thing—the disregard of and contempt for the law, the morbid curiosity of thousands of people gathering around the corpse of the dead man, the apparent indifference of all but a few in the community to the disgrace of such scenes—is a serious reflection upon the city of Cumberland. The least it can do is to make every effort to punish the mob leaders for such defiance of the law.

JONAH.

It is remarkable—or perhaps it is not at all remarkable, but is merely the most natural thing in the world—the way some crank religionists repudiate the'r followers or their fellows who happen to come to grief through the practice of their creeds.

Somebody starts a "Church" on the comforting creed that it is impossible for anybody to drown. For a time its members, assembled on dry land, exultingly proclaim that not one of them was ever drowned or is in danger of drowning. But some day the devoutest deacon in the Church drops his baby overboard from a boat, confident in the impossibility of its drowning. The baby sinks like a stone, and is fished out dead, and the deacon is in trouble about it. Whereupon the whole "Church" rises and chants in unison, "Oh, no; he never was one of us!"

Somebody else starts a "Church" on the theory that every sick person is possessed of devils, and that the devils are to be cast out by the manual process—to wit, mauling and hauling and contorting the patient, until the devils, through sheer discomfort, are driven to seek a more quiet and peaceful abode. Some day some zealous believers in this athletic creed apply their faith to a patient, whom they manhandle until life is extinct. Of course they are thereupon in trouble. And, of course, the Great Panjandrum of their creed tumbles over himself in haste to declare that he never taught nor meant any such thing, and that they are schismatics and heretics.

We had always supposed that one of the glories of true religion was that its professors bore one another's burdens and stood loyally by each other in evil as well as in good report. But maybe some of these Holy Hoppers and Pious Pecksniffians have improved upon those old-fashioned notions

Everybody Invited to Be Present.

THE PRESS AGENT.

The genial and accommodating individual who looks after the publicity campaign of a candidate for office is often overworked and undoubtedly underpaid for the great amount of labor performed and sacrifice undergone. He has to be a man of one idea. The sun, moon, stars and satellites all revolve around his hero. He must keep track of his every movement, record his sayings, turn his studidity into humor, make up for his various shortcomings and constantly be inventing something new to parade before the public to the advantage of his man. Notwithstanding all his handicaps and drawbacks, however, the press agent is very useful to the candidate who wants to make his name a household word. The people as a rule know nothing of the work of press agents as such and taking everything they see in the papers as more or less authentic. A dope story is about as likely to be believed as any other. The dope letter is written expressly for the band wagon crowd. Were it not for that weakness in human nature the paid dope writer would very soon be out of a job, but people keep such close tab on every move in order to get on the side of the winner that they play to the press agent for his man may win and leave them outside the breastworks. While editors as a rule know that a press agent story is only froth it is usually interesting and entertaining and helps to make the paper readable, hence it is usually accepted and published. The dope writer will probably have a job as long as humanity remains as it is under the present dispensation.

BLOOMINGTON.

Rev. D. D. J. Collins, pastor of the South Cumberland M. E. church, South, in the absence of Presiding Elder Wolf, who is unable to fill his appointment at the present time, on account of sickness in his family, presided at the Quarterly Conference at Bethel church, near Barnum, on last Sunday morning. In the afternoon he preached in the Barnum church. Both services were interesting and well attended.

The wedding services of Mr. George Clyner Macfarlane, Superintendent of the Monroe Coal Mining Co., of Barnum and of the Dodson Coal Co., of Dodson, and Miss Mamie Gerstell, oldest daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Richard Gerstell, will take place at the Bellevue-Stratford hotel, Philadelphia, next Saturday evening at 6 o'clock.

Mr. Stewart Paugh, of North Glade, was in town Sunday. He reports heavy frosts in his vicinity and all kinds of vegetation destroyed.

Mr. Daniel Raley, the well known ball player, who purchased property in Blaine or Kitzmillersville a few months ago, moved his family to his new home on last Monday.

Mr. Washington Barnard, of Chestnut Grove, has abandoned farming for the winter and moved to town occupying a house with his family on Main street.

Mrs. Ollie Livenston, is visiting the family of her brother, Mr. Lock Laviller of Beryl.

Ex-State Senator Palmer was in town on business during the past week.

Magistrate Fazenbaker, of this district, sold at public auction on last Saturday afternoon, the effects of Joseph Harris, the man who was so mysteriously murdered on the 4th of July last.

Mr. Henry Conrad, of near Barnum is erecting a dwelling on the five acre tract of land recently purchased from Mr. Jackson Paugh.

Mr. William Moody, a well known business man of our town, will leave for Baltimore on Sunday next to attend the festivities of Home Coming week. Mr. Moody is a native of the city and was a prominent character in its political and business history back in the sixties.

A festival is in progress in the Junior Hall under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid society of the M. E. church. The proceeds are for the benefit of parsonage improvements.

Mr. Robert Grant, formerly boss miner at the Buxton mines, recently promoted to be Superintendent of the Elk Garden collieries of the Davis Coal & Coke Co., was a visitor to friends and relatives at Beryl and Franklin on Sunday.

Miss Mary Bond, daughter of Mr. James Bond, of Brockleyville, Pa., is a guest of her uncle, Mr. N. U. Bond, of Bond.

Mr. John Tompson, aged about 60 years, one of the best known miners in this region, died at his home near Franklin on last Monday evening at nine o'clock. Mr. Tompson, had about recovered from an attack of typhoid fever when he was seized with a severe case of cholera morbus and died from exhaustion in a short time. His funeral took place from his home Wednesday morning. His remains were taken to Cross for burial. He leaves a widow, two married daughters living in Piedmont and four children at home, three of whom are recovering from typhoid fever.

Miss Mary Mullen, daughter of Mr. Charles Mullen, leaves for Baltimore this week to enjoy the festivities of of Home Coming Week.

Mr Leroy Barnard, son of Wm. J. Barnard of Chestnut Grove, who was taken to the Hoffman hospital about three weeks ago for a special treatment was brought home last week, with conditions very little improved. Mr. Barnard was caught under a fall of slate on the 13th day of last July while at work in the Barnum 4-foot and sustained injuries to the spine, which has resisted treatment. He is paralyzed from the hip downward and goes around in an invalid chair.

Mr. Samuel Bartlett, of South Cumberland, a well knowm freight conductor was called to town on account of the death of his brother-in-law Mr. Thos Conelly, returned home Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. Oss, of Stucker, have a smile for every body. It is a boy.

Snap shots of the Republican Convention at Oakland.

Two of the best looking men in the "Meeting:" Delegate Chapelle and Sec'y Finzell. After an absence of a few years A. F. George appears again in the political lime light.

Charley Hillery couldn't muster a caucus in the forenoon.

Jacob Myers, of Friendsville enjoys the unusal distinction of having been nominated for an office after his own district had gone against him in the primary.

District No. 4 got the bumps and there were others.

Delegate Price said the hard luck attending his district was due to the unlucky No. 13. His district is No. 13; only 13 at the primary; Chappell had 13 districts against him, and Judge Wilson has filled the office of Judge of the Orphans' Court for 13 years.

Consumption is less deadly than it used to be.

A VISIT TO FAIRFAX STONE.

Correspondent of the Keyser Tribune Gives a Description of Historic Spot.

On Saturday morning, Sept. 21st, the writer in company with Jim and Will Roderick boarded train No. 1, at Schell and at 11:15 disembarked at Fairfax station. From here we walked about one half mile across the hill in a N. W. direction to the Fairfax Stone. After eating our lunch and drinking from the head of the water supply of our National Capital, we commenced to take notes. Now as this is quite a historic place a minute description of the same may be interesting to many of the readers of this paper. We now find ourselves at an altitude of 3,560 feet, from whence the mighty Potomac rolls down to the sea. This spring is not at all head of a ravine as might naturally be supposed, but is on the side of the hill about 200 yards from the top where the hill (the watershed of the Alleghanies) slopes toward the northwest at a grade of about three degrees. At the head of a strip of ground slightly lower than the surrounding land, the spring flows from under a bank about two feet high. There are two streams about 15 feet apart and flow together at a distance of 85 feet below, and from there flows northwest gradually circling towards the north and east. We have often been told that either of these streams would flow through an inch pipe, when we were there either of them would have flown through a pipe the size of a common lead pencil. Betwixt those two springs and directly north of the most westerly one stands the "Fairfax Stone." There are two rocks placed side by side which form a foundation about two feet square. These rocks have been roughly dressed with a hammer and placed so as to extend about eight inches above the surface of the ground, upon this is placed a cut stone just two feet square and eighteen inches deep and coped off on the top to a square of thirteen inches. There has been another stone or shaft placed upon this but has been destroyed.

All four sides of this stone have cut on it the letters F. H., and one place is covered with an inscription but time has so obliterated it that we could read nothing but a date, "April 174—" the fourth figure was either 3, 5, or 8. These rocks have been brought from the top of the hill some distance back as there are no rocks of this kind or of any size near the spring. From a little distance above the spring the state line may be seen for miles as there is a strip cleared about one rod wide which was done a few years ago when the line was re-run. After the Potomac crosses this line about one half mile from the stone it is, in a few hundred yards from there, met by another rivulet from the Maryland side which is flowing near due south. They then flow round a hill in an eastern direction until they reach a point about one and a half or two miles below Fairfax station, there this rivulet is met by a stream from the Maryland side and quite near this place one from the W. Va., side. Here it forms quite a brook and meanders for miles in a north eastern direction. Now it will be seen that maps all give this wrong, as they all give the stream as running directly from the stone in a N. E. direction and near straight, thereby making the stone the corner of Md., whilst that state has nothing to do with it except as a starting point to run their western boundary line. Maryland possesses no land closer than one half mile of the "Fairfax Stone."

Some historians tell us that George Washington "explored this country, located the stone and ran the line from here due north, to the Pennsylvania line" but we think this can hardly be for what we consider the best authorities (records) show that this stone was placed here and the line was run in the year 1745 which the date on the stone would indicate "by a corps of surveyors in the employ of Lords Baltimore and Fairfax." At that date Washington was only a lad in his teens. History also tells us that "Washington entered the employ of Lord Fairfax at the age of 17 and did some surveying in the Shenandoah Valley in Virginia in that year." —"O. C." in Keyser Tribune.

Advertised to Sell Sugar at Two Cents a Pound but Did'at Make Good.

One day last week United States Marshal Henry George, of Cumberland, was at Swanton and there arrested a young man named William G. Wagner on the charge of having used for fraudulent purposes the United States mails. His hearing came up before Commissioner Anderson on Saturday, but owing to the absence of some important witnesses in the matter the case went over until this week, when it will again be taken up, probably on Friday.

Wagner is charged with having advertised in various magazines and other periodicals over the country that he was engaged in the manufacture of sugar, which he sold at two cents per pound. It is also alleged that orders poured in for the sugar from almost every section of the United States, and that when an order would come in Wagner would fill it by buying sugar at five cents a pound and then wait for the second order which would be largely increased as to the amount. The second order would not be filled. For instance, one man in Illinois sent in an order for 200 pounds of sugar. This was filled and when the customer sent in an order for $60 worth of sugar, the latter order, it is alleged, was not filled.

It is claimed that there will be over one hundred witnesses, embracing victims from nearly every section of the United States.

It is expected that Attorney J. C. Rose will be present at the hearing tomorrow, together with many witnesses. It will, if tried, be the first criminal case to be tried in the Federal Court in Cumberland and will necessitate the drawing of grand and petit jurors.

Mr. Bernard Gonder, telegraph operator for the Northern Pacific Railway at Thompson Falls, Montana, has written a letter descriptive of the state of his adoption, which we publish in this paper today. Messrs. Austin Brown and Wallace Frazee went down to their saw mill, which is located near Merrill, on the Savage River railroad, Monday morning for the purpose of arranging for the removal of the machinery from the present site to a new location over near Thomas, on the Western Maryland railroad. The mill will be placed on a tract of timber land owned by Messrs. Bond Brothers.

Rev. Thomas J. Stanton, of Baltimore, arrived in Oakland Tuesday afternoon to visit his brother, Mr. J. M. Stanton, and family, for a few days. Father Stanton returned to the United States recently from a tour of France, Switzerland, Spain, Italy, England and Ireland, and a cruise in the Mediterrean Sea. The voyage was made necessary owing to the declining health of Rev. Stanton, who returned very much improved.

As it is with right and wrong, good and evil, so it is with failure and success. Perseverence is the chief ingredient of the compound that brings success. There may be other elements required—and usually there are—but without this one the mixture is ineffectual. Talent, intellect—genius itself—may all combine for a certain end, but if the force of persistent industry is not behind them, they will lag upon the road and never reach the goal.

There is a structure which every graduate from our school is building, young and old, rich and poor, each one for himself. It is called "character," and every act of your lives is a stone for ti is structure. If day by day you are careful to build your lives with pure upright deeds, at the end you will stand a fair temple, honored by God and man. But as one leak will sink a ship, and one flaw break a chain, so one mean dishonorable act or word will forever leave its impress and work its influence on your character. Then let the several deeds unite to form a day and one by one the days grow into noble years, and the years as they slowly pass will raise at last a beautiful edifice, enduring forever to your praise, and you will cherish with the utmost tenderness the memories of your school life. The old school house, the familiar walks about the place, the desk upon which you wrote your mane, all indelibly stored away in memory never to be forgotten.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. LILY MORGAN STEMPLE.

After a brief illness, continuing only a few days, Mrs. Lily Morgan Stemple departed this life at her home near Coleman, Michigan, on Wednesday, September 25th, 1907, aged 32 years, 8 months and 6 days, leaving in deep sorrow a desolate home where sit a devoted husband and five children smitten with pangs of deepest mourning. Mrs. Lily Morgan Stemple was a native of Garrett county, Maryland, having been born on the old Lohr Homestead near Bittinger on January 19th, 1875. She was the second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Peter P. Lohr, and was married several years ago to Mr. Cam. Stemple, of Aurora, W. Va., where she resided until about four years ago, when she removed with her husband and children to Coleman, Michigan, where her last days were spent. The last months of this noble mother's earthly life was a season of great tribulation, typhoid fever having come into her home and laid hold upon four of her five children, and through the long siege she watched with a mother's tender devotion by the bedside of her little ones until they were all carried safely through the racking fever. Then when the best of her strength was gone, giyen to the care of the children she loved, she too was smitten and in a few days yielded up her life a willing and noble sacrifice on the altar of a mother's devotion. Such a deed needs no extolling and the unfailing memory of such a one shall be her lasting eulogy. The deceased is survived by her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. P. P. Lohr, of Oakland; three brothers: Wade Lohr, of Swanton; T. J. Lohr, of Bittinger; P. Y. Lohr, of Oakland, and one sister: Mrs. Daniel Orendorf, of Mt. Lake Park, to whom in this sad affliction the sympathy of many friends is extended.

MRS. AMANDA DEWITT.

On Saturday last at her residence in Oakland, after an illness extending over several months, of paralysis and dropsy of the heart, Mrs. Amanda DeWitt, wife of Mr. Horace R. DeWitt, County Treasurer of Garrett county. Mrs. DeWitt was twice married, her first husband being the late William Rodeheaver, of Preston county, W. Va., who died a number of years ago. She was married to Mr. DeWitt about ten years. Her age was 45 years, 3 months and 20 days. Mrs. DeWitt was a Christian lady of the highest type and was a member of the Hoyes M. E. congregation, her funeral occuring from the church of that denomination at Hoyes on Monday at eleven o'clock, the services being conducted in the presence of a large concourse of sympathetic relatives and friends by Rev. Henry E. Friend, with interment at Hoyes. Mrs. DeWitt, though a resident of Oakland but a comparatively short time, had endeared herself to the people here, who sympathize deeply with her bereaved husband and friends.

RAYMOND SHAFFER.

Died, at the home of his parents, on Water street, Oakland, after a week's illness of typhoid fever, Monday morning at five o'clock, Raymond, aged twenty years, son of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Shaffer. The young man was violently ill from the moment he was stricken with the disease and although every attention was paid him by the attending physician and his parents and nurses, he succumbed. His funeral took place yesterday morning from St. Peter's Catholic church in Oakland, where appropriate services were conducted by Rev. James E. Connell, the pastor. Interment was made in the Oakland cemetery.

There are mighty few young young people who go into marriage with any real idea of what it means. They get their notion of it from among the clouds where they live while they were engaged, and naturally about all they find up there is wind and moonshine, or from novels which always end before the real trouble begins, or, if they keep on, leave out the chapters that tells how the husband finds the rent and the wife the hired girl. But if these's one thing in the world about which it's possible to get all the facts, it's matrimony. Part of them are right in the house where you were born, and the neighbors have the rest.

GOVERNOR WARFIELD'S TEMPTING INVITATION.

Maryland's Executive in Soul-Stirring Terms Proclaims the Spirit of Old Home Week.

Governor Edwin Warfield has issued a special proclamation for Maryland's Old Home Week, which is to be celebrated in Baltimore October 13th to 19. The edict is couched in the most tempting language and ought to stir the soul of every native of the "Old Line State" who reads it. The Governor says-

WHEREAS, it is designed by the people of Maryland to hold an "OLD HOME FESTIVAL" in the month of October, 1907, from the 13th to the 19th thereof, inclusive, wherein Maryland shall welcome, with open doors, those of her sons and daughters who have gone forth from her towns and cities, from her villages and her fertile farm lands, to seek fortune and acquire fame, and to help in the upbuilding of other States and the founding of new homes; yea, even to those who have established themselves among foreign peoples.

It is now my proud pleasure and pleasing duty to proclaim to them the welcome that awaits them, especially in the celebration of this event. Maryland invites them to enjoy the many features that have been provided for their entertainment, delectation and amusement, the City of Baltimore, at Annapolis, the ancient Capital of the Commonwealth, and elsewhere, and urges them to embrace this opportunity of visiting the old homes and haunts, the familiar scenes of early life and love and adventure so dear to their hearts.

It will be the season of the golden autumn, when Maryland will be arrayed in her garments of glory, when the fruits of her orchards and the crops of her fields will be ripe for the garnering, when the Chesapeake Bay will be yielding its perennial supply of oysters, fish, terrapin and wild ducks, and the heart of nature will beat responsive to the hearts of her happy children who come to sit by old hearthstones.

Now, THEREFORE, as Governor of the Commonwealth of Maryland, I, Edwin Warfield, speaking as a parent, do, by these presents, and by the authority of the State, command all her children, even unto the third and fourth generation, to come to this festival of rest and recreation, of feasting and of friendship, and to bring with them their friends and neighbors whether they be native or not.

Proud of her children and their achievements, proud of her place in the galaxy of the great Commonwealths, Maryland anxiously waits to clasp her home-comers to her breast. It is her fondest hope that no heart will resist the invitation.

Given under my hand and the Great Seal of the State of Maryland.

EDWIN WARFIELD

Letter to E. E. Sollars.
Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: You've got 200 cows; how much will you take for calves and milk of 100 of 'em next year—you pick out the 100?

How much for the other 100?

The point cows are not all alike, and you know which is which.

It is so with paint. You've got one best cow in that herd. There are 200 different paints in the United States; and one best. You know your best cow; we know the best paint.

The best cow is the one that gives the best calves and milk. The best paint is the one that covers most surface and stays there longest—neither paint nor Holstein or Jersey is better to look-at.

10 gallons Devoe will cover your barn and wear 10 years; it'll take 15 of another paint, and that paint'll wear 5 years.

Reckon costs. Devoe: 10 gallons $1.75, $17.50; about 10 days' work $3, $30; the job $47.50 for ten years; $4.75 a year. The other: 15 gallons $1.60, $24; about 15 days work $3, $45; the job, $69 for five years; $13.80 a year. Devoe $4.75 a year; the other $13.80 a year. Difference $9 a year.

That's how to reckon cows and paint.

Yours truly

P. S. Dixon & Kelso, Oakland, and C. M. Rathbun & Sons, Mountain Lake Park, sell our paint.

"No News In The Paper."

Frequently you pick up one of the local papers, and after glancing at the headlines wearily thrust it aside, remarking, "nothing in the paper today." Did you ever stop to think what that phrase—"nothing in the paper today—means. It means in the day or week just passed that no misfortune has befallen any one in our city; that no fire has wiped out a neighbor's wordly goods; that the grim angel of death has crossed no threshold of a friend, that no man driven by liquor, hatred or fear has taken the life of a fellow-human; that no poor devil, haunted by the past or the misdeeds of some other has crossed the great divide by his own hand. So the next time you pick up a paper that doesn't announce a tragedy, give a little thanks instead of grunting because there is no news.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

KODAK SAFETY FILM

At the River's Brink.

By BRADFORD K. DANIELS.

Copyright, 1907, by B. K. Daniels.

A SLEIGH dashed up to the little country station, and a gaunt, disheveled prisoner, heavily handcuffed and bespattered with the slushy snow of a thawing March day, stepped upon the platform, closely followed by Sheriff Peterson. He dropped down upon the baggage truck in the stooping posture necessitated by the irons and looked dully out across the whitened pastures to the river, whose wet ice glistened in the sun. The officer stood a few feet behind him, watching his slightest movement.

"Gee! They've caught Al Brock!" A score of collarless loafers came pouring out of the waiting room from about the leprous stove and stared in open mouthed wonder at the man on the truck. Had the redoubtable sheriff appeared with a chained lion they could not have been more fascinated, more awed.

"It was them bloodhounds that done it. They tracked him forty mile through the woods."

They ventured a little nearer.

"He was in our barn for more 'an a week and lived on milk and pulped turnips, but we didn't know nothing about it till afterward. Gee!"

The figure on the truck stirred, and the crowd fell back.

"Come on up nearer. He's handcuffed. He can't hurt you."

"Not much! He smashed Joe Porter to a jelly with the handcuffs on the last time they took him."

A whistle screeched somewhere behind an orchard, the escaping steam shot up above the trees, and as the station master hurried out with a mail sack and a red flag the prisoner rose stiffly and the sheriff led him down the platform.

The train wheezed and clanked to a standstill, and the two men climbed on at the rear. Then, like a flash, Al Brock jerked his narrowed left hand (two fingers and a strip of the hand had been blown away by the explosion of a gun) from its manacle and dealt the sheriff a terrific blow upon the head with the dangling iron, felling him to the floor, and before the rear platform moved up in sight of the loafers leaped with the senseless man down the embankment at the farther side of the track.

As the train moved away Al looked cautiously about him. The station master had removed the flag from the edge of the platform and was entering the waiting room. The loafers were hurrying away toward the corner grocery to spread the news. Half way up the bank the sheriff lay sprawling upon his face. At the siding three men were loading lumber upon a flat car. He crept cautiously along until screened by intervening box cars, then vaulted the fence and ran toward the river. On the other side lay the United States and freedom—unless his confederate smugglers failed him.

Reaching the river he sprang out upon the ice, splashing straight on with head down, through the puddles that the sun had melted upon its surface. Suddenly he stopped short, arrested by the rhythmic crunch of ice under the feet of a sharp calked horse, and, looking up, he saw a sleigh heading straight toward him. At first he thought it was a revenue officer and stood ready to fight till he died rather than be captured. Then he saw a black plume past the horse's head and a moment later recognized Sheriff Peterson's wife. For a moment he stared, dumfounded, then looked desperately about him for a hiding place. Why, of all the women in the world, must he meet her and have her look upon his shame? Suddenly he laughed an ugly laugh, and moved with head down straight toward the approaching horse, and as the animal came opposite sprang and caught the bridle.

"Al Brock!" For a long moment the sheriff's wife sat motionless, paralyzed with astonishment and fear. Then she snatched the whip and struck the horse across the flank. It leaped forward, with a snort, but with one hand gripping its nostrils Al threw it back upon its haunches.

"Get out!"

She looked at his face and then stepped out upon the ice without a word.

He leaped into the sleigh and, whirling the horse about, started at a gallop toward the American side. "You'd better trot along home and patch up Bob's head. It needs it!" he called over his shoulder. Then as escape became almost certain he laughed his old devil may care laugh and began to soothe the fine black roadster that under happier circumstances had once been his. Fifty rods more and he would be on American soil and within a half hour's drive of Ned Fletcher's. Then Bob Peterson and the extradition treaty be hanged!

Pop, pop, pop, pop! Al gave one look upstream at the long white ridge that was moving swiftly down upon him, then seized the whip and lashed the horse into a furious run. The freshet from the melting snow in the hills was sweeping down the river, heaving up the rotten ice in a jagged ridge as it came.

"Help! Help!"

The fleeing outlaw looked back at the woman and then as the commotion drew nearer stood up in the sleigh and drove the horse to the utmost limit of its speed.

"Al! Oh, Al!" came over the ice in piteous appeal.

Al started and the hard lines about his mouth softened as they had not softened for years. She had called him just like that when they were children playing together and the boat in which she had hidden had gone adrift above the falls.

"Al! Al!"

He looked hungrily at his "promised land," not ten rods away now, then swung the horse about and galloped back toward the woman. The ridge of heaving, splitting ice drew nearer, passed under him and left the horse floundering in the swift current among crunching ice cakes. He leaped from the sleigh and dashed on, leaving the brute to its fate. Out there where the ice was pounding, grinding, writhing, she was crouching upon a rocking cake, and he sped straight on over the heaving mass toward her with a nimbleness and sureness that had saved him a score of times from pursuing revenue officers.

"Quick, Al!" And as he snatched her from her perilous position she clung to him as though he were Al Brock of five years before instead of the most dangerous outlaw in the province.

The ice was now thoroughly broken up. It was as though the river were full of wallowing white monsters fighting each other to the death. Even with nothing to impede his flight his chances of reaching land would be remote. He knew that. He had seen three different men of his gang try to make the American side at such a time, and all three had gone over the falls.

As he leaped upon it a cake sank under him till the water reached his knees, and she gripped him convulsively. He looked at her as he had not looked at any human being for years and bounded on to the next cake. It turned over under his foot, and he sank to his armpits in water, scrambling out only a moment before the ice closed together with a grinding crunch. The jagged ice cut through his rotten boots, and he left blood at every step. He slipped to his knees again and again, clinging by his battered elbows over the edge of some tilted block, straining to keep his charge out of immediate danger. At last he stumbled and fell with a crash across a blue black slab whose adhering gravel cut like the teeth of a saw.

"Let me help myself, Al. You're killing yourself." And, scrambling to her feet, she started away, but soon slipped and fell with a dull thud, lying still by a strip of swirling water into which she had nearly plunged.

Al snatched her up and leaped across the widening channel, looking at the falls and then at the shore, still a quarter of a mile away. Could he make it? Reason and his battered body said no, but the white, still face at his shoulder with the ugly cut across the forehead cried out above reason, and he reeled on.

He was upon hands and knees now, dragging her painfully from cake to tilting cake. The one across which he was squirming collided with another, pinning fast the handcuff dangling at his wrist. He wrenched at the iron until it cut into his flesh, but could not free himself. He started to his knees and circled round and round in sudden panic, still clinging to the unconscious woman. Then the mass on which they floated struck something with a force that threw him over his fetter and nearly wrenched the pinioned arm from its socket. A glance about him revealed the truth. They were stranded upon a submerged ledge, and the ice was rapidly piling up about them.

A cake of ice as large as a half barrel crashed down within a yard of his companion's head, and he tugged at his manacle until his wrist bled in another desperate attempt to free himself. Then he crouched and waited. Behind him the jagged white wall rose steadily higher, now ominously still, now groaning loudly as the whole mass slipped forward a few feet upon the ledge. They might lie there in this sheltering half circle which screened them from view and perish from the cold that would set in with the night. The mass might topple over and crush them at any moment.

He put his free arm under her head and raised it from the wet ice. The low sun illumined the tumbled mass of reddish brown hair and revealed with startling clearness the premature lines about her eyes and mouth. He knew that he had helped to put them there; that if he had gone straight and married her five years ago she would have been a different woman. And yet he had begun smuggling in order to raise money enough to start a home as good as Bob could give her.

A prolonged growl came from the wall of ice, something snapped, and then the entire mass moved shudderingly forward. The cake on which they lay began to settle. The water crept steadily up the sides, ran into the crevices about the edge and reached his shackled hand. He drew her closer to him and with infinite dilicunty placed her upon his back. One dainty ear curled like the petals of a rose was within a few inches of his mouth, and he remembered as from another world the first time he had kissed it.

The chilly water was covering his chest now, and he rose upon his elbow. It reached his shoulder, his neck, his ear; then a falling cake splashed the water into his face. For a few moments he struggled blindly, frantically, like a trapped animal, nearly losing his hold upon her wrist. When his death struggle came, would he abandon her then like a selfish coward? His fingers tightened upon her wrist with a grip of steel, and as a wave broke over his head he closed his eyes in anticipation of the end.

Pop! He instinctively clutched at the edge of the leaping cake with his manacled hand. They were out of water moving swiftly away on a detached piece of ice. The cakes had ceased until the black water showed everywhere between them, and the danger was greater than ever before, but he gathered her into his arms and staggered on.

A lane of water ten rods wide opened before him, and he could go no farther unless he swam. Drawing her arm about his neck, he took her sleeve between his teeth and plunged in. The sleeve gave way, and he closed his teeth upon her wrist. The ice they at last reached proved rotten, breaking under his weight again and again. Finally he rolled out like a log and, hooking his manacled wrist about a hub, dragged her after him.

Shaking from his icy bath like one in a chill fit, he was stooping to pick up his burden for the final dash, when suddenly he paused and looked across the shifting, grinding blocks to the shore. It was Bob Peterson running along the headland to meet him. He looked at him like a hunted animal brought to bay. Bob Peterson would have no mercy on him, even if he had saved his wife's life. To go on meant ball and chain, and that horrible stone trap. Yonder was the precipice. All he had to do was to sit still and let the swift current have its way. To allow her to drift over with him before her husband's very eyes would be a crowning revenge upon the man who had hunted him so mercilessly. Ah, it was just past that headland there where she had called to him in her childish voice from the drifting boat. For a moment he listened again to that cry as it rang in his ears across the years. Then, with set face, he snatched her up and hurried on, at length sinking, exhausted, with his burden upon the bank not ten rods above the brink of the falls.

"Thank God!" exclaimed the sheriff fervently as he bent above his still unconscious wife. Then his eyes encountered those of the man who had rescued her.

"Well, put on the irons. There's no more fight left in me," gasped the prostrate man defiantly, holding out his manacled hands.

For answer the sheriff produced a long blue envelope. "Why, I didn't get it yesterday. It would 'a' saved me an ugly bat over the head," with a dry smile, handing the envelope to his companion.

Al, with ever increasing amazement written upon his haggard face, examined the document till he comprehended that it was his pardon, duly signed by the lieutenant governor of the province, then slowly folded it like a man in a dream. "Whose work is this, Bob?" at length with shaky voice.

"Hers," replied the sheriff, nodding toward his wife. "She wouldn't rest night or day till she got it."

For a time Al sat quite still, the muscles of his face working painfully. Then he rose slowly to his battered knees and, bending over the sheriff's wife, sobbed as can only a strong man broken upon the wheel of remorse.

Snakes.

There is nowhere a snake with a sting in its tail, nor are there any snakes whose breath can poison even a fly, nor does a snake, fatally hurt, live until sunset.

He—You've worn your hat ruined. She—Well, it was an old hat, and I do hate to wet my new umbrella.

WORSE THAN WASTED.

The Money Which Great Britain Spends for Liquor.

There are not quite 41,000,000 persons in the United Kingdom, but they annually spend for spirituous liquors a sum equal to one and a half times the national revenue, or to all the rents of all the homes and farms in the country. The public house, the English name for the saloon, with its barmaid, is as much a national institution as the houses of parliament. There is one public house to every 300 inhabitants in England and Wales; in Scotland, one to every 566 persons, in Ireland, one to every 271.

Whereas in the days of our forefathers, the worst drinking was among the nobility and gentry, to-day, says the writer in the Craftsman, the poor and working classes are by far the most intemperate. The fact that drinking is habitual among the women of this grade as well as the men is the most serious feature, for when women do go to the dogs the very uttermost depths of degradation are usually reached before the end comes.

At meal time, throughout the United Kingdom, a procession of women with pitchers, buckets or cans may be seen going to some one of the many public houses, never more than a stone's throw from their homes, and often not so far. As a rule, the omnibus, the favorite British mode of local transportation, has stopping places in front of public houses. From an outside seat on the bus top, especially in London and other cities, a full view may be had of the interior of the public house, crowded always, and on Saturday night jammed to the point of suffocation. Old women, young women, girls are there; mothers with infants in arms, and not uncommonly with other children tugging at their skirts—little ones whose fretful cries are stilled by sips from mother's glass of gin.

Working men drink just as much as the working women. A manufacturer, an employer of hundreds of men, was asked if English manufacturers ever made any restrictions about drinking when taking on new men. His reply was: "No, for it would be impossible to carry on business if such conditions were imposed." He was almost incredulous when told of the strict regulations in regard to drinking that obtained in some of America's largest business establishments.

Rebukes Drinking of Toasts.

Rev. Dr. Paget, the bishop of Oxford, has just made a great sensation in England by his stinging rebuke of the habit of drinking toasts at banquets with wine, and calls upon the clergy and laity to cure the bad habit. He suggests that toasts of church and king, of bishop and clergy, of the theological school or missionary college, or any such institution, jar on him when used in connection with drinking at all. The bishop's views and fearless expression of them have pleased the temperance people of Great Britain very much, and should receive the indorsement of the good people of every land and clime. The bishop is right in his belief that water is a good enough element with which to drink a toast to any man or cause.

Are Good Risks.

The twenty-fourth report of the Scottish Temperance Life Insurance company, recently issued, shows that good progress has been made during the year; 1,604 life proposals for £461,754 were accepted, yielding in new premiums £17,676. The mortality experience continues to be favorable, the claims by death, though heavier than last year, being still much under expectation. Comparing the temperance section with the general section a table of mortality experience for 20 years (1883-1902) shows that of 936 expected claims in the temperance section there were 420 deaths, being only 45 per cent., while of 319 in the general section, there were 225, or 71 per cent.

Going Slow on Alcohol.

The Majestic distillery at Terre Haute, Ind., which was equipped by the alcohol trust on a large scale, is still idle, and according to Automobile, there is little prospect of its starting up in the near future. The industrial company, formed by the trust, to place the denatured alcohol on the market, is said to have found that the product cannot compete with gasoline as yet. Another trust plant, the Atlas distillery at Peoria, Ill., which was running at full blast, using 7,000 bushels of corn daily in the making of the denatured product, has been cut down to 2,500 bushels a day. It is thought that the Majestic plant will be allowed to remain idle until fall.

To Establish Coffee Houses.

The ministers of St. Louis have launched a movement for establishing a number of coffee houses in St. Louis, to take the place of the saloons. Wholesome food, an agreeable atmosphere, and interesting and instructive methods of passing the time will be provided.

I know what I will be, by ging,
when I git growed and everything, away up in the Northern Woods,
almost 2 frozen altitudes,
where there is fish and lots of gaim,
there is a feller that they naim
a Scout!

and I shall be a Scout myself and gather lots of skins and pelf!
in Summer I will hunt and fish and guide the Tenderfoots who wish and in the winter I will trap and wear a seal skin suit and cap!

a Scout don't have to work a tall, but just 2 play from Fall 2 Fall.
he doesn't haf 2 mow the yard or tramp 2 town 2 git sum lard!
he does not haf 2 comb his hare—
and think of Hunting for the Bare!

in twelve more years, or thereabout, ma sez that I kin be a Scout!
it seems a long, long time 2 wait
but pa sez never kick at Fate!
I herd him tell my ma to-day
"a Pirate's job is better pay!"

perhaps it is, but gold is knot the only thing that life has got!
Gist think of fishing awl the time in sum far distant wood and clime!
a Pirate is all right, by gee, but I shall go up North and be a Scout!

Slivers of Thought.

Distance does not lend enchantment to the view of a ten-dollar bill.

The reason that man was made a little lower than the angels was that he might tie his lady love's shoe without stooping enough to break his suspenders.

It seems that a little over a year ago, a Utah prognosticator said the world would come to an end in a year. My wife didn't hear about this until yesterday and she's mad because she hasn't had a chance to worry—and now, it's too late.

Some men make the mistake of their lives by being in such a hurry to call a doctor when their rich relatives are having fits.

When Cupid enters a flat, he asks the stork to wait outside for him.

A Detroit man, being met by a train on a high bridge, made himself believe that his wife was right behind him with a rolling-pin. He scared himself so that he jumped clear over the speeding train and came down safe and sound on the other side. I don't believe this story myself, but some people will believe anything, and I tell it simply for variety.

Modern invention is hard on the newspaper editor. With the passing of the office stove, he has no place to burn poems.

Homeliness never fades. Marry a homely person and know the worst at the outset.

A Wisconsin editor is in a wild state of terror because a local physician is hunting him with a gun. The editor wrote, "Having felt the patient's pulse, he prescribed for the man," but the compositor set it "purse" instead of "pulse"—and the end is not yet.

An Illinois editor, just to show his bravery, prints the poem, "Beautiful Snow" in his paper this week. Some men are too blamed mean for this world.

Do not forget to buy your Christmas presents early this year. Do it now!

When some small-minded married men get bossed at the office down town, they go home and boss their wives scandalously to get even.

Side Remarks.

A magazine writer tells of two street cars being the parents of a little red wheelbarrow. They were not Chicago street cars, else the offspring would have been a cute, little pile of old junk.

The young man that can show his prospective father-in-law he has saved money, generally gets the girl.

The white man loves the Indian. Indeed, he loves the very ground on which the Indian walks.

A Sunday paper tells us that Mary and her little lamb once actually lived. Having been thus reassured, we turn again to the carking cares of the daily grind with renewed courage and enthusiasm.

Happy the man in this world who can pluck his blossoms of success before the first frost.

The undertaker gives many a man the first vacation he has had since his first baby was twins.

A bluff old professor of ours used to tell the class, "If you mean leg say leg!" This is brought to mind by a Boston paper that speaks of 'em as "froge-limbs."

Short But True.

Many young girls have shown infatuation for old hymns.

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

STORY OF TWO CHINESE GIRLS.

One Reared in Christian Home Wins Other Away from Her Idols.

Mary Stone ("Stone" being a translation of the Chinese name Shi meaning "stone") was born into a Christian family, her father having been the first convert to Christianity in all of the Yangtse valley. When Mary was eight years old, her father, then one of the most valued native preachers of the Methodist mission, took her to Miss Howe, in Kiukiang, and asked that she be trained for the medical profession. At 19 she entered Michigan university on English examination, graduating with her degree of M. D. four years later. Dr. Stone then returned to Kiukiang, where she has had charge of the hospital work for the last ten years.

MARY STONE, M. D.

In the same city, in the same year that Mary Stone was born, another baby girl of the same family name came into the world, but this little one was born into a heathen home. "Rii Kuliang," as she is called, lost her father when very young, and the mother at once vowed she would never remarry, but devote her life to searching for the true religion, adopting the life, customs and dress of the Taoist nun. In a very pretty little home on the outskirts of the city this woman lived a life of utter seclusion, her one companion being her little daughter, who, as she grew older and proved to be a beautiful girl, was educated in her home, and taught the three religions of the east; and she, too, adopting the ugly garb of the Taoists, became known, like her mother, as a "truth-seeker."

The reputation of the two women for their piety came to the ears of the emperor, who ordered that his seal be placed over the gate, thus insuring their safety from molestation.

For many years the Christian members of the Stone family sought to gain admittance to the home, but it was not until two years ago that the door was opened to them. And since then God has used the dear little doctor-cousin to effect a change, says the Christian Herald. The free, happy life of Dr. Stone attracted the little nun, and the gay, almost childlike spirit of the Christian, with her bright face and merry laughter, soon drew forth confidence of the lonely recluse. First came the interchange of calls, and Rii Kuliang became intensely interested in the beautiful work of her cousin, spending hours following her about the hospital. Then the Bible was introduced and a copy placed in the hands of the "truth-seeker."

Last winter, just a short time before Dr. Stone started for America, Rii Kuliang accepted an invitation to come to our home in the medical compound, and for a week the timid, shrinking little Taoist nun lived and slept in the home of Christians, the first time in her life away from the idols. Here she saw the free, happy, useful life of her cousin. Each morning she attended prayers, hearing the sweet songs of faith and love.

A few days after our visitor had returned to her home we went to call on her at "Purity Hall." A bright, eager face welcomed us. The mother said to Dr. Stone: "Since Rii Kuliang came back from your house she hasn't been near her idols once!"

PROGRESS OF KINGDOM.

"It abideth alone" explains away some lives. They have never learned the law of service.

The American International convention of Y. M. C. A.'s is to be held in Washington next November. President Roosevelt has signified his willingness to receive the delegates at the White House. In the city of Calcutta there are now six branches of the Y. M. C. A., with a membership of 1,078; six residential houses, affording accommodation for 200 men, with 174 actually in residence; 13 secretaries, six of whom are Indians and seven Europeans; four buildings rented, and four, valued at 580,000 rupees owned by the associations.

Religion may become an escape from duty, rather than its inspiration and fulfillment.

People who complain of the days being too short to do the good that awaits them often live as though life would be too long.

A Baptist deacon who has been traveling through the south said recently: "I find that wherever I go there is the spirit of revival in the churches. Successful revivals are being held all over the country."

A New Society.

A new society that goes by the name of "The Student Recruits for the Christian Ministry" has recently been formed in California. The time seems to have come to present the claims of the ministry upon young men in a businesslike way. This California organization, fostered by Y. M. C. A. interests, will be watched with considerable curiosity.

His Doom.

The preacher who is feeding the children on philosophy may have to work his teeth on chaff some day.

Standard Oil Fine a Forerunner of Others.

By THOMAS W. LAWSON, Financier.

THE people make their own laws; the people would not make laws to perfect their own robbery; THE PEOPLE HAVE BEEN ROBBED, ARE BEING ROBBED, THEREFORE THEIR LAWS MUST BE TRICKED; show the people the trick, and they will apply it to those who have had their surplus earnings of the past twenty-five years of unprecedented prosperity; the people will come into their own.

A United States judge has fined one offender out of hundreds $29,240,000, and in every state in the Union there can be seen the FRENZIED SCRAMBLING OF THE PEOPLE to get their firkins, barrels and hogsheads ready for the outpouring of the at last tilted spout.

I NOW PREDICT THAT THE $29,240,000 FINE OF STANDARD OIL WILL APPEAR INSIGNIFICANT IN COMPARISON WITH THOSE WE WILL READ OF IN A FEW WEEKS OR MONTHS—AND WHY NOT, WHY NOT?

First.—We all know there have been STUPENDOUS stealings from the people. We all know who did the stealing. We all know who has the LOOT, and some of us are showing the rest how the stealing was done.

Second.—For a quarter of a century the world has asked the question, What will happen when the American people awaken to the fact that a favored few are getting all the surplus of the people? And every time the question has been asked STUDENTS OF AFFAIRS AMERICAN HAVE SHUDDERED, shuddered because they remembered ancient Rome and modern France. They shuddered because they feared the American people in their awakening might forget the laws they had made and—there would be no American republic.

Third.—All this $29,240,000 fine comes from where the money is and goes to where it is not—comes from the few to the many—and it is the very base rock of economics that GOOD MUST COME FROM THE FEW AND GIVING TO THE MANY, provided the taking is done legally.

Fourth.—The riches of America are in the billions of corporation tokens of wealth. These are owned directly or indirectly by the PEOPLE, and anything which legally enhances their value benefits the people, anything which tends to weaken the grip of the makers and controllers of these corporation tokens, who in the past used their control to divert the earnings of the corporations from their owners, the people, to their own pocket, this, too, benefits the people.

THEREFORE I SAY: WHY NOT FINE AND FINE THE CORPORATION LAWBREAKERS UNTIL THE LAST ONE HAS REPAID TO THE LAST CENT POSSIBLE THE PROCEEDS OF THE ROBBERIES OF THE PAST?

Why Americans Should Be Happy.

By the Rev. CHARLES F. AKED, Baptist, of New York, Formerly of England.

I HAVE always loved America. Had it not been for the fact that duties in England tied me I should have come to this country long ago.

To begin with, in America there is no hereditary monarchy. I have been a republican all my life. I have always had a contempt for monarchy. I agree with Mark Twain that IF WE HAD KING TOMCATS, KING TOMCAT THE FIRST UP TO KING TOMCAT THE TWENTIETH WOULD HAVE BEEN JUST AS USEFUL AND QUITE AS MORAL.

My second reason is that here you have no house of lords to sit on one's chest and stifle one's best ambitions and to lock every path to political redemption.

Thirdly, you have no established church.

Reason number four is this: America has no sectarian system of education, and of all hateful things English sectarianism, with ITS NARROWNESS, ITS SNOBBERY AND THE PERSECUTING SPIRIT which it brings in its train, its political and moral dishonesty, is one of the most HATEFUL on the face of the earth.

The fifth reason is: You have no such military despotism as is found in England, no such caste and class interests, no such vast vested interests in the promotion of war.

FINALLY, THE DRINK EVIL IS NOTHING IN AMERICA IN COMPARISON WITH WHAT IT IS IN ENGLAND. THE CONSUMPTION PER CAPITA OF THIS COUNTRY IS LESS THAN ONE-HALF THAT OF ENGLAND.

We Are Entering an Era Of Economic Reform.

By Justice WILLIAM J. GAYNOR of the New York Supreme Court.

WE ARE ENTERING UPON AN ERA OF THE GREATEST ECONOMIC REFORM THIS COUNTRY EVER HAD. WE ARE ABOUT TO CAUSE OUR GOVERNMENTS, NATIONAL AND STATE, TO MAKE THOSE WHO RUN OUR RAILROADS UNDERSTAND THAT OUR RAILROADS ARE NOT PRIVATE ROADS, BUT PUBLIC HIGHWAYS, LICENSED AND ESTABLISHED AS THEY WERE BY GOVERNMENT TO BE RUN FOR THE EQUAL BENEFIT AND USE OF ALL AND ON WHICH THERE CAN BE NO DISCRIMINATION OR FAVORITISM IN RATES.

We do not any longer intend to TOLERATE that the goods of a few shall be carried over these highways at rates so much lower than their rivals in business are made to pay that they are thus ENABLED TO UNDERSELL SUCH RIVALS AND DRIVE THEM OUT OF BUSINESS and thereby establish monopolies. It will take years to do it.

We are also about to stop FRAUDULENT stock and bond watering and swindling in our public corporations by laws such as our public utilities law, which Governor Hughes has brought about. Such laws will not injure the bonds and stocks of our public service corporations, as is falsely said, but will improve them by making them honest and genuine. We can all invest our savings in them with the CERTAINTY that we will not be swindled, and in that way more money will be forthcoming for such enterprises than ever.

When You Need Printing Done

You want it to be of the very best kind. As you expect your printed matter to make business it is necessary it should do the talking for you. Poor or indifferent printing cannot do this as it lacks the strong points required to gain and hold the interest of the patron.

¶ In this particular line of work we excel, for several reasons, viz: 1st; we have the largest and best variety of up-to-date type to be found in the western part of the state. 2nd; we carry only the very best grades of papers; and 3rd; the know-how with which to create original and attractive tye display.

MONTANA AS SEEN BY AN OAKLAND BOY.

Bernard Gonder, Telegraph Operator, Writes Interestingly of the North-West.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

In the year 1861, in a conversation with his intimate friend, Gen. J. W. Denver, who served in the Mexican Army and was afterwards Governor of Kansas, Stephen A. Douglas, brought out a map of the west saying he intended to introduce a bill to form some new territories, and he wanted Denver to suggest appropriate names. "I want a name for a territory I am going to mark out up here in the Mountains," said Douglas. Denver's life in the west and his services in the Mexican War had made him familiar with many Spanish words and he remarked: "Why not call it Montana?" "What does it mean?" Denver replied that it meant "mountainous country." By the way of re-assuring himself, Douglas called his wife, who was a Spanish scholar, repeated his question and received the same answer. "General, it's just the thing," said Douglas, "I shall adopt it." Thus originated the name of the third largest state in the Union (Montana). Although situated in the Rockies, it is one of the richest mineral producing states in the Union. The home of the buffalo; also a state to be remembered in history.

As a copper producer she is first in rank; second in silver, and fifth in gold. The total values up to 1903 amounted to $1,001,782,177,00. Montana could easily lead in silver if it would pay to mine it. Her copper is now the most important metal. The richest of the Empire are shut up by the abrupt curve of the Rocky Mountains that circles Butte. The productien of the red metal in and around Butte is the greatest of any region on earth. One fourth of the world's whole copper comes from Butte. Precious stones, blue as the sky, rare as diamonds, are also found in Montana. Sapphires of values sometimes exceeding the price of diamonds are found in different localities, the Yogo mines of Fergus county, being the most productive.

On the plains and in the foot hills where roamed the buffalo by the hundreds of thousands years ago, can now be seen any number of fine ranches, which furnished many train loads of cattle and sheep for the city markets.

On the mountains in the western portion of the State there are thousands of acres of fine timber land, mostly all pine, fir and tamarack. Oak, chestnut and other woods as in Garrett county are not to be found here.

Montana, although a young state, is one of historical events. For instance note the route taken by Lewis and Clarke in their expedition in the early eighteen hundreds, which extended up through Montana. Also the great Indian wars, two of the most horrible battles being the Battle of the Little Big Horn, June 25th, 1876, where General Geo. A. Custer and his entire regiment were entirely annihilated by the mighty Sioux Indian chief Sitting Bull, and his braves, and the Battle of Big Horn, where General Gibbons defeated the Nez Perces Indians, under Chief Joseph in three days hard fighting Aug. 9th, 10th and 11th, 1877, at which place Lieut. Bradly and thirty others were killed and forty wounded, there also being one hundred Indians killed and two hundred wounded.

In Montana there can be found quite a number of Indians yet, there being four tribes on reservations in different parts of the state, namely, the Flatheads, Blackfeet, Northern Cheyenne and Fort Belknap.

I am within thirty miles of the Flathead reservation, which I understand will be thrown open to settlers some time next summer.

I know of no state in the Union where they pay the wages as they do here for labor. A man cannot even be procured to work on the farm for less than $2.50 per day and board. It is utterly impossible to find men enough to fill the numerous vacancies which exist, especially in the big construction work. And yet with all of this labor wanted one can see twenty or thirty hoboes on the trains going back and forward each day. Some perhaps have been over the same route hundreds of times. Every time you meet one of these professional tramps he will ask you how far it is to the next station and at the same time he could almost tell you the exact number of telegraph poles. They do this to give you the impression that they are not really boes, but men out of work.

The school system in Montana is one of the finest in the country. She spends 25 cents each day on each child in school. This is exceeded only by two other states. Besides her primary and grammer school Montana has a large number of excellent high schools, and the State has five state schools: The University of Montana at Missoula; the College of Agriculture and Mechanical Arts, of Bozeman; the Montana State Normal at Dillon; the State School of Mines at Butte, and the School for Deaf and Blind at Boulder. Each of these institutions is well equipped and housed and the whole school system is one of which they may be justly proud.

I am now telegraphing for the Northern Pacific Railway Company, working nights, at this place, Thompson Falls, which is 102 miles west of Missoula, near the Idaho State line, situated on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains, altitude and climate being about the same as that of Oakland. I understand it is a very healthy place, in fact it proves that for itself as there is scarcely any sickness here at all. During the latter part of the month of June and the whole of July the mosquitoes are very much in evidence. These little pests are terribly bothersome, especially in the evening. You can keep them off your face by moving your hands before it, but that is not the only place they try to bore. Should you be wearing a pair of low cut shoes they seem to be aware of the fact that they can get in their good work around the ankles. My ankles were swollen to about twice their normal size nearly all the time during the mosquito season.

Thompson Falls is the county seat of Sanders, which was formerly part of Missoula county. The location of this town, which has a population of about 200, is indeed beautiful, almost surrounded by two chains of hills through which runs the Clarks Fork of the Columbia River. As this river turns in an abrupt curve several hundred yards west of here it transposes its self into a very pretty group of water falls something similar to the Swallow Falls of Garrett county, although much larger. Running parallel on both sides of the river can be seen a very imposing chain of cliffs which extend down the river for some little distance.

I have become acquainted with nearly all the people of Thompson Falls, and I can hardly find words appropriate to express my gratification upon the way I, a perfect stranger, have been treated by them In fact I find nearly all the people in the west are sociable and kind, some perhaps a little rough, but take them on a whole they are a fine class of people.

The hills which surround Thompson Falls are considered very fine hunting grounds, there being plenty of game such as the black bear, mountain lions, wild cats and deer; also fowl of numerous kinds. While I pen these few lines during the lonely hours of this morning I can hear the howl of the coyote in the hills.

There is also some very fine fishing in Montana. All the brooks whose waters bable down the mountain sides are fairly alive with fine brook trout. It is not considered anything for a person to go out and catch 75 or a 100 of these trout ranging from 8 to 15 inches, and the beauty of this fishing is that the fly hook is used altogether which is much handier than by using angle worms. I have been out fishing on several occasions and have caught some of these trout, the largest being about 16 inches. My, what a gallant fight this large trout did make. In the larger streams there can also be found what is known as the Dolly Varden trout, some of the largest weighing 25 to 30 pounds. To land these fish it is necessary to shoot them first as they make an awful fight for their life. Several Sundays ago (Sunday being a great fishing day here) two parties came in with a catch of ten of these trout which was enough fish to feed a dozen good sized families several days.

In conclusion will say, I like this Northwestern Country very much although I have experienced but three months of it. Am taking in all I can see, and am having a bully time. Could hardly think of returning east for a year or so at least.

BERNARD GONDER.

BITTINGER.

There is an invigorating freshness in these bright October mornings and a whispered regret creeping among the rustling leaves that laments for the departed days of "the good old summer time."

A little child of Mr. and Mrs. George Wiley died in it's parents home near this village last Sunday morning and was buried on Monday afternoon.

At the Democratic primary held here last Saturday afternoon Messrs. Perry Broadwater, Jesse Warnick, Amos H. Reckner, Luther Ralson and Turner Lohr were elected delegates to the county convention held in Oakland Monday.

Constable Peter Bickford was in this village on official business Monday.

C. J. Brenneman and daughter, Miss Fannie, were visiting relatives over in Somerset county last Saturday and Sunday.

F. M. Bittinger was calling on his lady over in the Keystone state a few day ago and asserts that he got his final this trip.

Mr. and Mrs. James O'Brien, of North Glade, were visiting Mrs. O'Brien parents near here last Sunday.

Master EdwardHeyward, accompained W. L. Thomas to his home at Fike, Md., last Saturday and says he enjoyed the tramp very greatly.

Paul Beachy, our genial mail carrier, is off this week on account of illness.

It is announced that Rev. H. C. Shull will preach a trial sermon in the Lutheran church here next Sunday at 3 p. m.

MARYLANDERS HOME COMING.

Hundreds of Thousands of Former Residents Will Go Back For the Big Time This Year.

Baltimore, Oct. 9.—(special)—"Arrangements for Maryland's Old-Home week, October 13 to 19, have progressed so magnificently that I am warranted in saying that the celebration will be the grandest ever held here, and I have good reason to hope that it will eclipse anything of the kind ever held in any part of the country," said Governor Warfield in discussing the approaching celebration, to which he has invited tens of of thousands of Marylanders living all over the country.

Responses to the invitations have so overloaded the headquarters of the Maryland Homecoming Association that Secretary Burrough's staff of clerical aids was for a time stalled in their work and it required the services of hurried reinforcements to catch up with the immense correspondence.

The homecomers are from every part of the land. A large delegation is to be brought down by the Maryland Society of New York, and a delegation of 1,000 from the Maryland Society of Ohio is to travel in special trains. Notices have been received of the coming back of Marylanders from Sponkan, Tacoma, San Francisco, Brisbee, Arizona, the Yukon district, Canada, British Columbia, Mexico, and from other points far and wide.

The program for the Old Home Week represents a long round of interesting and attractive features that will furnish entertainment for the host of visitors from the time they get here until they depart.

The ball game played by the old-time pennant winners is expected to carry city and its visitors by storm on the first day of the reunion and the bombardment of Fort McHenry will furnish the most spectacular water event seen anywhere out side of an actual naval engagement.

Corner Stone Laid at the New Court House

By Oakland Lodge of Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons—An Eloquent Address by Senator George L. Wellington and Judge Boyd's Interesting Historical Paper.

Under a clear sky, with the sun shining brightly, and in the presence of a large assembly of Garrett county citizens, many of whom come from distant parts of the country, the cornerstone of the new Garrett county courthouse, now in course of construction in Oakland, was laid Tuesday afternoon with Masonic ceremonies, in charge of Oakland Lodge, No. 192, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons.

The ceremonies at the cornerstone laying began at 2:30 o'clock. Prior to this Oakland Lodge of Masons preceded by the Deer Park band, and accompanied by the local lodge of Knights of Pythias, marched in procession from their lodge rooms in the First National Bank building to the courthouse site, upon which the foundation and portions of the walls had already been built. Here a platform had been erected. Upon this the lodge, the clergy and a chorus of thirty trained voices assembled. The Masonic ceremony was in charge of Worshipful Master J. M. Jarboe, assisted by Dr. E. H. Bartlett, past master; N. S. Heindell, senior warden; J. C. Renninger, junior warden; B. H. Sincell, senior deacon; A. D. Naylor, junior deacon; Past Master E. M. Button, marshal; and E. J. [illegible]uger, tyler. Rev. Manges, pastor of the Lutheran church, opened the ceremony with prayer, this invocation being sponsored by the ritualistic service of the [illegible]tion, the stone being lowered to its final resting place with the Masonic public grand honors. During the ceremony and during the lowering of the cornerstone several selections were rendered by the chorus under the direction of Prof. Turner, principal of the Oakland public school.

The inscription on the stone is "A. L. 5907. A. D. 1907."

Within the corner stone was placed a copper box which contains the following:

A copy of THE REPUBLICAN and other local papers; copies of the Baltimore American and Sun; a list of the workmen employed on the building as well as the name of the architect: copies of the addresses of Hon. George L. Wellington, Judge Boyd and Capt. Jarboe; copies of the statements of the Garrett National and First National Banks of Oakland; also the Kitzmillersville and Frostburg banks; list of the county officials and the local attorneys; copy of the by-laws of Oakland Lodge of Masons with a list of the members of the lodge; names of the school teachers and trustees in the Oakland schools; names of the court house commission; coins presented by Miss Virginia DuVall, Capt. J. M. Jarboe, Mrs. Margaret Sincell-Durst and Benj. H. Sincell.

At the conclusion of the Masonic ceremony, Worshipful Master Jarboe, who is also superintendent in charge of the building, delivered a short address, followed by the reading of Chief Judge A. Hunter Boyd's historical address concerning Garrett county, and the oration, delivered by former United States Senator George L. Wellington. Judge Boyd was unable to be present on account of his duties at the Court of Appeals, but his address which was read by Dr. E. H. Bartlett was received with hearty applause. Senator Wellington was tendered an ovation when he was introduced and his remarks were frequently interrupted with applause.

Senator Wellington's able and eloquent address is herewith appended in its entirety.

Most Worshipful Grand Master, Brethern of our Ancient and Honorable Craft, and Friends:

We have assembled amid the lengthening shadows of this October afternoon on the mountain top—near the summit of the Alleganies—amid the gladsome glades of Garrett—in the good town of Oakland, to perform our part in the laying of the corner stone of the foundation upon which shall rest the super-structure of the public building which the people of Garrett County have determined to erect.

Nature is in a pleasant mood, the environment of this scene shows us the splendor and beauty of an autumn day. About us stand the isolated giants of the woods, which in their silent language tell us of the distant time when they were an integral part of the "forest primeval." Beneath us the green sward is as bright as it was in the springtime when our mother earth awakened from her winter sleep, put on her garment of verdure, begirdled with flowers, and was crowned with the halo of glorious sunshine.

Our part of the work stands well done, and I trust this day may be the harbinger of others like unto it, until in due time the structure shall have been erected, ornamented, completed and ready for occupancy for the purposes to which it was designed. For here the affairs of Garrett county shall be administered—here its officers shall perform their duties,—here its commissioners, who not only levy the taxes, but expend the sum total thereof in their judgment and discretion, shall officially dwell—here the Honorable Judges of the Orphans Court who conserve the estates of the departed, and have in their keeping the interests of the widow and orphan, shall hold their sessions,—here the chosen ones of the states judiciary shall sit in the performance of their high office and mete with even hand and well balanced scale, equity and justice to all—high or low—rich or poor—great or small—white or black. For before the majesty of the law all men shall stand upon the level of equality.

I can well remember in the days of my early youth, the natal period of Garrett County, when under the leadership of such citizens as Patrick Hamill, James M. Schley and William R Getty, old Allegany was called upon to give a part of herself that her daughter might be added to the list of Maryland counties. I have a vivid recollection also of disappointments, jealousies and heart-burnings which arose during the establishment of Garrett county and the election of Oakland as its chief town. A part of the citizenship of the new county dissatisfied with the choice of the county seat, determined that they would not sustain or support by levies of money the erection of suitable buildings for the administration of the county government. Time smooths many wrinkles on the brow of circumstance, and I am happy to say that the passage of five and thirty years have calmed the stormy sentiment and brought about fraternal feeling. A generation has passed away and the disappointments are no longer felt, the bitterness has been forgotten and in the present there is evidenced the sentiment of local patriotism, which has determined that for the honor of Garrett County sturdy, strong and prosperous, as it is today, it is necessary to erect such a public building as will be suitable in material, architecture and ornamentation to the dignity and needs of the people, and, therefore, not only Oakland and her vicinity, but Accident, Grantsville, Hutton, McHenry's Gate, Bloomington, Kitzmillerville and other outlying points contribute and share alike in the ratio of their contribution toward this most praiseworthy end.

It is not my purpose to speak further of the honorable history of Garrett County or of her illustrious sons upon this auspicious occasion. I have come more especially to perform the task assigned to me, which has become a labor of love—that of addressing the fraternity of Free Masons, unto whose ranks I joined myself in the first years of early manhood and for which I then conceived, and still hold deep veneration and love.

I would discuss both with my brethren of the Mystic Tie and my fellow citizens whose privilege it has not been to kneel at the altar of Masonry,— to receive its obligation,—or to take upon themselves the reciprocal duties which are enjoined,—the ceremony in which we have been engaged. Most frequently upon occasions of this kind when our craft assumes the labor of laying the corner stone of a public building, a charitable institution or a Temple of God the question is asked "why should they arrogate to themselves this most important part in the erection of a building—the laying of the corner stone?" This interrogation deserves an intelligent answer. May I, therefore, speak frankly and freely as I see the right, yet modestly and with due regard for those who may hold otherwise. Perhaps I should premise the answer with the declaration of a truth unknown to many.

The Masonic fraternity never appears upon public occasions like this unless there be an invitation properly extended from those who have in charge architectural works and designs. A Masonic Lodge dare not ask permission of the Grand Master to attend a ceremony of this character without an invitation, any more than a member of the fraternity dare ask any man to enter from the darkness of the outer world into the light by which Masons work.

The Fraternity of Free Masons is an organization which is unique in its character and stands alone among all the institutions conceived and created by the mind and aspiration of man. It is the only craft builded by the genius of the human race which has survived shipwreck upon the Ocean of Time "on whose shore we wander up and down to store some treasures of the time of old."

When we call upon history, the reverend chronicler of the grave, to unfold the canvas upon which have been traced century after century, the annals of men, we see many splendid pictures of events which permeated generations and climes, and affected as it seemed the whole of humanity, yet as our vision speeds down the corridors of the past we see that nations which were once as great and strong as those of later days are surrounded with ever deepening gloom until they fade into entire oblivion. They were born, they have had their upward course, they attained meridian splendor, and were lost by gradual decline and finally absolute destruction. It seems to be the fate of all institutions, in which the hand or mind of men have been the chief promoters, that they be evanescent in their character. It is so with peoples and nationalities. From a state of savagery and barbarism they emerge and progress until they reach the highest stages of civilization, wealth and power. It was so with Phoenicia and Egypt, Macdonia and Rome, each and all these wealthy and powerful governments have passed away and in their stead others have come and they too have felt the inevitable blow of time and circumstance. No matter how strongly governments may be builded, whether a monarchy, an oligarchy or a republic, they bear with them the seeds of their own annihilation.

Men have spoken various languages. They have been fashioned out of materials taken from the store house of the past, until the rude words by which the barbarian would make known his wants and desires to another were developed and beautified, at length reaching that splendor and magnificence of sound which makes language, as it nears perfection, the most powerful of all human weapons. Yet however beautiful of sound, strong in import, rich in literature, one after the other they have disappeared and are known only to the scholars and savants. Where today do you hear the language in which Homer wrote, or Moses commanded the Jews, or Cyrus addressed the Persians, or Caesar immortalized his Roman Legions? Dead and silent, one and all [illegible] in the halls of education and scholastic refinement.

The same rule applies to systems of philosophy. From Plato and Aristotle, through all the nationalities and climes and times, one after the other, there have arisen men who attempted to build up certain systems of philosophic thought and yet in the days of Humboldt and Spencer and Darwin and Heckel, they have fallen and the vortex of the dark waters will envelop even those of the new time and condition.

Even religions bear the same token and mark. Ancient story tells us of nations with thousands of priests and a powerful hierarchy kneeling at the altars paying vows and devotion at the shrines of gods whose very names have been forgotten, whose priesthoods have departed and whose votaries are no more.

As we look about us today who may fathom how long any of the divisions of religious which are with us now will stand the test of time? I shall not presume to answer the inquiry nor attempt by any words of prophecy to foretell which of the many that claim sovereignty over, and devotion from their people, shall exist when the others have followed in the path of those who have gone before.

It would thus appear that human institutions are transitory and ephemeral, and yet there seems to have been one institution which, in all this wreck and desolation wrought by the inexorable rod of time, has been strong enough to resist every attack; formidable enough to repel ever encroachment, and after the lapse of thousands of years stands in pristine vigor, in its youth, though it be deemed old, in its strength, when all else of the olden time has become decrepit, or lies dead and forgotten. It is a strong chain of many links, forged by innumerable hands, made of different metals, yet all binding together the centuries that have passed, from the shores of oblivion to the bright sunlight of the present day. If this be true then at least this institution should commend itself for strength, for it bears upon it an armor stronger than that of Achilles, for there is not a single place where the arrow may hurt.

No man can tell the day in which Masonry was born, somewhere beyond the sands which are covered by the oblivious tide of time, somewhere beyond the earliest traditions which have come in fable and legend, there was erected an altar and there knelt the men who bound themselves together mutually and reciprocally for their own betterment and the elevation of their race. No man can tell the hour of its birth or point with certainty to its birthplace. But this we know, that it has been one of the forces by which the human race has arisen from the condition of deepest degredation and ignorance and ascended to the height of many civilizations, always to fall, but ever to rise again.

Republican Campaign Opened Auspiciously

Masterly Addresses Made to a Large Audience by Hon. George R. Gaither, Candidate for Governor, and Hon. Hammond Urner, Candidate for Attorney General—Senator Brown Presided

If the enthusiasm shown at the mass-meeting which the Republican state candidates addressed at the Opera House here Tuesday night is indicative of the ardor with which the party workers are conducting the campaign in this part of the state this good old Republican stronghold will this year give a better account of itself than ever before. The workers declare that they will not be satisfied with less than 1,000 majority, and they claim this can be obtained.

George R. Gaither arrived from Baltimore at eight o'clock Tuesday morning, and after breakfasting at the Frantz Hotel was taken for a tour of the town by Norman S. Heindel ex-city attorney of Oakland. Mr. Hiendel, introduced the candidates many of whom greeted him cordially and promised their earnest support. The normal Republican majority in inceased county is about 800 at state elections but this majority will be increased this fall because of the great popularity of Mr. Gaither in Western Maryland.

The Democratic vote will be affected by dissatisfaction with the Democratic state ticket. Governor Warfield was the choice of Garrett Democrats for the nomination for governor, and the insulting treatment he received in the Democratic convention will lead many members of his party to remain away from the polls, especially, so they say, because their votes for Warfield as a senatorial candidate would be wasted.

Hammond Urner, candidate for attorney general, and William F. Broening of Baltimore, who is to speak at several meetings in this county, arrived here at 4 o'clock Tuesday afternoon and joined Mr. Gaither at the Frantz Hotel.

The meeting was addressed by George R. Gaither, Hammond Urner and William F. Broening, James H. Baker, candidate for comptroller, and Thomas Parran, candidate for clerk of the Court of Appeals, were unable to be present.

The meeting was called to order by A. Frederick George and presided over by State Senator W. McCulloh Brown.

Senator W. McCulloh Brown presided at the meeting, introducing the speakers in a few well chosen words.

The vice presidents were chosen from the various districts of the county, including the following gentlemen: Herman Steiding, George W. Moon, W. W. Sweet, Alvesia Wilson, Theo. George, F. G. Fox, W. W. Savage, N. R. Selby, G. D. Browning, G. J. Gnagey, J. C. Boucher, Ralph Engle, C. J. Otto, Henry Leatham, N. U. Bond, Dr. H. M. Kemp, Grant Hershberger, Jacob Stump, G. L. Michaels, A. B. Friend, T. O. Collier, Henry Kamp, W. A. Smith, D. McLean, J. Alvin Friend, Fred. A. Thayer, Joseph Rathbun, Capt. J. A. Hayden, G. D. White, C. E. Hilleary, I. W. Abernathy, Jonas Yutzy J. A. Aronhalt, J. M. Conneway, P. E. Finzell, T. B. Layman, Daniel Layman, S. P. Specht, Charles Ashby, W. C. Jones, H. A. Hardesty, W. B. Miller, Ephrim Kelso, George B. McMillian, Eli. Merrill, W. H. Jacobs, Jonas Bittinger, Thos. B. Wiley, Henry Beitzel, Daniel Wilson, A. C. Smith, John H. Rafter, H. L. Price, J. E. Chappell, E. E. Sollars, S. T. Jones, T. J. Peddicord, U. S. Kendall, Capt. J. M. Jarboe, P. H. Rodeheaver, U. G. Palmer. Secretaries, Benj. H. Sincell, N. S. Heindel, and Charles S. Davis.

The opera house was decorated with American flags and bunting, and prominently displayed was a portrait of President Roosevelt. The stage was set off with palms, which made the scene very attractive.

When Mr. Gaither arose to speak he was cheered by a crowd which filled the opera house to its capacity. In the audience were many members of the fair sex, and they took a prominent part in the flattering reception which was given the candidate for governor. Throughout the speeches the ladies appeared deeply interested and they rewarded the efforts of the orators with enthusiastic applause.

Mr. Gaither, after discussing at some length the issue of fair elections said:

The simple presentation of the figures for your county of Garrett and the neighboring county of Allegany will show how many voters have been practically disfranchised by this Extra-Session Law. These figures are especially instructive, as we have been told so

CORNER STONE LAID AT THE NEW COURT HOUSE

To the student of history at least it is well known that any nation which is forming in its tribal relations, establishes first government and rulership, with that comes religion, and added to the two—the era which marks the disappearance of the tent and the erection of the house, the castle and the palace, which the mason and the architect plan and build. These three forces have at many times been joined and united, and have given what seemed a forceful and lasting civilization. The most notable instance of this kind is the ancient Egyptian monarchy, where the chief ruler, the hierarchy and the fraternity of builders intermingled and became united as one.

But men do not only rise in material matters, they grow also in intellect, culture, nobility of thought and higher aspirations. The savage is lost when he passes from the tent, the barbarian grows wiser and better as he leaves the hut for the castle and palace. It was the mission of Free Masonry to unite with its efforts in elevating man in the material part of his living, the other and nobler achievement of developing by various gradations the art of thinking less of self and more of our fellow men, for in the rise and progress of humanity we see three marked and distinct eras. First, the time when men lived upon men. Second, the time when men lived and allowed other men to live. Third, the time when men lived and died for other men. In bringing about this revolution and reformation Free Masonry was one of the supreme forces, and it is at this point that we may unite the labor of the architect and builder of human habitations with that of the moralist and philosopher, who in subtle and various ways builds up, refines and cultures human minds and emotions. It is here that ancient Masonry clasped hands with the Free and Accepted Brethern of the Craft.

I believe in Free Masonry because of this fact. I would pay honor to any organization of men who aim to lessen the consideration of self and to increase that of their fellows.

Not only has Masonry been ancient beyond the ken of man; it has also become universal in extent. In the farthermost point of the Antarctic region to which men have penetrated, where animal life has ceased to exist, vegetation is unknown and nature seems dead, where the flag of no nation has yet sought a home, the mysterious emblem of the Masonic fraternity is engraven. In the far north, where the Lena casts her icy current into a frozen ocean, and beyond, the same insignia has been borne by its votaries. In every land, upon every continent, and upon the islands of every sea, professing religions, various and different in their character, you will find the might and the power, either open or secret, of this great Brotherhood of Men. It dwells alike amid the roses of England and the lilies of France; it makes its home in imperial Germany and far off Turkestan. Its lodges exist in the very shadow of the Vatican, even as they do here near the summit of the Alleganies. Its fraters labor upon the banks of the Orinoco and have made settlements in the wilderness of South Africa. They have borne martyrdom in mysterious China, as well as in degenerate Spain and ignorant Mexico. They have been honored in the North and South, the East and West, not only have they borne their honors, but they have made universal history.

Four thousand years ago, when Achilles dragged the dead body of Hector around the walls of fated Troy, and Priam the aged father of the slaughtered hero, stood in deepest agony, when he knew that neither force of arms nor deeds of valor could give succor, made his appeal by the clasp of the lion's paw and the vengance of Achilles was softened until it became transformed into sympathy for the bereaved father and, for a time at least, peace reigned, as both joined together to lay away the mighty warrior of Troy.

Three thousand years ago, when on the hills of ancient Jerusalem, Solomon, wisest of Jews, and perhaps the wisest of men, in all the splendor of his royalty, clasped the hand of Hiram of Tyre—different in faith, race and character, but one in fraternal feelings, and the endeavor to build to the Supreme God Jehovah, whom Solomon worshiped, the greatest and most beautiful temple which the earth ever saw, and joined with them stood a third, not of royal blood, neither Jew nor Tyrian, only "the Widow's son," but a genius and enthusiast who eked out what his royal brothers lacked, for he gave them the plans for this supreme effort in architecture, this magnificent structure upon which more than a hundred thousand men labored, and yet in its whole erection there was not heard "the sound of axe or hammer."

Nearly twenty centuries have passed since the Galilean fishermen gathered about their Nazarene Master and gave to the world a new religion which commanded men to forego vengeance and substitute love.

For centuries persecution followed the disciples of Christianity. In the time when Imperial Caesar conquered Rome, while Augustus was increasing her wealth and power, aye, even beyond the time when Nero sat amid the flames which in their lurid light gave evidence of the passing away of the City of the Seven Hills, the Christian Free Masons of yonder epoch inhabited the catacombs and, as their brethern died at the stake and in the arena, they builded in the subterranean streets, mausoleums, crypts nd tombs which even today excite not only the wonder but the admiration of those who are fortunate enough to view them.

In the transition, when the old civilization of Greece and Rome passed away, and the barbaric splendor of the beginning of modern rule began, Free Masonry was making its changes and adapting itself to conditions that it might not lose its power, but transform the rude, unlettered Goth, Frank and Alleman into the cultured, refined, civilized Briton, German and Frenchman of today.

These races detested the degenerate Greek and Roman civilization and shrank from accepting either science, art or literature from its hands. There were two elements who labored for the safety and the continuation of letters and literature, the leaders of the Ecclesiastic forces of the Christian Church and the Masonic fraternity, both of which adapted themselves to this period of transition.

Scattered upon the European continent, at numerous points of interest, we see the castles they designed and builded century after century and then defended by force and arms.

Many transformations came, and the fraternity of Masons changed with them, ever holding fast their ancient landmarks, their splendid philosophy, their intimate knowledge of architecture, their code of morals, and the great principles underlying their existence.

In the dark period known as the "Iron Age" in Europe, they penetrated the gloom and at least established the light which gave to modern Europe the doctrine that all men stand equal before God the Father. There were many stubborn battles, there were some defeats, and many victories, but out of it all was liberty, civil and religious.

There is not, in all modern history, an important event in which the Free Mason has not done his part nobly. There have been times when they, and they alone, could stand against the current of the tide and bid defiance to the powers that were. Throughout the Great Reformation in Europe, in the supreme day of that great transformation of governments and conditions of men, the flower of the nobility of imperial Germany, led by such Free Masons as von Hutten and von Sickingen, stood ready to cast their lives and fortunes with the man who stood alone for what he deemed right.

When London, stricken by the plague, was swallowed up by the flames of the great conflagration and her people left homeless and destitue, (perhaps the darkest picture of English history) where was the strength and succor which bridged the dreadful chasm? It lay with Sir Christopher Wren, then the Grand Master of Masonry in England, who not only rebuilt the city in its present magnificence, bet saved the lives of the citizens by his appeal for aid to the brothers of the Kingdom.

It was during this period that Free and Accepted Masons began to have an existence separate and apart from Ancient Free Masons, who labored in masonry and practiced the arts of architecture, and gradually there was a new environment which lead the votaries of the Craft to the practice of morals and philosophies which had long been taught, devoting themselves entirely to mental and spiritual labors instead of the material work of the ancients.

When the Great Frederick, alone and unaided, gave battle to five of the chief nations in Europe, and after seven years of war was victorious, himself and his leaders in war and peace were united by closer bands than those of sovereign and subject. They were united by the secret and mysterious ties of Free Masonry, to which Frederick had become attached with an enthusiasm rarely ever shown by any man.

The same may be said of Napoleon the Great, who in his unexampled and incomparable victorious marches subdued the continent of Europe, until the frost and snow rose superior to him. Napoleon gathered around himself men, whether they were of high or low condition, and bound them as fraters for the attainment of his great design.

There are many magnificent pictures of men and events that are singularly Masonic. We find them in every rank and condition of life, as is evidenced by the one scene which I present to your view, that of the peasant who a century and a quarter ago, in the hallowed precincts of his lodge, chanted a song which will be immortal.

Who has not heard; who will ever forget the ryhthm, the beauty and sublimity of the lines of Robert Burns, when he said:

"By yonder hieroglyphic bright,
Which none but Craftsmen ever saw,
Fond memory on my heart shall write
These scenes when I am far awa'."

He was the greatest Scotchman that ever lived, and yet had it not been for the loving care of Masonry, which found in him an erring brother, he would have died amid the scenes of want in Christian Scotland.

But you may say, what of all this, we dwell in a different time and country? Most true, but perhaps it is not known to you that the American Republic was born in a Free Masons Lodge, and that the American Revolution, from the Declaration of Independence to the surrender at Yorktown, was fought, directed and victoriously concluded by Free Masons. Jefferson, who wrote the Declaration of Independence was a Free Mason. Franklin, who inspired it was a Free Mason. John Hancock, the first signer, was a Free Mason. Warren, who fell at Bunker Hill, the most illustrious son of Massachusetts in that struggle, was a Free Mason. Patrick Henry, who led the Revolutionary movement in Virginia, was a Free Mason. Howard, who led the Maryland Line, was a Free Mason. Lafayette, Pulaski, De Kalb, Von Steuben, who came from foreign lands to give the aid of their military genius and their swords to the American cause, were Free Masons. Stark who fought at Bennington, Gates, who won laurels at Saratoga, Marion, who commanded the Revolutionists in South Carolina, and many more of the immortals, were Free Masons. But the central figure of that time, the Father of his country, George Washington, was an enthusiast in the Masonic cause from the days of his youth to the moment when his spirit took its flight to eternity. He ever said that the greatest honor he had achieved was that of Master of his Lodge and the privilege of wearing the lamb's skin, or white leather apron—"the emblem of purity and the badge of a Mason."

To him we not only owe the superstructure of our present national government, but the architectural design of what will be the most beautiful city in the world. There the ancient orders of architecture have been remodeled and beautified, and there day by day, according to his plan, we are rearing edifices which will outrank all that has been done in the past. We will have the peerless capital of an incomparable republic. It is true that in the formation of our government, Free Masons were not alone, for there have been times, before and since, when the Free Mason and the Jesuit have labored together, each in secret but both for the same end.

Every step of our advancement since independence was achieved has been either originated or aided by companions of our organization. Whether it was Lewis and Clark journeying in the wilderness that led across the continent and to the discovery of the greath northwest, or Boone upon the frontier in Kentucky, or Crockett and Houston beneath the lone star of the Texan Republic, or Clinton building the Erie Canal, Fulton sending the first steam boat upon the waters, or Clay enunciating his system of American improvement and protection, or Lincoln saving the Union, or Hayes effecting the compromise which cemented the sections, Free Masonry was the mother and handmaiden of all.

And why has this been possible? Because Free Masonry is founded upon a higher and broader plan than any other association ever formed among mankind. It bears religion and morality, and yet it inquires not into the dead form or into the meaningless words which often form the chief charm of denominations and sects and religions. Free Masonry counts among its numbers devotees of every branch of religion, for it stands upon the broad ground of God in his universal Fatherhood, and men in their universal brotherhood, and because where men live among men, Free Masonry teaches that our first duty is not to the Spirit God in the distance, but to our fellowmen. With them we must walk and live and die, and for this reason Free Masonry has selected the most blessed tenets of all religions and above all commands those who have knelt at her altar to have charity and love for their fellows, for, in the language of the great Apostle Paul, "Faith, Hope and Charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity."

This was not new to Free Masons; it is a tenet universally accepted among them, and indeed, if I were to picture these three virtues I would paint Hope as a young man, strong, vigorous, simply clad, climbing a mountain side, bearing in the one hand a banner and in the other a staff, surmounting one obstacle after the other, conquering the opposing forces that would check his advance, thus journeying on until he has almost reached the top of the mountain, and yet not quite, and in his mien and face I would put the expression of undying, inextinguishable hope not attained but about to be achieved. If I were to paint Faith, it would be as a young and transcendently beautiful woman, clad in garments of white, standing upon the mountain height looking in wrapt vision down the vista of time, until it reached the impassible darkness of the future, and then I would have her sink upon her knees and whisper "though I cannot see, yet I believe," for "faith is the evidence of things unseen." But if I were to paint Charity it would be as a woman clad in serge, her face hidden by a dark hood, standing by the way-side in the gloaming of the eventide, as the vast stream of itinerant humanity goes to and fro, whispering words of counsel to the erring, giving food to the hungry and stretching forth her arm to hold up those who are about to fall, or stooping and, with all her strength, dragging from the dust and placing back in the highest estate some forlorn human being. Such is charity as commanded and practiced by Free Masons.

This organization, with its incomparable history, its universal existence, its noble motive, its splendid achievements, its modest secrecy, neither asks for approbation nor begs for recognition. It is willing to stand in its own strength, battling for what it holds to be right; in secret it is true, and yet who may attack it for its secrecy? Nature is a secret, and the greatest secret of all is Natur's God.

Occupying this vantage ground that looks out into the future, ready to make its forward march, having done its duty in the past we can say to every man who joins himself to the great army of those who are bounden by its vows and subject to its decrees, "he takes unto himself the highest of earthy honors." Aye standing upon this vantage ground, who will dispute the right of our fraternity to lay the corner-stone of a great building or to fashion the life of a splendid nation?

The great need we have is men, men who will act upon the everlasting principles of our Craft, charity toward men, truth and faith toward man's God. True it is that many who bear the name have not yet been joined to the accepted number. In my experience I have found among Free Masons those who had less regard for fraternity, for friendship and for justice, than had Judas Iscariot when he sold the Divine Master for thirty pieces of silver, and yet I have also found among them friends true as steel, men steadfast as adamant, men charitable even to the point to which the Master commanded.

For these reasons we deem it right and proper to be present here and lay this corner-stone "and so close" with malice toward none, with charity for all, but a firmness for the right as God gives us to see the right," and the renewal of the vow, that in this land of ours there shall be preserved, the true equilibrium which gives tolerance to all, supremacy to none.

Our work will soon be over and some of us, ere many years have sped, will be taken to our last resting place among these mountains, adding our dust to the earth that is already there, and we shall be forgotten; the building, of which we have laid the cornerstone, will by the needs of time or the demolition of nature, pass away, perhaps even the Government, County, State and National, which rules our country and gives authority for the superstructure may, like its predecessors in the world's history, fall into ruin, the various philosophies and religions that are mingled among those who surround me may one after the other be surrendered and rejected,—but in my opinion, so long as men do live, the Ancient and Honorable Fraternity which is present today will survive. When time shall be no more, and Eternity, the ring that hath no beginning and no end shall have taken its place, then and not until then shall its mission be accomplished, and its labors ended.

Judge Boyd's paper, read by Dr. E. H. Bartlett, follows:

Thirty-five years ago this Autumn it was determined by a vote of 1297 to 405 Garrett county should be formed, and on the seventh day of January, 1873, county officers were elected.

By the terms of the Act of Assembly (1872, Ch. 212) providing for the formation of the county it was embraced in the Fourth Judicial Circuit of Maryland and Garrett, Allegany and Washington counties have since then constituted that Circuit. By that Act the County Commissioners were authorized to purchased land for erection of necessary buildings for county purposes, and "to levy such tax upon the assessable property of Garrett county as may be necessary for the erection of said public buildings, when, in their judgment, the public convenience may require such buildings for the use of said county. By Ch. 346 of the Acts of 1874 the County Commissioners were authorized at their discretion, to erect a jail and a court house, and for the purpose to issue bonds. Those buildings were finally erected and the Circuit Court was held in the court house for the first time at the September term, 1877, the contract price for that building being $9,010.

The first court held in the county was on the 19th day of May, 1873, in the old Glades Hotel, which was subsequently destroyed by fire, and was presided over by Judges George A. Pearre and William Motter who were then the Associate Judges of this Circuit.

The December term of that year was also held in that Hotel; the May and September Terms 1874, in a store room at the corner of Third and Oak streets and the terms of 1875 and 1876, as well as the March term, 1877, were held in the M. E. Church and the school house at Oakland—the records not disclosing which were in the Church and which of them were in the school. Beginning in 1878 two jury terms and two non-jury terms have been regularly held in the present court house. It was soon discovered that the court house was inadequate, and before many years the small vault that was built for the records and papers would not hold them. The present vault was then built. It is now not only too small, but it is utterly unfit for the records, by reason of the dampness which is liable to seriously injured them and is my judgment it does not afford proper protection from fire. If the building was to burn the walls would doubtless fall and there would be every likelihood of the vault being so crushed as to seriously injure, if not totally destroy, the papers contained in it. The vault is already so crowded that the records cannot be examined with comfort, even if it be possible to use due care in doing so, but beyond that, there is no longer room for new records. There are now about three times as many deeds and mortgages recorded annually as there were during the early years of the county, and if a new court house had not been determined upon, new vaults must have been built. For some years past I have felt great concern about the land records of the county, although your efficient Clerk does everything in his power to protect and care for them. If the people of this county had fully realized the actual conditions, and what the results would be if the land records were destroyed, I believe the sentiment of the taxpayers would have been practically unanimous in favor of a new court house. The destruction of the records would cost them vastly more than the expense of a new building, not to speak of the difficulty of selling lands or borrowing money by the way of mortgage, until the necessary steps could be taken to perfect the titles. Several instances in this state have demonstrated the great

WHAT INDIAN SIGNS IMPLY

To the Unitiated, Nothing. But to Those Who Know, Much.

As time has passed and civilization has changed Indian conditions I was under the impression, says a writer in the San Francico Chronicle, that our red brothers had forgotten the use of signs in their travels, but as I was loitering about the hills in Siskiyou county a few weeks ago I came across a geninue Indian "sign," such as I had not seen for a dozen years or more. It was a simple little sign in appearence; but it was full of meaning to those who could read it. A long stick with one end stuck in the ground, the other learning and pointing up the road. The stick was elevated at an angle of only about 10 degrees from the ground and was supported on a stone. It told some Indain that his friend had been along there and had gone ahead in the direction pointed out by the stick.

I marveled at it, but on investigation found that the Indains of California still use signs to convey intelligence to each other. I found that amongthe Cocopahs, Cohuillas Pimas and Yumas the sign is as much in use as ever.

While traveling in San Bernandino county some months ago I came across a peculiar grouping of stones, and at once saw that some Indians had left a sign, so that all other Indians might know that water was to be found in a certain direction. The stones were lying in a complete circle and in the center was a long triangular stone, with a sharp point indicating a specific direction. The sign was plain to one versed in such things, and in order to see if the same sign was universal, for I had seen it elsewhere, I followed the direction pointed out by the long stone and found a little spring

This arrangement of stones I had often seen in a dozen different places in the Middle West and as variant which was also found in California I have seen a mound of stones, similiar to a miner's monument, with a pointed stone resting on top, pointing toward water. In many parts of the country, espically in the deepest parts of California and Arizona, the question of water supply for travelers is one that requires serious consideration, and I have known men to pass within a few hundred yards of water without knowing it, because they could not read Indian signs. The sign was in plain view, and was placed there because the Indians recognized the necessity of telling all who came along that they could find water. True, there was not a big board set up with "water" printed on it, but to the initiated it was equally plain. There is not a trail in all the Southwest that runs near a spring that does not have the sign openly displayed I have ever seen instances where the water was so far from the regular trail that especial signs have been made to show where it was. I remember one instance among the Shoshones where there was a large monument of stones with an extra long flat stone on top pointing toward the spring. After going in this direction for some distance I came upon another similar monument and before I got to the spring I found five distinct monuments showing the way.

Sometimes, however, these circles may not mean water at all, and then it is necessary to understand the intricacies of the Indian mind to understand just what he is driving at. I remember once when I was hunting on the Republican river I came across a circle of buffalo skulls, which attracted my attention because of their peculiar arrangement. Sixteen skulls were set in a semi-circle, with their noses pointing down the river. In the center of the circle was a skull on which were painted thirty-six red lines. Near the skulls were two small sticks placed upright in the ground, and at the top of each stick were tied two bundles of hair A Pawnee Indian was with me, and told me that thirty-six Pawnees had camped there. They had made a raid against a compos Comanches containing sixteen tents of lodges, and had taken four scalps. They were now returning home down the river. To the ordinary observer this arrangement of skulls and sticks would have given no more impression than the idea that some one had been amusing himself by playing with these buffalo skulls. To the Indian the arrangement was a complete story.

THE "RATTLER" IS EVER DANGEROU

Its Fangs Even When Removed, Are Regenerated Within a Short While.

A common misconception, which is apt to lead to serious accidents, writes Francis Metcalfe in the Outing Magazine, is the belief that the rattler is rendered perfectly harmless so that it can be handled with impunity, by the removal of its poisonous fangs. These fangs, two in number, are situated on the upper jaw, and lie flat, except when the serpent strikes, when they become erect, and the closing of the jaws compresses the poison glands and injects the venom, through minute openings in them. In striking its prey (for whatever charm the serpent may employ to get its victim within its reach, it relies upon the venom to give the coup de grace) these fangs may often be broken, and nature has provided a full supply of reserve weapons, which lie dormant in the gums, and which within two weeks will develop and replace the injured fang.

An acquaintance who returned from a hunting trip with twenty-five full-grown rattlers in a box, kept them in his office for two months, confined behind a coarse meshed wire screen. He handle them most carelessly, as he extracted the poison fangs, but when shown that each of them had developed a perfect pair of new ones, there was a sudden rise in the local snake mortality. One was preserved and sent to the Branx Zoo, where it shortly afterward gave birth to a large litter of young ones, which could have easily crawled through the screen behind which the mother had been kept. As each of them possessed the poison apparatus in full commission and was without the power to rattle, they would have been even more dangerous than adult snakes.

Professional snake handlers are often ignorant of this power to quickly replace fangs possessed by rattlers, and this ignorance led to a serious accident to one of them at Bostock's at Coney Island last year. He was badly bitten and narrowly escaped death, his recovery being attributed to the generous amonnt of whisky which was immediately administered to him, which illustrated another mistaken idea. It is a pity to shatter a pleasant illusion, but alcohol, except in very small doses, in harmful rather than beneficial as an antidote to snake bite poison.

As a matter of fact, although the symtoms of rattle-snake poisoning are more harmful and alarming, an adult rarely dies from the bite of the variety common in the North. The diamond backs of the South attain a much larger size, and consequently inject more venom, and their bite is proportionately more dangerous.

Valuable Property to Be Sold.

Mr. William E. Walsh, of Cumberland, mortgagee, advertises in this paper today the sale of the Bradley Farm, adjoining Oakland, which contains quite a large acreage. The land is suitable located for dairy or stock raising purposes. A portion of the land has been laid off into town lots through which streets have been located. The sale will take place on the premises on October 22nd, at eleven o'clock a. m. A plat of the property may be seen at the office of Mr. John T. Mitchell in Oakland or at the office of Mr. Walsh in Cumberland.

CHAPTER XIV.
In Honor of Miss Spencer.

Mr. Jack Moffat, president of the Bachelor Miners' Pleasure club, had embraced the idea of a reception for Miss Spencer with unbounded enthusiasm. Indeed, the earliest conception of such an event found birth within his fertile brain, and from the first he determined upon making it the most notable social function ever known in that portion of the territory.

The large space above the Occidental was secured for the occasion, the obstructing subdivisions knocked away, an entrance constructed with an outside stairway leading up from a vacant lot, and the passage connecting the saloon boarded up. Incidentally, Mr. Moffat took occasion to announce that if "any snoozer got drunk and came up them stairs" he would be thrown bodily out of a window. Mr. McNeil, who was observing the preliminary proceedings with deep interest from a pile of lumber opposite, sarcastically intimated that under such circumstances the attendance of club members would be necessarily limited. Mr. Moffat's reply it is manifestly impossible to quote literally. Mrs. Guffy was employed to provide the requisite refreshments in the palatial dining-hall of the hotel, while Buck Mason, the vigilant town marshal, popularly supposed to know intimately the face of every "rounder" in the territory, agreed to collect the cards of invitation at the door, and bar out obnoxious visitors.

The invited guests arrived from the sparsely settled regions round about, not a few riding for a hundred miles over the hard trails. The majority came early, arrayed in whatsoever apparel their limited wardrobes could supply, but ready for any wild frolic. The men outnumbered the gentler sex five to one, but every feminine representative within a radius of about 50 miles, whose respectability could possibly pass muster before the investigations of a not too critical invitation committee, was present.

Lieut. Brant was somewhat delayed in reaching the scene. Certain military requirements were largely responsible for this delay, and he had patiently wrestled with an unsatisfactory toilet, mentally excoriating a service which would not permit the transportation of dress uniforms while on scouting detail.

The dance was already in full swing when he finally pushed his way through the idle loungers gathered about the door, and gained entrance to the hall. Many glanced curiously at him, attracted by the glitter of his uniform, but he recognized none among them, and therefore passed steadily toward the musicians' stand, where there appeared to be a few unoccupied chairs.

"Miss Spencer, May I Inquire If You Possess Such a Phenomenon as a 'Star' Pupil?"

The scene was one of color and action. He watched the speeding figures, striving to distinguish the particular one whose charms had lured him thither. But among them all he was unable to distinguish the woodnymph whose girlish frankness and grace had left so deep an impression on his memory. Yet surely she must be present, for, to his understanding, this whole gay festival was in her honor. Directly across the room he caught sight of Rev. Mr. Wynkoop conversing with a lady of somewhat rounded charms, and picked his way in their direction.

The missionary, who, in truth, had been hiding an agonized heart behind a smiling face, was only too delighted at any excuse which would enable him to approach Miss Spencer, and press aside those cavaliers who were monopolizing her attention. The handicap of not being able to dance he felt to be heavy, and he greeted the lieutenant with unusual heartiness of manner.

"Why, most assuredly, my dear sir, most assuredly," he said. "Mrs. Herndon, permit me to make you acquainted with Lieut. Brant of the Seventh cavalry."

The two, thus introduced, bowed and exchanged a few words, while Mr. Wynkoop busied himself in peering about the room, making a great pretense at searching out the lady guest, who, in very truth, had scarcely been absent from his sight during the entire evening.

"Ah!" he ejaculated, "at last I locate her, and, fortunately, at this moment she is not upon the floor, although positively hidden by the men clustering about her chair. You will excuse us, Mrs. Herndon, but I have promised Lieut. Brant a presentation to your niece."

They slipped past the musicians' stand, and the missionary pressed in through the ring of admirers.

"Why, Mr. Wynkoop!" and she extended both hands impulsively. "And only to think, you have never once been near me all this evening! You don't know how much I have missed you. I was just saying to Mr. Moffat —or it might have ben Mr. McNeil— that I was completely tired out and wished you were here to sit out this dance with me."

Wynkoop blushed and forgot the errand which had brought him there, but she remained sufficiently cool and observant. She touched him gently with her hand.

"Who is that fine-looking young officer?" she questioned softly, yet without venturing to remove her glance from his face.

Mr. Wynkoop started. "Oh, exactly; I had forgotten my mission. He has requested an introduction." He drew the lieutenant forward. "Lieut. Brant, Miss Spencer."

The officer bowed, a slight shadow of disappointment in his eyes. The lady was unquestionably attractive, her face animated, her reception most cordial, yet she was not the maiden of the dark, fathomless eyes and the wealth of auburn hair.

"Such a pleasure to meet you," exclaimed Miss Spencer. "Do you know, lieutenant, that actually I have never before had the privilege of meeting an officer of the army. Your appearance supplies the one touch of color that was lacking to make the picture complete. Mr. Moffat has done so much to make me realize the breadth of western experience, and now, I do so hope, you will some time find opportunity to recount to me some of your army exploits."

The lieutenant smiled. "Most gladly; yet just now, I confess, the music invites me, and I am sufficiently bold to request your company upon the floor."

Miss Spencer sighed regretfully. "Why, really, Lieut. Brant, I scarcely see how I possibly can. I have already refused so many this evening, and now I almost believe I must be under direct obligation to some one of those gentlemen. Still," hesitatingly, "your being a total stranger here must be taken into consideration. Mr. Moffat, Mr. McNeil, Mr. Mason, surely you will grant me release this once?"

There was no verbal response to the appeal, only an uneasy movement; but her period of waiting was extremely brief.

"Oh, I knew you would; you have all been so kind and considerate." She arose, resting her daintily gloved hand upon Brant's blue sleeve, her pleased eyes smiling up confidingly into his. Then with a charming smile, "Oh, Mr. Wynkoop, I have decided to claim your escort to supper. You do not care?"

Wynkoop bowed, his face like a poppy.

"I thought you would not mind obliging me in this. Come, lieutenant."

Miss Spencer, when she desired to be, was a most vivacious companion, and always an excellent dancer. Brant easily succumbed to her sway, and became, for the time being, a victim to her charms. To Brant the experience brought back fond memories of his last cadet ball at the Point, and he hesitated to break the mystic spell with abrupt questioning. Curiosity, however, finally mastered his reticence.

"Miss Spencer," he asked, "may I inquire if you possess such a phenomenon as a 'star' pupil?"

The lady laughed merrily, but her expression became somewhat puzzled. "Really, what a very strange question! Why, not unless it might be little Sammy Worrell; he can certainly use the longest words I ever heard of outside a dictionary. Why, may I ask? Are you especially interested in prodigies?"

"Oh, not in the least; certainly not in little Sammy Worrell. The person I had reference to chances to be a young woman, having dark eyes, and a wealth of auburn hair. We met quite by accident, and the sole clew I now possess to her identity is a claim she advanced to being your 'star' pupil."

Miss Spencer sighed somewhat regretfully, and her eyes fell. "I fear it must have been Naida, from your description. But she is scarcely more than a child. Surely, lieutenant, it cannot be possible that you have become interested in her?"

He smiled pleasantly. "At least 18, is she not? I was somewhat impressed with her evident originality and hoped to renew our slight acquaintanceship here in more formal manner. She is your 'star' pupil, then?"

"Why, she is not really in my school at all, but I outline the studies she pursues at home, and lend her such books as I consider best adapted for her reading. She is such a strange girl!"

"Indeed? She appeared to me to be extremely unconventional, with a decided tendency for mischief. Is that your meaning?"

"Partially. She manages to do everything in a different way from other people. Her mind seems peculiarly independent, and she is so unreservedly western in her ways and language. But I was referring rather to her taste in books—she devours everything."

"You mean as a student?"

"Well, yes, I suppose so; at least she appears to possess the faculty of absorbing every bit of information, like a sponge. Sometimes she actually startles me with her odd questions. I really believe Mr. Wynkoop seeks to avoid meeting her, she has shocked him so frequently in religious matters."

"Does she make light of his faith?"

"Oh, no, not that exactly, at least it is not her intention. But she wants to know everything—why we believe this and why we believe that, doctrines which no one else ever dreams of questioning, and he cannot seem to make them clear to her mind. Some of her questions are so irreverent as to be positively shocking to a spiritually minded person."

They lapsed into silence, swinging easily to the guidance of the music. His face was grave and thoughtful. This picture just drawn of the perverse Naida had not greatly lowered her in his estimation, although he felt instinctively that Miss Spencer was not altogether pleased with his evident interest in another.

"It is very interesting to know that you two met in so unconventional a way," she ventured, softly, "and so sly of her not even to mention it to me. We are room-mates, you know, and consequently quite intimate, although she possesses many peculiar characteristics which I cannot in the least approve. I shall certainly do my best to guide her aright. Would you mind giving me some details of your meeting?"

For a moment he hesitated, feeling that if the girl had not seen fit to confide her adventure to this particular friend, it was hardly his place to do so. Then, remembering that he had already said enough to arouse curiosity, which might easily be developed into suspicion, he determined his course. In a few words the brief story was frankly told, and apparently proved quite amusing to Miss Spencer.

"Oh, that was Naida, beyond a doubt" she exclaimed, with a laugh of satisfaction. "It is all so characteristic of her. I only wonder how she chanced to guess your name; but really the girl appears to possess some peculiar gift in thus discerning facts hidden from others.

The music coming to a pause, they slowly traversed the room.

"I presume, then, she is not present?" he said, quietly.

Miss Spencer glanced into his face, the grave tone making her apprehensive that she might have gone too far.

"She was here earlier in the evening, but now that you remind me of it, I recall having noticed her of late, really, lieutenant, it is no my duty to chaperon the young girl. Mrs. Herndon could probably inform you of her present whereabouts."

Miss Spencer was conscious of the sting of failure, and her face flushed with vexation. "It is extremely close in here, don't you think?" she complained. "And I was so careless as to mislay my fan. I feel almost suffocated."

"Did you leave it at home?" he questioned. "Possibly I might discover a substitute somewhere in the room."

"Oh, no; I would never think of troubling you to such an extent. No doubt this feeling of lassitude will pass away shortly. It was very foolish of me, but I left the fan with my wraps at the hotel. It can be recovered when we go across to supper."

"It will be no more than a pleasure to recover it for you," he protested, gallantly.

The stairs leading down from the hall entrance were shrouded in darkness, the street below nearly deserted of loiterers, although lights streamed forth resplendently from the undraped windows of the Occidental and the hotel opposite. Assisted in his search by Mrs. Guffy, the officer succeeded in recovering the lost fan, and started to return. Just without the hotel door, under the confusing shadows of the wide porch, he came suddenly face to face with a young woman, the unexpected encounter a mutual and embarrassing surprise.

CHAPTER XV.
An Unusual Girl.

The girl was without wraps, her dress of some light, fleecy material fitting her slender figure exquisitely, her head uncovered; within her eyes Brant imagined he could detect the glint of tears. She spoke first, her voice faltering slightly.

"Will you kindly permit me to pass?"

He stepped instantly to one side, bowing as he did so.

"I beg your pardon for such seeming rudeness," he said, gravely. "I have been seeking you all the evening, yet this unexpected meeting caught me quite unawares."

"You have been seking me? That is strange. For what reason, pray?"

"To achieve what you were once kind enough to suggest as possible—the formality of an introduction. It would seem, however, that fate makes our meetings informal."

"That is your fault, not mine."

"I gladly assume all responsibility, if you will only waive the formality and accept my friendship."

Her face seemed to lighten, while her lips twitched as if suppressing a smile. "You are very forgetful. Did I not tell you that we Presbyterians are never guilty of such indiscretions?"

"I believe you did, but I doubt your complete surrender to the creed."

"Doubt! Only our second time of meeting and you already venture to doubt! This can scarcely be construed into a compliment, I fear."

"Yet to my mind it may prove the very highest type of compliment," he returned, reassured by her manner. "For a certain degree of independence in both thought and action is highly commendable. Indeed, I am going to be bold enough to add that it was these very attributes that awakened my interest in you."

"Oh, indeed; you cause me to blush already. My frankness, I fear, bids fair to cost me all my friends, and I may even go beyond your pardon, if the perverse spirit of my nature so move me."

"The risk of such a catastrophe is mine, and I would gladly dare that much to get away from conventional commonplace. One advantage of such meetings as ours is an immediate insight into each other's deeper nature. For one I shall sincerely rejoice if you will permit the good fortune of our chance meeting to be alone sponsor for our future friendship. Will you not say yes?"

She looked at him with greater earnestness, her young face sobered by the words spoken. Whatever else she may have seen revealed there, the countenance bending slightly toward her was a serious, manly one, inspiring respect, awakening confidence.

"And I do agree," she said, extending her hand in a girlish impulse. "It will, at least, be a new experience and therefore worth the trial. I will even endeavor to restrain my rebellious spirit, so that you will not be unduly shocked."

He laughed, now placed entirely at his ease. "Your meed of mercy is appreciated, fair lady. Is it your desire to return to the hall?"

She shook her head positively. "A cheap, gaudy show, all bluster and vulgarity. Even the dancing is a mere parody. I early tired of it."

"Then let us choose the better part, and sit here on the bench, the night our own."

He conducted her across the porch to the darkest corner, where only rifts of light stole trembling in between the shadowing vines, and there found convenient seats. A moment they remained in silence, and he could hear her breathing.

"Have you truly been at the hall," she questioned, "or were you merely fibbing to awaken my interest?"

"I truly have been," he answered, "and actually have danced a measure with the fair guest of the evening."

"With Phoebe Spencer! And yet you dare pretend now to retain an interest in me? Lieut. Brant, you must be a most talented deceiver, or else the strangest person I ever met. Such a miracle has never occurred before!"

"Well, it has certainly occurred now; nor am I in this any vain deceiver. I truly met Miss Spencer. I was the recipient of her most entrancing smiles; I listened to her modulated voice; I bore her off, a willing captive, from a throng of despairing admirers; I danced with her, gazing down into her eyes, with her fluffy hair brushing my cheek, yet resisted all her charms and came forth thinking only of you."

"Indeed? Your proof?"

He drew the white satin fan forth from his pocket, and held it out toward her with mock humility. "This, unbelieving princess. Dispatched by the fair lady in question to fetch this bauble from the dressing-room, I forgot my urgent errand in the sudden delight of finding you."

"The case seems fully proved," she confessed, laughingly, "and it is surely not my duty to punish the culprit. What did you talk about? But, pshaw, I know well enough without asking—she told you how greatly she admired the romance of the west, and begged you to call upon her with a recital of your own exploits. Have I not guessed aright?"

"Partially, at least; some such expressions were used."

"Of course, they always are. I do not know whether they form merely a part of her stock in trade, or are spoken earnestly. You would laugh to hear the tales of wild and thrilling adventure which she picks up, and actually believes. That Jack Moffat possesses the most marvelous imagination for such things, and if I make fun of his impossible stories she becomes angry in an instant."

"I am afraid you do not greatly admire this Miss Spencer?"

"Oh, but I do; truly I do. You must not think me ungrateful. No one has ever helped me more, and beneath this mask of artificiality she is really a noble-hearted woman. I do not understand the necessity for people to lead false lives. Is it this way in all society—eastern society, I mean? Do men and women there continually scheme and flirt, smile and stab, forever assuming parts like so many playactors?"

"It is far too common," he admitted, touched by her naive questioning. "What is known as fashionable social life has become an almost pitiful sham, and you can scarcely conceive the relief it is to meet with one utterly uncontaminated by its miserable deceits, its shallow make-believes. It is no wonder you shock the nerves of such people; the deed is easily accomplished."

"But I do not mean to." And she looked at him gravely, striving to make him comprehend. "I try so hard to be—be commonplace, and—and satisfied. Only there is so much that seems silly, useless, pitifully contemptible that I lose all patience. Perhaps I need proper training in what Miss Spencer calls refinement; but why should I pretend to like what I don't like, and to believe what I don't believe? Cannot one act a lie as well as speak one? And is it no longer right to search after the truth?"

"I have always felt it was our duty to discover the truth wherever possible," he said, thoughtfully; "yet, I confess, the search is not fashionable, nor the earnest seeker popular."

A little trill of laughter flowed from between her parted lips, but the sound was not altogether merry.

"Most certainly I am not. They all scold me, and repeat with manifest horror the terrible things I say, being unconscious that they are evil. Why should I suspect thoughts that come to me naturally. I want to know, to understand. I grope about in the dark. It seems to me sometimes that this whole world is a mystery. I go to Mr. Wynkoop with my questions, and they only seem to shock him. Why should they? God must have put all these doubts and wonderings into my mind, and there must be an answer for them somewhere. Mr. Wynkoop is a good man, I truly respect him. I want to please him, and I admire his intellectual attainments; but how can he accept so much on faith and be content? I know I am a perfect heathen,—Miss Spencer says I am,—but do you think it is so awful for me to want to know these things?"

He Drew Forth the Fan and Held It Out Toward Her.

"You merely express clearly what thousands feel without the moral courage to utter it. The saddest part of it all is, the deeper we delve the less we are satisfied in our intellectual natures. We merely succeed in learning that we are the veriest pygmies. Men like Mr. Wynkoop are simply driven back upon faith as a last resort, absolutely baffled by an impenetrable wall, against which they batter mentally in vain."

"Are you a church member?"

"Yes."

"Do you believe those things you do not understand?"

He drew a deep breath, scarcely knowing at that moment how best to answer, yet sincerely anxious to lead this girl toward the light.

"The majority of men do not talk much about such matters. They hold them sacred. Yet I will speak frankly with you. I could not statte in words my faith so that it would be clearly apprehended by the mind of another. I am in the church because I believe its efforts are toward righteousness, because I believe the teachings of Christ are perfect, His life the highest possible type of living, and because through Him we receive all the information regarding a future existence which we possess. That my mind rests satisfied I do not say; I simply accept what is given, preferring a little light to total darkness."

"But here they refuse to accept any one like that. They say I am not yet in a fit state of mind."

"Such a judgment would seem to me narrow. I was fortunate in coming under the influence of a broad-minded religious teacher. To my statement of doubts he simply said: 'Believe what you can; live the very best you can, and keep your mind open toward the light.' It seems to me now this is all that anyone can do whose nature will not permit of blind, unquestionable faith."

"I am so glad you have spoken in that way," she confessed. "I shall never feel quite so much alone in the world again, and I shall see these matters from a different viewpoint. Is it wrong—unwomanly, I mean—for me to question spiritual things?"

"I am unable to conceive why it should be. Surely woman ought to be as deeply concerned in things spiritual as man."

"How very strange it is that we should thus drift into such an intimate talk at our second meeting!" she exclaimed. "But it seems so easy, so natural, to converse frankly with some people—they appear to draw out all that is best in one's heart. Then there are others who seem to parch and wither up every germ of spiritual life."

"There are those in the world who truly belong together," he urged, daringly. "They belong to each other by some divine law. They may never be privileged to meet; but if they do, the commingling of their minds and souls is natural. This talk of ours to-night has, perhaps, done me as much good as you."

"Oh, I am so glad if it has! I—I do not believe you and Miss Spencer conversed in this way?"

"Heaven forbid! And yet it might puzzle you to guess what was the main topic of our conversation."

"Did it interest you?"

"Deeply."

"Well, then, it could not be dress, or men, or western romance, or society in Boston, or the beautiful weather. I guess it was books."

"Wrong; they were never mentioned."

"Then I shall have to give up, for I do not remember any other subjects she talks about."

"Yet it was the most natural topic imaginable—yourself."

"You were discussing me? Why, how did that happen?"

"Very simply, and I was wholly to blame. To be perfectly honest, Miss Naida, I attended the dance to-night for no other object than to meet you again. But I had argued myself into the belief that you were Miss Spencer. The discovery of my mistake merely intensified my determination to learn who you really were. With this purpose, I interviewed Miss Spencer, and during the course of our conversation the facts of my first meeting with you became known."

"You told her how very foolish I acted?"

"I told her how deeply interested I had become in your outspoken manner."

"Oh! And she exclaimed, 'How romantic!'"

"Possibly; she likewise took occasion to suggest that you were merely a child, and seemed astonished that I should have given you a second thought."

"Why, I am 18."

"I told her I believed you to be of that age, and she ignored my remark. But what truly surprised both of us was, how you happened to know my name."

The girl did not attempt to answer, and she was thankful enough that there was not sufficient light to betray the reddening of her cheeks.

"And you do not mean, even now, to make clear the mystery?" he asked.

"Not—now," she answered, almost timidly. "It is nothing much, only I would rather not now."

The sudden sound of voices and laughter in the street beneath brought them both to their feet.

"Why, they are coming across to supper," she exclaimed, in surprise. "How long we have been here, and it has seemed scarcely a moment! I shall certainly be in for a scolding, Lieut. Brant; and I fear your only means of saving me from being promptly sent home in disgrace will be to escort me in to supper."

"A delightful punishment!" He drew her hand through his arm, and said: "And then you will pledge me the first dance following?"

"Oh, you mustn't ask me. Really, I have not been on the floor to-night; I am not in the mood."

"Do you yield to moods?"

"Why, of course I do. Is it not a woman's privilege? If you know me long it will be to find me all moods."

"If they only prove as attractive as the particular one swaying you to-night, I shall certainly have no cause for complaint. Come, Miss Naida, please cultivate the mood to say yes before those others arrive."

She glanced up at him, shaking her dark hair, her lips smiling. "My present mood is certainly a good-natured one," she confessed, softly, "and consequently it is impossible to say no."

His hand pressed hers, as the thronging couples came merrily up the steps.

"Why, Naida, is this you, child? Where have you been all this time?" It was Miss Spencer, clinging to Mr. Wynkoop's arm.

"Merely sitting out a dance," was the seemingly indifferent answer; then she added sweetly, "Have you ever met my friend, Lieut. Brant, of the Seventh cavalry, Phoebe? We were just going in to supper."

Miss Spencer's glance swept over the silent young officer. "I believe I have had the honor. It was my privilege to be introduced to the gentleman by a mutual friend."

The inward rush of hungry guests swept them all forward in laughing, jostling confusion; but Naida's cheeks burned with indignation.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. Among them is a stranger who introduces himself by the name of Hampton, also Gillis, the post trader, and his daughter. Gillis and a majority of the soldiers are killed during a three days' siege.

CHAPTER II.—Hampton offers assistance to the girl, and is at first spurned because he is known as a gambler.

CHAPTER III.—Hampton and the girl only escape from the Indians. They fall exhausted on the plains.

CHAPTER IV.—A company of the Seventh cavalry, Lieut. Brant in command, find Hampton and the girl on the plains, and restore them to consciousness. Hampton announces that he proposes to care for the girl.

CHAPTER V.—Hampton and the girl stop at the Miners' Home in Glencaid, Mrs. Duffy, proprietess. Rev. Howard Wynkoop proposes that Hampton place Miss Gillis in care of Mrs. Herndon. He consents to think it over.

CHAPTER VI.—Hampton talks the future over with Miss Gillis—the Kid. She shows him her mother's picture and tells him what she can of her parentage and life. They decide she shall live with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VII.—The Kid takes up her residence with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VIII.—Naida—the Kid—runs away from Mrs. Herndon's and rejoins Hampton. He induces her to go back, and to have nothing more to do with him.

CHAPTER IX.—Hampton plays his last game of cards. He announces to Red Slavin that he has quit, and then leaves Glencaid.

CHAPTER X.—Miss Phoebe Spencer arrives in Glencaid to teach its first school.

CHAPTER XI.—Miss Spencer meets Naida, Rev. Wynkoop, etc. She boards at Mrs. Herndon's.

CHAPTER XII.—Naida and Lieut. Brant again meet without his knowing who she is. She informs him of the coming Bachelor club ball in honor of Miss Spencer.

CHAPTER XIII.—Lieut. Brant meets Silent Murphy, Custer's scout. He reports trouble brewing among the Sioux.

Mr. Gaither Makes a Hit in State Senator Gorman's Home Town.

No public building in which the meetings of Mr. George R Gaither, the Republican candidate for Governor has been held has been large enough to contain the vast crowds that assembled to hear his discussion of the issues of the campaign. At Ellicott City on Saturday night, in the very home of Senator Gorman, one of the most astute leaders of the Democratic party in the state, the throng of people who greeted Mr. Gaither was the largest and most enthusiastic ever seen in the county seat of Howard. Down there the people have felt the sting of the Democratic party lash and when Mr. Gaither unfolded to them the familiar picture of the trick ballots they saw and even felt afresh the lacerations that had been inflicted upon the body politic by the Democratic bosses. Here is the picture that Mr. Gaither drew, so familiar to his Howard county audience: "The splendid results," said the speaker, "of the elections which were held from 1896 to 1900 in this state under the provisions of the fair election law of 1906, seem to cause most conflicting emotions in the breasts of our opponents. We are told with great solemnity that the Republican party should not have the entire credit for this admirable law, but that, on the other hand, it was also to the credit of a Senate, which consisted of 12 Republicans, 11 regular Democrats and 2 independent Democrats that this wise measure was enacted. We gladly conceded to the independent Democrats in the Senate of 1907 who aided us in securing our fair election law, all the credit to which they are justly entitled. But how can the Democrats, as a party, claim any credit for this fair law when they ruthlessly violated its provisions at the first opportunity when they had the power to change its provisions.

"The fair declaration of the law of 1896, that the ballot should be counted as far possible to carry out the intent of the voter, was ingeniously changed so as to make the present ballot defeat the intent by every form of construction. Under the extra-session and every devious device which ingenuity could suggest have been restored to. Instead of a ballot easily marked and easily counted, we have a law under which no citizen no matter how intelligent or how much he may contribute to the support of his government, can be sure that his ballot has been counted at any election.

"The thumbmark of an unscrupulous judge, the slightest mutilation of the ballot, the making of one crossmark out of a great number which may in the slightest degree slip beyound the square the inability to refold a ballots in the exact creases in which it was originally folded—any one of these will destroy the right of an American citizen to cast his ballot; but, above and beyond all this, every voter is required, within a few moments, in a dimily lighted booth to make 24 crossmarks in the city of Baltimore, and almost as many in the counties of this state, at the coming election, in order to vote for all the candidates and measures which are presented to him for his decision.

There are thousands of good citizens in this state who are from their early training on account of their occupation, which does not qualify them for such an effort, practically disfranchised by this onerous requirement. I cannot believe that the people of this state will longer tolerate these burdens upon the franchise.

"It should be the first duty of a Republican legislature and a Republican governor to enact a law which will do away with all these abuses, which will restore to all the people of this state the right to vote and to have that vote counted as cast, and especially to enact some feature which will allow the voter, if he so desires, by a single mark, to cast his ballot for all the candidates of the party of his choice, without being subjected to the dangers and annoyances of the present law. Moreover, such a system will promote independent voting. Any independent party voter can easily and safely, by a few marks, vote for the several candidates of the opposite party whom he favors, and still vote the balance of his party ticket, whilst the real independent will mark each candidate for whom he wishes to cast his ballot in the same manner as he now exercises the privilege.

"A dishonest ballot debauches and corrupts the electorate of our state and lowers the moral standard of the people. An honest ballot, a fair count and the participation of every citizen in the affairs of his government are the foundation-stones of American institutions. If the law under which the right of suffrage is exercised is vicious and debased the government based upon it will surely be tainted by the same influences."

---

THE Baltimore Sun on Tuesday published a praiseworthy editorial endorsing the recent compacts by politicians in various counties of this State to prevent the use of whiskey to influence voters on election day. Such utterances, though, would come with a better grace if the Sun had not recently prevented the nomination of a Democratic candidate for Governor because of his pro-temperance views.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Dunnington, who so efficiently managed the Chautauqua Hotel the past season, go to Kingwood, W. Va., to take charge of a hotel at that place. We would be pleased to have them return to the Park next season and manage one of our hotels.

The driving party as noted last week, consisting of Dr. W. W. Davis and others, returned to the Park Tuesday, well pleased with their outing.

Our Methodist citizens should be well pleased with the action of the M. E. Conference in the return of Rev. E. J. Westfall and the election of Rev. Joseph Lee and Dr. Ward delegates to the M. E. General Conference.

Dr. Willets gave a very interesting talk in the M. E. Church at 11 o'clock Sunday morning.

The wife and little daughter of Clarence Michael of Pittsburg, after a visit among relatives and friends in this neighborhood, was called to her home Tuesday by the announcement that her husband had fallen from a building on which he was working and broken his ankle and sustained other injuries.

Rev. Jacob Cuppett was admitted to the West Virginia M. E. Conference and given a charge in Morgantown District at Wise.

Miss Ella Hopkins has been quite ill at the residence of her brother-in-law, Rev. L. A. Rudisill. She is now better.

The question of publishing a weekly paper at the Park is being agitated.

REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN OPENED AUSPICIOUSLY.

often that this law was intended to disfranchise the colored voters of our State. Out of the 12,985 registered voters of Allegany, only 462 were colored, whilst the total registered vote of Garrett in 1907, shows 4,149, of which only 24 are colored, and yet the total vote at the elections in these counties show the great falling off in the number of registered votes. In the election for Governor in Allegany, in 1899, under our Fair Election Law of 1896, there were 9,270 votes counted. In 1903, in the same county, there were only 7,966 votes counted, a difference of 1,304. In 1900, in the vote for President, the total vote was 10,880 under our old law, whilst in 1904 the total vote had fallen to 9,289, a loss of 1,691 votes, whilst in the State election of 1905 the total vote of Allegany fell to 7,486, but the registration of 1899 as compared with the registration for 1905 shows an increase of voters from 11,537 to 12,985, an increase of over 1,400 votes, whilst the vote has decreased nearly 1,600. These figures show conclusively the great percentage of the white voters of Allegany who are disfranchised by the present law. In Garrett county the same story is told. The vote for Governor in 1899 was 3,246 as against 2,665, a loss of 580 votes. In the election for President in 1900, 3,580 votes were cast as against 3,063 recorded in 1904, a difference of 517 votes, whilst in the State election of 1905, under the Wilson amendment to the Extra-Session law, the total vote of Garrett was only 2,320. At the same time the ragistered vote increased from 3,931 in 1899 to 4,149 in 1905, and yet in spite of this increase we see the wholesale falling off in the counted vote of Garrett county. Could there be a greater evidence of the pernicious effect of this election law of 1901, and especially of its effect upon the white voters of our State?

The selection of candidates for the United States Senatorship by a direct vote of the people is a great reform which can only be successfully carried out under a legalized system of primaries held throughout the State on the same day for both political parties, and with plain provisions whereby the candidate receiving the highest number of votes throughout the State shall be declared the nominee of his party for this lofty position. To such a plan, and its proper enactment into law as a part of the statues of this State, our party is unequivocally committed, and it will be the duty of a Republican Legislature and Governor to successfully inaugurate this needed reform. The attempt of the Democratic managers to provide a party substitute for these requirements has resulted in a complete failure. It is on a par with their efforts through the guise of a Senatorial primary to divert the minds of the people from the important State issues which are confronting them, and to make the election of a United States Senator of paramount importance. This specious attempt to run a State campaign on a National issue has met with the disastrousfailure that such a deceiving method deserves. The numerous "conferences," the attempts of would-be aspirants to bind the Legislative candidates to a blind support of plans which are at variance with the instructions of their State Convention, the contradictory terms of the State convention resolutions, themselves, have all contributed to deepen the darkness of the chaos into which the "paramount" issue has been plunged. Without any agreements, even of a gentlemanly character, it is a "go-as-you-please," if not a "free-for-all" race. The entries are judiciously distributed from a geographical standpoint, three from the Eastern Shore and three from the balance of the State, and yet there is a strong suspicion on the part of the sporting fraternity that most of the entries are from the same stable, and that in this event, unlike the State convention, there will be no necessity for a dark horse to come to the front, but that after a becoming setting of the pace on the part of certain gentlemen, so as to dispose of the one independent entry, the finish will be an easy victory for the favorite of the political ring, ex-Governor John Walter Smith. It remains to be seen whether the people of Maryland will tolerate this thinly veiled scheme for disposing of the United States Senatorship.

The education of the youth of our State upon broad and helpful lines should be of primary importance to any State administration, but especially to Republican officials. Our party has always believed in the principle that it is the truth which makes you free, and that the greatest bulwark of our institutions is an intelligent and educated electorate. Ignorance and illiteracy are injurious to our system of government, but when that ignorance is the result of unfortunate conditions in the early life of the citizen which prevented him from enjoying any opportunities for instruction, it is a misfortune and not a crime, and can be easily corrected in succeeding generations by the broad system of education in which we believe. Especially should the education of our youth tend to promote the industrial usefulness of the coming citizen. The dignity of all forms of productive labor should be emphasized and the children of our State taught and trained to consider agricultural and industrial occupations of equal importance with the literary professions. The work of the farm, the shop and the mine must be made sufficiently attractive and remunerative to command the interest and support of men of intelligence and training. I trust that the Federal Government may be induced to cooperate with the States in securing agricultural training in higher schools, which at the present time put too great a premium on mere literary training as a practical step in the improvement of our schools. We advocate an increase in the meagre salaries of the teachers of our State, and the lengthening of the school year as far as our revenues will permit.

There are some other features of a progressive State administration which might be properly referred to. The inauguration of a system of State Market roads and the restoration of our oyster industry to its former prosperity are matters which should receive the careful attention of the next administration. My experience as a member of the city government has convinced me that every species of graft can be eliminated from public contracts by a faithful adherence to certain fixed rules and methods in awarding the same. If I am elected to the high office of Governor of Maryland I shall enter upon the discharge of its duties with only one purpose in view to give to the people of my native State a clean, honest, progressive and yet economical administration of their affairs."

Mr. Urner said, in part:

The situation in this county is a standing rebuke to those who are so incessantly asserting the importance of Democratic success to the maintenance of white supremacy, and the operation of the extra session law here shows most conclusively that its disfranchising effects are disastrous, even in an exclusively white community In your registration for state elections the number of colored voters has decreased from 30 in 1901 to 24 in 1905. Your total registered vote in those years has ranged from 3,992 to 4,217; but the vote actually counted was, on an average, 1,648 short of the registered vote. In the two state elections held in 1897 and 1899, under the fair election law of 1896, the difference between the vote registered and that counted was, on an average, only 966. These results, therefore, show a loss of 982 in the counted vote of Garrett county due to the extra session legislation. If this loss excluded the vote of every colored man in the county whose name appeared on the registration books it would still involve the disfranchisement of at least 952 white citizens.

We have been contending with earnestness and sincerity that the paramount issue of this campaign is not a partisan, but a popular, question, because the election law passed by the extra cession disfranchises our voters indiscriminately, without regard to their party, race or color. No one doubts that thousands af reputable Democratic voters all over the state lose their franchise every year on account of the arbitrary exactions of the present law. In this county, with 24 colored and 4,000 white voters, the extra-session law has proven to be a much greater hardship to the Democratic party than to our own. While nearly a thousand white voters have lost their suffrage at the state elections since the extra session, the Republican pluralities in Garrett county have substantially increased. Under the act of 1896 our pluralities in the elections of 1897 and 1899 averaged 605, while under the act of 1901 they have averaged 752.

Our appeal for a free and fair election system is addressed to the intelligence and conscience of the people of Maryland, regardless of their party affiliation. We demand that the law be relieved of its present rigorous requirements, in order that every party may exercise, with ease and certainty, the high prerogative of the suffrage.

BITTINGER.

As an indisputable evidence of the near approach of winter there was snow seen flying in the air at air intervals during the past four days, the last flurry being noticed last Monday morning.

Rev. J. B. Shoup started from his home at this place last Monday afternoon to be in attendance at the Lutheran Conference to be held at Westernport this week.

Miss Laura Fazenbaker drove down from Oakland last Saturday and spent the night and part of Sunday with her mother.

Mrs. Slabach and daughter, Mrs. Killius, of Sunnyside, are visiting relatives in this neighborhood this week.

Abel DeWitt, of near Oakland, was in this section early this week buying up lambs for the eastern markets.

Deputy Sheriff Hamill Lee and Constable W. A. Maffett, of Oakland, passed through this village last week and spoke a pleasent word to friends in passing.

Titus Delawder, of Oakland, passed through this place last Sunday afternoon en route for Mount Nebo, where he has been employed to teach the Engle school.

Master Edgar Hayward, who is attending school here, spent last Sunday with his parents at Bond.

Simon Brenneman, the hustling barn builder is at home this week, digging potatoes.

Mahlon Brenneman, of McHenry, came down last Sunday for a short visit with his folks.

Resolutions of Respect.

At a meeting of Elizabeth Grange No. 195, held on October 12, the following resolutions were adopted as a memorial to the late Benjamin F. Shaffer, a member of the organization:

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God to remove from his labors on earth our faithful and worthy brother Benjamin F. Shaffer, past master of the Garrett County Pomona Grange, and also past master of Cherry Creek Grange, of which he was a member thirty-three years ago.

WHEREAS, It is our duty to bow in submission to His holy will and strive to uncomplaingly accept the mandates of Him who doeth all things well; therefore, be it resolved—

First, that Elizabeth Grange, although sorely afflicted by the burden of our great loss, still we hope to keep alive an ascendant faithin the wisdom of Him who never willingly afflicts or grieves the children of men.

Second, that in the death of Brother Shaffer his family has lost a loving husband and father and our Gaange a wise and faithful member.

Third, that we extend to his bereaved wife and family our sincere sympathy in the sad loss, and that a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this Grange and that a copy be sent his grief stricken faimly.

J. M. CONNEWAY,
FRED. GORTNER,
JAMES W. MASON,
Comittee.

FIKE.

Everything in this community has been quiet for some time but now there is quite a stir.

The Connecting Telephone Co. cut a certain man off the line for bad conduct and as a result there is considerable trouble about the affair.

Mr. J. A. Fike made a trip to Braddock, Pa., last Saturday to see his brother S. K. Fike, who lives there. While there Mr. Fike bought his brother's interests out in the Connecting Telephone Co. Mr. P. F. Fike returned from Uniontown, Pa., packed his household goods at this place and started for Unionnown again and intends to make that place his home.

The Brethren at this place will hold their "love feast" at Markleysburg on Oct. 26.

The Sunday School will close at this place on Oct. 20.

Master Edgar Heyward, of Bond was at this place a few days ago.

Mr. Roy Chishohn, one of our neighbors was out hunting the other day and killed thirteen squirrels.

The farmers have not completed their fall work yet as it is bad for them to get their work done. It will require some time yet to finish.

THE DEATH RECORD.

SAMUEL KIMMELL.

Samuel Kimmel, an enterprising farmer who lived near Hutton died on Friday night, Oct. 11, of preumonia, superinduced by heart failure. Mr. Kimmell was born in Somerset county Pa. At the time of his death his age was sixty years, four months and eighteen days. He was a consistent member of the M. E. church, and leaves a wife, one daughter and eight sons, all living. The deceased was a practical farmer, very energetic and industrious; a man whose veracity was never questioned; honest and upright; in short was a Christain gentleman, kind husband, good father and highly esteemed by those who knew him best. The funeral services were held in the M. E. church at Oakland Sunday afternoon, Oct. 13th. As the pastor of the church was attending the Annual Conference and Rev. J. M. Davis was not at home, Rev. E. Manges, pastor of the Lutheran church very kindly took charge of the services. The family has the sympathy of the entire community. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."—Thess. 4-14.

BEALLVILLE.

The snow storm Sunday last made us think that winter is near at hand.

Mr. and Mrs. Arch. Broadwater, of Avilton, were guests of Mrs. Broadwater's sister, Mrs. James Carey, Sunday last.

Miss Rose McMahon, of Frostburg, spending some time at the home of her parents at this place.

Miss Annie Carey is engaged at C. F. Graham's.

Mrs. C. J. Otto and daughter, Mrs. Floyd Broadwater, spent Saturday night last with Mrs. Otto's daughter, Mrs. Chas. Layman.

Mr. and Mrs. Sam. McKenzie, of Frostburg, spent a few days recently at Mrs. McKenzie's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Ravenscroft, at this place.

The farmers of this section are about through with their fall work.

Mrs. Thos. Ravenscroft and daughter, Mrs. Ed. Wiland, were calling on Mrs. Ravenscroft's mother, Mrs. W. B. Murphy Sunday last.

Miss Cora Layton, of Frostburg, spent Sunday last at her home at this place.

Messrs. Scott and John Garlitz, Reed Anderson and Harry Blocher were all engaged Thursday last in hauling lime from Yoder's lime kiln near Grantsville, for Harry Blocher.

Thos. Ravenscroft and sister Ena spent Saturday and Sunday last in Frostburg, the guests of their brother Merton.

Miss Emma Blocher was the guest of Miss Rella Murphy Sunday last.

We are sorry to learn of the death of Mr. Hickenbaugh Saturday night last, who met with a fatal accident, by his wagon upsetting and horses running away, on Wednesday last while hauling a load for the pumping station near here. He was brought to Mr. Moon's where he was cared for until his death.

Henry Blocher is our champion potato raiser. He raised over four hundred bushels on an acre of ground.

She Saw Them.

Exaggeration and misstatement of facts are the evils of the day. It is a habit with some people; they do it unconsciously. This habit is not confined to the people of any particular age or class. The story is told of a girl who became so accustomed to exaggeration and misstatement that nobody could believe her, and her parents were greatly annoyed by the unfortunate reputation she was acquiring. One afternoon her mother said to her:

"Now listen, Lillian, and heed my words. What has happened to one sinner may easily happen to another; you know what happened to Ananias and Sapphira, don't you?"

"Yes'm, I do; they fell dead on a street corner; I saw them carried into a drug store."

Mr. Edward H. Sincell, who is associate counsel in the Maryland-West Virginia boundary line case, was in Washington Tuesday where he was admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States. The case between the two States invovling the boundary line will soon come up for a hearing the Supreme Court, the records having been filled Tuesday by Attorney General Bryan, of Maryland, and Mr. Friend and by Gen. George E. Price, of Charleston, West Va.

The wholesale price of beer has been raised in Philadelphia and other Northern cities, and it is said that the local brewers are preparing to follow suit. As a consequence, it will not be long before there is more froth on the "growler" and the size of the schooner will be cut down. It is curious that this calamity has come almost simultaneously with the increase in the price of votes. The dual elevation tends to create dismal forebodings in the breast of the average political worker.

There are a large number of useless dogs running about town. They are no good to their owners and no good to the community at large. They keep up a barking and yelping at night, scare children, frighten horses, and make themselves a nuisance in general. Most cities and many towns have a license, and every dog is required to wear a tag, or be taken in by the dog catcher. This is a good scheme. Besides putting a little money in the city treasury it rids the community of numerous worthless curs. We believe our city council would be wise in adopting such a plan here. Tnose who have dogs which they prize for one reason or another would not object to the small tax.

At the Conference of the M. E. church held in Huntington, W. Va., Dr. R. B. Ward, of Oakland, and Dr. Joseph Lee, of Mt. Lake Park, were elected delegates to the General Conference of the M. E. church, which will be held in Baltimore next year. Dr. Ward served at the last session of Conference, which was held in California, and his election to succeed himself has not been precedented since the year 1872, which reflect creditably upon him and his work. Other ministerial delegates elected besides the gentlemen above mentioned were Rev. S. K. Arbuthnot, S. J. Miller and L. E. Ressegger. The friends of Mr. F. A. Thayer, of Oakland, made a strong effort to have him elected as a lay delegates, Mr Thayer receiving 44 votes on the first ballot.

Man that is born of his parents is of few days and full of microbes. He goeth to school when a youngster and gets the seat of his pants paddled for something he didn't do until he is sick at heart. He groweth up like a weed in a back yard, and soon reaches the age when he is composed largely of feet, freckles and an appetite for pie. About the time he gets too long for short trousers and not long ones he goeth away to college, learneth how to monkey with a three dollar mandolin and play whiskey poker. He cometh home a bigger fool than ever and marrieth a sweet young thing whose pa is supposed to be wealthy but whom he subsequently ascertaineth couldn't buy the prize rooster at county fair. He worrieth along from year to year, gradually acquring offsprings, until his house resembles a Sunday school class just before Christmas. He fretteth through the day and lieth awake nights trying to figure out how to keep himself and his dependent population out of the poor house. Efforts are rewarded by having his daughters run away and get married and bring him home a nice son-in-law every few days to feast at his board. His sons grow up and call him governor and set him back a five spot every day or two. About the time he was acquired enough lucre to make it worth while for his heirs to quarrel over, he contracts a cold and is hurried away before he has time to have a talk with his family. His sons blow in his estate on bad whiskey and plug hats, and his wife puts the finishing touches to his career by marrying the hired man.

PRESIDING ELDER WARD'S REPORT

To The West Virginia Annual Conference of The M. E. Church.

To Bishop Henry Spellmeyer, D. D, L. L. D., president, and members of the West Virginia Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal churche:

Brethren, in making this my fourth annual report to you, it is with profound gratitude to God, our heavenly Father, the Giver of every good gift, and the Dispenser of every gracious providence.

He has graciously sustained us during the year, and the lives of the brethren have been precious in His sight. In but one instance, has real sorrow come into our parsonages, that in the case of the death of the little daughter (Mary) of Bro. and Sister P. W. Matheny. Our sympathy goes out to them.

Throughout the year we have sought to give special attention to revivals, and aggressive evangelism. The preachers have been loyal and energetic in this work, and I believe there is not a charge within the district but has felt the touch of revival power. There have been some notable revivals at various points, viz: Oakland, with 115 conversions; Evansville, 106; Blaine, 175; St. George, 70; Mt. Lake Park, 70; Rowelsburg 100; Pendleton, 60, and Tunnelton with 201 conversions. All told there have been reported to me during the year 1250 conversions on the district, a large per cent. of which have and will be received into full membership in the church. The preachers are careful to organize probationers' classes, so that our young members come to us better trained than in former years, and as a result more of them are gathered into the church for permanent membership.

The work of the Sunday schools is prospering throughout the district. Our people are loyal to this phase of christian work. Our own literature is almost universaly used, except in a few cases where union schools and union churches, so called, are involved. In these cases we always suggest that our literature is second to none.

Many of our pastors and churches are active in the promotion and work of the Epworth League. An active League is found to be helpful in revivals, social work of the church, and in looking after strangers coming within our borders. A very earnest and helpful Epworth League convention was held in June, at Bayard, W. Va.

We have not done so much this year, in the way of church building, yet I am glad to say at Newburg, a splendid two story brick church, with stone trimming, is in process of erection. This building will cost not less than $5500, when completed. Bro. E. O. Woodyard is laboring with his own hands as well as superintending the erection of this building. The people appreciate his labors. He is the best suited, best watched preacher in the conference. He also dons a good hat and is well shod; altogether it cost more than $100—he is also a good preacher.

The church at Aurora has been improved at a cost of $25, and the money has been raised to paint the Bellview church on the same charge.

At Bayard the foundation of the church has been improved at a probable cost of $25.

On the Bruceton charge three organs have been put into the churches at a cost of $240. Improvements have been made on Bruceton, and Laurel Run churches to the amount of $200.

The church at Cranesville has been reroofed and painted at a cost of something less than $200, and at Oak Grove appointment a new organ has been purchased at a cost of $90.

Bethel church, on Evansville charge, has been improved at a cost of $350, and Zion church at a cost of $30.

The church at Grantsville has been improved costing $200, and the church at Fairview costing $60.

Progress has been made in the last few years in the district, and the present year finds the district practically out of debt.

Terra Alta, under the leadership of J. W. Engle, has paid during the year a debt of $3000, leaving our fine church property free of debt.

Oakland has paid a small debt of $200 during the year.

At Thomas, through the untiring and heroic effort of W. C. Strohmeyer, an embarrassing debt of $1000 was cancelled. Great credit is due him and all parties concerned in this consummation so devoutly wished.

At Mt. Lake Park a debt of $600, which has been embarrassing to the church for the last eight years has been paid. Much credit is due the pastor, E. J. Westfall.

On the Parsons charge the debt on the Hambleton church has been paid during the year amounting to something like $200. This places this church on a solid basis after years of struggle.

We have 27 parsonage on this district, most of which are comfortable and commodious.

The parsonage at Evansville has been furnished with all of the substantial furniture at a cost of something less than $100. This is commendable and I trust the day is not distant when all our parsonages will be nicely fitted up with substantial furniture. A. M. Crabtree deserves great credit in this success.

Sinclair charge has remodeled the parsonage at a cost of $500, greatly adding to its beauty and comfort; the pastor now lives in a commodious home.

Mt. Lake Park has secured a good parsonage property, well situated, for $1300. A rare bargain and adds strength and permanency to this charge.

At Kingwood the congregation has built and paid for during the year, a fine brick parsonage, with all modern conveniences, costing $6002, situated on a beautiful lot valued at $2000. This is one of the finest parsonages in the State. Great credit is due all concerned.

At Parsons some improvement has been made on the parsonage, and a walk has been laid in front of the church and parsonage costing more than $50, all of which has been paid.

Improvements have been made at Terra Alta on the parsonage and grounds to the amount of $200.

We have given special attention to the church Benevolences, especially foreign missions, and church extension. We find some people, even in the churches who are not in sympathy with the missionary interest of the church, yet I think upon the whole the interest is increasing with the years. Missionary literature was liberally distributed throughout the district early in the year, and we trust when all reports are in to have an increase for the year. Many of the men are deligent and zealous in this work and always come up at the close of the year with an increase. I am sorry to say, there are always some few exceptions, and these exceptions some times give us a shortage in the annual collection. I am glad to note a handsome increase in the missionary collection, at Oakland, Kingwood, Terra Alta and Hendericks and Evenwood. Several other points have made an increase over last year.

The men were at the posts of duty soon after the adjournment of the Conference. They have done faithful work throughout the year, and their fidelity to the Master and his cause has made the success of the district possible. While their salaries are not large, not what they should be, yet they prosecute the work without murmer or complaint. Our success in the field is their victory in the churches.

I have pressed the work of this large district, with, I trust, sufficient prudence and zeal, with untiring energy, not at times without weariness of body and brain, in His name, knowing that these is a reward at the end of duty. I have tried to be good to the brethren; they have been good to me.

His blessing has been upon the churches, and prosperity has come to the people.

With hearty cordiality for the brethren, and gratitude to God, I close this my fourth year's work on the district.

R. B. WARD, P. E.

Letter to Elmer Green

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: The easiest way we know of to make a little money is—if you're going to paint—to paint with the paint that takes least gallons.

Take a small job; say it takes 10 gallons Devoe, two coats; that's an average house. When the job is done and the bill comes in, it is $50; the paint, etc., $17.50; the rest is for labor and cartage the labor is fixing the surface, shifting ladders scaffolds pulleys and ropes, and brushing-on paint.

Take another job exactly like that; try another paint; it takes 12 gallons, The bill is $10 more. Take another exactly the same; another paint; it takes 20 gallons. The bill is $100.

There is only one Devoe; there's a dozen 12 gallon paints, and 100 that take 20 gallons to cover a 10 gallon job.

The only difficulty is in finding out Devoe. After that you save work: there's less work in 10 than there are in 12 or 20 gallons; less paint to buy and less to brush-on and less wages to pay.

If Devoe were only a little better than others, there'd be some difficulty in finding out the difference. It goes twice as far as half the paints; that ought to be easy.

It wears longer too. You'll wait to find-out how long it wears; there are thousands of people who know that the least-gallons paint wears longest.

Yours truly

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day, Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Mistress Mary

By TEMPLE BAILEY.

Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.

"Don't you ever get discouraged?" he asked. "How does your garden grow?" asked the young man who leaned over the fence.

"Oh, dear," little Miss Mary told him, "look at it."

There had been eight neat little plots laid out in the empty city lot. Miss Mary, the settlement worker from across the way, had brought her little girls over, and they had dug and planted and trained, and yesterday there had been beans climbing sturdily up the poles, and tomatoes already blossoming, and parsley and lettuce ready for salad, and radishes.

"And now look at it," said Miss Mary again.

It was trampled and torn and the little plants lay in the dust.

"The neighbors' boys did it," Miss Mary said, "your boys."

"Are you sure?" asked the young man.

"Yes," Miss Mary said; "one of my little girls saw them."

"They are a bad lot," said the young man, with a stern setting of his lips.

"DON'T YOU EVER GET DISCOURAGED?" HE ASKED.

"I am afraid I shall have to give them up."

"Oh, don't," said little Miss Mary; "they need you all the more because they are bad. Don't give them up."

He smiled at her. "Don't you ever get discouraged?" he asked.

"Sometimes," she admitted, "when things like this happen," and her hand swept out toward the ruined garden. "We had planned to pick the lettuce this morning, and we were going to have it for lunch with our bread and butter."

"I tell you," said the young man, whose name was Oswald Gunning, "I'll make the boys give the little girls a treat. It's better than punishing them, and, what's more, I'll make them come over with it."

"Do you think they'll do it?" asked Miss Mary, interested.

"Yes, I'll tell them how disappointed you are in them. They won't care what the little girls think, but they are awfully fond of you, Miss Mary."

"Oh," said little Miss Mary, with a blush.

"They show their good taste," said the young man earnestly. "I am awfully fond of you myself."

"You mustn't talk such things to me," said little Miss Mary, but her eyes sparkled.

"Mistress Mary, quite contrary,
How does your garden grow?"

he sang under his breath, and then he said:

"I shall say it whenever I like, for it's true. I am very fond of you—very, very fond."

"The little girls are coming," said Miss Mary severely, "and you'd better go."

So, still singing under his breath, he went to the public playgrounds to meet his class in physical training.

"I am ashamed of you," he told them a little later as they sat before him sheepishly. "Here I have spent my time upon you, and all I seem to have taught you is how to make a lot of little girls unhappy."

"Aw, gwan," protested Jim Dovesky from the front row.

"And you have made Miss Mary unhappy," said the teacher, with increasing earnestness, "and she was crying when I got there this morning—crying over that poor little garden."

"Aw, gwan," murmured Jim again, and there were other apologetical murmurs from the background.

"It seems to me," Gunning told them and watched the effect of his words, "that we ought to make it up to them somehow."

He had the boys there. They had expected punishment, and now he proposed restitution. It took their fancy at once.

"Sure," came the hearty chorus.

"We can't make the little garden grow," said their teacher, "we can't bring life to the little dead plants, and that's a pity, too, but we can let the little girls know that we are sorry. They were going to pick the lettuce today and have it with their bread and butter for lunch, and you know there isn't anything nicer than vegetables from your own garden."

There were various proposals, but Jim Dovesky's was the most popular.

"Let's buy thirty little pies, and each girl will have one for her lunch."

With visions of indigestion, Gunning protested, but the idea took like wildfire.

There was a hasty pooling of finances, and a delegation of boys started to the nearest bakery.

"I tried to switch them off to berries or ice cream," Gunning explained later to Miss Mary, "but I couldn't. And it's the idea, not the article."

"Yes," Miss Mary agreed. She was standing in the middle of the ruined garden, with the little girls digging in the eight little beds. "It's nice of them, and I only hope the little girls won't be ill."

Her voice was tired, and she looked warm and weary.

"Poor little Mistress Mary," said Gunning, looking down at her. "Has it been a hard morning?"

"The girls nearly cried their eyes out," she said. "They wept on my shoulder in bunches, and it was wearing."

"I wish you would weep on my shoulder," said the impertinent young man. "It would help you a lot and I should like it immensely," and when she reproved him he went away singing:

"Mistress Mary, quite contrary,
How does your garden grow?"

which of late had become a most popular song with him.

At noon the boys marched into the settlement house with the pies, and Jim Dovesky made the speech of presentation.

"It's a peace offerin'," he said with a flourish; "git on to it."

And the little girls, round eyed and forgiving, divided their bread and butter and divided the little pies and made the boys stay to lunch.

"Which spoils the lesson, but settles things up nicely," said Gunning. "According to all laws the boys should have suffered. As it is, I am the only one who suffers."

Miss Mary stared at him. "You?" was her startled question.

"What do I get out of it?" he demanded.

"What do you want?" she asked, innocently enough, but her swift blush betrayed her.

"I want—you," was his bold statement.

She shook her head, but before she could open her lips he begged. "Don't be contrary, Mary."

And she laughed at that, tremulously, and after a little she said, "I won't."

Letter Writing Made Easy.

"The picture postal card is not the only factor that is reducing letter writing to a lost art," said the woman who has many correspondents. "The newspaper clipping is also a serious foe to the well written letter. Almost every day I get a heavy mail, and frequently half the communications are made up largely of clippings from the daily press. Persons who, if obliged to do their own writing, would express some opinion on books, plays, clothes, vacations, clubs and current events can find something on those very subjects in the daily paper. So, instead of writing, they simply cut out the article that meets their needs, paste it on to a sheet of paper, say 'These are my sentiments, too,' and thus expeditiously conduct their correspondence.

"I must confess I am falling into the same pernicious habit. Yesterday I wanted to jolly a friend who has a strong predilection for ghostly literature. I read a paragraph in a paper that exactly expressed my meaning, so instead of digging into my own thoughts I sent the clipping. To another friend whom I wished to interest in a book I sent another printed article that admirably answered the purpose. Since every subject can be found adequately treated in the newspaper and on post cards it is no wonder that an accomplished letter writer is now a curiosity."—New York Press.

Learning to Swim.

Never waste time at first in attempting to learn to swim by means of the breast stroke, the side stroke or any other stroke. Simply wade out to where the water comes to your shoulders, lean forward, with arms extended and with one toe on the bottom, then suddenly throwing back both feet, splash and kick as wildly as you like, hand over hand and foot over foot—"dog fashion," as the boys call it. By repeating this vigorous performance a few times you will feel a momentary sense of buoyancy beneath you, and as your efforts are continued, making no attempt to propel yourself forward, but simply to keep your nose above water, you will gradually come to the perception that old Neptune will hold you up with surprisingly little effort on your part. And once that confidence gained, it is a simple matter to learn the more intricate and showy strokes.—Outer's Book.

The Old Round House.

St. Albans is said to possess the oldest inhabited house. This distinction is said to belong to the old Round House, now the "Fighting Cocks" inn, which stands close to the river Ver. It is a curious structure—of octagonal shape—of early Saxon origin, having been built as a boathouse to the ancient monastery founded at St. Albans by King Offia about the year 795, and is thus over 1,100 years old. A subterranean passage, now blocked up, runs from the basement to the ruins of the monastery, a distance of about 200 yards. There is a shed at the back of the house where, it is said, Oliver Cromwell stabled his horse, himself once sleeping under its roof during the civil war.—Westminster Gazette.

A RHYME TO PHYLLIS.

When Phyllis walks along the sands,
Clad in her bathing suit, and stands
And gazes out upon the sea,
I wonder not that mightily
The ocean rages for a space
To hold her in his cold embrace!

When Phyllis for a moment kneels
Upon the beach the wavelet steals
Up closer there to snatch a kiss
That fills it with such utter bliss
That, as it rushes back to sea,
It seems to dance in ecstasy.

When Phyllis, when her dip is done,
Lies basking in the yellow sun,
Who wonders, as she rests out there,
That suddenly the summer air
Grows languid and the breezes die
Away just like a lover's sigh?

Ah, would I were that favored sea
And Phyllis daily came to me!
Ah, would I were that wavelet small—
No laggard would I prove at all!
Ah, would I were the little breeze
That comes to kiss her from the seas!

Or yonder sun that smiles above
And dowers her with stores of love.
Egad, I'd even be that grave
Old lobster hiding 'neath the wave,
That, when my princess leaves the shore,
Just nips her toe and asks no more!
—John Kendrick Bangs in New York Herald.

Fooling the Infant.

"Well," remarked Nupop in rather a loud tone of voice, "it's pleasant to think that we can remain comfortably at home this evening"—

"Why, George," began Mrs. Nupop, "you know we've got tickets for the"—

"Sh! Can't you see the baby's listening? I said that for his benefit."—Catholic Standard and Times.

The Object.

"I suppose," said the old time friend, "you retired from business so that you could enjoy a rest?"

"That's what I thought," answered Mr. Cumrox, "but mother and the girls have explained to me that it was in order to give me time to help in their social activities."—Washington Star.

Again the Servant Problem.

He—I thought they weren't going to get married until the autumn?

She—Yes, but they changed their minds suddenly and were united yesterday. You see, they happened to hear of a good servant out of a place, and they wanted to secure her.—Democratic Telegram.

A Shameful Mistake.

Judge—You were caught carrying away a sackful of jewelry and silverware and yet have the audacity to plead not guilty.

Prisoner—It's a most annoying mistake, your honor. I am a souvenir collector.—Kansas City Times.

Absentminded.

The Professor—Yes, hello, is this Jones' lamp store? No, I can't tell you the size of the shade, but here's the lamp.—Harper's Weekly.

Very Strange, Indeed.

"Spellin' is awful funny, ain't it?" said little Tommy. "Now, h-o-r-s-e spells 'horse'"—

"Yes, that's right," said his mother.

"An' if you put another 's' on to it it makes it a whole lot o' horses."—Des Moines Register.

Ages of Wisdom.

"I believe it's a fact that a man must get to be at least thirty before he really knows anything."

"Yes, and he must be at least forty before he learns to quit telling what he knows."—Philadelphia Press.

Stupid.

"What a tiresome convention!"

"Why?"

"They talked of nothing but the weather."

"Who were they?"

TEMPERANCE NOTES

ALCOHOL A HANDICAP.

A Practical Test of the Influence of Alcohol on Workmen.

In a recent lecture on "The Physical Effects of Alcohol in So-called Medicinal Doses," widely published in medical circles, Dr. G. E. Benton, P. H. C., of Chester, Va., gave an interesting account of an experiment conducted by Prof. Krapelin, the eminent German scientist and alcohol expert. The experiment aimed to determine the influence of alcohol in a performance of practical work involving mental processes. One and a quarter ounces of alcohol in the form of Greek wine were administered to each of four typesetters. The subjects were all accustomed to the use of beer, but were required to abstain during the experimental period, and every detail was arranged so the test was scientifically accurate and simultaneously adapted to the every day life of the men, with the one exception of enforced abstinence. On the second and fourth day each man was given the one and one-quarter ounces of alcohol 15 minutes before the regular working test began. The results showed that there were no more errors than usual, but the amount of work done with alcohol was 15 per cent. less than that done without it. Commenting on the result ascertained, Dr. Benton states: "Here we have a scientific demonstration of the effect of an allowable medicinal dose of alcohol a little less than the usual physiological limit, administered but once in 24 hours and reducing the output of labor involving mental process to the extent of 15 per cent. All scientists who are giving special attention to the study of the alcohol question now are arriving at much the same conclusions as the result of their investigations. All agree that very much harm may result from its use. The past promiscuous prescribing of alcohol by the medical profession must be considered as the outgrowth of custom and routine, rather than accurate knowledge or discretion. Therefore, it is evident that the true knowledge of the action of alcohol by physicians and the general public will restrict its promiscuous use to a very large extent."

ALCOHOLISM AND INSANITY.

The Latter Is a Direct Result of the Former.

Dr. Savage recognizes that alcoholic intemperance is a potent cause not only of actual insanity, but also of nervous weakness and instability both in the individual and in his offspring.

Nevertheless, says London Hospital, he argues the increase of insanity at the present time certainly bears no actual relationship to the consumption of alcohol, for he feels no doubt that the English people are far more temperate than was formerly the case and that improvement in this respect is particularly marked in the lower and middle classes. Hence the recognized increase in insanity cannot be directly placed to the charge of alcohol.

Further, Dr. Savage remarks that the large number of total abstainers he sees in consulting practice has sometimes made him wonder whether "the complete and total change from moderate indulgence in alcohol to total abstinence has been altogether for the good—the mental good, I may say—of the race." Such facts as these show how complex and difficult is the discussion of the whole subject of alcohol and how necessary it is that partisan exaggeration and eloquence should be excluded from its consideration.

Kipling's Conversion.

It is said that Rudyard Kipling, the great English literary genius, one time believed in the inalienable right of the individual to exercise self-control and self-regulation on the liquor question, but was converted to prohibition by witnessing the leading of two young girls to ruin through drink, after which he wrote as follows: "Then, recanting previous opinions, I became a prohibitionist. Better it is that a man should go without his beer in public places and content himself with swearing at the narrow-mindedness of the majority; better it is to poison the inside with very vile temperance drinks and to buy lager furtively at back doors than to bring temptation to lips of young fools such as the four I had seen. I understand now why preachers rage against drink. I have said there is no harm in it, taken moderately; and yet my own demand for beer helped directly to send those two girls reeling down a back street to—God alone knows what end."

No Marshal Needed.

One of the newspapers of Winters, Cal., a temperance town, says in a recent issue: "In the event of the office of the town marshal becoming vacant by removal from town of the present incumbent, the Express voices the opinion of many tax-payers by saying no new marshal should be appointed. If any officer is needed, give us a night watchman. The town is so orderly now that the presence of the constable is sufficient to preserve the peace in daytime—in fact, there is absolutely nothing to do for either officer. The town may as well save at least $50 of the salary now paid." It is now three years since Winters adopted the no-license ordinance.

Tommy Hicks.

Now, Old Tommy Hicks was as poor as a mouse;
Of riches he had not a cent.
He lived in a cottage way down on the "Flat,"
And rustled each month for the rent.
But Thomas, though poor and unlettered and old,
Had learned the great lesson of life:
When things came his way, he was happy and glad
And lived there in peace with his wife.

But when luck was bad and there wasn't much work,
He whistled a livelier tune—
No matter the season, when Thomas was short,
The air that he piped was of June!
"I reckon," says Tom, "when the money pours in
That then ain't the time to be sad,
And when things is going to smash in a bunch,
A feller gist has to be glad!

"I figger," says Tom, "that a sour man is lost—
The way t' git on is t' smile!
No matter how black are the clouds over head,
Th' sun will bust through after while!"
And never a day that I knew Tommy Hicks,
Did he ever growl at his luck,
But always he lived by the rule he had made:
"Gist whistle and keep up yer pluck!"

When Thomas took sick with the fever that time,
He gave it a terrible race
By keeping his spirits chirked up to the end
And wearing a smile on his face.
The last words he said—I remember them well:
"I guess I'll go happy, by gee;
I figger St. Peter will let me pass in,
If only I'm smilin'," says he.

"They don't want no growlin' up there in th' skies,
No face that is scowlin' and sad,
So when I git up to th' great throne on high,
I reckon my phiz will be glad!"
So saying, he wreathed his old face with a light
That shone with a sanctified glow—
I'll bet when the angels caught sight of Tom Hicks
They didn't escort HIM below!

Now Thomas was simple and lowly and poor,
But somehow I sort of believe
That those who will fashion their living like his,
Will seldom have reason to grieve.
He opened his heart to the sunshine of earth;
He closed it when chilling winds blew.
And somehow I cannot help thinking that Tom Discovered Life's Secret! Don't you?

THE CHURCH AT WORK

FATHER AND CHILDREN.

Stirring Story of the Progress of Christianity in Uganda.

From darkest Africa in 1875, Stanley sent out the challenge, through the London Daily Telegraph, "Now, where in all the pagan world is there a more promising field for a mission? Here, gentlemen, is your opportunity; embrace it!"

DAUDI CHUA.
The Present King of Uganda.

Three days later the challenge was accepted. A gift of £5,000 was offered for the establishment of a mission in Uganda, and men went forth to lay down their lives in the land of Livingstone.

It was not only the fever that killed them. Uganda had extraordinary tragedies. Among the rest was the death of the missionary, Bishop Hannington, who was murdered by an African chief by command of the wicked King Mwanga.

Mwanga was the son of the king who first greeted the missionaries in 1877. Mtesa, the father, bade them hearty welcome, and was very desirous to know whether they had brought "the Book" with them. But his friendship was fickle; and the son who succeeded him was both a worse man than his father and a weaker one; and under his reign the missionaries were often in peril of their lives, and some of them, like Hannington, met martyrdom.

It was a most discouraging sequel to the welcome accorded the missionaries by Mwanga's father, and there were those in England who proposed to give up the mission altogether. By that time Mackay was there, and by his courage and tenacity and the faithful devotion of others the mission continued.

The son of the king who welcomed the missionaries became the murderer of the missionaries. But he, too, had a son. In 1885 Hannington was murdered. Twenty-one years later, in [illegible] son of Hannington baptized [illegible]ent king, son of the man who [illegible]red his father. Here, surely, [illegible]s an example of poetic justice, and a proof of the value of holding on.

Religion, says theh Youth's Companion, has a firm hold in Uganda to-day and thousands attend worship every Sunday. Those who endured the persecutions of 20 years ago rejoice that times have changed.

The life of Hannington was not thrown away. Men die, but the work lives. There is a verse in the Psalms which is full of promise for generations that have reached the limit of their upward progress: "Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth."

NOTES.

The Salvation Army is established in 52 countries and colonies and preaches the gospel in 31 languages.

"How shall we secure a greater attendance of young people at our Sunday schools?" inquires an anxious superintendent. If everything else fails, brother, try a box of fudges, says the Chicago Tribune.

The heroines are not all dead yet. One of them returned from Japan last month, where she had been a missionary for 13 years. She left her two young children in America when she went to teach Christianity to the Japanese, and when she returned they had grown so that she did not recognize them as they stood on the pier, waiting for her to disembark from the steamship. If the Japanese do not appreciate the sacrifice that she has made for their sake, remarks Youth's Companion, all mothers will understand how great it was.

Agnes Paynter and Nellie M. Bryant, missionaries in Ceylon, write: "One of the objects worshiped on Komati Lanke island was a huge, high post, with a few bunches of corn tied at the top."

The convention of the Presbyterian Brotherhood of America will be held in Cincinnati, November 12 to 14. There will be an exchange of practical information about the work successful organizations are doing.

Fetish Priestess Converted.

At Badagry (where the first missionaries to the Yoruba country, on the west coast of Africa, landed in 1845), Bishop Oluwole recently baptized an old woman who had been a fetish priestess. Her husband became a convert to Christianity about 40 years ago, and was baptized in 1[illegible]. The bishop says, "It was with great joy that both the husband and the children witnessed her baptism."

Ideal Church.

"Every church should be one great Bible school and the minister's supreme function that of teaching the Word and so feeding the flock of God."

England After Torrey Again.

Election Fraud Talk Menaces Our Institutions.

By United States Senator JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER of Iowa.

WITHIN the last thirty years an abuse has grown up far more fatal to our institutions than the buying and selling of votes in the interest of anxious candidates for office. That abuse is the CAMPAIGN FUND COLLECTED BY NATIONAL COMMITTEES and expended in the management of our presidential elections. It is comparatively a new thing. In one of Miss Ida Tarbell's delightful sketches of the life of Lincoln there is preserved a letter written by Mr. Wirt Dexter to his wife, in which the size of the campaign fund collected to aid Lincoln's second election is stated. It appears to have been $200,000, and the amount was regarded as so unusual that the custodian of the fund felt called upon to defend himself in advance against the imputation of seeking to DEBAUCH the election.

Since that day there has been a steady increase in the expense of managing political campaigns. I took some pains in the last campaign to inquire into the expenditures of a national committee. I found that thousands of dollars were being paid out every day for the express charges on political literature sent to the voters, and while, judging from the character of some of the documents, it was easy to see that a good deal of the money was being wasted, it cannot be said that it was being used to injure the institutions of our government. Thousands of dollars were spent every day to pay the expenses and per diem allowance of campaign orators, and while, judging from the character of many of the speeches that were made, a good deal of the money was thrown away, still it must be allowed that its expenditure did not tend to undermine free institutions. Vast sums of money were paid out to equip and uniform clubs, to charter and maintain special trains for star performers and to provide those spectacular episodes which have become so dear to our people.

Nor is the complaint made here against the overgrown campaign fund an attack upon the contributors to the fund. On the contrary, for more than twenty years politics has been so organized that PRACTICALLY THE WHOLE PROPERTY INTEREST of the country has been involved.

Yet such, as a whole, has been the influence of national campaign funds that the time is come when every man interested in the health of our system of government ought to take notice of it. It is impossible to conceal the fact that for some cause the CONFIDENCE OF THE PEOPLE in the integrity of American public life has been weakened.

Unless this growing distrust of the integrity of the election day shall be checked the time may come when our highest offices may be the prize of an election so close that the imputation of fraud MAY plunge the country into ANARCHY AND CIVIL DISSENSIONS. The time already has come when men talk of election frauds as a matter of course. Scandals and hearsays, without limit and without responsibility, appear to be substituted for the orderly information which ought to be filed, when good citizens have knowledge of such a case, before a court with jurisdiction TO HEAR AND DETERMINE THE FACTS.

IF THE DAY SHALL EVER COME WHEN THE MASS OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE LOSE THEIR CONFIDENCE IN THE RETURNS OF THE ELECTION, CONDITIONS EASILY ARE IMAGINABLE WHICH MAY PUT THE FRAMEWORK OF OUR INSTITUTIONS TO A STRAIN SO GREAT THAT GOVERNMENT BY THE PEOPLE, OF THE PEOPLE, FOR THE PEOPLE, MAY BE MADE OBNOXIOUS TO THE UNIVERSAL HUMAN CONSCIENCE.

Corporations Necessary To Modern Civilization.

By STUYVESANT FISH, Ex-President Illinois Central Railroad.

IT would seem that under the law we are to have a valuation of the railroads for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not any of them and, if so, which are overcapitalized and this apparently to the end of fixing just rates for railroad freights and fares IN PROPORTION TO A TRUE VALUATION. If such valuation were possible, which I doubt, and the fixing IN ADVANCE by any governmental agency of a just rate were possible, which I deny emphatically, the result would probably be that no railroads would be built in the undeveloped parts of this country, except at the risk and with the capital of EXISTING lines. We are likely to have from the law of 1906 precisely the same experience as was had from that part of the law of 1887 forbidding pooling, from which it has resulted that since 1887 no railroads have been built for a share in the pools, and the only builders of railroads of any magnitude during the last twenty years have been directly or indirectly the LARGE SYSTEMS then existing or since brought together.

From the day that I was graduated from college to this I have been continuously interested in and for most of that time employed by railroad companies and have read somewhat extensively on the subject. As a result of such experience I have no hesitancy in saying that NO RAILROAD FORTUNE was ever made through enhancing rates, oppressing shippers or withstanding the general tendency of rates to decrease.

AND, WHAT IS MORE, EVERY DISHONEST RAILROAD FORTUNE HAS BEEN MADE NOT BY OPPRESSING SHIPPERS, BUT BY ROBBING THE STOCKHOLDERS.

All corporations, federal and state, are technically artificial persons and citizens created by law. So long as they conform thereto, they have the UNDOUBTED RIGHT to continue to exist and to perform all their lawful functions. They are a necessary means to our civilization, were known to our laws in colonial times and have been ever since. As a people we have no quarrel against corporations AS SUCH.

CORNER STONE LAID AT THE NEW COURT HOUSE

loss to property-holders when the land records had been destroyed by fire. It was therefore necessary that something be done for the protection and preservation of the land records of this county—not only because those now in existence could not be properly care for, but because there is no longer space in the vault for new ones. I have dwelt upon the records in the custody of the Clerk of this Court because under the statute the duty is imposed upon the Judges of seeing that they are properly kept, but any intelligent persons who will investigate the subject will find that the other officers in the court house do not have facilities for their work, or sufficient protection for the records and papers in their care. The election supervisors, school commissioners and all county officers should have office buildings, not only for the convenience of the public but to save the payment of rent and for the protection of the books, papers, etc., under their control. If the registration books are not cared for, as they should be, it is not only possible that they be tampered with but that they might be destroyed, which would cause great confusion and deprive many entitled to vote of their right to do so, at leastuntil a new registration could be held. Fortunately there had been no contested election in late years in this county, but if there had been, there was no safe place provided for the protection of the ballots and ballot boxes. The records of the School Commissioners and the school books in their care should likewise be better protected than they can be under existing conditions. I might speak of the County Surveyor's record and others but when the attention of the intelligent public is directed to such donditions as actually exist, there ought not to be in their judgment any question about the necessity for a new building.

I do not believe in unnecessary or extravagant expenditures of the public money, but in addition to the reasons I have given to show the necessity for a new building, those of you who have attended the sessions of the court must know that there are not sufficient accommodations at present for the Court, the members of the bar or those of the public required to attend. If the judges find it necessary to consult over some question before them there is no place for them to retire; if the members of bar desire to talk with their clients or witnesses they are likewise without proper facilities, and when ladies are summoned as witnesses, or are parties to suits although they may have small children with them, they are compelled either to sit in the court room, which is often crowded, or delay the court until they can be sent for. These matters do not affect the comfort and convenience of such persons alone, but they necessarily cause more or less delay which adds to the expenses of litigants and the county.

Then no one can deny that the present court house is not only a discredit to this progressive, growing county, but is calculated to injure it. Strangers visiting it would not be favorably impressed with this county, if they judged its prosperity by that building, although I regard its future as bright as that of any county in the State, brighter than that of any not in close proximity to the city of Baltimore or some large city or town. The assessable basis for county taxes is about two and a half times as large now as it was in 1873, when the first levy was made, being now over $8,000,000, while it was then about $3,000,000. When the county was formed there were 1702 votes cast on the question whether there should be a new county, which presumably brought out a large vote, while now you have over 4000 registered voters. Much of your land has greatly increased in value and I have great faith in the future development of your mineral interests.

But your progress has not been confined to these material things and as affecting the welfare of your people, they are by no means all. I can notice a marked improvement in the educational facilities of your county. When you separated from Allegany county your county was sparcely settled, and being remote from educational centers the young men and women had but few advantages for the development of their minds. But now school houses are within easy reach of the most of them, and any observant person can see that many are taking advantage of their opportunities. People with such environments as many of your citizens have been surrounded by are noted for their good, hard common sense and correct ideas of honesty and fair dealings, and the people of Garrett have added to that number, but with the many advantages your boys and girls now have, you should and doubtless will, make more rapid advance in these respects. Often have I noticed the just verdicts of your juries and the intelligent explanations of witnesses in your court.

The development of your county has likewise given greater opportunities to each of your citizens "to worship God in such manner as he thinks most acceptible to Him," to use the language of our declaration of rights. Churches are more numerous, and religious services more frequent than they were in former days, and while it is unfortunately true that with the growth and development of a country, new temptations will beset us and some Godless, lawless persons will come from other places, no one in Garrett county can have as an excuse for not engaging in the public worship of his God the absence of houses dedicated to His service, or of Godly men engaged in His work. The people of a county like this ought to have a religion which is purer and less defiled than those who are brought in contact with so many temptations to be found in cities and large towns. Evil and temptation may follow you to your homes, whether they be on the top of the majestic mountains which the Creator of the universe has raised Heavenward in parts of your county, or be in the beautiful valleys which lie between these hills and mountains, but if the beauty and grandeur of nature are ever to appeal to the heart of man, you people of Garrett ought to be among the first to respond. Men may design beautiful churches, court houses and other structures, but whatever their beauty may be, it cannot approach that of your magnificent mountains and forests, or that of your valleys, watered by streams which, in their original state, are as pure as waters from the heavens can be.

But some of you may ask, "what connection has all this with laying a cornerstone of a Court House?" It is simply this: Unless in this building there be an intelligent and honest administration of Justice, the most important uses for which it is intended will fail. The public is more or less inclined in these days to criticise the law and those especially set apart to administer it, and forget that the responsibility for the proper execution of the law does not rest upon the Judges alone. Judges may at times be justly subject to criticism, for they are human and make mistakes, but the intelligent people of every community ought to remember that there must be some arbiter to settle the disputes of others which they cannot settle themselves, and that under our system of government the courts have been organized for that purpose. When then, one of those courts determines a question which the laws of the State have left for its determination, the law-abiding people of the community should not only accept the decision as conclusive of that particular case, excepting as in so far as some other tribunal may be authorized to review it, but they should use their influence to uphold the courts and to encourage and induce others to do so. Unjust and improper criticism of courts by those who are believed to be law-abiding and influential people may be more harmful to communities than the commission of some recognized crime, for it not only weakens the power of the courts, and interferes with the proper administration of justice, but it encourages the criminal to commit other crimes. No reasonable judge should expect a litigant who believes in the justice of his cause, but loses it, to at once feel that the decision was right and he was wrong. That is not natural, but such litigant, after the immediate effects of his disappointment are over, ought to realize that a disinterested tribunal is more apt to be right than a party to a suit, who is more or less predjudiced in his own favor, and if he cannot bring himself to appreciate that fact he ought at least to be willing to attribute proper motives to the tribunal which decided his case. It is extremely rare to find a court deciding a case from improper motives. Of course no honest judge would decide contrary to his judgment of what the law is, or what the facts require, and his self-respect, his oath of office and his legal training, will generally prevent him from being affected by prejudice, fear, favor or other improper motives or influences.

But I want to bring this still closer to you, the people of this county, where it belongs. I have said that the responsibility for the proper execution of the law does not rest upon the judges alone. Upon whom then does it rest? I would emphasize the answer, and unhesitatingly declare that it is upon the people. Under our system the people not only elect the judges and legislators, who make the statutory laws, (not to speak of the fact that the majority of our legislators are not lawyers but selected from the public at large), but they take a most important part in the decision of cases in court. Trial by jury is guaranteed by our Constitution, and jurors are selected from the taxpayers and registered voters, exclusive of lawyers. Under our Constitution jurors are judges of the law as well of the facts in criminal cases, and if these be a wrong decision in such case the twelve men in the jury box are responsible for it. In civil cases if the judges' interpretation of the law be erreneous it can generally be corrected on appeal, but if the jury be wrong in its conclusion, with but few exceptions, there is no redress. So after all, what is of supreme importance is that the people of the community be honest, intelligent and faithful to their duties in order that justice be properly meted out. You cannot shift all the responsibility and burden upon the court. It rests largely with you, and you the people of Garrett county, have it in your power to determine, to a large extent, whether justice shall be properly administered within the walls of this building in course of construction.

It is therefore for such reasons that I have spoken of the opportunities you have to educate your children and to advance their moral and spiritual welfare, which will not only make them more intelligent but more honest, more appreciative of the duties and responsibilities devolving upon them by the laws of the land. So I appeal to you to do your part towards educating the young of this county, and above all towards making them honest, upright and righteous citizens who will respect and obey the laws of God and man. A community largely composed of such material can have but little cause for complaint of the manner in which the laws are administered. I trust that while you can still speak of this building as your "new court house" your county will have so progressed in its educational, moral and spiritual interests that the residents of the lowlands of this State will look up to the highlands of Garrett to find a people who have made it one of the most prosperous, intelligent, lawbiding, and religious counties of the State.

If such hope be realized, then the money of the tax-payers of this county, expended on this building will be returned many fold, and this will in reality be a "Temple of Justice," wherein the rich and the poor, the high and the low, will stand on an equality, and can be assured that their rights will be preserved and their wrongs redressed, as impartially and abundantly as is possible to be done by human tribunals.

Capt. J. M. Jarboe, Worshipful Master of Oakland Lodge said:

MY FRIENDS AND BRETHREN: It has been my good fortune on two former occasions to hear the Hon. George L. Wellington on Masonry; he will address you today on that subject. That he will edify and interest all Masons, and all friends of Masonry, goes without saying. In view of this fact it would seem a little like presumption on my part to attempt to make a few remarks. You all know I am not a public speaker and I would gladly refrain only it seems to me that agreeable to a rule of our ancient Brethren, it is my duty to say something. I will detain you but a short while, how far any will be guided by what I may say I hope I shall always know myself so well as to leave that to their own choice.

Then to men and Brethren here assembled: Be it known unto you that we are lawful Masons, true and faithful to the laws of our country. Free Masonry is to be considered as divided into two parts, operative and speculative; and these are again subdivided, that is craft or operative Masonry, into three distinct branches: the manual, the instrumental and scientific. For a considerable time previous to the building of King Solomon's Temple the societies of architects and builders had become celebrated throughout the ancient world; our ancient brethren worked in both operative and speculative Masonry. Since 1717 the craft has been working in speculative Masonry, though we still hold fast to the ancient emblems and symbols. As a Fraternity we are not engaged in squaring stones and hewing timbers, but I will here say that it is the duty of every Mason to lend his moral support to any practical measure that will redound to the benefit of the inhabitants of any community in which he may reside. As Masons we have secrets, and these secrets are lawful and honorable, and not repugnant to the laws of God or man. They were entrusted in peace and honor to Masons of ancient times and having been faithfully transmitted to us it is our duty to convey them unimpaired to the latest posterity. Unless our calling were honorable we should not have lasted for so many centuries, nor should we have been honored with the patronage of so many illustrious men in all ages who have ever shown themselves ready to promote our interests and to defend us from all adversaries. We are assembled here today in the face of you all to lay a foundation stone. It is not for a church of God, nor is it for a Masonic Temple. I will term it, if you please, a "Temple of Justice." Within these walls, those that violate the law will have to here answer for their crimes and misdemeanors. In the course of events sad and trying scenes will be witnessed. This all of the good citizens and Masons of our county cannot prevent. Crime to a greater or less extent will continue until not one stone of this structure shall be left resting upon another, so it is up to all men and Masons to set a good example.

To the members of Oakland Lodge and visiting brethern, to all Masons whithersoever dispersed, myself included, I wish to say a few words. Yonder in the North-east resides a man who is nearing the close of an eventful life. He has ever been ready to fight for principle for that which he thought was right whether on the field of battle or in the halls of congress. He is engaged in his last battle which is with the scythe of Time. He has, I think, passed his four score years. To what branch of the Christian church he belongs, I know not, but I know him be a Mason as true as steel—not perfect for prefection on this earth has never yet been attained by mortal man. In delivering a Masonic address he uttered the following words: "above the dome of our mystic temple rests a shadowy form clothed in garments woven from the twilight, and half radiant with the glory that shall hereafter be revealed, it is emblematic of Charity, the very keystone to our mystic fabric, and the brightnest gem that can ornament the character of any man."

Now, my brethren, do we practice what we preach? Masons I believe, are always willing to aid the poor and the distressed, but do they remember in all ages men have differed, that they still differ and honestly differ. Is it right, is it charitable, for any of us to censure and condemn any man because he honestly differs with us about any measure? Would it not be will for all Masons to set a good example and settle their differences one with the other outside the walls of this building? When men of every class, rich and poor, I care not what sect, what secret society they may be members of, or not members of any, can fairly and squarely act with each other and do unto each as you would that they should do unto you, then and not till then, shall crime cease.

One thing more and I am done: I believe the gentlemen who sit in judgment over our courts in this judicial district are capable, and just, and upright, square men, if you please, and when their places have to be filled by others it is to be hoped that they will be men of the same calibre.

vs.
Thompson Lish, and —— Lish his wife, Philip Lish, and —— Lish his wife, and the unknown heirs of Grace Mutler and Lewis Lish.

No. 1406 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree for the sale of certain real estate in Garrett county, Maryland, of which Frank Lewis Lish died seized and possessed.

The bill states that Lewis Lish, late of Garrett county, deceased, was in his life time seized and possessed of a parcel of land in Garrett county, being the 14 132-160 acres of Military Lot No. 422, and 9 6-160 acres of a tract of land called "Vacancy," and being so seized and possessed the said Lewis Lish departed this life on or about the 9th day of —— 1906, intestate, leaving surviving him your orators aforesaid, des cendants and heirs at law, whom together with the said defendants, the said land has descended, viz: John Lish, Thompson Lish, James E. Lish, Julia Harvey, Sarah Moreland, Peyton Lish, Huldah Lish his wife, George Lish, Visa Uphold and Charles Lish being children and heirs at law of Jeremiah Lish a deceased brother of the said Lewis Lish; William Lish, Roy Lish, May Wahlenmaier, Garlie Lish, Philip Lish, Orna Lish, children of Charles Lish a deceased brother of said Lewis Lish; and Levina Brobst, Mary A. Friend, Josiah Lish, Emma Runyan, John Lish, P. S. Lish and Lillie E. Lish, children of Joseph Lish, a deceased brother of the said Lewis Lish and Caroline Horner, all sisters of the said Lewis Lish and Philip Lish a brother, and the unknown heirs of Grace Mutler a deceased sister, and such other unknown heirs of the said Lewis Lish, whose proper name is Frank Lewis Lish, but commonly known as Lewis Lish.

That the said real estate is not succeptible of partition without material loss and injury to the parties entitled to interests therein as above set forth, and that in order to make division of said interest it will be necessary that said real estate be sold and the proceeds thereof divided among the parties according to their several interests.

That the said defendants are non-residents of the State of Maryland.

The bill prays for the sale of said property, and that the proceeds be distributed among the parties according to their respective rights and interests, and general relief, and an order of publication against non-resident defendants and unknown heirs.

It is thereupon, this 14th day of October, 1907, ordered by the Circuit Court for Garrett county, in Equity, that the plaintiffs by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 16th day of November, 1907, give notice to said absent defendants and the unknown heirs of Grace Mutler and Lewis Lish of the object and substance of this bill warning them to appear in this Court, in person or by solicitor, on or before the 2nd day of December, next, to show cause, if any they have, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1907. NUMBER 34

RULE SAVORS OF OLIGARCHY

Democrats Have Too Long Been in Power in Maryland.

Cumberland, Md., Oct. 7, 1907.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

The Democratic party has had full control of the political affairs of Maryfor 40 years, with the exception of four years, when Hon. Lloyd Lowndes was governor. Not in the history of our state since its birth in the memorable year of 1776 has there been such a prolonged reign of party power—almost a dynasty in its character. Such rule is not for the real interests of the whole people, but mostly for the few in power. It is neither Democratic, Republican nor even Americian in political effect. The masses of the people want a change, and an improvement in our state government and it general affairs. And now is the acceptable time to secure it, by the election of the Republican state ticket, of excellent men, for Governor, George R. Gaither; Comptroller, James H. Baker; Attorney General, Hammond Urner, and Clerk of the Court of Appeals, Thomas Parran. This ticket needs no eulogy, and is worthy of the support not only of the Republican party but many not within its lines—of independent, and individual views, of whom there are now many. The ticket is a fit and suitable one, worthy of general support. These reasons of themselves ought to be sufficient for the Democratic party, but there are many others of a more positive nature, some of which will be placed in view of voters, in this paper.

But the vital issue of our next election will be the ballot and registration questions. They will be paramount to all others. The ballot is the very foundation of our governmental system. The will and wants of the people are made known by ballots of voters. That our whole election system is in a most deplorable and oppressive condition, none can deny, unless it be the few who are the beneficiaries thereof. And let it not be overlooked that the Democratic party is the author of these wrongs and hardships now borne by our people, the result of their persistent legislation from time to time, to disfranchise or prevent persons from voting who might not support that party. Party domination has been given for the convenience or engagement to persons who have the constitutional qualifications to vote.

True there should be restrictions or restraints upon the ballot, but they should be reasonable, just and in accordance with the constitution, and not purposely prohibitory. Our election law should be plain and intelligible, so that the uneducated may understand or be made to understand. But as they now exist, even intelligent persons are in doubt. Elections ought to be such as to draw voters to the polls, not to prevent them from coming. Many voters now dread or so much dislike the election system, as to prevent them from attending. It is an ordeal they do not wish to encounter. Democratic legislation on the registration and ballot questions shows forcibly that the purpose was to exclude voters who would not be with and for that party. Of course these prohibitions were covertly aimed at the colored people, but the fact is, as is now well known, that more white voters have been harmed than colored ones.

The Poe amendment, as is well known was a Democratic measure, through not favored by Gov. Warfield. The object of it was to give the disfranchising business a constitutional foundation, so as not to be interfered with by any anterior authorities. It placed the power to enfranchise, or disfranchise voters in the hands of the registration office. Under it they could have refused registration to a majority of persons fit to be registered, by asking them a few difficult constitutional questions, which they would not be able to answer. But fortunately for the us the odious amendment was voted down by the people, regardless of party feelings, and the honor of our state saved, at least to that extent.

And now let it be shown how and in what manner our registration and ballot system affect the voters and election results in our good old state. According to official records there are in the state 225,589 registered white voters and 52-301 colored votes—277,890 in all. At our last election in 1906 there were cast only 191,632 voters. The stay-home and uncounted voters were 82,258; and futher, that from 25,000 to 30,000 were thrown out or uncounted on account of defects in the ballot in not coming up to the requirements of our intricate laws. No wonder we hear so much about "trick ballots"—much ground for the talk. In Allegany county there are 12,985 registered voters, but at the election of 1906 only 5,906 ballots were counted. Garrett county has 4,149 registered voters, but only 1,971 ballots counted at the last election. This is the way the system works.

From Democratic sources we are hearing much about negro domination is a mere whim. I know of a more suitable name for it. There is not a colored man holding office in our county or the state, at least of any importauce, although they have over 52,000 registered voters in the state, almost one-fifth of the whole. It is an obvious fact, that colored people as a class are not clamoring for or hunting office, in the manner the white men are doing it. Let this fact stand to their credit; and may they remain in that suitable relation. But might not the white folks modify their zeal for office, somewhat at least. Another view of this domination question: Under our national constitution, the colored race counted much as the white in forming a basis for congressional representative. The colored population in our country number about 8,000,000. The congressional basis is about 200,000 for a representative; so that population elects 40 members to the lower House of Congress and nearly all that basis elects Democrats congressman. So really this vast colored population helps the Democracy in their domination. Were these 8,000,000 people without civil existence, there would be about 40 congressman less, and most domination would fall upon the Democratic party. Surely the party can see this.

This paper comes from a Republican voter, old as the party itself; an unfailing adherent to its principals and creeds, because they were and now are, national, patriotic, just and for the good of all, and in strict accordance with our national constitution and adverse to sectionalism, localism and prejudices of all kinds. This is not only a union of states, but also a nation; a leading member of the great internationality.

In preparing this paper I have carefully avoided the use of epithets or harsh expressions of any kind towards our political opponents, not forgetting they are fellow cit zens, and entitled to respectful treatment. It is however true, the wrongs and errors complained of are of their enactments or actions. But let we Republicans have the power, and we will cure them willingly for all the people of our good old state. No doubt when the Republican party is given the necessary power, and have cured the existing evils and hardships, Democrats as well as Republicans, will feel as they should, grateful for the general relief and cure of unbearable evils and harkships.

Of course these remarks are to be in the interest of the county ticket just announced, in like manner as the state ticket.

A VETERAN SPEAKS.

Calls Upon All True Men to Support the Republican Ticket.

To the Editor of The Republican:

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR:—I hope that you will give these few lines space in your paper. We have an election in this county and State on Tuesday, November 5th, and I have been following the campaign made by our candidate for Governor, Mr. Geo. R. Gaither, as printed in the Baltimore daily papers, with a great deal of interest. His speeches regarding the election law passed by the Democratic party at their extra session, are straight from the shoulder. This law cost we tax payers over $100,000, at least that was the cost of the extra session. The money to pay for this came out of the Treasury of the State and every man that pays any taxes contributed his share. This law was passed, we believe, to keep the Republican party out of power. It has the effect of destroying the votes of over 50,000 of our citizens of the State. These citizens that lose their votes pay their taxes, yet by throwing out their ballots they are not allowed to take part in electing the officers who run our government. If the farmer, the laborer or the man who is nervous from old age, or from disease, though he may have been one of the early settlers of our county and state, and a heavy taxpayer for the last forty years, marks his ballot over the square, the election law of the Democratic party says he has not voted. Though our country called us into active service in the 60's, and at a time when an awful crisis was pending in this Union, when the dark clouds of secession were hovering over and about us, threatening as it were to break down the Union, we left the fireside of our home, with all its comforts, a loving wife and an infant babe to render our country service upon its battle fields, no man then thought to ask us if we could read or write, nor did any man think even for a moment of making inquiry as to our efficiency, manhood and patriotism, because of a lack of educations. It was not, and should not have been, for we were able to render and did render to our country service upon its battle fields. We have receive the plaudits and commendations of a grateful people from the close of the great Civil war up until to-day, and even now the American hearts throb with emotion and gratitude toward the few remaining veterans. And thus it has been, thus it is, and thus it should be as long as the citizens of this Republic breathe the atmosphere of freedom. What an awful wrong, what a glaring injustice and base ingratitude has been shown the old veteran by this trick ballot law of the Democratic party. It is unfair, unpatriotic and certainly un-American.

Another part of this Democratic trickery is in its registration law. It requires a citizen coming into our State, or even a veteran who has once lived here and remained away a year, when he returns he must go to the county seat, a distance of 27 miles, and make an affidavit that he intends to become a citizen of the County and State before he can register and vote. In this community there are men who have bought homes and farms, have become large taxpayers, and who have in the last several years not cast a ballot on account of the expense and loss of time required to drive to the county seat and return, a distance of 54 miles, with a doubt as to whether their ballot would be counted as cast after all this trouble. This law is a curse to manhood suffrage. It is endangering our liberties and the people of my section are aroused as never before. I tell them the remedy is in their hands. Two years ago we voted down the infamous Poe amendment. By this they intended to make the law more cursed. The Democratic Governor and the members elected to the House of Delegates for the last several years have refused to repeal this law; they are now trying to make it worse. Failing in the Poe amendment, they have asked for a vote on a call for a Constitutional Convention. They want to make the Poe amendment a part of the Constitution and reduce the voters of the State to a few in number. The Democratic candidate for Governor was a leader in the Senate at the time this bill was passed at the extra session. The two Democatic candidates of the House of Delegates in this county are pledged by their party platform to stand by, uphold and vote to keep this law on the statute books. Why? Because they are the "regulars of the regular," but they don't want the voter to know this. It was the regulars that force this down the throats of the independents, because they had control without the vote of the independents. They have endeavored in this county by what they call their own platform to avoid the issue, to deceive the voters by calling attention to other reforms. Have you ever known the Democratic party or their candidates when elected, to reform anything? Veterans, and the sons of veterans, and neighbors of veterans, do not be fooled! The paramount issue is the repeal of this infamous election and trick ballot law. When this is complete and our suffrage returned to us again, we can look after the other reforms. A vote for the Democratic candidates for the House of Delegates is not only a vote for this infamous election and trick ballot law, Poe amendment if they win, but is also a vote for a Democratic candidate for U. S. Senator. This in turn means free trade and Democratic ruin. Do not be deceived by personal appeals. Our candidate for Governor, George R. Gaither, and our two candidates for the House of Delegates, have pledged themselves to the passage of an election law which will allow the voter by a single mark to cast his vote for all the candidates of the party of the party of his choice and to have that vote counted as cast. This is what the voters of this section of Garrrett want, a return to a simple ballot, and we appeal to veterans and sons of veterans in other sections of the county to join us in the paramount issue of this campaign and lend your aid in rolling up an overwhelming majority on Tuesday, November 5th, for the entire Republican ticket and show the Democrats that we cannot be deceived and will no longer tolerate this unfair election law. You will hear from me again on the election law before this campaign is over.

CONTRACT AWARDED.

For Safety Tracks on The 17-Mile Grade Has Been Made.

The Baltimore and Ohio Monday awarded the contract for building the "flying junction" on the 17-mile grade on the the main line, to F. H. Clement & Company, of Philadelphia. The work is a precaution against accidents on the steep grade between Altamont and Piedmont, where the grade is one of the heaviest on the main line.

The improvement will consist of a third rail, with quick acting switches at the altitude of the grade and with connection at various points along it. If one or more cars should become disconnected or even a whole train, they can rapidly be switched to the third rail and allowed to go on their way unmolested until stopped by friction and the application of the hand brakes by the train crew. This will throw the detached cars off the main line.

Mr. Gus A. Bolden and son William, of Grafton, were guests on Sunday of relatives in Oakland and Crellin.

The First Railroad to Enter New Union Station, Washington.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 21.—On and after October 27, 1907, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad will abandon its present passenger station at New Jersey Avenue and C Street, Washington, D. C., and occupy the new Union Station at the intersection of Massachusetts and Delaware Avenues, two blocks northeast of the old station. The Baltimore & Ohio will be the first to use this magnificent structure, and all passenger trains, through and local, to or from Washington, will use this station.

As a matter of history the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, the first railway of America, was the first railway to enter Washington, in 1835, and it is fitting that it be the first to open the doors of the great central station at Washington, which will eventually be used by all the railroads which enter the National Capital.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Reappearance of an Old Friend.

After supper the lieutenant and Naida danced twice together, the young girl's mood having apparently changed to one of buoyant, careless happiness, her dark eyes smiling, her lips uttering freely whatever thought came uppermost. Outwardly she pictured the gay and merry spirit of the night, yet to Brant, already observing her with the jealousy of a lover, she appeared distrait and restless, her affectation of abandon a mere mask to her feelings. Perhaps these things might have passed unnoted but for their contrast with the late confidential chat.

He could not reconcile this sudden change with what he believed of her. It was not carried out with the practiced art of one accustomed to deceit. There must be something real influencing her action. These misgivings burdened his mind even as he swung lightly with her to the music, and they talked together in little snatches.

The last two waltzes ended, they walked slowly through the scattering throng, he striving vainly to arouse her to the former independence and intimacy of speech. Suddenly they came face to face with Mrs. Herndon, and Brant felt the girl's arm twitch.

"I have been looking everywhere for you, Naida," Mrs. Herndon said, a slight complaint in her voice. "We were going home."

Naida's cheeks reddened painfully.

"I am so sorry if I have kept you waiting," her words spoken with a rush, "but—but, Lieut. Brant was intending to accompany me. We were just starting for the cloakroom."

"Oh, indeed!" Mrs. Herndon's expression was noncommittal, while her eyes surveyed the lieutenant.

"With your permission, of course," he said.

"I hardly think I have any need to interfere."

They separated, the younger people walking slowly, silently toward the door. He held her arm, assisting her to descend the stairway, his lips murmuring a few commonplaces, to which she scarcely returned even monosyllabic replies, although she frequently flashed shy glances at his grave face. Both realized that some explanation was forthcoming, yet neither was quite prepared to force the issue.

"I have no wraps at the hotel," she said, as he attempted to turn that way. "That was a lie also; let us walk directly down the road."

He indulged in no comment, his eyes perceiving a pathetic pleading in her upturned face. Suddenly there came to him a belief that the girl was crying; he could feel the slight tremor of her form against his own. He glanced furtively at her, only to catch the glitter of a falling tear. To her evident distress, his heart made instant and sympathetic response. With all respect influencing the action, his hand closed warmly over the smaller one on his sleeve.

"Little girl," he said, forgetting the shortness of their acquaintance in the deep feeling of the moment, "tell me what the trouble is."

"I suppose you think me an awful creature for saying that," she blurted out, without looking up. "It wasn't ladylike or nice, but—but I simply couldn't help it, Lieut. Brant."

"You mean your sudden determination to carry me home with you?" he asked, relieved to think this might prove the entire difficulty. "Don't let that worry you. Why, I am simply rejoiced at being permitted to go. Do you know, I wanted to request the privilege all the time we were dancing together. But you acted so differently from when we were beneath the vines that I actually lost my nerve."

She looked up and he caught a fleeting glimpse into her unveiled eyes.

"I did not wish you to ask me."

"What?" He stopped suddenly. "Why, then, did you make such an announcement to Mrs. Herndon?"

"Oh, that was different," she explained, uneasily. "I had to do that; I had to trust you to help me out, but—but I really wanted to go home alone."

He swept his unbelieving eyes around over the deserted night scene, not knowing what answer to return to so strange an avowal. "Was that what caused you to appear so distant to me in the hall, so vastly different from what you had been before?"

She nodded, but with her gaze still upon the ground.

"Miss Naida," he said, "it would be cowardly for me to attempt to dodge this issue between us. Is it because you do not like me?"

She looked up quickly, the moonlight revealing her flushed face.

"Oh, no, no! you must never think that. I told you I was a girl of moods; under those vines I had one mood, in the hall another. Cannot you understand?"

"Very little," he admitted, "for I am more inclined to believe you are the possessor of a strong will than that you are swayed by moods. Listen. If I thought that a mere senseless mood had caused your peculiar treatment of me to-night, I should feel justified in yielding to a mood also. But I will not lower you to that extent in my estimation; I prefer to believe that you are the true-hearted, frankly spoken girl of the vine shadow. It is this abiding conviction as to your true nature which holds me loyal to a test. Miss Naida, is it now your desire that I leave you?"

He stepped aside, relinquishing her arm, his hat in hand, but she did not move from where he left her.

"It—it hurts me," she faltered, "for I truly desire you to think in that way of me, and I—I don't know what is best to do. If I tell you why I wished to come alone, you might misunderstand; and if I refuse, then you will suspect wrong, and go away despising me."

"I sincerely wish you might repose sufficient confidence in me as a gentleman to believe I never betray a trust, never pry into a lady's secret."

"Oh, I do, Lieut. Brant. It is not doubt of you at all; but I am not sure, even within my own heart, that I am doing just what is right. Besides, it will be so difficult to make you, almost a stranger, comprehend the peculiar conditions which influence my action. Even now you suspect that I am deceitful—a masked sham like those others we discussed to-night; but I have never played a part before, never skulked in the dark. To-night I simply had to do it."

"Do You Really Think I am So Very Bad, Because—Because I Like Bob Hampton?"

"Then attempt no explanation," he said, gently, "and believe me, I shall continue to trust you. To-night, whatever you wish may be, I will abide by it. Shall I go, or stay? In either case you have nothing to fear."

She drew a deep breath, these open words of faith touching her more strongly than would any selfish faultfinding.

"Trust begets trust," she replied, with new firmness, and now gazing frankly into his face. "You can walk with me a portion of the way if you wish, but I am going to tell you the truth,—I have an appointment with a man."

"I naturally regret to learn this," he said, with assumed calmness. "But the way is so lonely I prefer walking with you until you have some other protector."

She accepted his proffered arm, feeling the constraint in his tone, the formality in his manner, most keenly. A older woman might have resented it, but it only served to sadden and embarrass her. He began speaking of the quiet beauty of the night, but she had no thought of what he was saying.

"Lieut. Brant," she said, at last, "you do not ask me who the man is."

"Certainly not, Miss Naida; it is none of my business."

"I think, perhaps, it might be; the knowledge might help you to understand. It is Bob Hampton."

He stared at her. "The gambler? No wonder, then, your meeting is clandestine."

She replied indignantly, her lips trembling. "He is not a gambler; he is a miner, over in the Black Range. He has not touched a card in two years."

"Oh, reformed has he? And are you the instrument that has worked such a miracle?"

Her eyes fell. "I don't know, but I hope so." Then she glanced up again, wondering at his continued silence. "Don't you understand yet?"

"Only that you are secretly meeting a man of the worst reputation, one known the length and breadth of this border as a gambler and fighter."

"Yes; but—but don't you know who I am?"

He smiled grimly, wondering what possible difference that could make. "Certainly; you are Miss Naida Herndon."

"I? You have not known? Lieut. Brant, I am Naida Gillis."

He stopped still, again facing her. "Naida Gillis? Do you mean old Gillis' girl? Is it possible you are the same we rescued on the prairie two years ago?"

She bowed her head. "Yes; do you understand now why I trust this Bob Hampton?"

"I perhaps might comprehend why you should feel grateful to him, but not why you should thus consent to meet with him clandestinely."

He could not see the deep flush upon her cheeks, but he was not deaf to the pitiful falter in her voice.

"Because he has been good and true to me," she explained, frankly, "better than anybody else in all the world. I don't care what you say, you and those others who do not know him, but I believe in him; I think he is a man. They won't let me see him, the Herndons, nor permit him to come to the house. He has not been in Glencaid for two years, until yesterday. The Indian rising has driven all the miners out from the Black Range, and he came down here for no other purpose than to get a glimpse of me, and learn how I was getting on. I—I saw him over at the hotel just for a moment—Mrs. Guffy handed me a note—and I—I had only just left him when I encountered you at the door. I wanted to see him again, to talk with him longer, but I couldn't manage to get away from you, and I didn't know what to do. There, I've told it all; do you really think I am so very bad, because—because I like Bob Hampton?"

He stood a moment completely nonplussed, yet compelled to answer.

"I certainly have no right to question your motives," he said, at last, "and I believe your purposes to be above reproach. I wish I might give the same credit to this man Hampton. But, Miss Naida, the world does not often consent to judge us by our own estimation of right and wrong; it prefers to place its own interpretation on acts, and thus often condemns the innocent. Others might not see this as I do, nor have such unquestioning faith in you."

"I know," she admitted, stubbornly, "but I wanted to see him; I have been so lonely for him, and this was the only possible way."

Brant felt a wave of uncontrolable sympathy sweep across him, even while he was beginning to hate this man, who, he felt, had stolen a passage into the innocent heart of a girl not half his age, one knowing little of the ways of the world.

"May I walk beside you until you meet him?" he asked.

"You will not quarrel?"

"No; at least not through any fault of mine."

A few steps in the moonlight and she again took his arm, although they scarcely spoke. At the bridge she withdrew her hand and uttered a peculiar call, and Hampton stepped forth from the concealing bushes, his head bare, his hat in his hand.

"I scarcely thought it could be you," he said, seemingly not altogether satisfied, "as you were accompanied by another."

The younger man took a single step forward, his uniform showing in the moonlight. "Miss Gillis will inform you later why I am here," he said, striving to speak civilly. "You and I, however, have met before—I am Lieut. Brant, of the Seventh cavalry."

Hampton bowed, his manner somewhat stiff and formal, his face impenetrable.

"I should have left Miss Gillis previous to her meeting with you," Brant continued, "but I desired to request the privilege of calling upon you tomorrow for a brief interview."

"With pleasure."

"Shall it be at ten?"

"The hour is perfectly satisfactory. You will find me at the hotel."

"You place me under obligations," said Brant, and turned toward the wondering girl. "I will now say goodnight, Miss Gillis, and I promise to remember only the pleasant events of this evening."

Their hands met for an instant of warm pressure, and then the two left behind stood motionless and watched him striding along the moonlit road.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. Among them is a stranger who introduces himself by the name of Hampton, also Gillis, the post trader, and his daughter. Gillis and a majority of the soldiers are killed during a three days' siege.

CHAPTER II.—Hampton offers assistance to the girl, and is at first spurned because he is known as a gambler.

CHAPTER III.—Hampton and the girl only escape from the Indians. They fall exhausted on the plains.

CHAPTER IV.—A company of the Seventh cavalry, Lieut. Brant in command, find Hampton and the girl on the plains, and restore them to consciousness. Hampton announces that he proposes to care for the girl.

CHAPTER V.—Hampton and the girl stop at the Miners' Home in Glencaid, Mrs. Duffy, proprietress. Rev. Howard Wynkoop proposes that Hampton place Miss Gillis in care of Mrs. Herndon. He consents to think it over.

CHAPTER VI.—Hampton talks the future over with Miss Gillis—the Kid. She shows him her mother's picture and tells him what she can of her parentage and life. They decide she shall live with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VII.—The Kid takes up her residence with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VIII.—Naida—the Kid—runs away from Mrs. Herndon's and rejoins Hampton. He induces her to go back, and to have nothing more to do with him.

CHAPTER IX.—Hampton plays his last game of cards. He announces to Red Slavin that he has quit, and then leaves Glencaid.

CHAPTER X.—Miss Phoebe Spencer arrives in Glencaid to teach its first school.

CHAPTER XI.—Miss Spencer meets Naida, Rev. Wynkoop, etc. She boards at Mrs. Herndon's.

CHAPTER XII.—Naida and Lieut. Brant again meet without his knowing who she is. She informs him of the coming Bachelor club ball in honor of Miss Spencer.

CHAPTER XIII.—Lieut. Brant meets Silent Murphy, Custer's scout. He reports trouble brewing among the Sioux.

CHAPTER XIV.—Social difficulties arise at the Bachelor club's ball among the admirers of Miss Spencer. Lieut. Brant meets Miss Spencer but she is not his acquaintance of the day before. She tells him of Naida, and he accidentally meets her again as he is returning to the ballroom with a fan for Miss Spencer.

WHO IS THE JOKER?

To the Editor of The Republican:

The Hon. "Josh" Miles and the Hon. Isaac Strauss seem to be the end men of the Democracy's campaign troupe. And it must be confessed, they are doing very well at sustaining the parts assigned them. Strauss scored the first little joke when he undertook to frighten Baltimore into voting the Democratic ticket with a threat of losing the business patronage of the South—as if men bought goods on the strength of their political opinions. The joke didn't take well and was promptly withdrawn from the boards. Miles was called on to do better, and did better—as a joker. No more delicious bit of humor has enlivened this campaign—barring of course, the Senatorial courtesies of the Senatorial aspirants, than Miles declaration at Deal's Island, that the Democratic party has always "striven for ballot reform and the purification of elections." Lend us a hand at laughing, gentlemen, as we read the words aloud. And then hoop us in, or we shall burst with laughing, as the solemn visaged candidate for the Federal Senatorship proceeds to picture "that sturdy and regular Democrat, Mr. John P. Poe," as the valiant leader of the movement for purified elections. Evidently, the spell-binders of the State Democracy are bent on entertaining the people with pleasantries rather than discussing with them the issue that are vitally involved in a campaign which means so much to the freemen of the State. The State Convention seemed funny enough, when a gubernatorial candidate was evolved from a "dog-eat-dog" scrap among the leaders. Then came the contortions of contending forces, striving to find an acceptable answer to the simple inquiry "What is a Democrat." Treading close upon the heels of this exhausting struggle was the endless chain of conferences by Senatorial aspirants, wherein gentlemen who express their unbounded trust in the dear people find themselves wholly unable to transfer any portion of that trust to one another. And now comes the howling climax to the whole show, in the funny things that are being uttered by the campaign orators in lieu of any serious and worthy arguments to be found for continuing their machine in power. In view of which fact it is interesting to hear the Standard Oil Attorney solemnly aver that "there is no earthly reason why any Democrat should vote against his party this year." But Mr. Cull has doubtless already found a multitude of Democrats who are shifting the question thus:—"Is there any earthly reason why any Democrat should vote for his party this year?" That party refused to heed the popular demand for Warfield's re-nomination, turned a deaf ear to the candidacy of Baker, and put itself in bondage to John Walter Smith and his faithful henchman, Crothers. Why should any Democrat feel bound to vote for the entrenchment in power of men who have proven themselves utterly indifferent to the peoples's rights, recreant to their most sacred pledges, and unworthy of high places at the hands of a party which holds a large percentage of the best citizenship of this State.

The time has gone—let us hope, forever, and ever gone—when a man votes the Democratic or Republican ticket because his great grandfather did; just as he declines to wear an old "drab coat all buttoned down before" because it was the approved attire of his respected ancestors. We are living in a new era—the Bourbon democracy to the contrary notwithstanding. Men are not led as lambs to the slaughter in politics any longer, by the ancient dodge of partisan appeals. People are voting for the man, looking to his character and record more than the party name he wears. And nothing in the history of Maryland politics goes further to the proof of this gratifying condition, than the way men of all parties are lining up beside George R. Gaither in his fight for good government and a "square deal." Mr. Gaither's record as a public official has been so clean, his honesty and integrity are so unimpeachable, his fearless stand for equal rights to every man has been so sincere and frank, that every body (even his opponents) have come to trust him. Nothing could better illustrate this fact than Mr. Gaither's attitude toward public service corporations. It was rumored, in certain quarters, that Mr. Gaither's opinions on this subject were radical and dangerous, and that the public service corporations would oppose his candidacy. Mr. Gaither did not equivocate in the face of this report. He spoke right out in his speech of acceptance,—and "that's what I call a man" was the words of approval I heard on all sides. Mr. Gaither did not hesitate to remind the public service corporations that their privileges come to them from the people and that to the people they must account for the use or the abuse of those privileges. The servant if not greater than his lord. The corporation is not greater than the people who give it being.

On the other hand he did not fail to warn the people that blind assaults upon such corporations could do no good, but only harm. It is never wise to burn down the barn to get rid of the rats. It is not statesmanship to destroy, but to regulate the giant forces that can and ought to be the people's valued servants and not their unlicensed tyrant. That is safe and sound, and every good citizen will wish well to the public official who guides his public conduct by the light of that same star. The people want a man—not a scion of the ancient and (not) honorable family of the waxnoses, but a man, who has broad, wise statesmanlike ideas and is not afraid to take them out for a public airing and official exercises. The contrast between a small county boss, steeped in politics from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet, and an able and broad-minded man, tried and true in the services of his city and State, identified with every movement for the betterment of our public affairs and thoroughly sympathetic with the spirit of political progress that dominates the thought of today, is too great to escape any save those whose devotion to party blinds them to all other considerations. It is this contrast which rallies all classes of citizens to George R. Gaither's support and which support will land him in the chair as our Chief Executive.

Indeed, the only breath of criticism thus far passed upon Mr. Gaither is that he is a socialist and that "most of his real views have been of a socialistic character." Well, that depends on what is meant by that very hazy and ill-defined adjective "socialistic." Mr. Gaither is a socialist, if he is permitted to define his socialism himself. He defines it as a firm belief in the ultimate evolution of the human race, upward. He holds an optimistic creed concerning his fellowmen. He believes the time will come when extremes of poverty and wealth will be no more, and when every man will have a fair chance to make the most of himself, in intellectual and moral, as well as in material things. And nobody but a misanthrope, or a narrow-sighted partisan will quarrel with Mr. Gaither's creed. The man who has faith in the race will find the race has faith in him. The man who looks always for the best in his fellowmen, will find his fellowmen looking for the best in him. The world goes up after better men and better ideas, always. If this is socialism, make the most of it. If it is George R. Gaither's socialism, honor him for it.

In other words, Mr. Gaither is distinctively and thoroughly a believer in the people and a defender of their rights. This it is which made his nomination inevitable from the moment when he expressed a willingness to accept it, and this is which has rallied around him men of all classes, until factions in the Republican party are forgotten in enthusiastic loyality to their splended leader, and Democrats by the hundreds especially in Baltimore city are flocking to his standard. It is no exaggeration or rainbow chasing to say that Baltimore where Mr. Gaither is so well known and has been so thoroughly tested, will go Republican at this election by several thousands.

CALLED ON HIS FRIEND GEORGE.

A Story of Lincon's Visit to Richmond, Virginia.

The day after the great fire following the fall of Richmond, Lincoln, with a small bodyguard, walked through the streets of the charred city. As he approached the corner occupied by General Pickett's residence he directed the guard to wait and to their astonishment ran two steps at a time up to the door and rapped. The servants had fled. The "baby bride" had never seen President Lincoln, but she had read his letters to her husband and from him had learned to hold in the highest esteem the great Northern President. With her baby in her arms she opened the door, says the World, and looked up at the tall, gaunt man with the sad face and uncouth ways.

Without a word of explanation he asked:

"Is George Pickett about?"

To hear her husband's name bereft of its title by a Yankee at that moment was almost the limit, especially as many a rumor had floated about Richmond concerning the fate which awaited the leaders of the Confederacy.

With all the proud dignity she could command the baby bride replied:

"General Pickett is not at home."

The stranger seemed disappointed, and as he turned to go remarked:

"I am Abraham Lincoln, an old friend of George's."

"Not President Lincoln?" Mrs. Pickett exclaimed. The tall man shook his head, repeating:

"No. Just Abraham Lincoln, George Pickett's old friend."

Following the instant promptings of the heart which still governs her, the baby bride thrust her baby boy into the arms of the great Yankee as her best effort to express her veneration and confidence, saying;

"I am George Pickett's wife and this is George Pickett's baby."

GENERAL GEO. R. GAITHER SEES VICTORY AHEAD

The Republican Candidate is Enthusiastic Over Party Prospects.

OUTLOOK IN THE COUNTIES

Standard Bearer Gives Assurance of Success At Polls.—Especially Pleased With Prospect in Western Maryland.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 21.—Brimming full of enthusiasm over the prospect of a sweeping victory at the polls in November, Mr. George R. Gaither, Republican candidate for Governor, returned to Baltimore yesterday from a week's campaign tour embracing part of Southern and Western Maryland.

Although going night and day, Mr. Gaither has stood up under the strain remarkably, and physically looks as though he had just gotten back from his summer vacation. He has grown much stouter than he was before the campaign, and above all he says that he is deriving keen enjoyment in visiting the towns throughout his native state and in talking to the voters.

The gubernatorial candidate was only allowed two days' respite from his rather arduous task, for tonight he went to Denton, where a meeting was held, it being the first gun to be fired by the Republicans on the lower Eastern Shore.

No candidate on the ticket is more confident of Republican success next month than is Mr. Gaither. He said last night that at the present time all indications pointed to a triumph for the entire state ticket.

"So far," remarked Mr. Gaither, "I have visited nearly all the towns in Southern and Western Maryland, and found everybody enthusiastic over our ticket. Everywhere we have been received in the most cordial manner, meetings have been largely attended, we have been listened to with the closest attention, and have gotten the people aroused as they have not been in a state election since 1895 and 1897. Why, even in some of the Democratic strongholds—for instance, the towns in Howard county—our gatherings were surprisingly large. I was told that many Democrats were on hand to greet us. This goes to show that the people are thinking, and will after all reach the conclusion that the affairs of the state can best be managed by a Republican administration.

"So far as the Republican party itself is concerned," continued Mr. Gaither, "I might say that never during my career as a public man have I seen it better united. Unity seems to be the watchword everywhere you go. Whatever the differences may be as regards the county tickets, these differences have been entirely obliterated when it comes to the state ticket, and in every county we have visited so far we have found all factions united and clasping hands with only one supreme idea in view—to elect the entire ticket.

"I might further add that the Republicans of Maryland will not be satisfied to have a gubernatorial candidate meet with success, and at the same time have the legislative ticket defeated. They are determined to elect every Republican who has been nominated, no matter what the office might be.

"It is deemed absolutely necessary to safeguard the party's candidate for governor in case he is elected with a Republican legislature. Our party believes that members of the legislature selected from its own ranks are better qualified to carry out Republican policies than anyone else, and all are fully determined that defeat shall come to no one at the polls in November.

"Throughout our campaign our paramount issue, of course, has been a better election law, and our arguments in this direction have fallen upon attentive ears. You have no idea what a burning issue this is throughout the entire state. In every county you hear the most bitter denunciation of the present law, and the prevailing belief is that Republican success is the only assurance of a better law being enacted.

"All the issues for which the party stands have been clearly defined by the candidates, and particularly by my associates on the ticket. Mr. Urner, candidate for attorney general, has been a tower of strength to our party. He is a logical speaker, and the intelligent, convincing way to which he has appealed to Marylanders has won us many votes. Both Messrs. Baker and Parran, too, have proved popular with the people, and much of our success must rightly be attributed to their efforts on the hustings.

"As I have said before," added Mr. Gaither in conclusion, "taking conditions as they exist today, I am firmly of the opinion that we shall triumph on election day. Our party will present a solid phalanx, with all factions gotten together in one common cause, and will further be aided by many Democrats who love good government."

LET Garrett County be the banner Republican county of the State this year.

CANDIDATE for County Commissioner Otho Fike, has made numerous friends at points where he has visited. He is conservative and his election as a member of the Board will be no mistake.

IN THE nominees on the Republican ticket the people of the county have men in whom their confidences will be held sacred. They will look after the interest of the whole people when elected and not be tools of a few bosses.

SHERIFF BROWN is making an active campaign for the entire ticket as well as himself. His past record as a public official should be sufficient to inspire the people with confidence in his ability to administer the affairs of the office which he seeks and to which he will undoubtedly be elected by a large majority.

A VOTE for Myers and Green, Republican nominees for the House of Delegates, means a vote against the further emasculation of the election law of Maryland. It is bad enough now, everybody knows, and to further juggle with it will make the question of whether you voted or not still harder to answer.

GARRETT COUNTY has within her confines twelve hundred more Republican voters than the opposite party and there is no reason why she should not give at least a thousand majority for the Republican State and county tickets.

A CAMPAIGN without fuss or feathers gives the conscientious voter an unusually good opportunity to think about the two candidates for governor and their comparative fitness for office. The important thing at issue in this election is whether the people of Maryland want the Gaither or the Crothers type of man in public office.

MR. JULIUS C. RENNINGER, Republican candidate for State's Attorney, has been speaking nightly ever since the campaign opened in behalf of every individual on the ticket. Where he is known he has cemented friendships and at other places where his ability as a lawyer and speaker was a matter of hearsay only, he has drawn many voters to him who will give him their heartiest support.

THE SENATE HUMBUG.

Governor Warfield, speaking to a friend in Baltimore last Friday, made use of the following language: "I think, and I intend to say it from the stump next week, that a Democrat who will cheat a Democrat in a primary election is the most detestable and the most contemptible creature that lives."

This is as true as taxes; indeed, we think the Governor might have gone a little farther and objurgated the Democrat who cheats anybody, even a Republican, in an election.

GORMAN'S DOUBLE-DEALING.

Senator Gorman's audacity in claiming that his party favored the passage of a fair election law at the last session of the Legislature, while the Republicans opposed such legislation, is about the most bare-faced and brazen misstatement that has been made in this campaign. The evidence is simply overwhelming that Gorman and the Democratic managers passed the word down the line at Annapolis that no changes were to be made in the present law. The Republicans introduced the old Reform League law of 1896 and failing to get that, joined in to get even a few beneficial changes proposed by a Democrat, Mr. Murphy, of Baltimore. The Democrats fought this bitterly in the House and killed it in the senate on the last day of the session. A few minutes before midnight, when the session ended by Constitutional limitation, a bill was reported by a special committee, composed entirely of Democrats, and the Republicans were asked to vote for it in faith without having had a chance to know anything about what changes were proposed. To a man they voted against it in the House. Two Democrats deliberately absented themselves when the vote was taken after midnight and thus the bill failed. With those two votes the bill would have passed, and if either a good or bad measure, the credit or discredit would have been given the majority party. As a matter of fact it was not intended to make any material change in the law, because it gave them unfair advantages which they were afraid to lose, and nobody knows this better than young Mr. Gorman.

A ONE-PARTY STATE THEIR AIM.

The prospect of another disfranchising amendment which will threaten the suffrage of thousands of voters—white as well as black—in case of Judge Crothers' election should be taken into serious consideration by the people of the State, and particularly of Baltimore. The Democratic leaders are pursuing their determination to make Maryland a one-party State with untiring zeal and with all the resources at their command. They propose, if possible, to put into the hands of election officials powers which can be used to deprive white men of the rights of suffrage. However the purpose is disguised, they aim at disfranchisement. There is no question that the present law works to that end. Our election figures in the past few years prove it beyond the shadow of doubt. It is now proposed to tinker the law again, with the idea of making it more serviceable. Exactly how this is to be done we are not told, but we have the declared intention to do so when a law can be framed which will be acceptable to all factions in the Democratic party, and, furthermore, the opinion is expressed that agreement on this issue can be reached. There is no reason to believe that Judge Crothers will stand in the way of such an agreement. That was one reason for his nomination, and his success at the polls will be the next step in a sinister attack on the ballot. It is worth an earnest struggle to keep the right to vote; it is worth a strenuous endeavor to prevent the State from being delivered over permanently to machine domination, which will inevitably follow undisputed one-party rule, the real aim of the Democratic organization.

THE DOPESTERS.

Another attempt is evidently being made to impart some buoyancy to the Knox boom. The big Pennsylvania papers are all running some columns of political dope date lined from Washington and Columbus and other centers of political activity. The dopesters all agree that something has happened to the Taft boom and that the Taft managers are tremendously worried. They do not all think alike as to the reason for the slump which they look for in the force of the Taft sentiment, but they all mention the fact that Uncle Joe Cannon has two real live delegates already elected, while none of the other candidates has a single one in his corral. They all agree that the Roosevelt policies are stronger than ever with the plain people, and they find out in some inscrutable way that all these facts point to the probable nomination of Senator Knox.

This is all very interesting, and it fills space as well as any other kind of dope, but it does not deceive anybody who is watching the drift of popular sentiment the country over. The next republican national convention will be a meeting of Roosevelt republicans. The delegates will not renominate Roosevelt, because he has promised the people of this country that he "will under no circumstances accept a renomination," and they know that he will keep that promise. They will restate the Roosevelt square-deal program as a part of the republican platform, and they will nominate the strongest and most conspicuous of men who have been identified with the present administration.

The fact that the President has already selected Secretary Taft as the man pre-eminently qualified to carry the Roosevelt policies to their full fruition will be in no way to Taft's disadvantage, the dopesters to the contrary notwithstanding. Nobody except certain of the reactionaries has ever shown any feeling of resentment at the idea of the President's holding and expressing his own opinion, like any other citizen, as to the choice of his successor. That choice is plainly the big war secretary, and it is likely to coincide with the choice of the convention.

PARTY VS. PEOPLE.

The following editorial from the Baltimore American sets forth so plainly the position of the Democratic party in Maryland that THE REPUBLICAN reproduces it. It is a struggle between public opinion and political rapacity. The American says:

"Whenever their grip upon the state is threatened the Democratic managers invariably raise a cry that appeals to the self-interest of the partisan office-holders. This is the case now. Their orators and organ are listing the various state boards, pointing to the number of offices that these represent and telling the placeholders that in the event of the success of the Republican party there will be a "revolution" inaugurated. They, of course, do not base their plea openly upon the principle of self-interest. They are too shrewd to make such a plea; they assert that in the event of the overthrow of the Democratic party all the places will be parceled out by a horde of incompetents and rascals. This as the fact, is just the state of the case in the event of Democratic success. The present administration is creditable because of the pressure of public sentiment that kept the bosses out of the saddle. This has been a cause for unending irritation among those who believe that the main purpose of a state official is to create party spoils. That element is now seeking control of the state, as it has the unquestioned control of the Democratic party. It is safe to predict that the effect of the triumph of the Democratic machine would be vastly more radical upon the state machinery than the election of the Republican ticket. Republican success would mean carrying out to further lines the beneficial elements in the present administration of the state, and the making room for a vastly widened serviceability of the various departments of the government. It is always the Democrats that are seeking to tamper with the government machinery. The Republicans seek to make the best use of it for the public good. But the cry has been raised and a certain element of the party will fully comprehend that they are called upon to line up with the Democratic organization for their own good, not the good of the state. The real struggle is between public sentiment and political rapacity. The Republican party in Maryland represents organized public opinion. Only as it gives response to public opinion can it hope to be entrusted with the work of doing the public service. When public opinion is at its best the party is bound to succeed. This is the situation at present. The sentiment of the people is clearly for the perpetuation and extension of the comparative freedom of the state from malign influences. The Democratic party, under its present direction, with its candidate, stands for deterioration at every point. Public sentiment will not permit this to be the out come of the election. For instance, it will not permit the election supervisors to come under the control of the bosses, with the inevitable corruption of the politics of the state and the strengthening of the machinery of fraud by the doing away with the present bipartisan board or reducing it to a farce. It will not consent to the Liquor License Commissioners being named by the crew who would use this force as a sinister one in the state. It will not permit the Commissioners of Police to be named by the bosses, with the dragging of the police into politics. It believes heartily in the stand taken by Mr. Gaither for the absolute divorcing of the police from all political uses. Very many persons are not greatly concerned as to the party that administers the state departments. They are greatly concerned, however, that the government shall not fall into the hands of those who have the bad grace to cloak their ulterior designs by casting imputations at the party that is responsible for the inauguration of the era of reform. So that every time the plea is made by the leaders that the offices are in danger the public understands that it is a call to the Democrats to bend all their efforts to do the service of the organization, in the hope that should it come into power they would find grace in the eyes of the bosses. But the spoils argument has little weight with the thinking people. The independents repudiate the suggestion that the Republicans will not administer the affairs of government in all respects better than the bosses who are seeking to inaugurate a reign of corruption and to break the force of public sentiment."

MR. GREEN FOR HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

Words of Commendation in His Behalf From Hon. C. J. Otto.

To the Editor of the Republican:

Would you allow me a little space in your valuable paper, in behalf of my friend Mr. Lawrence Green, one of the candidates for the House of Delegates? Mr. Green was born in Garrett county; has been a Repnblican from his youth. He was reared by a Republican family, and his present vocation in life is an instructor in educational matters. He was reared on a farm where he received his training for industry. He is honest, conscientious in all his endeavors; is a young man of good moral habits and of unimpeachable character, taking a prominent part in Sunday school and church work. He is a good talker and an able debater, and when he takes a position he believes it to be right, and his enemies will find him a foe worthy of their steel. The writer, knowing him from his boyhood days, and carefully watching his career until now, would say to the voters of Garrett county they will make no mistake in electing him on the 5th of November to represent their interests at Annapolis. He is a young man of which any community may well feel proud, and the object in writing these few lines is that the people of the county may learn to know him as he is known in the locality in which he was reared. He will take an active part against the infamous election law and for our county roads which I think an important issue for our people.

Yours,
C. J. OTTO.

THE CONTROL OF FOREST FIRES.

Forest Warden System Has Been Established in Garrett County.

Under the provisions of the Forestry Act passed by the last Legislature a Forest Warden system has been established for Garrett county. The names and addresses of Forest Wardens that have been commissioned up to date are as follows:

Nathan C. Browning, Sang Run; J. M. Falkenstein, Oakland; Walter O. Kimmell, Oakland; John H. Roth, Dobbin, W. Va.; W. D. Wilson, Wilson, W. Va.; W. T. Stoyer, Stoyer; George L. Micheals, Westernport; C. E. Ellithorp, Bittinger; C. E. Stanton, Grantsville; Henry Leatham, Keyser.

These men, acting under state law will assist in suppressing forest fires and aid the State Forester in the prosecution of all violation of the fire laws.

When a forest fire is observed by any one he is requested to report the same to the nearest forest warden, who will respond promptly in extinguishing it, employing assistance if necessary. The expense of fighting forest fires is paid by the county which then has recourse, under the law, to recover the cost from any land owner, individual or corporation, on whose account they shall have been obliged to pay out money for fighting fire.

The law makes it a misdemeanor for any one to set fire to woodlands, brush, grass, grain or stubble not his own or to allow, either through carelessness or negligence, fire to escape from his own lands to the injury of other lands. The maximum penalty is a fine of $1000 or one year imprisonment, or both fine and imprisonment. Furthermore a person who maliciously, wilfully or carelessly is responsible for a fire that does damage to the property of others, is liable to the county for the damage caused and for the expense of extinguishing the fire.

The owners of forest lands are coming more and more to realize the value of the forests and the products derived from them. The State also realizes its duty in affording all possible protection to our forests to lessen the dangers of destructive fires, fires that not only burn the timber but burn also the young growth, destroying the possibility of a new forest for many years to come.

The restaurant recently opened by Mr. Walter Morrison on Railroad street is enjoying a splendid patronage. The genialty of the proprietor and the excellent manner in which lunches and meals are served will in time build up a large trade.

Trial Catarrh treatments are being mailed out free, on request, by Dr. Shoop, Racine, Wis. These tests are proving to the people—without a penny's cost—the great value of this scientific prescription known to druggists everywhere as Dr. Shoop's Catarrh Remedy. Sold by all dealers.

Col. and Mrs. A. G. Sturgiss, who spent a month at Mount Clemens, Michigan, where the former went for the benefit of his health, returned to their home in Oakland last Friday evening. Col. Sturgiss was very much benefited by the treatment he received and hopes to remain permantly cured.

Stomach troubles, Heart and Kidney ailments, can be quickly corrected with a prescription known to druggists everywhere as Dr. Shoop's Restorative. The prompt and surprising relief which this remedy immediately brings is entirely due to its Restorative action upon the controlling nerves of the Stomach, etc. All dealers.

THE REPUBLICAN acknowledges with thanks the receipt of an invitation from the people of Wilmington, Del., sent through Mr. John O. Bosley, of that city, who is a native of Oakland, being a son of the late George L. Bosley and Mrs. Bosley, to attend the Home Coming which is to be held in Wilmington this month.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Bush and daughter removed to Oakland from near Eglon, W. Va., on Monday of this week and are occupying their residence which Mr. Bush purchased about a year ago from Mr. Percy Procter. The people of Oakland welcome Mr. Bush and his estimable family into their midst.

A weak Stomach, causing dyspepsia, a weak Heart with palpitation or intermittent pulse, always means weak Stomach nerves or weak Heart nerves. Strengthen these inside or controlling nerves with Dr. Shoop's Restorative and see how quickly these ailments disappear. Dr. Shoop of Racine, Wis., will mail samples free. Write for them. A test will tell. Your health is certainly worth this simple trial. Sold by all dealers.

DEATH OF JUDGE McSHERRY.

The Sad Event Occured at Frederick Yesterday Morning.

Judge James McSherry, chief judge of the Court of Appeals of this State, died at his residence in Frederick yesterday morning, aged 65 years.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MR. J. MORRIS MILLER.

Mr. J. Morris Miller, whose protracted illness from typhoid fever with complicating maladies, has been mentioned in our columns, died Friday night, Oct. the 18th, 1907, in his native county, Goochland, Virginia. Mr. Miller was never married, his business engagements were in Richmond and he was a younger and only surviving brother of C. M. Miller, who, owing to distance and the uncertainty of railway connections, could not arrive in time for the interment Sunday afternoon, Oct. 20th, at the ancestrial homestead near Goochland Court House.

RONALD THRASHER.

Ronald, the six year old son of Mrs. Nettie Thrasher, died at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George F. Loughridge, Mrs. Thrasher's parents, on Third street in Oakland last Sunday morning at 9.30 o'clock of enlargement of the heart. The little boy was quite a favorite with all who knew him. His funeral took place from the residence where he died on Tuesday afternoon, being conducted by Rev. Jno. M. Davis.

MRS. BRIDGET CARNEY.

Died, at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. Michael Fahey, Westernport, Md., of diseases incident to extreme old age, on Saturday last, Mrs. Bridget Carney, widow of the late Michael Carney, who proceeded her to the grave about eighteen years ago. Mrs. Carney was born in County Galway, Ireland, about eighty-five years ago, and came to this country while yet a young woman. She was married in Baltimore and came to this section of the country while the Baltimore and Ohio was building through here, settling with her husband at Hutton, where their children, Messrs. John, Martin, Michael and Patrick, and Mrs. Margaret Fahey, of Elk Garden; Mrs. Patrick Mackin, of Cumberland, and Mrs. Michael Fahey, of Westernport, were all born and reared. Mrs. Carney's remains were brought to Oakland Monday morning and taken to St. Peter's Catholic church, where Rev. James E. Connell, pastor, conducted the funeral services. The interment was made in the cemetery here. Many people from Piedmont, Westernport and Hutton were in attendance at the funeral.

If real coffee disturbs your Stomach, your Heart or Kidneys, then try this clever Coffee imitation—Dr. Shoop's Health Coffee. Dr. Shoop has closely matched old Java and Mocha Coffee in flavor and taste, yet it has not a single grain of real Coffee in it. Dr. Shoop's Health Coffee Imitation is made from pure toasted grains or cereals, with Malt, Nuts, etc. Made in one minute. No tedious long wait. You will surely like it. Get a free sample at our store. All dealers.

There are two ways of spending a dollar. You can spend it at home, gain an easy conscience, make another friend and perhaps get the dollar back tomorrow, or you send it away, feel that you have sinned, offended the home merchant and forever lose the dollar and the blessed influence for good to yourself and neighbor.

The accounts contained in THE REPUBLICAN of last week of the corner stone laying of the new court house by the Masonic fraternity and of the Republican meeting held in the opera house the same evening, were full and accurate in every respect. While a large number of extra copies of the paper were printed the edition was exhausted by Friday morning.

To check a cold quickly, get from your druggist some little Candy Cold Tablets called Preventics. Druggists everywhere are now dispensing Preventics, for they are not only safe, but decidedly certain and prompt. Preventics contain no Quinine, no laxative, nothing harsh nor sickening. Taken at the "sneeze stage" Preventics will prevent Pneumonia, Bronchitis, La Grippe, etc. Hence the name, Preventics. Good for feverish children. 48 Preventics 25 cents. Trial Boxes 5 cts. Sold by all dealers.

The habit of treating those who are nearest and dearest to us with discourtesy is one that clouds the sunshine of too many homes. If you are young and looking for your prince, just test his home conduct. Do not be guided in your choice by what a young man is in the parlor; find out what he is in his mother's sitting room. Do not judge him by the way he can tip his hat, but by the way he treats the old, especially his parents.

In this issue of THE REPTBLICAN will be found the official ballot containing the names of the candidates for State and county offices, and also the provision submitted under the terms of the Constitution for the taking of the sense of the people whether or not a Constitutional Convention shall be held. The ballot is the largest ever published in Garrett county, which under the election law must compare with the official ballot in form and arrangement. If the ballot is studied by the voters of the county there should be very little difficulty experienced in voting it intelligently.

A CALL TO ARMS.

Grantsville District In The Forefront Against The Election Law.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

Being a voter of District No. 3, and having at heart the best interests of my fellow citizens, I cannot resist writing to THE REPUBLICAN stating what I conscientiously consider the most important subject to each and every individual of this county or state from this moment until the last ballot is deposited on next election day. That is, the disfranchisement of any class of our citizens through proposed Democratic schemes and misnamed election laws.

If there be anything sacred, it is the sovereignty of man; there are no heaven-ordained classes to govern him. By the virtue of his existence, and by the reason of his creation, he is a sovereign in his own right, and in these latter days all just rights in government should not be derived from the will of the ruler, or from any scheming of political manipulators, but must come from the consent of the governed. If the present debauched election law, under which thousands of our best citizens are now suffering, is allowed to remain on the statute books, or replaced by a worse one, self-government in so far is absolutely obliterated, and you lose the most precious right of individual citizenship, on the simple subterfuge of not being competent to mark your ticket correctly. When you are denied the right of suffrage simply because you have had the misfortune of a limited education, you are governed by an arbitrary power unfit to exist under our present form of constitution and government.

Fellow citizens, will you permit this to continue when it is within easy reach on election day to wipe the iniquitous measure from the pages of the statute books, and place thereon an election law that guarantees you, whether white or black, learned or unlearned, your just and equal suffrage, and at the same time safeguards your ballot that it is counted as cast, and recorded as intended?

Now, or probably never, is the time to assert your prerogative of franchise, and with decisive step, march to the polls and by your ballot undo what you may never again have the opportunity. We, who are farmers, laborers and taxpayers, have in justice and right, equal rights of franchise with millionaries and presidents; more than this, it is our bounded duty to ourselves and country to fulfil this obligation on election day. Under the present election measure and methods thousands upon thousands have been unable to do this—often through so-called illiteracy, and oftener through devious subterfuges which should never be allowed to exist under any decent law or government.

But the remedy is near at hand, and by your vote for the Republican ticket the present Democratic regime will be driven from power and under Republican rule your wrongs will be righted and a fair election law will be placed on the statutes of our State.

Fellow citizens, I reiterate, it is for us to determine by our vote on November 5th if the Democrats are to further emasculate the election law of 1896 by enacting further obnoxious legislation, and rendering the law more onerous and unjust, or if the Republicans are to be restored to power, thereby insuring each and all their right to vote,—with a ballot of the simplest form and with a security beyond apprehension. Stop! look! listen! and cast your vote for George R. Gaither and the entire Republican ticket.

A voter who has not missed voting at an election for 20 years in the Grantsville district, and hopes to have the pleasure to cast a ballot November 5th against this infamous election law.

Grantsville, Oct. 21, 1907.

Ballots Being Printed in Frederick.

The ballots for the use of the voters of this county next month are being printed in Frederick City, notwithstanding the fact that in Oakland there are two printing offices provided with the necessary equipment and with workmen of sufficient ability to execute the work here, thereby keeping just that many dollars at home. Aside from this the liability of having any errors in the names of the candidates on the official ballots will be minimized as the printers of Oakland are familiar with every name to be printed thereon. The printing of the ballots was given to the Garrett Journal by the Election Supervisors without competition, the Board evidently being under impression that the Journal office was equipped for the work

People take newspapers nowadays, read them, and then throw them away. They never think what a source of pleasure and profit—or reminiscence and thought, a file or even a few numbers of such a paper would be to them twenty or thirty years afterwards. Pay for your papers and then keep them.

A Rare Invesement.

Garrett Aerie of Eagles.

Garrett Aerie, F. O. E., Oakland, Md., was instituted by Deputy Grand President Hirch, of Baltimore. The Aerie started off with 52 members, which has been increased, with more to follow. The following officers were elected:

Past worthy president, Chas. Liller; worthy president, G. Semmes Hamill; vice president, J. C. Renninger; chaplain, Chas. A. Deffinbaugh; secretary, Stephen Nally; treasurer, J. A. Kelly; physician, Dr. J. E. Legge; conductor, D. E. Bolden; outside guard, Leslie King; inside guard, E. G. Naylor; trustees, J. M. Stanton, E. J. Frantz and John Sweeney.

Tuesday the Bradley farm, adjoining Oakland, consisting of about four hundred acres of land, was sold at mortgagee's sale by Mr. William E. Walsh, of Cumberland, he becoming the purchaser at the price of $33 per acre, amounting in all to about $13,000. The property was first offered in parcels, but was then withdrawn and sold as a whole. A number of persons placed bids on the property among them being Dr. Web. Ravenscroft and Mr. D. E. Offutt.

How many of our readers can tell us what the stripes on the barber pole signify? You see the pole with its stripes and you know there is a barber shop back of the pole, but here the knowledge of the average person ceases. In the early days barbers did the bleeding for the community and surgeons were not as plentiful as now. The first thing thought necessary, way down to the time of George Washington's death, was that any patient should be bled. Tap him and take a few ounces of blood from him, no matter how weak he might be. When Washington was at the last gasp, the fools bled him. Well, the red stripes on a barber pole mean the red ribbon bandages that barbers bound over the wounds caused by bleeding people. That's all. When they got through with a plethoric man, of full habit and had tapped him like a hard maple tree in February, he was patched up and bandaged till his arms, legs and trunks looked like a much-gartered leg.

Public Auction of Personal Property

The undersigned will offer at public auction on Wednesday, October 25th, beginning at 10 o'clock, on the Stephen Browning farm, two miles south of Oakland on the Crelin road, his personal property consisting of Horses, Cattle, Hogs, Sheep and a lot of farming implements. I have a lot of well bred stock and this sale will give an opportunity to farmers to secure some good stock. For further particulars see posters. J. T. Glotfelty. 2 pd.

Four Inches of Snow.

The tops of the mountains about town were white with snow Monday morning, the timber being almost as green as in July. At Waneta, on Point Mountain, it is said to have been four inches deep. Last year the first snow worth mentioning fell on October 10th, and later. It is astounding, but nevertheless a fact, that we have already had snow in seven months during 1907, with November and December yet to come.—Webster Echo.

Dear Sir: Such experiences as this are occurring all over the country.

Judge I. D. Fairchild owns two houses, exactly alike, in Lufkin, Texas. J. M. Torrence painted both houses, one Devoe, 15½ gallons; the other with another paint sold at same price; 25 gallons. That 25 gallon paint is weak and 15 per cent whiting; that's why it took 9½ gallons more.

You can learn for nothing what he had to pay-for.

Yours truly

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you
